

WILLIAMS HISTORY OF WASHINGTON COUNTY, OHIO
1788-1881

REPRINT THE BOOKMARK
KNIGHTSTOWN, IND.

WITHDRAWN
WRIGHT STATE UNIVERSITY LIBRARIES

1788-1881.

---

HISTORY

OF

WASHINGTON COUNTY,
OHIO,

WITH

ILLUSTRATIONS AND BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

New General Index Pg. 740-777

New Errata Addenda Index Pgs. 778-779

Errata and Addenda 780

---

H. Z. WILLIAMS & BRO.

PUBLISHERS.

1881

---

Reprinted 1976 by The Bookmark, PO Box 74
Knightstown, Ind. 46148

Sponsored by:

The Washington County Historical Society, Marietta, Ohio

RALPH LIETZ SCHROEDER

This essay on Ralph L. Schroeder by his colleague Prof. Owen P. Hawley was written for the Ralph L. Schroeder Memorial Tribute Issue of The Tallow Light, Bulletin of the Washington County Historical Society, Inc., Vol. 11, No. 3 [Oct.-Dec. 1976]. It appears in this book as a way of recognizing the contribution made to all portions of the new Williams History by Schroeder and Hawley.

18 February 1920 — 26 October 1976

To measure his legacy is not lightly done. Especially so if its dimensions are to be plumbed by one who not only shared his enthusiasms but also remained his close personal friend for twenty years.

Inevitably one starts with a catalogue. Ralph L. Schroeder served Washington County Historical Society as its president for five terms (1967-69, 1973-76) and as founder and editor of its bulletin The Tallow Light for its first three years (1966-69). During this period, through the vital energies of his personality, the Society grew. Its holdings increased, its monthly meetings, annual Seventh of April celebrations and acquisition of the Henry Fearing Home stimulated local interest, and its bulletin spread the history and genealogy of the Old Northwest Territory nationwide.

The Tallow Light, monthly during its first two years and quarterly since April 1968, mirrored his careful attention to detail, thoroughness of research, lyrical prose and persistent sense of wit and good humor. These elements appear in his longer articles on Catharine Fay Ewing, the David Ward 1808 Letter, Washington County's Ancient Earthworks and Marietta's Mound Cemetery. But they are even more visible in his shorter pieces "Broom Straws," "Notes Caught at Random" and "Candle Wishes for Your Cake." In this last piece he went beyond the frequent sprinklings he often made in the bulletin of quotes from his Minnesota poet-friends of the 1950's. Instead he transformed the Illinois prairie-magic stanzas of "that fantasy-filled poet Vachel Lindsay" into a light for the Marietta-Dream.

But to return to the catalogue. He served for several years on the Mayor's Mound Cemetery Restoration Committee. Based on his own complete, annotated reading of all cemetery stones, he provided information valuable to the project.

In January 1975, Marietta Chapter DAR issued his "Spirit of '76 People in Washington County, Ohio," a 17-page publication on Revolutionary War patriots associated with the county. This became the forerunner of an ambitious Washington County Historical Society bicentennial year reprint program under his direction. Largest of the six publications in this project were Washington County, Ohio, Marriages, 1789-1840 (in cooperation with Marietta Chapter DAR) and the emendated and enlarged re-issuance of H.Z. Williams 1881 History of Washington County, Ohio with notes and indices. Death claimed him within the final galley-proofs of this last project.

Beyond these contributions, he gave frequent talks on three of his favorite enthusiasms: Vachel Lindsay, genealogy and art. Himself a poet of considerable lyrical ability, he collected, studied and wrote on the poetry of Lindsay, Anna Hempstead Branch and Ralph Hodgson. His genealogical bent appears in his sizeable knowledge of Old Northwest Territory family roots as well as in research into his own family history with its beginnings in Illinois, Indiana, New York and Germany. Sharp perception in color and beauty are evident in his abilities as an artist, especially in collage and scissor-cutting. His annual Christmas greeting cards often epitomized the blending of the first and last of these enthusiasms.

As final elements in the catalogue could be added these brief notes. He was born in Chicago, a son of Charles F. and Emilie (Bahde) Schroeder, and was reared on the prairies of Illinois' Fayette County near St. Peter. A freelance writer, he attended Concordia College and the University of Minnesota. He is survived by his mother, one sister, Mrs. Roger G. (Martha) O'Dell both of St. Peter, a niece and two nephews. Private burial services occurred at Marietta's Mound Cemetery in what he once described as "the clashing month of winds farewelling a season": 10 November 1976, the 97th birthday anniversary of Vachel Lindsay.

But such elements in a factual catalogue cover only the tangibles. Of greater import are his higher gifts. Moved by a vigor toward perfectionism, he abhorred dullness and mediocrity. Instead his spirit was one of lyricism, generosity, vision and imagination. It breathed the color of wit and laughter, the gaiety of balloons, the joy of wonder. These gifts light the essence of his legacy, spun in lathstring welcoming, captured in the web of memory.

Owen Philip Hawley

All Saints Day:

1 November 1976

PREFATORY NOTE.

---

In placing this History of Washington County before their patrons, the publishers feel that they have faithfully fulfilled all pledges made at the outset, and that their work will stand the tests of candid criticism.

That a volume containing, as does this, upwards of seven hundred royal quarto pages of printed matter—considerably more than three-quarters of a million words presenting at least ten thousand facts and twice ten thousand names—should be absolutely free from error, no thinking person will expect; and while we do not claim unerring accuracy, we are confident, such has been the conscientious care of our corps of writers and gatherers of facts, that the work we now place before the public does not contain any serious errors of statement, and that the sins of omission are not numerous or great. No pains have been spared to make the history at once comprehensive and correct. The task which confronted the writers when they began the preparation of the History of Washington County was one of arduous responsibility, but having entered upon it we believe that they have labored zealously and judiciously, and the publishers have no hesitancy in resting the result of their labors with the public.

The general history of Washington county, and the history of Marietta were principally prepared by Mr. Alfred Mathews. The history of the origin and doings of the Ohio Land company, and the events which were of chief importance to those who effected the initial settlement at Marietta are vividly narrated by Mr. Mathews. It far surpasses any other narrative extant of the same facts, both as to detail and interesting manner of statement.

Chief among the assistants were Mr. Benjamin S. Grosscup and Clarence G. Reynolds, among whose productions we may mention respectively the chapters devoted to Waterford and Belpre. The Military History, as is elsewhere indicated, is the work of S. J. Hathaway, esq., of Marietta. The History of the Washington County Bar was written by R. E. Harte, esq. An interesting chapter appears accredited to Anselm T. Nye, and a large portion of another, of especial value, is from the pen of William P. Cutler. Miss Mary Cone contributed the biography of General Rufus Putnam. The history of Marietta college was furnished by President Andrews. Other residents of the city of Marietta and Washington county have contributed to various departments and credit is given them, individually, in connection with their work.

The fact that the writers in our employ have availed themselves of every opportunity for research in the original authorities and sources of information, will be patent to every reader. The many valuable manuscripts which have been preserved and gathered into the college library, and others in private possession were generously proffered for their use, and have been advantageously consulted. A large amount of historical lore has been gathered, little by little, through personal interviews with the few living repositories of old-time memories. With a solitary exception, the people of Marietta and of Washington county have been courteous and cordial in extending to our corps of writers whatever aid was in their power. Of this class, and among those whose position has enabled them to be of especial service, we may mention the Hon. William P. Cutler, Anselm T. Nye, esq., Miss Mary C. Nye, Miss Julia Cutler, Mrs. Sarah Cutler Dawes, Mrs. Dr. Z. D. Walter, President I. W. Andrews, R. M. Stimson, esq., William F. Curtis, Captain C. M. Cole, Hon. Harlow Chapin, Miss Mary Monette, George T. Hovey and Beman Gates, of Marietta; Colonel John Stone and Captain George Dana, of Belpre; Dr. Joseph M. McElHinney, of Newport; E. S. McIntosh, General H. F. Devol and Stephen Powers, of Waterford. To these, to the members of the press, the pastors of the several churches and the obliging county officials, and to hundreds of others, in behalf of the writers engaged on this volume we return most cordial thanks.

THE WILLIAMS BROTHERS AND THEIR PUBLICATIONS

1881 was an especially busy year for the Williams Brothers, publishers of Ohio, Kentucky and Iowa county histories. In that year, from offices on the northwest corner of St. Clair and Ontario in Cleveland, they issued four substantial volumes: those on Buchanan County, Iowa; Ohio Falls Cities & Their Counties (Jefferson County, Kentucky); Preble County, Ohio; and Washington County, Ohio.

The Williams Publishing Company had begun its publication of county histories in 1878 through the assistance of J. B. Lippincott Publishing House in Philadelphia with the two books on Ashtabula County, Ohio, and Geauga & Lake counties, Ohio. A year later had come its histories of the Firelands (Huron & Erie counties, Ohio) and Lorain County, Ohio. Although the 1879 Firelands and Lorain volumes bore the imprint of Williams Bros., Philadelphia, they were actually printed by The Leader Company, Cleveland. 1880 was the year the Williams Brothers moved its quarters from Philadelphia to Cleveland and issued its volumes on Ohio's Ashland and Ross & Highland counties. Then in 1882 the brothers published the last of their twelve county histories: that of 834 pages on Sandusky County, Ohio and the two-volume work on Trumbull & Mahoning counties, Ohio.

Eldest of the four Williams Brothers, Publishers, who were born at Bellevue, Ohio, on the Huron-Sandusky county line was William W., fourth of the eight children of David Williams (1810-1871) and his first wife, Rebecca Elliott (d. 1854). Born 28 April 1842, William W. married first 9 April 1868, Susan C. Wood (1844-1872). His second wife was Mary Woodward.

The next brother, the one whose name appears most prominently on the 1881 history of Washington County, Ohio, was Hamilton Zadok Williams, born 2 July 1844. Like his Pennsylvania-born father, H. Z. Williams was a Bellevue, Ohio, farmer when he signed to serve from May to September 1864 as a private in Co. I., 169th O. V. I. After his marriage 1 September 1870 to Florence Adams (1848-1932), he and his wife lived a few years in Iowa, Kansas and Michigan before they returned to Ohio in 1880 and then settled in 1883 at Springfield, Missouri, where H. Z. Williams died 8 December 1923.

Third and fourth Williams Brothers were Theodore F. (b. 7 December 1846) who married Sarah Eckhardt, and Louis A. (b. 22 January 1849) whose wives were Jessie Sinclair (d. 1873) and Lizzie Bolt.

During the five years starting in 1878 and ending in 1882, the Williams Publishing Company had on the many thousand pages of its dozen county histories covered the past and the then-present of one Iowa, one Kentucky and fourteen Ohio counties. In November 1884, from its offices at 145 St. Clair St., Cleveland, it launched another important venture, the Magazine of Western History. Founded and edited until 1887 by William W. Williams, assisted by his younger brother, Louis, the periodical published Old Northwest Territory material of the highest caliber.

In the decade, then, from 1878 to 1888 the Williams Publishing Company made a truly significant contribution to the preservation of Old Northwest Territory history. In sponsoring this bicentennial reprint, Washington County Historical Society, Inc. hopes to provide a wider dissemination of the information about the Old Northwest Territory's first permanent settlement and Ohio's first county which appeared in the Washington County history of 1881.

7 April 1976

Owen P. Hawley
Assoc. Prof., English, Marietta College
Treasurer & Editor, Washington County Historical Society, Inc.

NEW INDEX and ADDENDA-ERRATA

|                                    |         |
|------------------------------------|---------|
| New General Index .....            | 740-777 |
| New Errata and Addenda Index ..... | 778-779 |
| Errata and Addenda Notes .....     | 780     |

CONTENTS.

HISTORICAL.

| GENERAL HISTORY.  |       | CHAPTER.                                 |  | PAGE. |
|---|-------|--|--|-------|
| CHAPTER.  | PAGE. |  |  |       |
| I.—Aboriginal Occupation of Ohio  | 9     | XXVIII.—Educational Matters              |  | 392   |
| II.—Ownership of the Northwest  | 13    | XXIX.—The Medical Profession             |  | 405   |
| III.—Advent of the White Man  | 16    | XXX.—The Press                           |  | 412   |
| IV.—Affairs in the West from 1785 to 1788                                 | 20    | XXXI.—Societies                          |  | 417   |
| V.—Inception of the Emigration Idea, and Organization of the Ohio Company | 26    | XXXII.—Natural Phenomena                 |  | 423   |
| VI.—The Ordinance of 1787, and the Ohio Company's Purchase                | 34    | XXXIII.—Reminiscences of Slavery Days    |  | 428   |
| VII.—From New England to Ohio   | 43    | XXXIV.—Some Distinguished Visitors       |  | 431   |
| VIII.—Progress of Settlement and Improvement                              | 48    | XXXV.—Municipal Matters                  |  | 433   |
| IX.—The Indian War  | 59    | XXXVI.—The Ancient Remains—Burial Places |  | 439   |
| X.—The Indian War—Continued   | 71    | XXXVII.—Moral and Material Advancement   |  | 444   |
| XI.—Later History of the Ohio Company                                     | 89    |  |  |       |
| XII.—The Era of Peace   | 95    | TOWNSHIPS AND VILLAGES.                  |  |       |
| XIII.—Political Measures and Events from 1788 to 1803                     | 101   | XXXVIII.—Belpre Township                 |  | 448   |
| XIV.—Civil History of Washington County                                   | 108   | XXXIX.—Waterford Township                |  | 530   |
| XV.—The Bench and Bar of Washington County                                | 114   | XL.—Adams Township                       |  | 556   |
| XVI.—War of 1812  | 133   | XLI.—Newport Township                    |  | 563   |
| XVII.—War of the Rebellion  | 143   | XLII.—Salem Township                     |  | 579   |
| XVIII.—War of the Rebellion—Continued                                     | 157   | XLIII.—Grand View Township               |  | 592   |
| XIX.—War of the Rebellion—Continued—1864-65                               | 167   | XLIV.—Muskingum Township                 |  | 605   |
| XX.—War of the Rebellion—Continued  | 174   | XLV.—Watertown Township                  |  | 621   |
| XXI.—History of Public Improvements in Washington County                  | 337   | XLVI.—Warren Township                    |  | 633   |
| XXII.—County Societies  | 346   | XLVII.—Dunham Township                   |  | 647   |
| XXIII.—Physical Features of Washington County                             | 351   | XLVIII.—Lawrence Township                |  | 654   |
|   |       | XLIX.—Palmer Township                    |  | 665   |
| MARIETTA.   |       | L.—Aurelius Township                     |  | 674   |
| XXIV.—Early Events—Moral Condition of the Community                       | 355   | LI.—Fearing Township                     |  | 683   |
| XXV.—Mercantile Business and Manufacturing                                | 364   | LII.—Independence Township               |  | 684   |
| XXVI.—Navigation  | 375   | LIII.—Ludlow Township                    |  | 699   |
| XXVII.—Religious History—The Churches                                     | 380   | LIV.—Liberty Township                    |  | 705   |
|   |       | LV.—Barlow Township                      |  | 710   |
|   |       | LVI.—Wesley Township                     |  | 719   |
|   |       | LVII.—Decatur Township                   |  | 730   |
|   |       | LVIII.—Fairfield Township                |  | 725   |

BIOGRAPHICAL.

|                        | PAGE. |                         | PAGE.           |
|------------------------|-------|-------------------------|-----------------|
| Andrews, Israel Ward   | 486   | Buell, General Joseph   | 466             |
| Andrews, E. B.         | 242   | Buell, Don Carlos       | 228             |
| Addy, Rev. William     | 492   | Buell, Daniel Hand      | 468             |
| Alban, David           | 127   | Buell, Hiram A.         | 468             |
| Alderman, E. R.        | 415   | Buell, Timothy          | 142             |
| Andrews, Samuel James  | 124   | Buell, Charles F.       | 122             |
| Barker, Isaac          | 502   | Buell, Frank            | 128-247         |
| Blennerhassett, Harman | 472   | Burch, Hiram            | 491             |
| Barclay, Charles R.    | 127   | Brown, William (facing) | 686             |
| Backus, Elijah         | 117   | Bisantz, C. T.          | between 684-685 |
| Backus, Thomas         | 118   | Bohl, Henry             | facing 436      |
| Barber, David          | 122   | Cass, Lewis             | 117             |
| Bartlett, G. B.        | 250   | Clarke, Melvin          | 124-240         |
| Barton, Robert C.      | 143   | Cutler, Rev. Manasseh   | 455             |
| Bent, Daniel           | 502   | Cutler, Ephraim         | 471             |
| Bent, Nahum            | 502   | Cutler, William Parker  | 485             |
| Browning, William      | 501   | Cushing, Nathaniel      | 500             |
| Bradford, Robert       | 505   | Converse, Benjamin      | 551             |
| Bowen, George          | 533   | Curtis, Walter          | 529             |
| Bowen, Charles         | 537   | Chapin, Harlow          | 487             |
| Bowen (family)         | 552   | Cone, Timothy and Sarah | 646             |
| Boyd, Rev. John        | 492   | Condit, Timothy L.      | 252             |
| Brabham, Walter        | 128   | Cole, Samson            | facing 420      |
| Brough, John           | 416   | Cole, Caius Marcus      | 488             |

|                           | PAGE.           |                              | PAGE.               |
|---------------------------|-----------------|------------------------------|---------------------|
| Chamberlain, John Dresser | 633             | Hathaway, Luther             | 254                 |
| Cotton, Josiah Dexter     | 411             | Hart, Seth                   | 490                 |
| Cotton, John              | 410             | Hart, Benjamin Franklin      | 411                 |
| Cook, Charles A.          | 131             | Hart, Simon D.               | 412                 |
| Crew, Joshua T.           | 129             | Hart, Samuel                 | 412                 |
| Collett, James W.         | 129             | Harte, Rufus E.              | 122                 |
| Chamberlain, Luman W.     | 130             | Holland, Harvey              | 127                 |
| Cooke, Pardon             | 254             | Holland, Harvey, jr.         | 130                 |
| Cheatham, Richard B.      | 253             | Hempstead, G. M. P.          | 410                 |
| Cram, Jacob               | 256             | Hildreth, Samuel P.          | 408                 |
| Cram, Jonathan            | 480             | Hildreth, G. O.              | 416                 |
| Curtis, Jason R.          | 143             | Howe, Perley                 | 529                 |
| Cutter, Frederick J.      | 469             | Howe, Rufus William          | 530                 |
| Cooney, J.                | facing 554      | Hill, Ira (and family)       | 591                 |
| Dana, Benjamin            | 536             | Hill, Alexander              | 141                 |
| Dana, William             | 499             | Hildebrand, Jesse            | 239                 |
| Danielson, Timothy E.     | 142             | Holden, Joseph               | 479                 |
| Davis, Daniel             | 551             | Hoon, Madison                | 247                 |
| Dawes, Ephraim C.         | 245             | Irvine, John                 | 130                 |
| Dawes, Henry Manasseh     | 128             | Jumper, John J.              | 250                 |
| Dawes, Rufus R.           | 237             | Knowles, Samuel S.           | 126                 |
| Devol, Jonathan           | 502             | Koenig, Jacob                | 246                 |
| Devol, (Family)           | 551             | Lake, Mary                   | 464                 |
| Devol, Stephen            | 541             | Leonard, William B.          | 406                 |
| Devol, Wanton             | 550             | Loomis, William B.           | 127                 |
| Devol, Gilbert            | 550             | Lorey, William               | 131                 |
| Devol, General H. F.      | 235             | Little, Nathaniel            | 501                 |
| Devol, Captain Charles    | 336             | Loring, Daniel               | 504                 |
| Dodge, Nathaniel          | 480             | Loring, O. H.                | facing 525          |
| Dodge, John               | 549             | Meigs, Return Jonathan, sr.  | 462                 |
| Drown, Solomon            | 406             | Meigs, Return Jonathan, jr.  | 470                 |
| Eddy, C. W.               | 411             | Mason, Richard D.            | 253                 |
| Dyar, John                | 619             | Mayberry, John Pennybacker   | 120                 |
| Dyar, Joseph              | 619             | McClure, James               | 412                 |
| Burgess, Dyer             | 486             | McClure, Andrew              | 549                 |
| Dye, J. H.                | facing 444      | McCormick, Andrew W.         | 131                 |
| Dye, Samuel               | facing 637      | McCormick, John W.           | 132                 |
| Dye, J. T.                | between 660-661 | McCormick, F. R.             | 132                 |
| Eells, Arthur D.          | 249             | McIntosh, Nathan             | 407                 |
| Emerson, Caleb            | 119             | McIntosh, E. S.              | facing 544          |
| Emerson, William D.       | 123             | McIntosh, William            | facing 549          |
| Ewart, Thomas W.          | 126             | McElHinney, Joseph M.        | facing 565          |
| Ewart, Thomas             | 129             | McMillen, S. M.              | 417                 |
| Farley, Thomas            | 406             | Mills, John                  | 480                 |
| Fearing, Paul             | 116             | Miles, Benjamin              | 505                 |
| Fearing, B. D.            | 493             | Moore, Thomas Watson         | between 496 and 497 |
| Foster, Peregrine         | 502             | Moore, Jonas                 | 410                 |
| Flagg, James              | 141             | Mueller, Jacob               | 417                 |
| Fouraker, Levi J.         | 251             | Malster, John                | facing 624          |
| Follett, Martin Dewey     | 491             | Mellor, Jesse                | 645                 |
| Follett, Alfred Dewey     | 132             | Mason, Manley W.             | facing 561          |
| Frazer, Cornelius T.      | 130             | Nye, Ichabod                 | 462                 |
| Fuller, Shubel            | 411             | Nye, Anselm Tupper           | 482                 |
| Gates, Beman              | 414             | Nye, Dudley Selden           | 125                 |
| Gates, Charles Beman      | 252             | Nye, Reuben L.               | 129                 |
| Greene, Griffin           | 501             | Nye, Horace                  | 143                 |
| Goodale, Nathan           | 504             | Nye, Arius                   | 121                 |
| Guthrie, Truman           | 506             | Nye, Arius Spencer           | 123                 |
| Gray, William             | 548             | Nye, William Spencer         | 125                 |
| Goddard, George R.        | 652             | Oliver, Robert               | 461                 |
| Gard, Hiram               | facing 716      | Oliver, Alexander            | 501                 |
| Giffin, Robert            | 704             | Oldham, Wylie H.             | 123                 |
| German, Morris            | 411             | Oldham, Frank F.             | 131                 |
| Gilman, Rebecca           | 446             | Parsons, Samuel Holden       | 115-458             |
| Gardner, Darwin E.        | 123             | Preston, John C.             | 132                 |
| Goddard, Levi Hart        | 122             | Palmer, Jewett               | 493                 |
| Guitteau, John T.         | 123             | Palmer, John Alexander       | 256                 |
| Green, Davis              | 123             | Paxton, John C.              | 243                 |
| Greenwood, Theodore E.    | 250             | Pearce, Edgar P.             | 253                 |
| Gear, Hiram L.            | 129             | Potterfield, William L.      | 255                 |
| Haskell, Jonathan         | 500             | Putnam, Rufus                | 448                 |
| Haskins, Alexander L.     | 245             | Putnam (M. D.), William Pitt | 406                 |
| Hart, Josiah              | 406             | Putnam, David                | 475                 |
| Hawks, Rev. T. H.         | 493             | Putnam, Douglas              | 483                 |
| Hamilton, John A.         | 130             | Putnam, Israel               | 500                 |
| Hathaway, Seymour J.      | 130             | Putnam, Aaron Waldo          | 505                 |

|                                      | PAGE.               |                                      | PAGE.               |
|--------------------------------------|---------------------|--------------------------------------|---------------------|
| Putnam, W. D. . . . .                | 412                 | Swan, Gustavus . . . . .             | 119                 |
| Pierce, Isaac . . . . .              | 505                 | Sibley, Hiram Luther . . . . .       | 496                 |
| Powers, William H. . . . .           | between 552 and 553 | Selby, James C. . . . .              | 246                 |
| Powers, Stephen . . . . .            | between 552 and 553 | Smith, James W. . . . .              | 721                 |
| Porter, Amos (and family) . . . . .  | 590                 | Towne, Henry A. . . . .              | 125                 |
| Phillips, J. D. . . . .              | facing 440          | Trautman, John W. . . . .            | 132                 |
| Ramsey, William M. . . . .           | 128                 | True, Jabez . . . . .                | 405                 |
| Regnier, John Baptiste . . . . .     | 406                 | Trevor, Hugh . . . . .               | 411                 |
| Regnier, Felix . . . . .             | 411                 | Thorniley, John . . . . .            | 141                 |
| Rhodes, Charles R. . . . .           | 124                 | Turner, George B. . . . .            | 251                 |
| Richardson, William P. . . . .       | 126                 | Tupper, General Benjamin . . . . .   | 458                 |
| Robinson, Samuel B. . . . .          | 124                 | Tupper, Anselm . . . . .             | 465                 |
| Ruggles, Benjamin . . . . .          | 118                 | Tupper, Colonel Benjamin . . . . .   | 466                 |
| Rood, David E. . . . .               | 131                 | Tupper, Edward W. . . . .            | 140                 |
| Rea, M. Wilber . . . . .             | 132                 | Varnum, James Mitchell . . . . .     | 116-459             |
| Ridgway, Sidney . . . . .            | 132                 | White, Haffield . . . . .            | 461                 |
| Ross, James . . . . .                | 132                 | Ward, Nahum . . . . .                | 476                 |
| Rouse, John (and Rebecca) . . . . .  | 500                 | Ward, J. C. . . . .                  | facing 688          |
| Rice, George T. . . . .              | 245                 | Ward, Augustus T. . . . .            | 248                 |
| Rodick, Bros . . . . .               | facing 446          | Wallace, Robert . . . . .            | 408                 |
| Sproat, Ebenezer . . . . .           | 461                 | Walter, Z. D. . . . .                | 412                 |
| St. Clair, Governor Arthur . . . . . | 462                 | Williamson, H. A. . . . .            | 604                 |
| Stacey, William . . . . .            | 465                 | Woodford, William G. . . . .         | between 628 and 629 |
| Story, Rev. Daniel . . . . .         | 468                 | Way, William G. . . . .              | 129                 |
| Slocomb, William . . . . .           | 479                 | Way, James E. . . . .                | 131                 |
| Stone, Colonel John . . . . .        | facing 512          | Whipple, Commodore Abraham . . . . . | 459                 |
| Stowe, James S. . . . .              | 620                 | Woodbridge, William, . . . . .       | 118                 |
| Shaw, Rodney K. . . . .              | 127                 | Whittlesey, William A. . . . .       | 122                 |
| Sheppard, Thomas R. . . . .          | 129                 | Whittlesey, William Beale . . . . .  | 246                 |
| Stevens, G. J. . . . .               | 411                 | Williams, Isaac . . . . .            | 464                 |
| Stanley, Wilson . . . . .            | 411                 | Williams, Rebecca . . . . .          | 464                 |
| Stimson, Rodney M. . . . .           | 126                 |                                      |                     |

ILLUSTRATIONS.

|   | PAGE.               |  | PAGE.               |
|---|---------------------|--|---------------------|
| Portrait of General Rufus Putnam . . . . .        | facing 28           | Portraits of J. H. Dye and wife . . . . .                | facing 444          |
| " " Manasseh Cutler . . . . .                     | facing 40           | " " Rodick Brothers, with view of Store . . . . .        | facing 446          |
| View of Campus Martius and Fort Harmar . . . . .  | facing 48           | Portrait of H. L. Sibley . . . . .                       | facing 496          |
| Portrait of Commodore Whipple . . . . .           | facing 53           | " " Colonel John Stone . . . . .                         | facing 512          |
| " " H. Blennerhassett . . . . .                   | facing 100          | " " O. H. Loring . . . . .                               | facing 525          |
| " " Ephraim Cutler . . . . .                      | facing 108          | " " Walter Curtis . . . . .                              | facing 528          |
| " " Return J. Meigs . . . . .                     | facing 116          | Residence of G. A. Howe . . . . .                        | facing 529          |
| " " General Don Carlos Buell . . . . .            | facing 144          | Portrait of Dr. George Bowen . . . . .                   | facing 532          |
| " " Colonel Jesse Hildebrand . . . . .            | facing 152          | " " Charles Bowen . . . . .                              | facing 533          |
| " " General Paul Fearing . . . . .                | facing 169          | Portraits of Stephen Devol and wife . . . . .            | between 540 and 541 |
| " " General H. F. Devol . . . . .                 | facing 184          | " " E. S. McIntosh and wife . . . . .                    | between 544 and 545 |
| " " Colonel John C. Paxton . . . . .              | facing 196          | Portrait of William McIntosh . . . . .                   | facing 549          |
| Embarkation of troops and Battleflag . . . . .    | facing 200          | Portraits of William H. and Stephen Powers . . . . .     | between 552 and 553 |
| Portrait of Major Jewett Palmer . . . . .         | facing 216          | Portrait of J. Cooney . . . . .                          | facing 554          |
| " " Lieutenant Luther Hathaway . . . . .          | facing 254          | " " Manly W. Mason . . . . .                             | facing 561          |
| " " Lieutenant John A. Palmer . . . . .           | facing 256          | Portraits of J. M. McElHinney and wife . . . . .         | between 564 and 565 |
| View of Soldiers' Monument . . . . .              | facing 333          | Residence, with portraits, of H. A. Williamson . . . . . | 604                 |
| Portrait of David Putnam . . . . .                | facing 360          | Portrait of Thomas Ridgway . . . . .                     | facing 612          |
| " " Nahum Ward . . . . .                          | facing 364          | Portraits of J. B. Dyar and wife . . . . .               | between 616 and 617 |
| " " Colonel John Mills . . . . .                  | facing 368          | " " James S. Stowe and wife . . . . .                    | between 620 and 621 |
| " " Douglas Putnam . . . . .                      | facing 372          | Portrait of John Malster . . . . .                       | facing 624          |
| " " W. P. Cutler . . . . .                        | facing 380          | Portraits of Mr. and Mrs. William G. Woodford . . . . .  | between 628 and 629 |
| " " Thomas W. Ewart . . . . .                     | facing 388          | Portrait of Samuel Dye . . . . .                         | facing 637          |
| " " I. W. Andrews . . . . .                       | facing 392          | Residence of H. Lyman Hart . . . . .                     | facing 641          |
| " " M. D. Follett . . . . .                       | facing 396          | " " Jesse Mellor, with portrait . . . . .                | facing 645          |
| Portraits of Mr. and Mrs. Harlow Chapin . . . . . | between 404 and 405 | " " George R. Goddard . . . . .                          | facing 652          |
| Portrait of Dr. Seth Hart . . . . .               | facing 408          | Portrait of J. T. Dye . . . . .                          | facing 660          |
| " " B. F. Hart . . . . .                          | facing 412          | " " C. F. Bisantz . . . . .                              | facing 684          |
| Portraits of Mr. and Mrs. C. M. Cole . . . . .    | between 416 and 417 | " " William Brown . . . . .                              | facing 686          |
| Portrait of Sampson Cole . . . . .                | facing 420          | " " John C. Ward . . . . .                               | facing 688          |
| " " T. W. Moore . . . . .                         | facing 424          | Residence, with portraits, of Robert Giffin, . . . . .   | facing 704          |
| " " David Alban . . . . .                         | facing 432          | Portraits of Hiram Gard and wife . . . . .               | facing 716          |
| " " Henry Bohl . . . . .                          | facing 436          | Residence, with portraits, of James W. Smith . . . . .   | 721                 |
| " " J. D. Phillips . . . . .                      | facing 440          | Portrait of L. P. Dunsmore . . . . .                     | facing 728          |
| " " F. J. Cutter . . . . .                        | facing 442          |  |                     |

MIRROR, MIRROR ON THE WALL: RECEPTION OF THE WILLIAMS HISTORY

Once upon a time, so this story begins, in the territory northwest of the river Ohio, there was a man by the name of St. Clair, who was governor of all these lands. He had a beautiful daughter whose name was Louisa. Every day this spirited child, in scarlet habit, rode upon her charger along the forest trails. Thus, side-saddled, she could outspurt any of the horse-borne men throughout the territory.

If, into this cauldron, we now add, mix well and stir, one witch and a fairy prince, we shall have a well done fantasy. Alas, we do not happen to have a Prince Charming upon the shelf, and we shall reserve the witch for later use.

No, this is not a fairytale, so you may as well uncurl yourself. The beautiful Louisa was not properly cast in the role of a chargirl, nor was she, as one of flaxen hair, put to spinning all day, with blood dripping from her delicate fingertips.

The line that divides fact from fantasy, or fiction if you will, is a genuine problem that confronts the historian, who, being honest, wishes to present and interpret nothing but fact. If, for example, we say that the history of the northwest territory is, to a large extent, the story of the development of the Land System in the United States of America, we are stating a fact. This is put down in the history books.

Unfortunately, history is seldom fixed or stable. Old documents and letters are found by the eager historian that alter what was once thought to be a fixed fact. Generation after generation, moreover, moves slyly toward new concepts, and within this framework of ideas the concept of history itself changes. It is and must be re-interpreted. Thus old heroes tumble and forgotten figures come back into living thought.

In a lesser degree perhaps this is true also of local history. In the first issue of the Tallow Light a footnote was presented:

H. Z. Williams & Bro. (Alfred F. Mathews, et al.), History of Washington County, Ohio (Cleveland, 1881).

We shall now call upon and discharge the witch from her high shelf, without giving her genealogical background. She is the same Queen, the step-mother, who cackled in "Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs." If we are quiet, if we listen, perhaps not even too intently, we can hear her chanting yet today:

Mirror, Mirror on the Wall,
Who has the fairest Mug of all?

You may remember this couplet with slight variation. At any rate her chant, in various form, echoes throughout most of the compendiums of local history. These huge volumes, because of their gallery of portraits, came to be known as "Mug Books," while the witch's chant rides throughout the biographical sections.

Williams' History of Washington County, Ohio, may not be considered a "Mug Book" in the strictest sense of the word, but rather as a forerunner of this type of work. This history, attributed to the brothers Williams, was begun apparently in the late fall of 1880. The Marietta Register for the 18th of November, in that year, carried a brief notice that "Mr. Alfred F. Mathews*, a former newspaper man and now with Williams Brothers . . . is making his headquarters at Mrs. Brown's, Second Street." A week later, 25th Nov., the Marietta newspaper carried a more substantial notice under the caption: "Messrs. Williams & Bro.'s Historical Enterprise." Their explanation read in part:

It is especially desired that those persons who are the depositories of information upon especial topics, shall be in readiness to give the fullest details possible upon these topics whatever they may be.

A description of the proposed history, and a tentative publication date, was also given:

The volume will contain not less than 450 royal quarto pages, and be printed in the best style of the art . . . upon heavy tinted paper . . . owing to the size of the volume, and the extraordinarily large task that the writers have before them in this classic ground, the company, although employing about eighteen or twenty men in all departments will be unable to conclude its labors before the middle of next year.

A roster of the principal writers of the various sections in Williams' History of Washington County, appears in the Prefatory Note; and, of these, Stephen Powers perhaps contributed one of the most engaging sections. Under any circumstance the compilation of such a history, within an abbreviated year, was an ambitious undertaking. The work, larger than at first conceived, by its very nature and by the nature of man, could not escape the shaking finger of accusation. The Prefatory Note acknowledges this:

That a volume containing, as does this, upwards of seven hundred royal quarto pages of printed matter — considerably more than three quarters of a million words, presenting at least ten thousand facts and twice ten thousand names — should be absolutely free from error, no thinking person will expect; and while we do not claim unerring accuracy, we are confident, such has been the conscientious care of our corps of writers and gatherers of facts, that the work we now place before the public does not contain any serious errors of statement, and that the sins of omission are not numerous or great.

While it is true that we do not care to have butter slapped on both sides of our bread, there are other factors that must be considered. Most of us demand the bread of honesty, or so we profess. Williams' History of Washington County had barely been placed between boards, when a delightful howl arose. The Marietta Register for Thursday, 20th Oct., 1881, carried the following item:

THAT HISTORY

Some months since a company calling themselves Williams & Brother proposed to write a history of Washington county, and many supposed it would be a good thing to have, and so it would if it had been written correctly and subscribers obtained in an honorable manners. (sic) Having lived in the county nearly seventy-five years, I was referred to as one who would be likely to furnish some statistics that would be of value. A man by the name of Devol came to me for the above purpose and I gave him what little information I could. — He took notes of what I told him, and then said he would like my signature, which I very innocently, and as it now appears, ignorantly gave. But at no time did he ask me to subscribe for the book. And now I charge him, and through him the company for which he acts, with swindling and dishonesty. I grant that the body of the work is in the main correct. Thanks to Hildreth's histories and the manuscripts of the men who had been to school long enough to distinguish between the letters T. L. S. and K. Otherwise there is scarcely a page that I have examined that is free from inaccuracies.

Rhoda E. Vincent.

Vincent, October 11th, 1881.

This letter by Mrs. Vincent<sup>2</sup> needs no comment, including the remark concerning the penmanship of Washington County Residents. In the same issue of the newspaper<sup>3</sup> a second item regarding the history appeared in the Belpre column:

The most talk is about the Washington County History, since the case of H. Z. Williams & Bros. vs. James Gander<sup>4</sup> (sic) before L. E. Stone, Esq., and a jury verdict was given in favor of plaintiff. The complaint is that the agent took names as subscribers, when the parties supposed they were signing something else. But had a note for one thousand dollars been presented for signatures, the parties would no doubt have read it before signing. The agent may in some cases have misrepresented, but careful men as those who claim to be swindled, should blame themselves. And their advice to us younger men would have been, "never sign your name to anything unknown to you." The names were taken in a separate book from the copy of the history taken.

Still another Civil Action came before Anson McNeal, J. P. of Muskingum Twp., Case No. 7, 29 Aug., 1882. The plaintiffs in this case being H. Z. Williams & Bro. (W. W. Williams), in which they were suing one Israel Devol<sup>5</sup>, defendant, for failure to pay for a copy of the said history, etc., according to the contract he had allegedly signed.

And now comes the said defendant Israel Devol and says:

. . . that he denies that he made or agreed to the contract set forth in the plaintiff's bill of particulars and further says that he agreed to take one copy of said history upon the representations of one Dawson, made orally, that said history be accurate and reliable as a history of Washington County and be gotten up in binding and style and in all ways equal to the Encyclopedia Britannica; that if said defendant was not satisfied with the book he, said defendant, need not take it . . .

According to the plaintiffs, Devol owed them a total of $32.00, of which $12.00 was the cost of the published volume; and $20.00 "on account, for publishing and advertising the biographical sketch of said defendant and his ancestors in their illustrated History of Washington County."

Soon after, on the 30th September, 1882, Sidney Ridgeway, of the firm of Way and Ridgeway, had served a notice on H. Z. Williams, and subsequently a deposition was completed on the 7th Oct., of that year, in the office of M. A. Calhoun, Warren, Trumbull Co., Ohio.

In this deposition one of the plaintiffs stated:

My name is H. Z. Williams; age 38; residence, Lake Side, Ohio.

In effect, he continued: The History of Washington County was sold by our solicitors by sample copies of other counties which we had gotten up. The solicitor for Muskingum Twp. was Mr. S. D. Dawson, who carried a copy of the History of Huron and Erie Counties, as an example of our work; and it was this history which he exhibited to the defendant, Devol. We have gotten up about twenty histories in the past, and we have always regarded the History of Washington County as our best work, far superior as compared with that of Huron and Erie Counties.

To fortify Devol's case, that the said history contained gross errors, a deposition had been taken, in which the person stated:

My name is Cornelius D. Battelle, I am 76 years of age, I am a minister by occupation.

Battelle continued:

I was present at all the quarterly meetings at Newport from 1825 to 1833 and I know that no such drunkenness or intoxication occurred as is recorded in H. Z. Williams & Bros. History of Washington Co., pages 444 and 445. Ebenezer Battelle was my father and I was present at the quarterly meeting held in 1828 at my father's house and there were none "visibly affected by liquor," neither was there any "decidedly drunk."

(signed) Cornelius D. Battelle

On the 26th Oct., 1882, both parties (Devol and Williams) appeared, jury sworn and trial held, and the jury . . . returned the verdict as follows: "We the jury do find verdict (in favor) for the defendant. A. S. Mellor, foreman."

That a volume such as the History of Washington County "should be absolutely free from error, no thinking person will expect." The Rev. Cornelius Battelle restrained himself in telling all, even regarding the subject of peach brandy. He also refrained from saying that history usually deals with mortals and not with celestial beings. Above all, he forgot that one should not dally before a mirror unduly.

Ralph L. Schroeder, President

Washington County Historical Society, Inc. based on an essay by the author in The Tallow Light: Bulletin of Washington County Historical Society, Inc., Vol. 1, No. 2 (December 1966), pp. 22-25.

<sup>1</sup>Alfred F. Mathews (15 Sept., 1852 - 15 Oct., 1904), b. in Painesville, Lake Co., O., a free-lance writer, journalist and historian, he wrote many historical articles for the New York Times and other publications, and wrote several county histories. His death occurred at Philadelphia.

<sup>2</sup>Rhoda E. Vincent, dau. of Elisha Clark and Helen Brown. Her tombstone in the Barlow Cemetery gives the following legend: Rhoda E. Clark, wf. of Henry Earl Vincent (d. 23 June, 1873, aged 76 yrs.) b. 18 Dec. 1806 - d. 26 Mar., 1892.

<sup>3</sup>The newspaper articles and the litigation between Williams and Devol were brought to the writer's attention by Mr. Jerry B. Devol.

<sup>4</sup>Dr. James Gandee, b. at Parkersburg (W.) Va., 12 Mar., 1823; d. at Belpre, Ohio, 19 Sept., 1885, aged 62 yrs., 6 ms. and 7 ds.; bur. in the Rockland Cem., Belpre. (From records compiled by Mrs. Clarence R. (Helen Hill) Sloan.) Dr. Gandee attended the schools in Parkersburg until he removed with his parents to the State of Missouri, where he stayed about six years, during which time, however, he made frequent visits to his old home for the sake of his health. He then came back and settled in Belpre Twp. He married Maria Smith in 1858. (Wms.' Hist., p. 528.)

<sup>5</sup>Israel P. W. Devol (1836-1918, son of Wm. Devol (Wing, Stephen, Sr.; Jonathan, Sr.; Jos., Sr.; Jonathan, Sr.; Wm., the first of this family known in America (Mass.), as early as 1640), and Helen Penelope Putnam. He married Dyanthea Stow(e) in 1858.

HISTORY

OF

WASHINGTON COUNTY, OHIO.

CHAPTER I.

ABORIGINAL OCCUPATION OF OHIO.

The Valley of the Ohio a Beautiful but Desolate Wild.—Cause of its Desertion the Repeated Incursions of the Iroquois.—Their Strength and Warlike Character.—Earliest Positive Knowledge of the Indians of Ohio.—Destruction of the Eries.—The Shawnees Driven Southward.—Return of Wandering Tribes.—Their Geographical Locations.—Confusion of Boundaries.—The Delawares upon the Muskingum, Tuscarawas, and Upper Scioto.—Their History in Brief.—Tribes and Principal Chiefs.—White Eyes and Captain Pipe.—Indian Villages upon the Upper, but none upon the Lower Muskingum.—Signification of the name Muskingum.—The Shawnees.—Their Tradition of Foreign Origin.—Tribal Division.—A Poetical Legend.—Their Wanderings.—The Scioto Country Originally Tendered to them by the Delawares.—Location of the Wyandots or Hurons.—Reputation for Valor.—The Ottawas, Miamis, and Mingoes.

DURING a long period—one which, perhaps, had its beginning soon after the forced exodus of the semi-civilized, pre-historic people, and which extended down to the era of the white man's actual knowledge—the upper Ohio valley was probably devoid of any permanent population. The river teemed with fish, and the dense luxuriant wood abounded in game, but no Indian wigwams dotted the shores of the great stream, no camp-fires gleamed along its banks, and no maize-fields covered the fertile bottom lands or lent variety to the wild vernal green. An oppressive stillness hung over the land, marked and intensified rather than broken, and only made more weird by the tossing of the water upon the shores and the soft mysterious sounds echoed from the distance through the dim aisles of the forest. Nature was lovely then as now, but with all her pristine beauty the valley was awful in the vastness and solemnity of its solitude. No where was human habitation or indication of human life.

This was the condition of the country when explored by the early French navigators, and when a century later it became the field for British and American adventurers. There was a reason for this desertion of a region rich in all that was dear to the red man. The river was the war-way down which silently and swiftly floated the canoe fleets of a fierce, relentless, and invincible enemy. That the dreaded devastators of the country when it was occupied by the ancient race had made their invasions from the northward by way of the great stream is suggested by the numerous lookout or signal mounds which crown the hills on either side of the valley, occupying the most advantageous points of observation. The Indians who dwelt in the territory included in the boundaries of Ohio had, when the white men first went among them, traditions of oft repeated and sanguinary incursions made from the same direction, and dating back to their earliest occupation of the country. History corroborates their legends, or at least those relating to less ancient times. The Iroquois or Six Nations were the foes whose frequent forays, made suddenly, swiftly, and with overwhelming strength, had carried dismay into all the Ohio country and caused the weaker tribes to abandon the valley, penetrated the interior and located themselves on the upper waters of the Muskingum, the Scioto, the Miamis, and the tributaries of the lake, where they could live with less fear of molestation. The Six Nations had the rude elements of a confederated republic, and were the only power in this part of North America who deserved the name of government.* They pretentiously claimed to be the conquerors of the whole country from sea to sea, and there is good evidence that they had by 1680 gained a powerful sway in the country between the great lakes, the Ohio and the Mississippi, and were feared by all the tribes within these limits. The upper Ohio was called by the early French the river of the Iroquois, and was for a long time unexplored through fear of their hostility.

But little is definitely known of the Indian occupation of the Ohio country prior to 1750, and scarcely anything anterior to 1650. As far back in American history as the middle of the seventeenth century it is probable that the powerful but doom-destined Eries were in possession of the vast wilderness which is now the thickly settled, well improved State of Ohio, dotted with villages and cities and covered with the meshes of a vast network of railroads. Most of the villages of this Indian nation, it is supposed, were situated along the shore of the lake which has been given their name. The Andastes are said by the best authorities to have occupied the valleys of the Alleghany and upper Ohio, and the Hurons or Wyandots held sway in the northern peninsula between the lakes. All were genuinely Iroquois, and the western tribes were stronger than the eastern. The Iroquois proper (the Five Nations increased afterward to Six by the alliance of the Tuscarawas) formed their confederacy in the beginning of the seventeenth century, and through consolidation of strength overwhelmed singly and successively the Hurons, the Eries, and the Andastes. The time of the massacre of the Erie nation—for the war upon them culminated in a wholesale murder—is usually set down by antiquarians and historians as 1655, and the victory over the Andastes is, on good evidence, placed in the year 1672. About the same time a tribe, supposed to have been the Shawnees, were driven from the Ohio valley and far towards the Gulf of Mexico. And so the territory now Ohio became a land without habitation and served the victorious Iroquois as a vast hunting ground. Whether the Iroquois conquered the Miamis and their allies, the Illinois, is a question upon which leading students of Indian history have been equally divided. The Miamis had no traditions of ever having suffered defeat at the hands of the great confederacy, and their country, the eastern boundary of which was the Miami river, may have been the western limit of the Six Nations' triumph. That they were often at war with the Iroquois is not disputed, however, by any writers of whom we have knowledge.

* James R. Albach's Annals of the West.

Although the Six Nations were the nominal owners of the greater part of the territory now constituting the State of Ohio, they did not, after the war with the Canadian colonists broke out in 1663 (and probably for some years previously), exercise such domination over the country as to exclude other tribes. Such being the case, the long deserted and desolate wild was again the abode of the red man, and the wigwams of the race again appeared by the waters of the Muskingum, the Scioto, and the Miamis; by the Tuscarawas, the Cuyahoga, and the Maumee.

Concerning what, so far as our knowledge extends, may be called the second Indian occupation of Ohio, we have authentic information. In 1764 the most trustworthy and valuable reports up to that time secured, were made by Colonel Boquet as the result of his observations while making a military expedition west of the Ohio. Previous to the time when Colonel Boquet was among the Indians, and as early as 1750, traders sought out the denizens of the forest, and some knowledge of the strength of tribes and the location of villages was afforded by them. The authentic history of the Ohio Indians may be said to have had its beginning some time during the period extending from 1750 to 1764.

About the middle of the last century the principal tribes in what is now Ohio were the Delawares, the Shawnees, the Wyandots (called the Hurons by the French), the Mingoes, an offshoot of the Iroquois, the Chippewas, and the Tawas, more commonly called the Ottawas. The Delawares occupied the valleys of the Muskingum and Tuscarawas; the Shawnees, the Scioto valley; and the Miamis, the valleys of the two rivers upon which they left their name; the Wyandots occupied the country about the Sandusky river; the Ottawas had their headquarters in the valleys of the Maumee and Sandusky; the Chippewas were confined principally to the south shore of Lake Erie; and the Mingoes were in greatest strength upon the Ohio, below the site of Steubenville. All of the tribes, however, frequented, more or less, lands outside of their ascribed divisions of territory, and at different periods from the time when the first definite knowledge concerning them was obtained down to the era of white settlement, they occupied different locations. Thus the Delawares, whom Boquet found in 1764 in greatest number in the valley of the Tuscarawas had, thirty years later, the majority of their population in the region of the county which now bears their name, and the Shawnees, who were originally strongest upon the Scioto, by the time of St. Clair and Wayne's wars had concentrated upon the Little Miami. But the Shawnees had also as early as 1748 a village, known as Logstown, on the Ohio, seventeen miles from the site of Pitsburgh.* The several tribes commingled to some extent as their animosities toward each other were supplanted by the common fear of the enemy of their race. They gradually grew stronger in sympathy and more compact in union as the settlements of the whites encroached upon their loved domain. Hence the divisions, which had in 1750 been quite plainly marked, became, by the time the Ohio was fringed with the cabins and villages of the pale face, in a large measure, obliterated. In eastern Ohio, where the Delawares had held almost undisputed sway, there were now to be found also Wyandots,† Shawnees, Mingoes, and even Miamis from the western border—from the Wabash, Miami, and Mad rivers. Practically, however, the boundaries of the lands of different tribes were as here given.

The Delawares, as has been indicated, had their densest population upon the upper Muskingum and Tuscarawas, and they really were in possession of what is now the eastern half of the State from the Ohio to Lake Erie. This tribe, which claimed to be the elder branch of the Lenni-Lenape, has by tradition and in history and fiction been accorded a high rank among the savages of North America. Schoolcraft, Loskiel, Albert Gallatin, Drake, Zeisberger, Heckewelder, and many other writers have borne testimony to the superiority of the Delawares, and James Fennimore Cooper in his attractive romances has added lustre to the fame of the tribe. According to the tradition preserved by them the Delawares, many centuries before they knew the white man lived in the western part of the continent, and separating themselves from the rest of the Lenni-Lenape migrated slowly eastward. Reaching the Alleghany river they, with the Iroquois, waged war successfully against a race of giants, the Alleghewi, and still continuing their migration settled on the Delaware river, and spread their population eventually to the Hudson, the Susquehanna, and the Potomac. Here they lived, menaced and often attacked by the Iroquois,

* This village and Shawneetown, at the mouth of the Scioto, were the only exceptions to the abandonment of the upper Ohio valley noted at the opening of this chapter.

† Gist, however, found, in 1750, the town on Whitewoman creek, called Muskingum, "inhabited by Wyandots" and containing about one hundred families. This was undoubtedly an isolated government.

As late as 1791, the Indian war being in progress, the different tribes were massed in what is now the northwestern part of the State, and their old abiding places, their favorite regions, were of course deserted. Delawares, Shawnees, Miamis, Mingoes, Senecas, Chippewas, and others were upon the Maumee, and its tributaries.

and finally, as some writers claim, they were subjugated by the Iroquois through stratagem. The Atlantic coast became settled by Europeans and the Delawares also being embittered against the Iroquois, whom they accused of treachery, they turned westward and concentrated upon the Alleghany. Disturbed here again by the white settlers a portion of the tribe obtained permission from the Wyandots (whom they called their uncles, thus confessing their superiority and reputation of greater antiquity) to occupy the lands along the Muskingum. The forerunners of the nation entered this region in all probability as early as 1745, and in less than a score of years their entire population had become resident in this country. They became here a more flourishing and powerful tribe than they had ever been before. Their warriors numbered not less than six hundred in 1764. The Delawares were divided into three tribes, the Unamis, Unalachtgo, and the Minsi, also called the Monseys or Muncies. The English equivalents of these appellations are the Turtle, the Turkey, and the Wolf. The tribe bearing the latter name exhibited a spirit that was quite in keeping with it, but the Delawares as a rule were less warlike than other nations, and they more readily accepted Christianity.

The principal chiefs among the Delawares were White Eyes and Captain Pipe. The former was the leader of the peace element of the nation and the latter of the tribes who were inclined to war. There was great rivalry between them and constant intrigue. White Eyes died about the year 1780. and Captain Pipe gained the ascendancy among his people. It was principally through his influence that the Delawares were drawn into a condition of hostility towards the whites, and he encouraged the commission of enormities by every artifice in his power. He was shrewd, treacherous, and full of malignity, according to Heckewelder, Drake and other writers on the Indians of the northwest, though brave, and famous as a leader in battle. White Eyes though not less noted as a warrior seemed actuated by really humane motives to fight only when forbearance was impossible. He encouraged the establishment of the Moravian Indian missions and was the firm friend of their founders, though he never accepted Christianity. His greatest influence was exerted over the Delawares after the death, in 1776, of Netawatmees, a celebrated chief, who, during his lifetime, had combatted the reforms which White Eyes advocated. Buckougahelas was another of the Delaware chiefs, and was celebrated principally for his action in what is now the western part of the State. Others were King Newcomer (after whom the present Newcomerstown was named) and Half King. There dwelt among the Delawares of the Upper Muskingum at one time a white woman who had great influence among them and after whom a creek was named—Whitewoman's creek.

Most of the Delaware towns were at the vicinity of the forks of the Muskingum, or the confluence of the Tuscarawas and Muskingum, and that region is rich in the old Indian names. The Delawares had no village on the lower Muskingum, and so far as is known none in what is now Washington county, this region, like almost the whole of the Ohio valley, being devoid of inhabitants and regarded as a hunting ground.

The Muskingum river derives its name from the Delawares, and was originally Mooskingom. The literal meaning of this term is Elk's Eye, and it was probably so called because of its clearness. The Tuscarawas undoubtedly took its name from an Indian town which was situated where Bolivar now is. The name according to Heckewelder meant "old town" and the village bearing it was the oldest in the valleys.

The Shawnees were the only Indians of the northwest who had a tradition of a foreign origin, and for some time after the whites became acquainted with them they held annual festivals to celebrate the safe arrival in this country of their remote ancestors. Concerning the history of the Shawnees there is considerable conflicting testimony, but it is generally conceded that at an early date they separated from the other Lenape tribes and established themselves in the south, roaming from Kentucky to Florida. Afterward the main body of the tribe is supposed to have pushed northward, encouraged by their friends the Miamis, and to have occupied the beautiful and rich valley of the Scioto until driven from it in 1672 by the Iroquois. Their nation was shattered and dispersed. A few may have remained upon the upper Scioto and others taken refuge with the Miamis, but by far the most considerable portion again journeyed southward and, according to the leading historians, made a forcible settlement on the head waters of the Carolina. Driven away from that locality they found refuge among the Creeks. A fragment of the Shawnees was taken to Pennsylvania and reduced to a humiliating condition by their conquerors. They still retained their pride and considerable innate independence, and about 1740 encouraged by the Wyandots and the French, carried into effect their long cherished purpose of returning to the Scioto. Those who had settled among the Creeks joined them and the nation was again reunited. It is probable that they first occupied the southern portion of their beloved valley, and that after a few years had elapsed the Delawares peacefully surrendered to them a large tract of country further north.* It is conjectured by some students that the branch of the Shawnees who lived for a term of years in the south were once upon the Suane river and that the well known name was a corruption of the name of the nation of Tecumseh. This chief, whose fame added lustre to the annals of the tribe, is said to have been the son of a Creek woman whom his father took as a wife during the southern migration. The Shawnees were divided into four tribes†—the Piqua,‡ Kiskapocke, Mequachuke, and Chillicothe.

* Some of the Delaware chiefs who visited Philadelphia during the Revolution spoke figuratively of having "placed the Shawnees in their laps."

† This information is derived from a communication in the Archæological American, written in 1819 by Colonel John Johnston, then Indian agent, and located at Piqua, Ohio.

‡ It was from the fact of these that the Indian village and the present town of Piqua, Miami county, derived their names. The name Pickaway, which has been given to one of the older counties of Ohio, but which was originally applied to the "plains" within its limits is a corruption of Piqua.

Those who deny to the American Indians any love for the beautiful and any exercise of imagination might be influenced to concede them the possession of such faculties and in a high degree, by the abundance of their fanciful traditions, of which their account of the origin of the Piqua is a good example. According to their practical legend the tribe began in a perfect man who burst into being from fire and ashes. The Shawnees said to the first whites who mingled with them, that once upon a time when the wise men and chiefs of the nation were sitting around the smouldering embers of what had been the council fire, they were startled by a great puffing of fire and smoke, and suddenly, from the midst of the ashes and dying coals, there arose before them a man of splendid form and mien, and that he was named Piqua, to signify the manner of his coming into the world—that he was born of fire and ashes. This legend of the origin of the tribe, beautiful in its simplicity, has been made the subject of comment by several writers as showing in a marked manner the romantic susceptibility of the Indian character. The name Megoachuke signifies a fat man filled—a man made perfect, so that nothing is wanting. This tribe had the priesthood. The Kiskapoke tribe inclined to war, and had at least one great war chief—Tecumseh. Chillicothe is not known to have been interpreted as a tribal designation. It was from this tribe that the several Indian villages on the Scioto and Miami were given the names they bore, and which was perpetuated by application to one of the early white settlements. The Shawnees have been styled “the Bedouins of the American wilderness” and “the Spartans of the race.” To the former title they seem justly entitled by their extensive and almost constant wanderings, and the latter is not an inappropriate appellation, considering their well known bravery and the stoicism with which they bore the consequences of defeat. From the time of their reestablishment upon the Scioto until after the treaty of Greenville, a period of from forty to fifty years, they were constantly engaged in warfare against the whites. They were among the most active allies of the French, and after the conquest of Canada continued, in concert with the Delawares, hostilities which were only terminated by the marching of Colonel Boquet’s forces into the country of the latter. They made numerous incursions into Pennsylvania, the Virginia frontier, harassed the Kentucky stations, and either alone or in conjunction with the Indians of other tribes, actually attacked or threatening to do so, terrorized the first settlers in Ohio from Marietta to the Miamis. They took an active part against the Americans in the war for Independence and in the Indian war which followed, and a part of them, under the leadership of Tecumseh, joined the British in the War of 1812.

The Wyandots or Hurons had their principal seat opposite Detroit, and smaller settlements (the only ones within the limits of Ohio, probably, except the village on White woman creek,) on the Maumee and Sandusky. They claimed greater antiquity than any of the other tribes, and their assumption was even allowed by the Delawares. Their right to the country between the Ohio and Lake Erie from the Alleghany to the Great Miami, derived from ancient sovereignty or from the incorporation of the three extinct tribes (the Eries, Andastes, and Neutrals) was never disputed, save by the Six Nations. The Jesuit missionaries who were among them as early as 1639, and who had ample advantages for obtaining accurate information concerning the tribe, placed their number at ten thousand. They were both more civilized and more warlike than the other tribes of the northwest. Their population being, comparatively speaking, large and at the same time concentrated, they naturally gave more attention than did other tribes to agriculture. Extensive fields of maize adjoined their villages. The Wyandots on the score of bravery have been given a higher rank than any of the other Ohio tribes.* With them flight from an enemy in battle, whatever might be the odds of strength or advantage of ground, was a disgrace. They fought to the death and would not be taken prisoners. Of thirteen chiefs of the tribe engaged in the battle of Fallen Timbers, Wayne’s victory, only one was taken alive, and he badly wounded.

The Ottawas existed in the territory constituting Ohio only in small numbers and have no particular claims for attention. They seem to have been inferior in almost all respects to the Delawares, Wyandots, and Shawnees, though as the tribe to which the great Pontiac belonged they have been rendered quite conspicuous in history.

The Miami Indians were, so far as actual knowledge extends, the original denizens of the valleys bearing their name, and claimed that they were created in it. The name in the Ottawa tongue signifies mother. The ancient name of the Miamis was Twigtwees. The Mingoes or Cayugas, a fragment of the Iroquois, had only a few small villages, one at Mingo Bottom, three miles below Steubenville, and others upon the Scioto. Logan came into Ohio in 1772 and dwelt for a time at the latter town, but two years later was on the Scioto.

---

* William Henry Harrison and other eminent authorities pay the highest tribute to the valor of the Wyandot warriors, and give abundant proofs of their assertions.

CHAPTER II.

OWNERSHIP OF THE NORTHWEST.

The Claims of France, Founded on Discovery and Occupation.—England's Claim Based Upon Discovery and Settlement of the Atlantic Coast and Treaties of Purchase.—Treaty of Paris in 1763.—Ohio as a Part of France and Canada.—The "Quebec Bill."—Title Vested in the Confederate States by Treaty in 1783.—Conflicting Claims of States.—Virginia's Exercise of Civil Authority.—The Northwest Territory Erected as Botetourt County.—Illinois County.—New York Withdraws Claim.—Virginia's Deed of Cession.—Massachusetts Cedes Her Claim Without Reservation.—"The Tardy and Reluctant Sacrifice of State Pretensions to the Public Good," Made by Connecticut.—A Serious Evil Averted.—The States Urged to their Action by New Jersey, Delaware and Maryland.—Extinguishment of the Indiana Title.—Difficulty of Making Satisfactory Provisions.—A Harsh and Unjust Policy.—Washington's Influence Causes More Humane Treatment of the Indians.—Treaty of Fort Stanwix.—Treaty of Fort McIntosh.—George Rogers Clark, General Butler and S. H. Parsons Confer with Several Tribes at the Mouth of the Miami.—Measures of the Treaty Ineffectual to Preserve Peace.—Great Improvement in the Attitude of the Government.—Indian Tribes Recognized as Rightful Owners.—Appropriations made to Purchase Title from Them.

FRANCE, resting her claim upon the discovery and explorations of Robert Cavalier de la Salle and Marquette, upon the occupation of the country, and later, upon the provisions of several European treaties (those of Utrecht, Ryswick, Aix-la-chapelle), was the first nation to formally lay claim to the soil of the territory now included within the boundaries of the State of Ohio as an integral portion of the valley of the Mississippi and of the northwest. Ohio was thus a part of New France. After the treaty of Utrecht, in 1713, it was a part of the French province of Louisiana, which extended from the gulf to the northern lakes. The English claims were based on the priority of their occupation of the Atlantic coast, in latitude corresponding to the territory claimed; upon an opposite construction of the same treaties above named; and last but not least, upon the alleged cession of the rights of the Indians. England's charters to all of the original colonies expressly extended their grants from sea to sea. The principal ground of claim by the English was by the treaties of purchase from the Six Nations, who, claiming to be conquerors of the whole country and therefore its possessors, asserted their right to dispose of it. A portion of the land was obtained through grants from the Six Nations and by actual purchase made at Lancaster, Pennsylvania, in 1744. France successfully resisted the claims of England, and maintained control of the territory between the Ohio and the lakes by force of arms until the Treaty of Paris was consummated in 1763. By the provisions of this treaty Great Britain came into possession of the disputed lands, and retained it until ownership was vested in the United States by the treaty of peace made just twenty years later. We have seen that Ohio was once a part of France and of the French province of Louisiana, and as a curiosity it may be of interest to refer to an act of the British Parliament, which made it an integral part of Canada. This was what has been known in history as the "Quebec Bill" passed in 1774. By the provisions of this bill the Ohio river was made the southwestern, and the Mississippi river the western boundary of Canada, thus placing the territory now constituting the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin under the local jurisdiction of the Province of Quebec.

Virginia had asserted her claims to the whole of the territory northwest of the Ohio, and New York had claimed titles to portions of the same. These claims had been for the most part held in abeyance during the period when the general ownership was vested in Great Britain, but were afterwards the cause of much embarrassment to the United States. Virginia, however, had not only claimed ownership of the soil, but attempted the exercise of civil authority in the disputed territory as early as 1769. In that year the colonial house of burgesses passed an act establishing the county of Botetourt, including a large part of what is now West Virginia and the whole territory northwest of the Ohio, and having, of course, as its western boundary the Mississippi river. This was a county of vast proportions—a fact of which the august authorities who ordered its establishment seem to have been fully aware, for they inserted the following among other provisions of the act, viz:

WHEREAS, The people situated upon the Mississippi in the said county of Botetourt will be very remote from the court house, and must necessarily become a separate county as soon as their numbers are sufficient, which will probably happen in a short time, be it therefore enacted by the authority aforesaid that the inhabitants of that part of the said county of Botetourt, which lies on the said waters, shall be exempted from the payment of any levies to be laid by the said county for the purpose of building a court house and prison for said county.

It was more in name than in fact, however, that Virginia had jurisdiction over this great county of Botetourt through the act of 1769. In 1778, after the splendid achievements of General George Rogers Clarke—his subjugation of the British posts in the far west, and conquest of the whole country from the Ohio to the Mississippi—this territory was organized by the Virginia legislature as the county of Illinois. Then, and not until then, did government have more than a nominal existence in this far extending but undeveloped country, containing a few towns and scattered population. The act, which was passed in October, contained the following provisions:

All the citizens of the commonwealth of Virginia who are already settled, or shall hereafter settle on the western side of the Ohio, shall be included in a distinct county which shall be called Illinois; and the governor of this commonwealth, with the advice of the council, may appoint a county lieutenant or commandant-in-chief, during pleasure, who shall appoint and commission so many deputy commandants, militia officers and commissaries, as he shall think proper, in the different districts, during pleasure, all of whom, before they enter into office, shall take the oath of fidelity to this commonwealth, and the oath of office, according to the form of their own religion. And all officers to whom the inhabitants have been accustomed, necessary to the preservation of peace and the administration of justice, shall be chosen by a majority of citizens, in their respective districts, to be convened for that purpose by the county lieutenant or commandant, or his deputy, and shall be commissioned by the said county lieutenant, or commandant-in-chief.

John Todd was appointed as county lieutenant and civil commandant of Illinois county, and served until his death (he was killed in the battle of Blue Licks, August 18, 1782), being succeeded by Timothy de Montbrun.

New York was the first of the several States claiming right and title in western lands to withdraw the same in favor of the United States. Her charter, obtained March 2, 1664, from Charles II, embraced territory which had formerly been granted to Massachusetts and Connecticut. The cession of claim was made by James Duane, William Floyd, and Alexander McDougall, on behalf of the State, March 1, 1781.

Virginia, with a far more valid claim than New York, was the next State to follow New York's example. Her claim was founded upon certain charters granted to the colony by James I, and bearing date respectively, April 10, 1606; May 23, 1609; and March 12, 1611; upon the conquest of the country by General George Rogers Clarke; and upon the fact that she had also exercised civil authority over the territory. The general assembly of Virginia, at its session beginning October 20, 1783, passed an act authorizing its delegates in Congress to convey to the United States in Congress assembled all the right of that commonwealth to the territory northwest of the Ohio river. The act was consummated on March 17, 1784. By one of the provisory clauses of this act was reserved the Virginia Military district, lying between the waters of the Scioto and Little Miami rivers.

Massachusetts ceded her claims, without reservation, the same year that Virginia did hers (1784), though the action was not formally consummated until the eighteenth of April, 1785. The right of her title had been rested upon her charter, granted less than a quarter of a century from the arrival of the Mayflower, and embracing territory extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Connecticut made what has been characterized as "the last tardy and reluctant sacrifice of State pretensions to the common good"* on the fourteenth of September, 1786. She ceded to Congress all her "right, title, interest, jurisdiction, and claim to the lands northwest of the Ohio, excepting the Connecticut Western Reserve," and of this tract jurisdictional claim was not ceded to the United States until May 30, 1801.

The happy, and, considering all complications, speedy adjustment of the conflicting claims of States and consolidation of all rights of title in the United States was productive of the best results both at home and abroad. The young nation, born in the terrible throes of the Revolution, went through a trying ordeal, and one of which the full peril was not realized until it had been safely passed. Serious troubles threatened to arise from the disputed ownership of the western lands, and there were many who had grave fears that the well-being of the country would be impaired or at least its progress impeded. The infant Republic was at that time closely and jealously watched by all of the governments of Europe, and nearly all of them would have rejoiced to have witnessed the failure of the American experiment, and they were not destined to be gratified at the expense of the United States. As it was, the most palpable harm, caused by delay, was the retarding of settlement. The movement towards the complete cession of State claims was accelerated as much as possible by Congress. The national legislature strenuously urged the several States in 1784 to cede their lands to the confederacy to aid the payment of the debts incurred during the Revolution and to promote the harmony of the Union.*

The States of New Jersey, Delaware, and Maryland had taken the initiative action and been largely instrumental in bringing about the cession of State claims. The fact that they had no foundation for pretensions of ownership save that they had equally in proportion to their ability with the other States assisted in wresting these lands from Great Britain, led them to protest against an unfair division of the territory—New Jersey had memorialized Congress in 1778, and Delaware followed in the same spirit in January, 1779. Later in the same year Maryland virtually reiterated the principles advanced by New Jersey and Maryland, though more positively. Her representatives in Congress emphatically and eloquently expressed their views and those of their constituents in the form of instructions upon the matter of confirming the articles of confederation.

The extinguishment of the Indian claims to the soil of the northwest was another delicate and difficult duty which devolved upon the Government. In the treaty of peace, ratified by Congress in 1784, no provision was made by Great Britain in behalf of the Indians—even their most faithful allies, the Six Nations. Their lands were included in the boundaries secured to the United States. They had suffered greatly during the war and the Mohawks had been dispossessed of the whole of their beautiful valley. The only remuneration they received was a tract of country in Canada, and all of the sovereignty which Great Britain had exercised over them was transferred to the United States. The relation of the new government to these Indians was peculiar. In 1782 the British principle, in brief, that "might makes right"—that discovery was equivalent to conquest, and that therefore the nations retained only a possessory claim to their lands, and could only abdicate it to the government claiming sovereignty—was introduced into the general policy of the United States. The legislature of New York was determined to expel the Six Nations entirely, in retaliation for their hostility during the war. Through the just and humane counsels of Washington and Schuyler, however, a change was wrought in the Indian policy, and the Continental Congress sought henceforward in its action to condone the hostilities of the past and gradually to dispossess the Indians of their lands by purchase, as the growth of the settlements might render it necessary to do so. It was in pursuance of this policy that the treaty of Fort Stanwix was made, October 22, 1784. By this treaty were extinguished the vague claims which the confederated tribes, the Mohawks, Onondagas, Senecas, Cayugas, Tuscarawas, and Oneidas, had for more than a century maintained to the Ohio valley. The commissioners of Congress in this transaction were Oliver Wolcott, Richard Butler, and Arthur Lee. The Six Nations were represented by two of their ablest chiefs, Cornplanter and Red Jacket, the former for peace and the latter for war. La Fayette was present at this treaty and importuned the Indians to preserve peace with the Americans.

* Statutes of Ohio; Chief Justice Chase.

* Albach's Annals of the West.

By the treaty of Fort McIntosh, negotiated on the twenty-first of January, 1785, by George Rogers Clark, Richard Butler, and Arthur Lee, was secured the relinquishment of all claims to the Ohio valley held by the Delawares, Ottawas, Wyandots, and Chippewas. The provisions of this treaty were as follows:

ARTICLE 1st—Three chiefs, one from the Wyandot and two from the Delaware nations, shall be delivered up to the commissioners of the United States, to be by them retained till all the prisoners taken by the said nations or any of them shall be restored.

ARTICLE 2nd—The said Indian nations and all of their tribes do acknowledge themselves to be under the protection of the United States and of no other sovereign whatever.

ARTICLE 3rd—The boundary line between the United States and the Wyandot and Delaware nations shall begin at the mouth of the river Cuyahoga, and run thence up the said river to the portage between that and the Tuscarawas branch of the Muskingum; then down the said branch to the forks at the crossing-place above Fort Laurens; then westwardly to the portage of the Big Miami, which runs into the Ohio, at the mouth of which branch the fort stood which was taken by the French in the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-two; then along the said portage to the Great Miami or Owl river, and down the southeast side of the same to its mouth; thence down the south shore of Lake Erie to the mouth of the Cuyahoga where it began.

ARTICLE 4th—The United States allot all the lands contained within the said lines to the Wyandot and Delaware nations, to live and to hunt on, and to such of the Ottawa nation as now live thereon; saving and reserving for the establishment of trading posts six miles square at the mouth of the Miami or Owl river and the same at the portage of that branch of the Miami which runs into the Ohio, and the same on the cape of Sandusky, where the fort formerly stood, and also two miles square on the lower rapids of Sandusky river; which posts and the land annexed to them, shall be for the use and under the government of the United States.

ARTICLE 5th—If any citizen of the United States, or other person not being an Indian, shall attempt to settle on any of the lands allotted to the Wyandot and Delaware nations in this treaty, except on the lands reserved to the United States in the preceding article, such person shall forfeit the protection of the United States, and the Indians may punish him as they please.

ARTICLE 6th—The Indians who sign this treaty, as well in behalf of all their tribes as of themselves, do acknowledge the lands east, south, and west of the lands described in the third article, so far as the said Indians claimed the same, to belong to the United States, and none of their tribes shall presume to settle upon the same or any part of it.

ARTICLE 7th—The post of Detroit, with a district beginning at the mouth of the river Rosine on the west side of Lake Erie and running west six miles up the southern bank of the said river; thence northerly, and always six miles west of the strait, till it strikes Lake St. Clair, shall also be reserved to the sole use of the United States.

ARTICLE 8th—In the same manner the post of Michilimackinack with its dependencies, and twelve miles square about the same, shall be reserved to the use of the United States.

ARTICLE 9th—If any Indian or Indians shall commit a robbery or murder on any citizen of the United States, the tribe to which such offenders may belong shall be bound to deliver them up at the nearest post, to be punished according to the ordinance of the United States.

ARTICLE 10th—The Commissioners of the United States, in pursuance of the humane and liberal views of Congress, upon the treaty's being signed, will direct goods to be distributed among the different tribes for their use and comfort.

The treaty of Fort Finney, at the mouth of the Great Miami, January 31, 1786, secured the cession of whatever claim to the Ohio valley was held by the Shawnees. George Rogers Clark, Richard Butler, and Samuel H. Parsons* were the Commissioners of the United States. James Monroe, then a member of Congress from Virginia and afterwards President of the United States, accompanied General Butler, in the month of October preceding the treaty, as far as Limestone† (now Maysville, Kentucky). The party, it is related, stopped at the mouth of the Muskingum and (in the words of General Butler's journal) "left fixed in a locust tree" a letter recommending the building of a fort on the Ohio side. By the terms of this treaty the Shawnees were confined to the lands west of the Great Miami. Hostages were demanded from the Indians, to remain in the possession of the United States until all prisoners should be returned, and the Shawnees were compelled to acknowledge the United States as the sole and absolute sovereign of all the territory ceded to them, in the treaty of peace, by Great Britain. The clause embodying the latter condition excited the jealousy of the Shawnees. They went away dissatisfied with the treaty, though assenting to it. This fact, and the difficulty that was experienced even while the treaty was making of preventing depredations by white borderers, argued unfavorably for the future. The treaty was productive of no good results whatever. Hostilities were resumed in the spring of 1786, and serious and widespread war was threatened. Congress had been acting upon the policy that the treaty of peace with Great Britain had invested the United States with the fee simple of all the Indian lands, but urged now by the stress of circumstance the Government radically changed its policy, fully recognizing the Indians as the rightful proprietors of the soil, and on the second of July, 1787, appropriated the sum of twenty-six thousand dollars for *1 General Samuel H. Parsons, an eminent Revolutionary character, was one of the first band of Marietta pioneers, and was appointed first as associate and then as chief judge of the Northwest Territory. He was drowned in the Big Beaver river, November 17, 1789, while returning to his home in Marietta from the north, where he had been making the treaty which secured the aboriginal title to the soil of the Connecticut Western Reserve.

†2 General Butler's Journal in Craig's "Olden Time," October, 1847

the purpose of extinguishing Indian claims to lands already ceded to the United States and for extending a purchase beyond the limits heretofore fixed by treaty.

Under this policy other relinquishments of Ohio territory were effected through the treaties of Fort Harmar, held by Général St. Clair, January 9, 1789, the treaty of Greenville, negotiated by Anthony Wayne, August 3, 1795, and various other treaties made at divers times from 1796 to 1818.* But of these it is beyond our province to speak in this chapter.

CHAPTER III.

ADVENT OF THE WHITE MAN.

La Salle Upon the Ohio Two Hundred Years Ago.—Possibility of his Having Explored the Muskingum.—The "Griffin" on Lake Erie.—French Trading Stations.—Routes Through the Wilderness.—The English Supersede the French.—Interest in the West Exhibited by Governor Spotswood, of Virginia, in 1710.—The Transmontane Order Founded.—Licenses Issued for Trading with the Indians, by the Governor of Pennsylvania, in 1740.—Systematic Exploration of the Ohio Valley by Celeron de Bienville.—At the Mouth of the Muskingum in 1749.—Leaden Plate Buried.—Discovered in 1798.—Pickawillany, the First Building Erected by the English in Ohio.—Organization of the Colonial Ohio Land Company, in Virginia, in 1748.—Preparation Made to Establish a Colony.—French Resistance.—War of Britain Against the French and Indians.—Its Results.—Franklin's Plans for Western Settlements.—George Washington upon the Ohio. His Favorable Impressions of the Country.—Immense Schemes for Western Colonization.—Indian Hostility and Imperfection of Land Title the Probable Cause of their Failure.—The First English Military Expedition upon Ohio Soil.—Colonel Boquet Wins a Bloodless Victory on the Upper Muskingum.—Thomas Hutchins.—Hostility of the Shawnees.—Logan.—Lord Dunmore's War.—The Battle of Point Pleasant.—The Breaking Out of the Revolutionary War.—An Event of Immeasurable Importance in the West.—General George Rogers Clark's Conquest of the Northwest.—Value of His Foresight and Decisive Action.—His Services Unappreciated.—Miscellaneous Military Invasions.—The Establishment of the Moravian Missions on the Muskingum.—The Massacre.

THE adventurous La Salle, there is every reason to believe, was the first white man who trod the soil of the destined State of Ohio, and the first whose eyes beheld the Beautiful river. With a few followers and led by Indian guides he penetrated the vast country of the powerful Iroquois until, as Parkman says, he reached "at a point six or seven leagues from Lake Erie, a branch of the Ohio, which he descended to the main stream," and so went onward as far as the "falls," or the site of Louisville. His men abandoning him there, he retraced his way alone. This, according to the best authorities, was in the winter of 1669-70, over two hundred years ago. And it is not improbable that one hundred and eighteen years before Marietta was settled this intrepid French explorer had encamped at the mouth of the Muskingum. Indeed, there is some reason to believe that he made his way from Lake Erie to the Ohio by the Cuyahoga, the Tuscarawas, and Muskingum, though the preponderance of evidence points to the Alleghany as the route followed. Ten years later La Salle unfurled the first sail ever set to the breeze upon Lake Erie, and upon the Griffin, a schooner of forty-five tons burden, made the voyage to Lake Huron. In 1682 he reached the Mississippi, descended to its mouth, and there solemnly proclaimed possession of the vast valley in the name of his king.

The French had a trading station on the Maumee near the site of Toledo, as early as 1680, and according to Bancroft they had a route through the western wilderness from Canada to the Mississippi; by the way of the Maumee, Wabash, and Ohio rivers in 1716; and another only a little later from Presque Isle (Erie) by the Alleghany and Ohio. About 1740, however, the French traders were superseded by the English.

Governor Alexander Spotswood of Virginia became interested in the western country early in the eighteenth century; engaged in exploring the Alleghanies in 1710; discovered a passage through them in 1714, and entered with great ardor upon the scheme of taking practical possession of the Ohio valley. He founded the Transmontane order, whose knights were decorated with a golden horseshoe bearing the legend "Sic jurat transcendere montes," and urged upon the British sovereign the importance of gaining a foothold in the west before the French had gained too powerful an ascendancy. His suggestions were not regarded, and many years later the British government had cause to remember with regret the wise policy they had neglected to act upon. Although no systematic plan of exploration or settlement was followed, individuals from time to time passed the great barrier and visited the valley of the la belle riviere. There have been handed down certain vague traditions that the English had trading posts on the Ohio as early as 1730, and it is known positively that they had soon after that time. In 1744 the governor of Pennsylvania issued licenses for trading with the Indians as far west as the Father of Waters. John Howard had descended the Ohio in 1742 and been captured on the Mississippi by the French; and six years later Conrad Weiser, acting in behalf of the English, visited the Shawnees at Logstown (below the site of Pittsburgh) bearing gifts with which to win their favor. About the same time George Croghan and Andrew Montour, the half breed of a Seneca chief bore liberal presents to the Miamis, in return for which the Indians allowed the whites to establish a trading post and build a stockade at the mouth of Loramies creek on the Great Miami (within the present county of Shelby). The fort, built in 1751, which was called Pickawillany, has been cited by some writers as the first English settlement in Ohio. The building, which was undoubtedly the first erected by the British on the soil of the State, was destroyed in June, 1752, by a force of French and Indians.

Prior to the middle of the century the French strenuously reasserted their ownership of the northwest, and did actually take possession of what is now the northern part of Ohio, building a fort and establishing a trading station at Sandusky. Celeron de Bienville made a systematic exploration of the Ohio valley and formally declared by process verbal the ownership of the soil. On the sixteenth of August, 1749, he was at the mouth of the Muskingum. This fact was revealed in 1798 by the discovery of a leaden plate which had been buried by him and which set forth that the explorer sent out by the Marquis de la Gallissoniere, captain general of New France, agreeably to the wishes of His Majesty, Louis XV, had deposited the plate as a monument of the renewal of possession of la riviere Oyo, otherwise la belle riviere, and all those which empty into it, and of all the lands of both sides even to the sources of the said rivers, and which had been obtained by force of arms and by treaties, especially those of Ryswick, Utrecht, and Aix-la-chappelle. The plate was found protruding from the bank after a freshet, by some boys, who, ignorant of its antiquarian value, cut away a considerable portion of it to melt into bullets, lead there being very scarce. The plate was finally secured by Paul Fearing, one of the Marietta pioneers, and the inscription was translated by William Woodbridge (afterwards governor of Michigan) but then a young man, who had been studying French at Gallipolis. Considerable difficulty was experienced in making the translation as a portion of the inscription had been cut away by the finders of the plate, but the larger part remaining enabled the student to supply the missing words. The plate was nearly twelve inches from top to bottom and about seven and a half in breadth.* A similar plate was found in 1846 at the mouth of the Kanawha. They were doubtless deposited at the mouths of all the principal tributaries of the Ohio.

*It is a fact worthy of note, and one of which we may well be proud, that the title to every foot of Ohio soil was honorably acquired from the Indians.

The French had a very just claim to the Ohio valley, but it was destined that they should not hold it and already events were shaping which eventually led to the overthrow of their authority and the vesture of title and possession in the English crown.

The Colonial Ohio Land company was organized in Virginia in 1748 by twelve associates, among whom were Thomas Lee, and Lawrence and Augustine, brothers of George Washington. Under their auspices Christopher Gist explored the Ohio as far as the falls, travelling a portion of the time with Croghan and Montour. The company secured a royal grant of half a million acres of land in the Ohio valley. In 1753 preparations were made to establish a colony. The French exhibited an intention of resistance, and the royal governor of Virginia sent George Washington, then a young man, to the commander of the French forces to demand their reason for invasion of British territory. Washington received an answer that was both haughty and defiant. Returning to Virginia he made known the failure of his mission. The project of making a settlement was abandoned, and preparations were immediately made for the maintenance of the British claim to the western valley by force of arms. The result was the union of the colonies, the ultimate involvement of England in the war that ensued, the defeat of the French, and the vesture in the British crown of the right and title to Canada and of all the territory east of the Mississippi and south to the Spanish possessions, excepting New Orleans and a small body of land surrounding it. Benjamin Franklin had previously tried to effect a union of the colonies and had been unsuccessful. He had proposed a plan of settlement in 1754, and suggested that two colonies should be located in the west—one upon the Cuyahoga and the other upon the Scioto, "on which," he said, "for forty miles each side of it and quite up to its head is a body of all rich land, the finest spot of its bigness in all North America, and has the peculiar advantage of sea coal in plenty (even above ground in two places) for fuel when the wood shall have been destroyed."

But little advantage was taken by the English of the ascendancy they had gained. About the only men who visited the country northwest of the Ohio were traders. The frontiers of Pennsylvania and Virginia were settled in due time, but as the title to the soil on the other side of the Ohio was not perfected no attempt was made for several years to occupy the country. Kentucky had even been penetrated by the pioneers, of whom Daniel Boone was a type, and many settlements founded before attention was again seriously given to the country north of the Ohio.

George Washington made a journey down the Ohio in 1770. He was accompanied by Dr. Craik, Captain (afterwards Colonel) William Crawford (who was burned to death at the stake within the present limits of Wyandot county in 1782), and several other white men, also by a party of Indians. The little company embarked on the Ohio from Fort Pitt, October 20th, and on the night of the twenty-fifth camped out "about half way down the Long Reach" (Grand view). Washington's journal continues:

October 26th. . . . At the lower end of the Long Reach, and for some distance up it, on the east side, is a large bottom, but low and covered with beech near the river shore, which is no indication of good land.

The Long Reach is a straight course of the river for about eighteen to twenty miles, which appears more extraordinary as the Ohio in general is remarkably crooked. There are several islands in this Reach, some containing a hundred or more acres of land, but all I apprehend liable to be overflowed.

On the night of October 26th Washington encamped "at a creek about twelve miles below the Three Islands," which was "pretty large at the mouth and just above an island." This was the Little Muskingum.

Under date of October 27th occurs the following entry:

Left our encampment a quarter before seven, and after passing the creek near which we lay and another of much the same size, and on the same side [this was Duck creek], also one island about two miles in length, but not wide, we came to the mouth of the Muskingum, distant from our encampment about four miles. This river is about a hundred and fifty yards wide at the mouth; it runs out in a gentle current and clear stream, and is navigable a great way into the country for canoes. From Muskingum to Little Kanawha is about thirteen miles. This is about as wide as the mouth of the Muskingum, but the water much deeper. It runs up towards the inhabitants of Monongahela. . . . About six or seven miles below the mouth of the Little Kanawha we came to a small creek on the west side which the Indians call Little Hockhocking, but before we did this we passed another small creek on the same side near the mouth of that river, and a cluster of islands afterward. The lands for two or three miles below the Little Kanawha appear broken, and indifferent, but opposite to the Little Hocking there is a bottom of good land.*

* This interesting relic passed into the possession of the learned and eccentric Caleb Atwater, of Circleville, Ohio, in 1821, was by him given to Governor Clinton, of New York, and by him transmitted to the Massachusetts Antiquarian society.

Largely through Washington was the interest in the west revived. Immense schemes for settlement and land speculation were projected. A huge company was organized which included the Old Ohio company and the Walpole scheme as well as recognizing the bounties of the Virginia volunteers in the French war. Doubtless some of these plans for the development of the west would have succeeded had it not been for Indian hostilities upon the border settlements already established, and the probability of a long continuance of the perturbed condition of affairs generally. Colonel Henry Boquet had made the first English military expedition into the Ohio country in 1764, his purpose being to punish and awe the Indians and recover from them the captives they had taken during the previous years on the Pennsylvania and Virginia borders. He was successful in the accomplishment of each one of his objects. The expedition was directed against the Delawares upon the Muskingum and Tuscarawas. No blood was shed, the Indians assenting to the terms of a treaty prepared by Colonel Boquet, and delivering to him over two hundred prisoners. Upon the twenty-eighth of November the army of about fifteen hundred men returned to Fort Pitt, which point they had left on October 3d. This expedition for a time tranquilized the Indians of the Ohio country, and the next ten years passed peacefully and without the occurrence of any important event. With Colonel Boquet was Thomas Hutchins (of whom we shall have frequent occasion to speak). He served in the capacity of military engineer and was geographer to the king of Great Britain. Hutchins published a large book upon the western country with which he became very familiar from long continued services as explorer. In later years as geographer of the United States he superintended the survey of the "seven ranges," and it was largely through his influence that the Ohio company was led to locate their purchase upon the Muskingum.

But returning to the period from which we retrograded to speak of the Boquet expedition, we find in 1774 that the Shawnees have become bitterly hostile, principally on account of the prospect of losing their land and because of the murder of the kindred of Logan, the famous Mingo, who was now dwelling with them at the Old Chillicothe town on the Scioto (where is now the village of Westfall, Pickaway county). Logan had "fully glutted his vengeance" upon the white settlements of the Monongahela country, and numerous atrocities had been committed all along the border. To quell the turbulence that prevailed Lord Dunmore, the then royal governor of Virginia, organized an army of invasion of the Indian country. He had a desire for military renown and decided to assume personal command of the larger division, while he entrusted the other, consisting of about eleven hundred men raised west of the Blue Ridge, to General Andrew Lewis. The forces of the latter were attacked by the Indians on the tenth of October south of the Ohio, and the ensuing combat, known as the battle of Point Pleasant, was one of the most desperate and bloody in the annals of the west. The contending forces were very nearly equal, it is claimed by most writers, but there is strong probability that the Indians were much weaker in numbers than the army which they assailed. The whites lost half of their officers and fifty-two men killed, while the Indian loss was estimated at two hundred and thirty-three. Lord Dunmore's division passed through a bloodless campaign. They descended the Ohio to the mouth of the Hocking river, and there built Fort Gower. The governor was here at the time of the battle of Point Pleasant, and had sent messengers to Lewis ordering him to march toward the Scioto towns. Dunmore marched through the territory included in Athens county and onward to the Pickaway (originally Piqua) plains, below the site of Circleville. There he was met by Lewis' decimated division, whom he could hardly keep from falling upon the Indians to avenge the death of their comrades at Point Pleasant. A treaty was held at Camp Charlotte, which was attended and acquiesced in by all of the leading chiefs of the villages except Logan. Lord Dunmore dispatched John Gibson to confer with the haughty Mingo, and his visit elicited the famous speech, which Jefferson pronounced equal in eloquence to any ever made by the great orators of civilized nations.

Already the premonitory signs of that discontent which developed into the Revolution of American independence were exhibiting themselves, and soon the conflict was begun which rivited the attention of the world upon the colonies. The Revolutionary period was almost barren of event in the west. There was one event, however, of immeasurable importance. The time had come when the destiny of the Great West—of the Northwestern Territory—was to be decided. The man who was to shape its destiny was, in 1774, an officer in Lord Dunmore's army, and in 1776 a pioneer settler in Kentucky—George Rogers Clark. He was a realization of the ideal soldier—cool, courageous, and sagacious, and at once the most powerful man and the most picturesque character in the whole west. It was his foresight and prompt, efficient action which at the close of the war made the Northwest Territory a portion of the United States instead of leaving it in the possession of the British.* He foresaw that even if the colonies should be victorious in their war for independence they would be confined to the eastern side of the Alleghanies, unless the west was a special field of conquest. After failing to interest the house of Burgesses he made an appeal to Patrick Henry, the governor of Virginia, and from him he succeeded in obtaining the authority which he needed, viz.: commissions that empowered him to raise seven companies of soldiers, and to seize the British posts in the northwest.

*The journey extended to the Big Kanawha. On his way back Washington, accompanied by Crawford, walked across the big bend, now in Meigs county, and again taking his boat proceeded up the river, arriving at Fort Pitt November 21.

"The cession of that great territory, under the treaty of 1873, was due mainly to the foresight, the courage and endurance of one man, who never received from his country an adequate recognition of his great service."—Hon. James A. Garfield: Address, 1873.

In January, 1778, he was at Pittsburgh securing provisions and ammunition; in June he was marching through the unbroken forest at the head of a small but valiant army, principally composed of his fellow pioneers from Kentucky. His march was directed towards the Illinois country. His able generalship and courage soon placed the garrisons of Cahokia, Kaskaskia, and St. Vincent in his possession, and his equally great tact enabled him to win over the French inhabitants to the American cause and make of them warm allies.

Two other expeditions were made by General Clark—both against the Indians upon the Miamis—one in 1780 and the other in 1782. Other expeditions into or through Ohio territory were made as follows: by Colonel Bradstreet (simultaneously with Boquet's expedition—1764) along Lake Erie to Detroit, accompanied by Major Israel Putnam (the major general of the Revolution); by Colonel Angus McDonald (just prior to Dunmore's invasion); by General Lachlin McIntosh in 1778 (to the Tuscarawas, where he built the first English fort, with a parapet and stockade, intended as a permanent work, in Ohio); by Colonel John Bowman in 1779; by General Daniel Broadhead in 1781; by Colonel Archibald Lochry in the same year; by Colonel Williamson in 1782; by the fated William Crawford in the summer of the year last mentioned; by Colonel Benjamin Logan in 1786; and still others of less importance by Daniel Boone, Simon Kenton, Colonel Edwards, and Colonel Todd, at various times during the decade preceding the settlement of the territory. In drawing a rapid outline of the history of this western land it is sufficient merely to mention these various military incursions of the Indians' domain, and we have spoken more at length of General Clark's expedition because its results have a wide, general interest, and of Dunmore's invasion, because nearer the legitimate field of our work. Enough has been said to bring to mind the fact that prior to the arrival of the New England pioneers the Ohio country was the scene of many actions and events, and though a wilderness inhabited only by the roving savage had already a history.

One other topic remains to be touched upon briefly in the conclusion of this chapter, and it is one of painful and peculiar interest. We have in mind the Moravian missions on the Muskingum, and use the word painful, as the horrible massacre perpetrated there—the blackest stain on Ohio history—comes to mind. We say also a peculiar interest, and that phrase is suggested by the fact that the Moravians had better claims to be considered as settlers than any other dwellers north of the Ohio, prior to the arrival of the New England colony, and however inadequate such claims may appear it must at least be admitted that these "monks of Protestantism"* presented to the western world a phase of civilization and religion which was both picturesque and inspiring, and, also, that one of them at least, the Rev. John Heckewelder, was in after years prominently identified with affairs of State and in close association with the Marietta settlers.

As early as 1761 the Delaware Indians on the Tuscarawas branch of the Muskingum were visited by a Moravian missionary, the Rev. Christian Frederick Post. In March of the following year John Heckewelder became his companion and assistant. Only a few months, however, were spent in missionary labor, for in the fall the Indians who had first welcomed them, became suspicious that their sojourn there was only a ruse through which a foothold was to be gained leading to settlement, and Post and Heckewelder were obliged to leave the country to save their lives. Not until ten years had passed by was another attempt made by the zealous religionists to plant a mission among the savages. In 1772 Rev. David Zeisberger founded Schoenbrunn (Beautiful Spring) on the west side of the river and near the site of New Philadelphia, Tuscarawas county, and twenty-eight persons located there. Gnadenhutzen (Tents of Grace) was established the same year seven miles below Schoenbrunn. The Rev. George Jungman, Rev. John Roth and Rev. John Etwin came out as missionaries from Pennsylvania the same year; and with the last named, immigrated to Zeisberger's station a large company of converted Indians, bringing with them the implements of industry. Good log huts were built in the regularly laid out village, a large chapel reared in which to hold religious services, the ground tilled, and every measure taken that was considered needful in the formation of a permanent settlement. The simple, quiet life went on very pleasantly, and all was peace and prosperity. Much did the Delaware chiefs and the few traders who visited Schoenbrunn marvel to see so many Indians living together after the manner of the whites, and devoting themselves to agriculture rather than the chase. They had abjured war and all savage customs. New converts were made almost daily, and the pious missionaries felt well rewarded for their patient toil and gave praise to Him whom they regarded as the prime author of their success. So many accessions were made by the Moravians that in 1776 Zeisberger formed another colony, village or station, near the present town of Coshocton, and gave it the name Lichtenan. In 1780 Salem was founded five miles below Gnadenhutzen, and the Rev. John Heckewelder became its regular preacher. All went well with the people at the mission stations until the British, fearing or pretending to fear, that they were performing various services for the Americans, forcibly removed them in September, 1781, to Sandusky. There they were sorely distressed by lack of provisions, and in the latter part of the following winter obtained permission to return to their old stations and gather the corn which they had planted the summer before, and to secure if possible any of the valuables they had been obliged to leave behind them when they were hurried away. They came down from Sandusky in February, and the first of March found them busily engaged in plucking the corn which had been left standing during the winter, and packing it for transportation to their famishing brethren. "The weather during the greater part of February," says Doddridge, "had been uncommonly fine, so that the war parties from Sandusky visited the settlements and began depredations earlier than usual. One of the parties fell upon a family named Wallace and murdered all of its members, exhibiting even greater brutality than usually characterized their atrocities. The early period at which the fatal visitation was made led to the conclusion that the murderers were either Moravians or that the warriors had their winter quarters at their towns on the Muskingum. In either case the Moravians being at fault, the safety of the pioneer settlements required the destruction of their establishments at that place.*" A force of eighty or ninety men was immediately organized, and led by Colonel David Williamson set out for the Muskingum. On their arrival at Gnadenhutten they found the Indians in the fields gathering their corn and with their arms by them as was the common custom, for the purpose of shooting game, and also to guard against attack. The unsuspecting Indians hearing the whites' protestations of peace and good will, and being informed that they had come to remove them to Fort Pitt and place them under the protection of the Americans, gave up their arms and began with all speed to prepare food for the white men and themselves for the proposed journey. A party of men sent out for the purpose soon brought in the Indians from Salem, and with the Gnadenhutten Indians they were placed in block-houses and confined under an armed guard. Colonel Williamson then coolly put the question to his men, should the prisoners be taken to Pittsburgh or dispatched. Sixteen or eighteen men only out of the eighty or ninety men leaned towards the side of mercy. The majority were for murdering them and were impatient to begin their hellish work. The Moravians had foreseen their fate as soon as they had been placed in confinement, and in the hour of extremity exhibited the steadfastness of their simple faith by singing the hymns and breathing the prayers that Heckewelder and Zeisberger had taught them. Some of them appealed for mercy when the murderers came among them to begin their work, but the greater number, sustained by their acquired religious faith or natural stoicism, met death with majestic composure. The executioners, with tomahawks, war-clubs, and knives, entering the crowded slaughter-pens struck down the defenseless and innocent captives until their arms grew tired, and then their places were taken by others of those white savages who thirsted for blood; and the dreadful carnage went on until ninety-six lives had been taken. Of these sixty-two were grown persons, of whom one-third were women, and the remaining thirty-four were children of various ages, from those just entering manhood or womanhood down to babes on their mothers' breasts. Neither the grey hairs of old age nor the mute, appealing innocence of childhood were protection from the fury and the brutality of these fiends in the form of men. Of all the Indians gathered in the block-houses only two escaped. Those at Schoenbrunn fled before the approach of Williamson's men and none of them were taken. This massacre occurred on the seventh of March, 1782, just six years and one month before the landing of the pioneers at the mouth of the Muskingum.

*Madame de Stael.

The wanton butchery of these inoffensive Moravians, more than any other event in western history, had the effect of making the Indians hostile to the Americans, and therefore, naturally, inclining them to amity with the British. This was an end which the latter people constantly sought to effect by every method of intrigue. There is some reason, too, for the belief that Williamson's men were led to the Moravian towns and incited to the commission of the stupendous massacre through the shrewd wiles of the British. It seems to be authoritatively established that the murderers of the Wallace family retreated by way of Gnadenhutten, and that one of them bartered with an unsuspecting young woman there for food, and in payment gave her a garment which he had stripped from Mrs. Wallace or one of the other victims, and that this garment was seen and recognized by some of the pursuing party as one which had been familiar to them at their homes. This fact may partly explain, but cannot in the slightest measure justify, the murder of ninety-six persons. It is sufficient, at any rate, to suggest the suspicion that to a dark stratagem of the English emissaries in the west was attributed the foulest deed in the history of the border. The Indians, wrought into frenzied passion, began that malignant, remorseless, and unceasing raiding of the borders which terrorized the frontiers from Fort Pitt to the falls of the Ohio. Their evil deeds were more numerous than ever before and their treatment of prisoners more inhuman. One of the first acts of retaliation upon the Americans, strangely enough, was visited upon Colonel William Crawford, an intimate friend and companion at arms of Colonel Williamson. But the diabolical cruelty that was practiced upon him was only one of the many horrible deeds which were the outgrowth of the white man's crime.

CHAPTER IV.

AFFAIRS IN THE WEST FROM 1785 TO 1788.

First Ordinance for the Government of the Northwest Territory—It Proves Practically Inoperative—Ordinance of May 20, 1785, for Survey of Western Lands—The Plan Prescribed—Surveyors Appointed by Congress—One from Each State—"Squatter" Settlers on Ohio Soil—Illegality of Their Position—A Proclamation of Warning Addressed to Them—General Richard Butler Disperses Them in 1785, While on His Way to the Miami—Extracts from His Journal—Butler Chooses Location for a Fort at the Mouth of the Muskingum—Hon. James Monroe, of Virginia, descends the Ohio with Baxter—Major Doughty Builds Fort Harmar—Description of the Work—The Gardens—Memento for Doughty in the Name of a Peach—Joseph Buell's Experience in the West—Daily Life at Fort Harmar—Depredations by Roving Bands of Indians—Scarcity of Provisions—Company Ordered out to Protect the Surveyors—The "Seven Ranges"—General Benjamin Tupper—Journal of John Mathews—Indians Harass the Men Engaged at Surveying—Narrow Escape from Destruction—Seeking Safety at Wheeling—Mathews Meets General Putnam at Sumrill's Ferry.

IN 1784 a committee, of which Thomas Jefferson was chairman, reported to Congress an ordinance providing for the establishment and maintenance of government in the Northwest Territory. It contained an article prohibiting slavery after the year 1800. This clause, was stricken out, however, before the ordinance came to its passage upon the twenty-third of April. This measure of 1784, although it remained nominally in force until repealed by the Ordinance of 1787, was really inoperative—a dead letter. Repeated though unsuccessful efforts were made to so improve the bill as to render possible the development of the west under it. Something, however, was accomplished by the Ordinance of 1784. It paved the way, however imperfectly, for a subsequent act of national legislation. This, the first step tending directly toward the sale and settlement of the lands northwest of the Ohio was taken by Congress in 1785. On the twentieth of May the ordinance for ascertaining the mode of disposal of these lands was passed and as soon as possible thereafter put into practical action. By this ordinance it was provided that a surveyor should be appointed from each State, who should take an oath before the geographer of the United States for the faithful discharge of his duty. The surveyors were to be under the general direction of the geographer, and as soon as qualified were to proceed with their work of dividing the territory “into townships of six miles square by lines running due north and south and others crossing these at right angles as near as may be, unless where the boundaries of the late Indian purchases may render the same impracticable.” Each surveyor was to be allowed pay for his services at the rate of two dollars for every mile in length he should run, including wages of chain carriers, markers, and all expenses. It was prescribed that the first line running north and south as aforesaid should begin on the river Ohio at a point due north from the western termination of a line which had been run at the southern boundary of Pennsylvania, and that the first line running east should begin at the same point and extend throughout the whole territory. The ordinance instructed the geographer to designate the townships or fractional parts of townships by numbers, progressively from south to north; beginning each range with number 1; and to designate the ranges by progressive numbers to the westward, the first ranges extending from the Ohio to Lake Erie being marked number 1. The geographer was personally to attend to the running of the first east and west line and the latitudes of the extremes of the first north and south line and of the mouths of the principal rivers. The surveyors were also charged with the duty of carefully noting on the plats to be made of the lands, all mines, salt licks or springs, mill seats, mountains, water courses, and the nature of the soil. The plats of townships were to be marked in subdivisions of a mile square by lines running in the same direction as the external lines. It was further provided that as soon as several of the townships had been surveyed the geographer should transmit plats of the same to the board of treasury, who should record the same with the report in well bound books, to which the Secretary of War should have access. This official was to take by lot a number of townships and fractional parts of townships, both of those to be sold entire and those to be sold in lots, such as would be equal to one-seventh part of the whole seven ranges, for the use of the Continental army. The board of treasury, it was provided, should from time to time cause the remaining number to be drawn for in the name of the thirteen States. The board of treasury was to sell (for not less than one dollar per acre) at public vendue, after proper notification, the lands not distributed to the several States, the plan prescribed being that township 1 should be sold entire, and township number 2 in the same range in lots; and thus in alternate order through the whole of the first range, and in the second range the same alternation should be observed, though beginning the reverse of the first range. The United States reserved out of every township the four lots 8, 11, 26, and 29, for future sale. Lot number 16 in every township was to be reserved for the maintenance of public schools in the township, and one-third of all gold, silver, lead, or copper mines to be sold as Congress should in the future direct. Further than the provisions stated the ordinance reserved the towns of Gnadenhutten, Schoenbrunn, and Salem, on the Muskingum, and lands surrounding them, for the use of the Christian Indians formerly settled there.

*Notes on the Early Settlement and Indian Wars in Western Virginia and Pennsylvania by Joseph Doddridge.

Congress elected six days after the passage of the ordinance the surveyors whose duty it should be to run the first line with glass and chain, northwest of the Ohio. Nathaniel Adams was chosen for New Hampshire; Rufus Putnam for Massachusetts; Caleb Harris for Rhode Island; William Morris for New York; Adam Hoops for Pennsylvania; James Sampson for Maryland; Alexander Parker for Virginia; Absalom Tatum for North Carolina; William Tate for South Carolina; and, nearly two months later, Isaac Sherman for Connecticut. At the time these appointments were made General Putnam was engaged in surveying for Massachusetts certain lands which she possessed in Maine, and therefore General Benjamin Tupper was appointed to serve in his place. Caleb Harris and Nathaniel Harris resigned and Colonel Ebenezer Sproat and Winthrop Sargent were respectively chosen to fill their places.*

Even as early as the Revolution a few hunters, trappers, and traders had located along the west bank of the Ohio, and it was apprehended that after the treaty of Fort McIntosh squatter settlers and speculators would throng those portions of the territory adjacent to Pennsylvania and Virginia and that evil results would follow this intrusion and exercise of “squatter sovereignty.” A few irresponsible men had already made temporary homes along the river, and there was every reason to believe that the number who would do so, unless prevented by immediate and strong measures, would be sufficiently large to be productive of serious evil. Congress foreseeing this movement and its possible results, on the fifteenth of June, 1785, authorized the Indian commissioners to publish the following proclamation and circulate it in the territory:

*General Benjamin Tupper, Colonel Ebenezer Sproat, and Winthrop Sargent, as will appear in subsequent chapters, were among the early settlers at Marietta and prominent citizens of the State of Ohio.

Whereas, it has been represented to the United States, in Congress assembled, that several disorderly persons have crossed the Ohio and settled upon their unappropriated lands; and whereas it is their intention, as soon as it shall be surveyed, to open offices for the sale of a considerable part thereof, in such proportions and under such other regulations as may suit the convenience of all the citizens of the United States, and others who may wish to become purchasers of the same—and as such conduct tends to defeat the object they have in view, is in direct opposition to the ordinances and resolutions of Congress, and highly disrespectful to the Federal authority, they have, therefore, thought fit, and do hereby issue this their proclamation, forbidding all such unwarrantable intrusions, and enjoining all those who have settled thereon to depart with their families and effects without loss of time, as they shall answer the same at their peril.

In the autumn of 1785 General Richard Butler passed down the Ohio on his way to attend the treaty with the Indians at the mouth of the Little Miami. He has left, in the form of a diary or journal, an account of his journey which throws much light on the then condition of the country. He makes several entries relating to the squatter inhabitants on the Ohio shore:

* Friday October 1, 1785. Passed Yellow Creek, and found improvements on both sides of the river. Put in at one Jesse Pennimans on the north side five miles below Yellow creek. Warned him off; called on one Pry who I warned off also; this appears to be a shrewd, sensible man.

I told him as well as the others, that Congress was determined to put all of the people off of the lands, and that none would be allowed to settle but the purchasers, and that these and these only would be protected; that troops would be down next week, who have orders to destroy every house and improvement on the north side of the river, and that garrisons will be placed at Muskingum and elsewhere, and that if any person or persons attempted to oppose Government, they may depend on being treated with the greatest rigor. He seems not well pleased, though he promised submission. Passed on to the Mingoe towns, where we found a number of people, among whom one Ross seemed to be the principal man of the settlers on the north side of that place. I conversed with him, and warned him and the others away.

Sunday, October 2nd. . . . . Called at the settlement of Charles Morris, whose house has been pulled down and he has rebuilt it. At this place found one Walter Kean, who seemed but a middling character and rather of the dissentious cast; warned all of these off, and requested they would inform their neighbors, which they promised to do. Colonel Monroe spoke to them also, which had weight, as I informed them of his character.† Called at the settlement of Captain Hoglan, who we also warned off, his house had also been thrown down and rebuilt. We informed him of the impropriety of his conduct, which he acknowledged, and seemed very submissive, and promised to remove and to warn his neighbors off also.

Tuesday, October 4th. I directed one corporal and three soldiers to stay at Zanes till Captain O'Hara would send a good boat from Fort McIntosh. . . . . I wrote to Colonel Harmar for three other men to join these as an escort to the Miami, and to give Major Dougherty (Dougherty) orders to pull down every house on his way to Muskingum, that is on the north side of the Ohio.

Wednesday, October 5th. . . . . Met . . . some of the inhabitants from Fishing creek, one of whom had made a settlement on the north side of the Ohio, warned him off and gave him two of the proclamations of Congress.

Three days later General Butler notes in his journal that "there is good improvement on the north side" nearly opposite the Little Kanawha. He also found settlements on the head of the first island below the Little Hockhocking, and also on the Ohio shore further down the river. To the people on the island who "seemed to be very reasonable people," and where the writer of the journal saw several women who appeared clean and decently dressed," he sent some proclamations, but sterner measures were resorted to in the case of the settlers below, as appears from the entry under date of Monday, October 10th.

General Butler's journal also gives information in regard to many other matters of interest, among them the location of Fort Harmar. In Virginia and Kentucky measures had been taken for what would have been really, an irresponsible invasion of the Indian country. This action, which threatened to precipitate a disastrous war hastened in all probability the action of the confederation in taking measures for the effectual strengthening of the frontier. It was determined to establish several posts northwest of the Ohio. Fort Laurens had been built in 1778 upon the Tuscarawas, near the old Indian town of Tuscarawas and one mile south of the site of the present village of Bolivar. It was injudiciously located, and was abandoned one year after its erection. General Butler while on his journey in 1785 chose the site for Fort Harmar. Before leaving Fort McIntosh he had prepared and left with Colonel Harmar, the commandant of the post, a paper in which he expressed the opinion that "the mouth of the Muskingum would be a proper place for a post to cover the frontier inhabitants, prevent intruding settlers on the land of the United States, and secure the surveyors." In his journal under date of Saturday, October 8th, he writes:

"Sent Lieutenant Doyle and some men to burn the houses of the settlers on the north side and put up proclamations.

Went on very well to the mouth of the Muskingum and found it low. I went on shore to examine the ground most proper to establish a post on, find it too low, but the most eligible is in the point on the Ohio side. Wrote to Major Dougherty and recommended this place with my opinion of the kind of work most proper. Left the letter, which contained other remarks on the fort, fixed to a locust tree.

A few days later the general instructed a man whom he met ascending the Ohio to take the letter from the mouth of the Muskingum to Major Dougherty.

A short time later Major Dougherty, with a detachment of United States troops under his command, arrived at the mouth of the Muskingum, and began the erection of a post which was not fully completed until the spring of 1786.

The fort stood very near the point on the western side of the Muskingum, and upon the second terrace above ordinary flood water. It was a regular pentagon in shape, with bastions on each side, and its walls enclosed but little more than three quarters of an acre. The main walls of defence, technically called "curtains," were each one hundred and twenty feet long and about twelve or fourteen feet high. They were constructed of logs laid horizontally. The bastions were of the same height as the other walls, but unlike them were formed of palings or timbers set upright in the ground. Large two-story log buildings were built in the bastions for the accommodation of the officers and their families, and the barracks for the troops were erected along the curtains, the roofs sloping toward the centre of the enclosure. They were divided into four rooms of thirty feet each, supplied with fireplaces, and were sufficient for the accommodation of a regiment of men,* a larger number, by the way, than was ever quartered in the fort. From the roof of the barracks building towards the Ohio river there arose a watch tower, surmounted by the flag of the United States. This tower was also used as a guard-house. There were other buildings within the enclosure—an arsenal, a store-house, and several smaller structures. The main gate was toward the river with a sally-port on the side fronting on the hills. A well was dug near the centre of the enclosure to supply the garrison with water in case of siege, but, happily, it was never needed, and we are told that ordinary water was brought from the river. The timber used in the construction of the fort was that of the heavy forest which covered its site and several acres of land round about. The area cleared was nearly all utilized for gardening purposes under the direction of Major Doughty, who seems to have had a remarkable fondness for tilling the soil and considerable taste and knowledge as a horticulturist.* Fort Harmar was named after General (then Colonel) Harmar, who was the commander of the regiment to which Major Doughty was attached, and for some time commandant of the fort at the mouth of the Muskingum.

*General Butler's Journal in Craig's "Olden Time"—October and November, 1847.

† This was Colonel James Monroe, member of Congress from Virginia.

* American Pioneer, volume one, 1842, contribution by Dr. S. P. Hildreth.

Joseph Buell (afterward one of the prominent early settlers at Marietta) was on the frontier for nearly a period of three years, dating from the latter part of December, 1785, and he spent a considerable portion of his time at Fort Harmar. His journal† affords some interesting glimpses of life in the garrison and affairs in the western country during the years immediately preceding its settlement. Much is said in the beginning of the hardships of army life, the depravity of the troops, and the severity of the punishments inflicted for various offences. Drunkenness and desertion were prevalent evils. The punishment for the former and other venal misdemeanors was not infrequently flogging to the extent of one hundred or even two hundred lashes, and the death penalty, without the process of court-martial, was inflicted upon deserters. Buell relates that three men, the finest soldiers in the company, deserted at Fort McIntosh, and being captured were shot by order of Major Wyllis, who commanded the fort—an act which the chronicler characterizes as the most inhuman that he ever saw. The pay of the soldiers at that time guarding the frontier was only three dollars per month.

March 12, 1786, Buell (still at Fort McIntosh) notes that "Generals Parsons and Butler," the latter the author of the journal from which we have made extracts in this chapter, "arrived here from the treaty at Miami."

It is shown by a later entry that the prevention of settlement northwest of the Ohio was still engaging the troops:

April 3rd. Major Wyllis and Captain Hamtramck, with his com-

* A portion of the cleared ground was planted with peaches, and the second or third year after, fine fruit was obtained from this orchard, probably the first in Ohio. One variety has been quite largely cultivated in Marietta and its vicinity, and named after its originator "the Doughty peach."

† The journal of Joseph Buell has been in part published in "Pioneer History of Ohio," by S. P. Hildreth. We make some extracts from it, both in this and subsequent chapters. Buell had the position of orderly in Captain Strong's company of Colonel Harmar's regiment.

pany, went down the river on command to disperse the frontier people settling on the Indian shore, or the right bank of the Ohio.

On the 4th of May, 1786, Captain Zeigler's and Strong's companies, embarked for Muskingum; and from this date forward the entries in the journal relate to occurrences at Fort Harmar.

May 8th. We arrived at Muskingum, where we encamped in the edge of the woods, a little distance from the fort.

10th. Captain Zeigler's company embarked for the Miami, and our company moved into the garrison, where we were engaged several days in making ourselves comfortable.

12th. Began to make our gardens, and had a very disagreeable spell of weather, which continued for twenty-two days raining in succession.

June 9th. Two boats arrived from Miami, and report that the Indians had murdered several inhabitants this spring. We are getting short of meat for the troops.

10th. Five frontiersmen came here to hunt for the garrison, and brought with them a quantity of venison.

19th. News arrived here that the Indians had killed four or five women and children at Fish creek, about thirty miles northeast from this garrison.

July 4th. The great day of American independence was commemorated by the discharge of thirteen guns, after which the troops were served with extra rations of liquor, and allowed to get as drunk as they pleased.

8th. We are brought down to half-rations, and have sent out a party of men to hunt. They returned without much success, although game is plenty in the woods.

9th. We discovered some Indians crossing the Ohio in a canoe, below the garrison, and sent a party after them, but could not overtake them.

10th. Ensign Kingsbury, with a party of nine, embarked for Wheeling in quest of provisions.

12th. Captain Strong arrived from Fort Pike.

16th. We were visited by a party of Indians, who encamped at a little distance from the garrison, and appeared to be very friendly. They were treated kindly by the officers, who gave them some wine, and the best the garrison afforded.

17th. Our men took up a stray canoe on the river. It contained a pair of shoes, two axes and some corn. We suppose the owners were killed by the Indians. Same day Lieutenant Kingsbury returned with only a supply of food for six or seven days.

18th. Captain Strong's company began to build their range of barracks, to make ourselves comfortable for the winter.

19th. This day buried the sifer to Captain Hart's company. Our funerals are conducted in the following manner. The men are all paraded without arms, and march by files in the rear of the corpse. The guard, with arms, march in front, with their pieces reversed; and the music in the rear of the guard, just in front of the coffin, playing some mournful tune. After the dead is buried they return in the same order, playing some lively march.

21st. A boat arrived from Fort Pitt with intelligence of a drove of cattle at Wheeling for this garrison.

22nd. Lieutenant Pratt, with a party of men, went up by land to bring down the cattle.

23d. Colonel Harmar arrived at the garrison. The troops paraded to receive him, and fired a salute of nine guns.

26th. Captain Hart went with a party of men to guard the Indians of the Muskingum.

27th. Lieutenant Pratt arrived with ten head of cattle, which revived our spirits, as we had been without provisions for several days.

29th. Three hunters came into the fort and informed us that they had seen a party of Indians lying in the woods. We sent out some men, but discovered nothing.

August 2d. Our garrison was alarmed. Captain Hart was walking on the bank of the river, and said he saw Indians on the other side of the Ohio, and saw them shoot one of our men who was out hunting, and beheld him fall. Colonel Harmar immediately sent the captain with a party of men after them. They crossed the river and found one man asleep on the ground, and another had been shooting at a mark. They had seen no Indians.

11th. Captain Hart's company were ordered to encamp in the open ground outside of the fort, as the men are very sickly in the barracks.

23d. Captain Hart and his company embarked for Wheeling with orders to escort and protect the surveyors in the seven ranges.

September 1st. Captain Tunis, the Indian, came to the fort and reported the Indians designed to attack our garrison, and that they were bent on mischief. We were all hands employed in making preparations to receive them, lining the bastions, clearing away all the weeds and brush within a hundred yards of the fort. We likewise cut up all our corn and broke down the bean poles, to prevent their having any shelter within rifle shot distance.

6th. Captain Tunis left the garrison to return to his nation and bring us further information.

7th. The troops received orders to parade at the alarm post at day-break, and continue under arms until after sunrise.

12th. Still busy making preparations for the Indians, and expect them every day.

21st. Ensign Kingsbury was ordered to take a party of men into the commandant's house, and put it in the best order for defence, and to remain there during the night.

26th. The troops are again brought to half rations. I went with a party of men after a raft of timber to construct our barracks.

27th. Lieutenant Smith embarked in quest of provisions. We are on short allowance, and expect the Indians every day to attack us. Our men are very uneasy, laying various plans to desert, but are so closely watched that it is very difficult for them to escape.

October 2nd. Lieutenant Smith returned with provisions sufficient only for a short time. We are busily occupied in erecting the barracks.

10th. Major Doughty and Captain Strong left here for New England.

11th. The Indians made us a visit, and stole one of our horses as it was feeding in the woods.

16th. Captain Tunis called again at the fort and says the Indians had repented of their design to attack the garrison.

November 3rd. Captain Tunis and a number of Indians with two squads, came into the garrison. At night they got very drunk and threatened the guard with their tomahawks and knives.

5th. Uling, a trader on the river, arrived with provisions.

9th. The hunters brought in about thirty deer and a great number of turkeys.

25th. Captain Hart's and McCurdy's companies came in from the survey of the seven ranges. They had a cold, wearisome time; their clothes and shoes wore out, and some of their feet badly frozen.

December 3rd. Uling arrived with twenty kegs of flour and ten kegs of whiskey and some dry goods.

Our rations now consist of a little venison, without any bread; as a substitute we have some corn and potatoes. The weather is very cold and the river full of ice.

13th. Lieutenant Pratt embarked in a boat for Flinn's Station (now Belleville) distant thirty miles below the garrison, for a load of corn and potatoes. The troops are in great distress for provisions. About twelve miles below they landed on account of the storm and their boat was carried off by the ice with a considerable amount of goods in it.

19th. Weather more moderate. Ensign Kingsbury embarked for Flinn's Station to make another trial for provisions.

22d. Ensign Kingsbury returned with about sixty bushels of corn and twenty of potatoes.

24th. We drew for our station about a peck of frozen potatoes. As Christmas is so near we are making all the preparations in our power to celebrate it.

25th. This being Christmas day, the sergeant celebrated it by a dinner to which was added a plentiful supply of wine.

January 31, 1787. Hamilton Kerr, our hunter, began to build a house on the island a little above the mouth of the Muskingum, and some of our men were ordered out as a fatigue party to assist him, under the command of Lieutenant Pratt.

February 11th. The weather has been very fine, and there is prospect of an early spring.

15th. Sergeant Judd went with a party of men to assist some inhabitants to move their families and settle near the garrison.

16th. Hamilton Kerr moved his family onto the island.

18th. Several families are settling on the Virginia shore opposite the fort.

24th. Isaac Williams arrived with his family to settle on the opposite shore of the river. Several others have joined him, which makes our situation in the wilderness much more agreeable.

27th. Major Hamtramck arrived from Fort Steuben in order to muster the troops. The same day some of the hunters brought in a buffalo, which was eighteen hands high and weighed one thousand pounds.

April 1st. The Indians came within twelve miles of the garrison, and killed an old man and took a boy prisoner.

5th. Lieutenant Smith went out with a party of men on a scout and discovered Indians on a hill within half a mile of the garrison.

9th. Ensign Kingsbury went on command with a party to bring in one of the hunters, fifty miles up the Muskingum, for fear of the Indians, who, we hear, are bent on mischief.

25th. One of our men discovered two Indians attempting to steal our horses a little distance from the fort.

May 1st. This is St. Tammany's day, and was kept with the festivities usual to the frontiers. All the sergeants in the garrison crossed the Ohio to Mr. Williams and partook of an excellent dinner.

7th. Twenty-one boats passed on their way to the lower country, Kentucky. They had on board five hundred and nine souls, with many wagons, goods, etc.

14th. John Stockley, a fifer in Captain Strong's company, deserted. He was pursued and overtaken twelve miles from the garrison, brought back, and ordered to run the gauntlet eleven times, through the troops of the garrison, stripped of his Continental clothing, and drummed out of the fort, with a halter around his neck, all of which was punctually executed.

21st. This evening I sent a young man, who cooked for me on Kerr's island, about half a mile above the fort after some milk; he was seen to jump into the river near the shore, when about a third of a mile from the garrison. We supposed some of the people were playing in the water. He did not return that evening, which led me to fear he had lost his course. In the morning a party was sent after him. They discovered fresh signs of Indians, and found his hat. They followed the trail, but did not find them. We afterwards heard that they had killed and scalped him. The Indians were a party of Ottawas.

The writer of the journal on the twentieth of May started down the Ohio with Captain Strong's company, and did not return to Fort Harmar until the twenty-first of November, having spent the interim at the Miami garrison, Fort Finney, Port Vincent, and other frontier localities in the lower Ohio country. During the period after his return, and prior to the landing of the Ohio company's colony, the journal contains no important entries, and we here leave it, to resume a survey of its pages in subsequent chapters.

While the various incidents of frontier army life above narrated or referred to were occurring at Fort Harmar, the eastern part of what is now Washington county, and the country north of it, was the theatre of a different kind of action. The surveyors mentioned in the first part of this chapter were traversing the country which was to be divided into "the seven ranges."

General Butler records the fact that he met the surveyors and the United States geographer at the west line of Pennsylvania, on the thirtieth of September, and dined with them. There was some discord among the members of the party, and Captain Hutchins was apprehensive of the safety of his company, unless the Indian chiefs should personally assure him of their good-will. A beginning had been made in the survey, but it was very soon abandoned.

General Benjamin Tupper, soon after the passage of the ordinance of May 20, 1785, providing for the survey and sale of the western lands, had gone as far as Pittsburgh with the idea of beginning the work which had been assigned to him. The Indians, however, who were dissatisfied with the terms of the treaty of Fort McIntosh, and alleged that they had been imposed upon, assumed a very hostile attitude, and threatened with death any persons who should engage in surveying the lands northwest of the Ohio. The risk was so great that common prudence dictated delay until further conference with the disaffected tribes and an amicable adjustment of their relations with the United States should be effected. General Tupper returned to New England.* The treaty of Fort Finney was negotiated in January, 1786, and temporary peace, at least, being promised the surveyors (General Tupper among them), made their way west in the following June, and began their labors.

These men (in one sense the pioneers—the advance guard of the great army of occupation which was to cross the Ohio)—led a career of adventure and danger, and accomplished the work to which they had been appointed only by overcoming many difficulties. Some idea of the sufferings they experienced has already been suggested by extracts from Joseph Buell's journal describing the condition of the soldiers who had been sent to guard them on their return to Fort Harmar. A more definite and a very interesting account of the progress of the survey is given in the journal of John Mathews.† He arrived at Pittsburgh July 29, 1786, and finding that the surveyors had gone down the Ohio to Little Beaver creek, followed and overtook them. After the troops who were to guard them had arrived from Fort Steuben, the work of the surveyors was begun, and Mathews went out with Captain Adam Hoops, the surveyor from Pennsylvania, to run the lines in the second range of townships. They remained out from the middle of August to the first of September, and then returned to the camp at Little Beaver, which they found deserted except by General Tupper, Captain Morris, and an assistant. Mr. Mathews made arrangements to go out with General Tupper on the survey of the seventh range, and started on the seventh of September. On the evening of the 9th they camped at the end of the fourth range. The next entry in the journal we quote:

Sunday, 10th. Camped near the end of the fifth range. Major Sargent, who surveys the fifth range, came to our camp and informed us that one of his hands had left him, which much embarrassed the progress of his work. General Tupper not being ready to begin work, as the geographer had not yet completed the sixth range, I went with Major Sargent to assist him for a few days, and General Tupper proposed to send his son Anselem,‡ who had gone to the geographer's camp, also, the next day to assist us. * * *

Monday, 11th. Anselem Tupper came to our camp about ten o'clock, and he and myself carried the chain.

14th. Mr. Anselem Tupper and myself, with a hunter, left Major Sargent's camp in order to fall in with General Tupper on the geographer's line, whom we found encamped near the end of the sixth range. *

15th. Decamped and moved to the westward six miles, where we joined the geographer's camp on Sandy creek, a large branch of the Tuscarawas.

Sunday, 17th. This morning I went to a camp of Indians who were returning from Fort McIntosh to their town. It was eighty rods above us on the creek. They were about eight in number, men and women. They had rum with them, and had a drunken frolic the night before, but appeared decent and friendly.

18th. General Tupper began his range, and our camp moved to the west about three miles to a large branch of the Tuscarawas, called Nine Shilling. After running on the line about three-fourths of a mile an express arrived from Major Hamtramck's camp at Little Beaver, with word that the Indians were assembling at the Shawnees towns and intended making a general attack upon the surveyors. Captain Hutchins and General Tupper thought it unsafe to proceed any further. Notice was immediately sent to Captain Morris, who had gone about one mile and a half on the west boundary of the seventh range, and we all returned to the ground we left this morning and passed the night.

19th. At nine A. M. decamped and marched for Little Beaver. Our party consisted of about fifty men, thirty-six of whom were troops under the command of Lieutenant Percy. Encamped at night near the first mile post of the sixth range.

The party continued their march, being met on the third day by Major Hamtramck and the whole of his command, and on the twenty-third of September reached Hamtramck's station, on the Ohio, five miles below Little Beaver. By the fourth of October, the feeling of alarm having partially subsided, the surveyors determined to go on with their work; and, on the eleventh, having made the necessary preparations, they again started into the wilderness. Mr. Mathews went with Major Sargent, who was to survey the fifth range. They proceeded westward on "Crawford's old trail" until they reached the place where they were to begin work. After carrying on the survey for about two weeks their pack horses were stolen by the Indians, who they discovered had been lying near their camp (within eighty rods of it the journal says), and had probably been watching them for several days. The journal relates that "When the commander of the escort, Captain Hart, was informed of the loss of our horses, he immediately commenced building a block-house on the most advantageous ground in the vicinity of our camp."

"31st. We this morning dispatched a man for Major Hamtramck's camp, on Wheeling rivulet, informing him of our situation and requesting more horses, so that we might proceed on our range. Although we were apprehensive of danger, we finished the west boundary of the seventh township this day. On our return to camp we found the block-houses in such a state as to afford a good shelter in case of an attack from the Indians."

Soon after the company returned to Wheeling, General Tupper started for Massachusetts on the twenty-second of November, and early in the following month Colonel Ebenezer Sproat and some others of the surveyors left for their homes. Captain Hutchins, the United States geographer, departed for New York on the twenty-seventh of January, 1787. The survey was suspended for the season. Mathews who went to Fort Steuben to take charge of the commissary department for the winter, notes that the surveyors again took up their work in the woods during April. With ranging degrees of success it was carried slowly and tediously on, during the spring and early summer, without the occurrence of any important incidents. Some of the surveyors who had recommenced work early in the season, came into Wheeling on the fifth of May, considerably alarmed, as they had heard through one of the Zanes of the murder of a family on Fishing creek, by the Indians. Early in June the surveyors had all arrived at the mouth of Indian Wheeling creek on the Ohio, and being met there by the troops sent from Fort Harmar to act as escort, went out into the wilderness to their respective ranges. It was the policy of Congress to continue the surveys if it was possible to do so. There were indications that the summer would be a troublous time. The surveyors were several times obliged to leave their work and seek safety at Wheeling or other points along the river. One party of Indians, supposed to be Chippewas, who hovered about the locality mentioned, were followed and attacked by the whites who killed one of them, and wounded two more. Several other skirmishes took place.

*We pause here briefly to note, the fact elsewhere to be enlarged upon, that it was during this first visit to the west that General Tupper became favorably and even enthusiastically possessed of the idea of making a New England settlement in the Ohio country; and it was during his visit to Massachusetts in the winter of 1785-86 that the first direct movement was made toward the formation of a company for the purpose of colonization. General Tupper visited General Putnam; they spent nearly a whole night in talking over the scheme of immigration, and the result of their earnest conference was seen in the public prints of the State on the twenty-fifth of January, 1786, in the form of an advertisement headed "Information," signed by the generals, and designed to test the spirit of the people in regard to the formation of The Ohio company.

†John Mathews, of New Braintree, Massachusetts, was a nephew of General Rufus Putnam. He came to the western country before he had arrived at his majority, with the view of obtaining employment in the survey of the seven ranges, and to gain knowledge concerning the country. He was afterwards one of the Ohio company's surveyors, and settled in 1796 in Muskingum county.

‡Major Anselem Tupper was among the early settlers at Marietta, and was a surveyor in the employment of the Ohio company. He died at Marietta in 1808.

The author of the journal from which we have given extracts, had but little to do with the survey after the spring of 1787, but was in the country all of the time acting in various capacities, and travelling about from Fort Steuben, Pittsburgh and Wheeling to Fort Harmar and other points. In the later entries of his journal (from November, 1787, to April 7, 1788), is found mention of several characters who were among the pioneers of the Ohio company. In November, 1787, he met Colonel Return J. Meigs at Pittsburgh, and at Washington (Pennsylvania) he met Anselem Tupper (in January, 1788), with whom he remained some time, completing plats of surveys. On the second of February he came across Major Hoffield White "with twenty-two men from New England," and on the seventeenth at Sumrill's ferry, he makes the following entry in the journal:

I had the pleasure of seeing my honored uncle, General Putnam, by whom I received a number of letters from my friends.

CHAPTER V.

INCEPTION OF THE EMIGRATION IDEA AND ORGANIZATION OF THE OHIO COMPANY.

Review of the History of the West—Early Time Spirit of Emigration in New England.—"The Military Company of Adventurers" Propose Settlement in Mississippi.—Rufus Putnam goes thither with his Uncle Israel.—Feature of the Scheme of Colonization.—Effect on the New England Mind.—The Revolutionary War.—By the Camp-Fires in the Watch of the Night.—Washington Directs the Attention of the Soldiers to the West During the Darkest Days of the Conflict.—Impoverishment of the Revolutionary Officers at the Close of the War.—Condition of the Country.—Officers Petition Government for a Grant of Land.—Their Plan of Western Settlement.—General Putnam's Letter to Washington.—Its Wise Suggestions.—Some of Them Adopted with Beneficial Results.—Washington's Influence Unavailing to Secure Action of Congress.—Impatience of the Officers for the Realization of their Plans.—Something of their Character and Condition After the War.—"Financial Settlement Certificates."—Their Depreciated Value.—Speculators Purchase them to their own Advantage.—Loyalty to the Government.—Shay's Rebellion.—Virginia's Action in Regard to Lands for her Soldiers.—Destiny.—New England to Effect First Settlement in the West rather than the "Old Dominion."—Opportunity and Advantages of the Latter State.—General Putnam Again Addresses Washington.—Reply to his Letter.—"Justice and Gratitude to the Army" Demand the Granting of the Officers' Petition.—Despair of Succeeding in the Old Scheme.—A New One Boldly Entered on.—General Tupper's Visit to the West.—His All Night Conference with General Putnam.—They Publish a Call for the Organization of the Ohio Company.—Delegates Elected.—Meet at "Bunch of Grapes" Tavern in Boston.—Certificates of Agreement Adopted.—Progress of the Company's Affairs.—A Purchase in the Ohio Company Decided upon.—Dr. Manasseh Cutler Employed as Agent of the Company.—Canvass for the Location on the Muskingum.

In the preceding pages has been given something of the history of the west while it was still a wilderness, the ownership of which was successively vested in France, in the British crown, in Virginia, and in the Confederate Colonies of America. Something of the history of the Indian tribes of the northwest has been shown; of the advent of the white man as an adventurer among them; of the invasion of the country by armed forces who came to conquer; and of its peaceful penetration by the zealous missionaries who came to propagate a faith. Some idea has been given of the operations of explorers and political economists; of the feeling that prevailed in Virginia in respect to the country; and the unsuccessful projects for its colonization. In the last few years of the period prior to the red letter year, 1788, we have witnessed just over the boundary, in the easternmost edge of the vast territory, unlawful settlers driven from their homes; we have seen the frontier surveyors at their work, harassed by Indians; and we have seen a fort arise in the forest at the mouth of the Muskingum. At the far western boundary, upon the Mississippi, are a few French settlers and possibly there are a score or so of transient residents upon the Maumee—mere traders. But the northwest is still practically an unknown land, explorers to the contrary notwithstanding, a desolate though beautiful wild inhabited by savage tribes, its vast latent wealth awaiting, as it had for ages, the talismanic touch of civilization.

Far away upon the Atlantic sea board forces were at work a score of years anterior to 1788 which were not only to form the first settlement but to plant New England morals, law, and institutions upon this vast inland domain of the nation. Ideas were in inception, which as the prime impetus in a long chain of causes and effects were to swell the tremendous result and effect the destiny not alone of the west but of the Republic from sea to sea.

It is a pleasant thought that in the British war against the French, General Putnam (at the time of his enlistment in 1757, nineteen years of age) and many others assisted in wresting from the enemy and in securing to their sovereign the very territory which was to become their home, and it is a disagreeable fact that they had finally so dearly to purchase a small portion of the domain which they had twice bought by bravery of arms. The very men who fought to win for England the territory which the French disputed, in 1755-1760, were foremost to win it from her twenty years later, and thus twice exhibited the hardihood and heroism of their natures.

Something of the spirit of emigration manifested itself in New England after the conclusion of the French and Indian war, and was in fact an outgrowth of that struggle. An organization of ex-soldiers of the colonies was formed, called "The Military Company of Adventurers," whose purpose it was to establish a colony in West Florida (now Mississippi). Although the project had been entered upon soon after the establishment of peace, it was not until the year 1772 that anything was accomplished. General Lyman, after several years' endeavor, succeeded in procuring a grant of a tract of land. It was decided to explore the tract, and a company of surveyors, of which the celebrated Israel Putnam was the leader, went out in January, 1773, for that purpose. Rufus Putnam was a member of the party. The examination was satisfactory, and several hundred families embarked from Massachusetts and Connecticut to make a settlement. They found to their chagrin that the King's grant had been revoked, and the settlement was therefore abandoned. Those who did not fall sick and die returned to their homes. Such was the disastrous end of this project of settlement, which, had it succeeded, might possibly have changed the whole political history of the United States. It seems at least to be within the realm of probability that had a settlement been planted in Mississippi, Massachusetts would not have made the initial settlement in the Ohio country and extended her influence over the territory from which five great States have been created. The enterprise of founding a colony in the far south, thwarted as it was, undoubtedly had its effect upon the New England mind, and was one of the elements which prepared the way for the inauguration of a new scheme of emigration in later years. The dream which had been fondly indulged in for a long term of years, was not to be forgotten even when the opportunity for its realization had passed away.

Soon, however, there arose a subject for thought which overshadowed all others. What men of shrewd foresight had long expected had come to pass. The colonies were arrayed against the mother country in a battle for independence. We shall not here attempt to follow Generals Putnam, Parsons, Varnum, and Tupper, Major Winthrop Sargent, Colonel Ebenezer Sproat, and the many other brave soldiers who became Ohio company emigrants, through the perils of those seven dark years of the Revolution. But is it not natural to suppose that some of them who had been interested in the old colonization project talked of it around their camp fires? Is it not probable that the review of the past suggested the possibility of forming in the future another military colony, in which they should realize the bright hopes that had once been blasted? It seems natural that in the long lulls between the periods of fierce activity this topic should have come up frequently in conversation, or at least that it should have appeared as a vague but alluring element in many pictures of the future painted by hopeful imaginations. It is evident from perusal of General Putnam's autobiography that he had indulged the hope of emigration to "some remote land rich in possibilities" "for many years before he led the little New England colony to the Muskingum. He had very likely cherished the hope unceasingly from the time when the military company of adventurers was organized, and doubtless the journey to that far away strange and beautiful Mississippi had served as a stimulus to quicken his desire for the realization of a project which would employ so much of his energy and enterprise, and afford so fine an opportunity for the achievement of a life success. We know that Washington, during the darkest days of the Revolution, directed the attention of his companions at arms to the west, as a land in which they might take refuge should they be worsted in the struggle, but happily it was not to be that contingency which should cause the movement of emigration toward the Ohio. If during the war the western country was the subject of an occasional stray, light thought, the time was to come when it should be uppermost in the minds of many of the soldiers and practically considered, not as a land in which they must seek to take refuge from a victorious foe, but as one in which they might retrieve the losses they had sustained in repelling the enemy. It must be borne in mind that the independence of the American colonies was dearly bought as indeed has been all the great good attained in the history of the world. The very men by whose long continued, self-sacrificing devotion and bravery, the struggle against the tyrannical mother country had been won, found themselves at the close of the war reduced to the most straitened circumstances, and the young nation ushered into being by their heroism was unable to alleviate their condition. These were the times which tried men's souls. Nowhere was the strain any more severe than in Massachusetts and Connecticut. The joy which peace brought after seven years of war was in most localities too deep to be voiced by noisy demonstration, and it was not unmingled with forebodings of the future. "The rejoicings," says a local historian,* "were mostly expressed in religious solemnities." There were still difficult problems to be solved—and there was the memory of husbands, fathers, sons, brothers, and lovers who would not return with the victorious patriots, and it may in many cases have been difficult "to discern the noise of the shout of joy from the noise of the weeping of the people."

* Ellen D. Larned, in the History of Windham County, Connecticut.

For the purpose of more adequately representing the feeling which prevailed in New England during the years following the war, we shall revert to the time when the great struggle was drawing to a close. Then the subject of western colonization was strongly agitated and the movement which culminated in the Ohio company's purchase and settlement had its inception. As the object which they had been fighting to achieve had been attained, the soldiers saw that their occupation was gone and looked about them for a new means of subsistence. Congress had in 1776 made an appropriation of lands by the laws of which it was provided that a colonel who should serve through the war should receive five hundred acres, a lieutenant colonel four hundred and fifty, and so on down to a private soldier who should be entitled to one hundred acres. The act was extended to the general officers in 1780, and it was arranged that a major general should receive one thousand one hundred acres and a brigadier eight hundred and fifty acres. In the summer of 1783 seeing that the final reduction must soon take place the officers to the number of two hundred and eighty-eight, anxious for definite action, petitioned Congress that the lands they were entitled to might be located in the country bounded on the north by Lake Erie, on the east by Pennsylvania, southeast and south by the river Ohio and west by a line beginning on the Ohio twenty-four miles west of the mouth of the Scioto, thence running north to the Miami of the lakes (Maumee) and down that stream to its mouth. "This tract," they said, "would be sufficient in extent, and the land of such quality and situation as may induce Congress to assign and mark it out as a tract or territory suitable to form a distinct government in time to be admitted as one of the Confederate States of America." This tract, it was claimed, "was not the property of or within the jurisdiction of any particular State"—which, by the way, was an erroneous assumption, as Virginia at that time laid claim to the whole northwest.

General Rufus Putnam was interested in the project. Like most of the other officers he was impoverished by the war, and had been so long engaged in the profession of arms that he necessarily knew little of any other. How earnestly he had entered into the scheme with his brother officers, and how thoroughly he had pondered the subject of western settlement is shown by a letter which he wrote to George Washington to enlist his great influence in favor of the petitioners. The letter shows that many of the wisest measures afterward adopted by the National Government in its plan for the disposal of the public domain, had their origin in the mind of the writer. It therefore has a broad and deep value as a matter of history, and as it is scarcely less interesting as exhibiting the spirit of the patriots in Massachusetts and Connecticut at the time it was written, we have thought it well to print it entire:

NEW WINDSOR, June 16, 1783.

SIR:—As it is very uncertain how long it may be before the honorable Congress may take the petition of the officers of the army for lands between the Ohio river and Lake Erie into consideration, or be in a situation to decide thereon, the going to Philadelphia to negotiate the business with any of its members or committee to whom the petition may be referred, is a measure none of the petitioners will think of undertaking. The part I have taken in promoting the petition is well known, and therefore needs no apology when I inform you that the signers expect that I will pursue measures to have it laid before Congress. Under these circumstances I beg leave to put the petition in your excellency's hands, and ask with the greatest assurance your patronage of it. That Congress may not be wholly unacquainted with the motives of the petitioners, I beg your indulgence while I make a few observations on the policy and propriety of granting the prayer of it, and making such arrangements of garrisons in the western quarter as shall give effectual protection to the settlers and encourage immigration to the new government; which, if they meet your approbation and the favor be not too great, I must request your excellency will give them your support and cause them to be forwarded, with the petition, to the president of Congress, in order that when the petition is taken up, Congress or their committee may be informed on what principles the petition is grounded. I am, sir, among those who consider the cession of so great a tract of territory to the United States, in the western world, as a very happy circumstance and of great consequence to the American empire; nor have I the least doubt but Congress will pay an early attention to securing the allegiance of the motives as well as provide for the defence of the country in case of a war with Great Britain or Spain. One great means of securing the allegiance of the natives, I take to be the furnishing them with such necessities as they stand in need of, and in exchange receiving their furs and skins. They have become so accustomed to the use of firearms that I doubt if they could gain a subsistence without them, at least they will be very sorry to be reduced to the disagreeable necessity of using the bow and arrows as the only means of killing their game; and so habituated are they to the woollen blankets, etc., etc., that absolute necessity alone will prevent their making use of them.

This consideration alone, is I think, sufficient to prove the necessity of establishing such factories as may furnish an ample supply to these wretched creatures; for unless they are furnished by the subjects of the United States, they will undoubtedly seek elsewhere, and like all other people, form their attachments where they have their commerce; and then in case of war will always be certain to aid our enemies. Therefore, if there were no other advantages in view than that of attaching them to our interests, I think good policy will dictate the measure of carrying on a commerce with these people; but when we add to this the consideration of the profit arising from the Indian trade in general, there cannot, I presume, be a doubt that it is the interest of the United States to make as early provision for the encouragement and protection of it as possible. For these and many other obvious reasons, Congress will no doubt find it necessary to establish garrisons in Oswego, Niagara, Michilimackinac, Illinois, and many other places in the western world.

The Illinois and all the ports that shall be established on the Mississippi, may undoubtedly be furnished by way of the Ohio, with provisions, at all times, and with goods whenever a war shall interrupt the trade with New Orleans. But in case of a war with Great Britain, unless a communication is open between the river Ohio and Lake Erie, Niagara, Detroit, and all the ports seated on the great lakes will inevitably be lost without such communication; for a naval superiority on lake Ontario and the seizing of Niagara, will subject the whole country bordering on the lakes to the will of the enemy. Such a misfortune will put it out of the power of the United States to furnish the natives, and necessity will again oblige them to take an active part against us.

Where and how this communication is to be opened shall be next considered. If Captain Hutchins, and a number of other map makers, are not out in their calculations, provisions may be sent from the settlements on the south side of the Ohio by the Muskingum or Scioto to Detroit, or even to Niagara, at a less expense than from Albany, by the Mohawk, to those places. To secure such communication (by the Scioto, all circumstances considered, will be the best) let a chain of forts be established; these forts should be built upon the banks of the river, if the ground will admit, and about twenty miles distant from each other, and on this plan the Scioto communication will require ten or eleven stockaded forts, flanked by block-houses, and one company of men will be a sufficient garrison for each, except the one at the portage, which will require more attention in the construction and a larger number of men to garrison it. But besides supplying the garrisons on the great lakes with provisions, etc., we ought to take into consideration the protection that such an arrangement will give to the frontiers of Virginia, Pennsylvania, and New York. I say New York, as we shall undoubtedly extend our settlements and garrisons from the Hudson to Oswego. This done and a garrison posted at Niagara, whoever will inspect the map must be convinced that all the Indians on the waters of the Mohawk, Oswego, Susquehanna, and Allegheny rivers and in all the country south of the lakes Ontario and Erie, will be encircled in such a manner as will effectually secure their allegiance and keep them quiet, or oblige them to quit the country.

Prof. Putnam

Nor will such an arrangement of forts from the Ohio to Lake Erie be any additional expense; for unless this gap is shut, notwithstanding the garrisons on the lakes and from Oswego to the Hudson, yet the frontier settlers on the Ohio, by Fort Pitt to the Susquehanna, and all the country south of the Mohawk, will be exposed to savage insult, unless protected by a chain of garrisons which will be far more expensive than the arrangement proposed, and, at the same time, the protection given to these States will be much less complete; besides, we should not confine our protection to the present settlements, but carry the idea of extending them at least as far as the lakes Ontario and Erie.

These lakes form such a natural barrier that when connected with the Hudson and Ohio, by the garrisons proposed, settlements in every part of New York and Pennsylvania may be made with the utmost safety; so that these States must be deeply interested in the measures, as well as Virginia, who will by the same arrangement have a great part of its frontier secured and the rest much strengthened; nor is there a State in the Union but will be greatly benefitted by the measure, considered in any other point of view, for, without any expense, except a small allowance of purchase money to the natives, the United States will have within their protection seventeen million, five hundred thousand acres of very fine land, to dispose of as they think proper.

But I hasten to mention some of the expectations which the petitioners have respecting the conditions on which they hope to obtain the lands. This was not proper to mention in the body of the petition, especially as we pay for grants to all members of the army who wish to take up lands in that quarter.

The whole tract is supposed to contain about seventeen million four hundred and eighteen thousand two hundred acres, and will admit of seven hundred and fifty-six townships of six miles square, allowing to each township three thousand and forty acres for the ministry, schools, waste lands, ponds and highways; then each township will contain of settlers' lands twenty thousand acres, and in the whole fifteen million, one hundred and twenty thousand acres. The land to which the army is entitled by resolve of Congress, referred to in the petition, according to my estimate, will amount to two million one hundred and six thousand eight hundred and fifty acres, which is about the eighth part of the whole. For the survey of this the army expect to be at no expense, nor do they expect to be under any obligation to settle these lands or do any duty to secure their title to them; but in order to induce the army to become actual settlers in the new government, the petitioners hope Congress will make a further grant of lands on condition of settlement, and have no doubt but that honorable body will be as liberal to all those who are not provided for by their own States, as New York has been to the officers and soldiers who belong to that State; which, if they do, it will require about eight million acres to complete the army, and about seven million acres will remain for sale. The petitioners, at least some of them, are much opposed to the monopoly of the lands, and wish to guard against large patents being granted to individuals, as, in their opinion, such a mode is very injurious to a country, and greatly retards its settlement; and whenever such patents are tentanted it throws too much power into the hands of a few. For these and many other obvious reasons, the petitioners hope that no grant will be made but by townships of six miles square, or six by twelve, or six by eighteen miles, to be subdivided by the proprietors to six miles square, that being the standard by which they wish all calculations to be made; and that officers and soldiers, as well as those who petition for charters on purchase may form their associations on one uniform principle, as to number of persons or rights to be contained in a township, with the exception only that when the grant is made for services already done, or on condition of settlement, if the officers petition with the soldiers for a particular township, the soldier shall have one right only to a captain's three, and so in proportion with commissioned officers of every grade.

These, sir, are the principles which give rise to the petition under consideration; the petitioners, at least some of them, think that sound policy dictates the measure, and that Congress ought to lose no time in establishing some such chain of posts as have been hinted at, and in procuring the tract of land petitioned for, of the natives; for, the moment this is done, and agreeable terms offered to the settlers, many of the petitioners are determined not only to become adventurers, but actually to remove themselves to this country; and there is not the least doubt but other valuable citizens will follow their example, and the probability is that the country between Lake Erie and the Ohio will be filled with inhabitants, and the faithful subjects of the United States so established on the waters of the Ohio and the lakes as to banish forever the idea of our western territory falling under the dominion of any European power. The frontiers of the old States will be effectively secured from savage alarms, and the new will have little to fear from their insults.

I have the honor to be, sir, with every sentiment, your excellency's most obedient and very humble servant,

RUFUS PUTNAM.

General Washington.

It will be observed that in the foregoing letter the admirable township system of New England is suggested as an element in the plan for settling and developing the western country. That measure was adopted very nearly as General Rufus Putnam originally advocated it, and it has been in the opinion of very many students of political economy* one of the most important factors in building up the civilization of the northern States and advancing them beyond the southern, in which the township system has only a nominal existence.

But to return to the matter directly in hand. Washington used his utmost influence to advance the object sought by the petitioners, and urged by General Putnam, but without avail. He wrote a communication to Congress, which he forwarded with the long letter he had received, but no legislation affecting the interests of the petitioners was enacted. The General Government had not yet a perfect title to the territory northwest of the Ohio, and even, if it had, Congress would undoubtedly have been tediously slow in taking the initiative in disposing of the domain which, in after years, was to be squandered with the most prodigal hand.

As time progressed, the New England Revolutionary officers and soldiers interested in western immigration became more and more impatient to realize their hopes. They were poorer than their neighbors who had not been in the field; and if they had more of pride, that was only natural from the lives they had led, and surely they had a right to feel proud of the services they had rendered. One who was among them, and a close observer, says that they had a better and more dignified bearing than before the war, dressed more handsomely, and were improved in manners and conversation.† Many of them were members of the Masonic order and of the Cincinnati, an order which was established to maintain the *De Tocqueville, in his "Democracy in America," was, perhaps the first writer who brought this subject prominently into consideration, and Judge Tourgee, author of the reconstruction novels "A Fool's Errand" and "Bricks without Straw" may be mentioned as the best known late writer who has dwelt upon the township plan as accounting in large measure, for the difference between the conditions of the north and south. In 1830, in the senate of the United States, Daniel Webster, in discussing the modes for the disposal of land—the northern and the southern—after speaking of the latter as the one which had shingled over the country in which it had been applied with conflicting titles and claims, causing the two great evils in a new country, of speculation and litigation, said: "From the system actually established these evils are banished. Now, sir, in effecting this great system, the first important measure on the whole subject, New England acted with vigor and effect, and the latest posterity of those who settled northwest of the Ohio, will have reason to remember with gratitude her patriotism and her wisdom. New England gave the system to the West, and while it remains, there will be spread over all the west one monument of her intelligence in matters of government and her practical good sense."

†Reminiscences of Colonel Ichabod Nye. (Mss.)

friendships of the war between the colonial officers and their French associates, and to aid the widows and the orphans of those who had fallen. It was by no means strange that, the war being ended and these men returned to their homes among people with whom they could not be wholly in sympathy, and from whom they had been separated seven long years, they should seek to perpetuate the newer ties that had been closely knit in common trials and dangers. These men, it must be remembered, did not receive money in pay for their fatigue, exposure and suffering, but final certificates in settlement. They were almost valueless, for the country had not the money to make them good. In 1784 they were worth only about three shillings and sixpence or four shillings to the pound, face value, and as late as 1788 they brought not more than five or six shillings. Even at these ruinous rates many holders had to part with them, and there were speculators who realized some profit from the transactions. Some lost property which would have been the support of their old age, because unable to raise comparatively trifling sums with which to save it. Thus illy were these men who had gained the Nation's independence requited. They rebelled at the idea of living in destitution and deficiency among people of relatively easy circumstances, and the thought of toiling at menial manual labor they could not entertain. Still, they were willing to work to gain a livelihood, but preferred to do that in a new country where they would all be in a condition of equality. They looked upon the western country, which should have been their free inheritance, as a land in which they could begin anew the toilsome grind of life. Still, in their perplexed, humiliated condition, they never wavered in loyalty; and, when the lower populace in Massachusetts, beginning to feel the distress caused by the long, costly war, broke forth in the first organized rebellion in the United States (Shay's insurrection), these soldiers were found, like General Benjamin Tupper, actively engaged upon the side of law and order.

There was an action, too, at this time, far away in Virginia, which could not be without its effect upon the waiting New Englanders. In 1783 the legislature of the Old Dominion authorized a deed ceding her claim to the territory northwest of the Ohio, with a very important reservation. A rich body of lands lying between the Scioto and the Little Miami, now known as the Virginia Military district, was reserved to be given to Virginia's Revolutionary soldiers of the continental line, or, in other words, to pay their bounty awards.

But in spite of this advantage possessed by Virginia in the privilege retained for her troops, and in spite of her contiguity to the territory, it was to be first settled by New Englanders, and leavened by New England law. And the events which were to lead to that consummation were closely following each other in Massachusetts and Connecticut.

Impelled anew, in all probability by the action of Congress, March 1, 1784, in accepting Virginia's cession, General Putnam again addressed George Washington in the interests of the New England officers. His letter was as follows:

RUTLAND, April 5, 1784.

DEAR SIR: Being unavoidably prevented from attending the general meeting of the Cincinnati at Philadelphia, as I had intended, where I once more expected the opportunity in person of paying my respects to your excellency, I cannot deny myself of addressing you by letter, to acknowledge with gratitude the ten thousand obligations I feel myself under to your goodness, and most sincerely to congratulate you on your return to domestic happiness; to enquire after your health, and wish the best of Heaven's blessings may attend you and your lady.

The settlement of the Ohio country, sir, engrosses many of my thoughts, and much of my time since I left the camp has been employed in informing myself and others in respect to the nature, situation, and circumstances of that country, and the practicability of removing ourselves there; and if I am to form an opinion on what I have seen and heard on the subject, there are thousands in this quarter who will emigrate to that country as soon as the honorable Congress makes provisions for granting lands there, and locations and settlements can be made with safety, unless such provision is too long delayed; I mean until necessity turn their views another way, which is the case with some already, and must soon be the case with many more. You are sensible of the necessity as well as the possibility of both officers and soldiers fixing themselves in business somewhere, as soon as possible, as many of them are unable to lie longer on their oars waiting the decision of Congress, on our petition, and, therefore, must unavoidably settle themselves in some other quarter, which, when done, the idea of removing to the Ohio country will probably be at an end, with respect to most of them. Besides, the commonwealth of Massachusetts have come to a resolution to sell their eastern country for public securities, and should their plan be formed, and propositions be made public before we hear anything from Congress respecting our petition and the terms on which the lands petitioned for are to be obtained, it will undoubtedly be much against us, by greatly lessening the number of Ohio associates.

Another reason why we wish to know, as soon as possible what the intentions of Congress are respecting our petition, is the effect such knowledge will probably have on the credit of the certificates we have received on settlement of accounts. Those securities are now selling at no more than three shillings and six pence, or four shillings on the pound, which in all probability might double, if not more, the moment it was known that the Government would receive them for lands in the Ohio country. From these circumstances, and many others which might be mentioned, we are growing quite impatient, and the general inquiry now is, When are we going to the Ohio? Among others, Brigadier General Tupper, Lieutenant Colonel Oliver and Mayor Ashley have agreed to accompany me to that country the moment the way is open for such an undertaking. I should have hinted these things to some member of Congress, but the delegates from Massachusetts, although exceedingly worthy men, and in general would wish to promote the Ohio scheme, yet, if it should militate against the particular interests of that State, by draining her of inhabitants, especially when she is forming the plan of selling the eastern country, I thought they would not be very warm advocates in our favor, and I dare not trust myself with any of the New York delegates, with whom I was acquainted, because that government is wisely inviting the eastern people to settle in that State; and as to the delegates of other States, I have no acquaintance with any of them.

These circumstances must apologize for my troubling you on this subject, and requesting the favor of a line, to inform us in this quarter what the prospects are with respect to our petition and what measures have been or are likely to be taken with respect to settling the Ohio country.

I shall take it as a very particular favor sir, if you will be kind enough to recommend me to some character in Congress acquainted with, and attached to, the Ohio cause, with whom I may presume to open a correspondence.

I am, sir, with the highest respect, your humble servant,

RUFUS PUTNAM.

General Washington.

General Putnam, in reply, received the following letter* from Washington, but, as will be observed, after a considerable delay.

MOUNT VERNON, June 2, 1784

DEAR SIR: I could not answer your favor of the fifth of April from Philadelphia, because General Knox, having mislaid it, only presented the letter to me in the moment of my departure from that place. The sentiments of esteem and friendship which breathe in it, are exceedingly pleasing and flattering to me, and you may rest assured they are reciprocal.

*The original is in the library of Marietta college with many other papers of rare value, presented by by Hon. William R. Putnam.

I wish it was in my power to give you a more favorable account of the officers' petition for lands on the Ohio, and its waters, than I am about to do. After this matter and information respecting the establishment for peace were my inquiries, as I went through Annapolis, solely directed, but I could not learn that anything decisive had been done in either.

On the latter, I hear Congress are differing about their powers, but as they have accepted of the cession from Virginia and have resolved to lay off ten new States, bounded by latitudes and longitudes, it should be supposed that they would determine something respecting the former before they adjourn; and yet I very much question it, as the latter is to happen on the 3rd—that is, to-morrow. As the Congress who are to meet in November next, by the adjournment, will be composed of an entire new choice of delegates, in each State, it is not in my power, at this time, to direct you to a proper correspondent in that body. I wish I could, for persuaded I am, that to some such cause as you have assigned, may be ascribed the delay the petition has encountered, for surely, if justice and gratitude to the army and general policy of the Union were to govern in this case, there would not be the smallest interruption in gratifying its request. I really feel for these gentlemen, who, by the unaccountable delays (by any other means than those you have suggested) are held in such an awkward and disagreeable state of suspense, and wish my endeavors could remove the obstacles. At Princetown, before Congress left that place, I exerted every power I was master of, and dwelt upon the argument you have used, to show the propriety of a speedy decision. Every member with whom I conversed acquiesced in the reasonableness of the petition. All yielded, or seemed to yield, to the policy of it but plead the want of cession of the land to act upon; this is made and accepted, and yet matters as far as they have come to my knowledge, remain in statu quo.

I am, dear sir, with my sincere esteem and regard,

Your most obedient servant,

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

All of the efforts of General Putnam assisted by the strongest influence of the Father of his Country were unavailing to secure those simple measures of justice which would have relieved those Revolutionary officers of New England from their embarrassed and desperate situation. As time went slowly by they gave up even the little hope that had sustained them while waiting Congressional measures. Despairing of the success of the old scheme they finally adopted a new one, resolving to purchase outright what the Nation refused to bestow as the hard earned remuneration of their services. Early in 1786 the idea of Ohio immigration began to form into that shape in which it became effective.

It has been shown in a former chapter that General Benjamin Tupper, in the early autumn of 1785, had gone to the Ohio country to engage in surveying under the ordinance passed by Congress May 20th of that year, and it will be remembered that owing to the hostility of the Indians and consequent hazard of entering upon the work, he returned to New England. General Tupper was one of the men who had been most intently engaged in planning western settlements, and was undoubtedly a coworker with his intimate old friend, General Putnam, he advocating and agitating the scheme which had proved unsuccessful. He returned from the west filled with admiration of that portion of the country which he had seen, and made enthusiastic through the descriptions given by traders of the region farther down la belle riviere than he had journeyed. Doubtless he pondered upon the idea of removing to the west, during the whole time spent there, and was chiefly occupied with the subject while making the tedious return to his home. Early in January he visited, at his house in Rutland, Worcester county, Massachusetts, General Putnam, and there these two men, who may be properly called the founders of the Ohio company, earnestly talked of their experiences and their hopes in front of the great fire, while the night hours fast passed away. In the language of one whom it is fair to suppose had preserved the truthful tradition of that meeting: "A night of friendly offices and conference between them gave, at the dawn, a development—how important in its results!—to the cherished hope and purpose of the visit of General Tupper." * As the result of that long conversation by a New England fireside, appeared the first mention in the public prints of the Ohio company. The two men had thought so deeply and carefully upon the absorbing theme of colonization, were so thoroughly impressed with the feasibility of their plans as they had unfolded them, so impatient to put them to that test, that they felt impelled to take an immediate and definite step. They could no longer rest inactive. They joined in a brief address, setting forth their views and feeling the opinion of the people. It appeared in the newspapers on the twenty-fifth of January, and read as follows:

INFORMATION.

The subscribers take this method to inform all officers and soldiers who have served in the late war, and who are by a late ordinance of the honorable Congress to receive certain tracts of land in the Ohio country, and also all other good citizens who wish to become adventurers in that delightful region, that from personal inspection, together with other incontestible evidences, they are fully satisfied that the lands in that quarter are of a much better quality than any other known to the New England people; that the climate, seasons, products, etc., are in fact equal to the most flattering accounts that have ever been published of them; that being determined to become purchasers and to prosecute a settlement in that country, and desirous of forming a general association with those who entertain the same ideas, they beg leave to propose the following plan, viz.: That an association by the name of The Ohio Company be formed of all such as wish to become purchasers, etc., in that country, who reside in the commonwealth of Massachusetts only, or to extend to the inhabitants of other States as shall be agreed on.

That in order to bring such a company into existence the subscribers propose that all persons who wish to promote the scheme, should meet within their respective counties (except in two instances hereinafter mentioned) at 10 o'clock A. M. on Wednesday, the fifteenth day of February next, and that each county or meeting there assembled choose a delegate or delegates to meet at the Bunch of Grapes Tavern, in Boston, on Wednesday, the first day of March next, at 10 o'clock A. M., then and there to consider and determine upon a general plan of association for said company; which plan, covenant, or agreement, being published, any person (under condition therein to be provided) may, by subscribing his name, become a member of the company.

Then follow the places of meeting:

At Captain Webb's, in Salem, Middlesex; at Bradish's, in Cambridge, Hampshire; at Pomeroy's in North Hampton, Plymouth; at Bartlett's, in Plymouth, Barnstable, Dukes and Nantucket counties; at Howland's, in Barnstable, Bristol; at Crocker's, in Taunton, York; at Woodbridge's, in York, Worcester; at Patch's, in Worcester, Cumberland and Lincoln; at Shothick's, in Falmouth, Berkshire, at Dibble's, in Lenox.

RUFUS PUTNAM,
BENJAMIN TUPPER.

RUTLAND, January 10, 1786.

The plan suggested by General Putnam and Tupper was carried out, and upon the first day of March, the delegates from the several counties assembled at the Bunch of Grapes tavern, the designated place in Boston, (which was then a considerably smaller city than is now the capital of Ohio), and there discussed in conventional form the proposed organization of the Ohio company. The delegates present at that historical meeting were: Manasseh Cutler, of Essex; Winthrop Sargent and John Mills, of Suffolk; John Brooks and Thomas Cushing, of Middlesex; Benjamin Tupper, of Hampshire; Crocker Sampson, of Plymouth; Rufus Putnam, of Worcester; Jeliel Woodbridge and John Patterson, of Berkshire; Abraham Williams, of Barnstable.

* Arius Nye, in Transactions of the Ohio Historical and Philosophical society.

General Putnam was made chairman of the convention, and Major Winthrop Sargent, secretary. Before adjournment a committee of five was appointed to draft a plan of an association, as "from the very pleasing description of the western country, given by Generals Putnam and Tupper and others, it appeared expedient to form a settlement there." That committee consisted of General Putnam, Dr. Manasseh Cutler, Colonel Brooks, Major Sargent, and Captain Cushing.

On Friday, March 3d, the convention reassembled and the committee reported the following Articles of agreement entered into by the subscribers for constituting an association by the name of the Ohio company.

PREAMBLE.

The design of this association is to raise a fund in Continental certificates, for the sole purpose and to be appropriated to the entire use of purchasing lands in the western territory belonging to the United States, for the benefit of the company and to promote a settlement in that country.

ARTICLE 1ST.—That the fund shall not exceed one million of dollars in Continental specie certificates, exclusive of one year's interest due thereon (except as hereafter provided), and that each share or subscription shall consist of one thousand dollars as aforesaid, and also ten dollars in gold or silver, to be paid into the hands of such agents as the subscribers may elect.

ARTICLE 2ND.—That the whole fund of certificates raised by this association, except one year's interest due thereon, mentioned under the first article, shall be applied to the purchase of lands in some one of the proposed States northwesterly of the river Ohio, as soon as those lands are surveyed and exposed for sale by the commissioners of Congress according to the ordinance of that honorable body, passed the twentieth of May, 1785, or on any other plan that may be adopted by Congress, not less advantageous to the company. The one year's interest shall be applied to the purpose of making a settlement in the country and assisting those who may be otherwise unable to remove themselves thither. The gold and silver is for defraying the expenses of those persons employed as agents in purchasing the lands and other contingent charges that may arise in the prosecution of the business. The surplus, if any, to be appropriated as one year's interest on the certificates.

ARTICLE 3RD.—That there shall be five directors, a treasurer and secretary, appointed in manner and for the purposes hereafter provided.

ARTICLE 4TH.—That the prosecution of the company's designs may be the least expensive and at the same time the subscribers and agents as secure as possible, the proprietors of twenty shares shall constitute one grand division of the company; appoint the agent, and in case of vacancy by death, resignation or otherwise, shall fill it up as immediately as can be.

ARTICLE 5TH.—That the agent shall make himself accountable to each subscriber for certificates and invoices received, by duplicate receipts, one of which shall be lodged with the secretary; that the whole shall be appropriated according to articles of association, and that the subscriber shall receive his just dividend according to quality and quantity of lands purchased, as near as possibly may be, by lot drawn in person or through proxy, and that deeds of conveyance shall be executed to individual subscribers, by the agent, similar to those he shall receive from the directors.

ARTICLE 6TH.—That no person shall be permitted to hold more than five shares in the company's funds and no subscription for less than a full share will be admitted; but this is not meant to prevent those who cannot or choose not to adventure a full share, from associating among themselves, and by one of their number subscribing the sum required.

ARTICLE 7TH.—That the directors shall have the sole disposal of the company's fund for the purposes before mentioned; that they shall by themselves, or such person or persons as they may think proper to entrust with the business, purchase lands for the benefit of the company, where and in such way, either at public or private sale, as they shall judge will be the most advantageous to the company. They shall also direct the application of the one year's interest, and gold and silver, mentioned in the first article, to the purposes mentioned under the second article in such way and manner as they shall think proper. For these purposes the directors shall draw on the treasurer from time to time, making themselves accountable for the application of the moneys agreeably to this association.

ARTICLE 8TH.—That the agents being accountable to the subscribers for their respective divisions, shall appoint the directors, treasurer and secretary, and fill up all the vacancies which may happen in these offices respectively.

ARTICLE 9TH.—That the agents shall pay all the certificates and moneys received from subscribers into the hands of the treasurer, who shall give bonds to the agents, jointly and severally, for the faithful discharge of his trust; and also on his receiving certificates or moneys from any particular agent shall make himself accountable therefor, according to the condition of his bonds.

ARTICLE 10TH.—That the directors shall give bonds, jointly and severally, to each of the agents, conditioned that the certificates and moneys they shall draw out of the treasury shall be applied to the purposes stipulated in these articles; and that the lands purchased by the company shall be divided among them within three months from the completion of the purchase, by lot, in such manner as the agents or a majority of them shall agree; and that on such division being made, the directors shall execute deeds to the agents, respectively, for the proportions which fall to their divisions, correspondent to those the directors may receive from the commissioners of Congress.

ARTICLE 11TH.—Provided, that whereas a sufficient number of subscribers may not appear to raise the fund to the sums proposed in the first article, and thereby the number of divisions may not be completed, it is therefore agreed that the agents of divisions of twenty shares each shall, after the seventeenth day of October next, proceed in the same manner as if the whole fund had been raised.

ARTICLE 12TH.—Provided, also, that whereas it will be for the common interest of the company to obtain an ordinance of incorporation from the honorable Congress, or an act of incorporation from some one of the States in the Union (for which the directors shall make application), it is therefore agreed that in case such incorporation is obtained, the fund of the company (and consequently, the shares and divisions thereof) may be extended to any sum, for which provision shall be made in said ordinance or act of incorporation, anything in this association to the contrary notwithstanding.

ARTICLE 13TH.—That all notes under this association may be given in person or by proxy, and in numbers justly proportionate to the stockholder or interest represented.

These articles of agreement were unanimously adopted and subscription books were immediately opened. A committee was appointed, consisting of three members, to transact necessary business, and some other measures taken to advance the project of the association; but in spite of all the exertions made there was but little progress in the affairs of the Ohio company. When the next meeting was held, a little more than a year from the time of the first, that is, upon March 8, 1787, it was found that the total number of shares subscribed for was only two hundred and fifty. And yet, all untoward circumstances considered, that was probably a fair exhibit, and more than was expected. One active friend of the movement, General Tupper, was the greater part of the year in the west. The influence of the others was very largely counteracted by events of an alarming nature—the dissatisfaction which finally culminated in Shay's rebellion. That civil commotion growing out of the imposition of heavy taxes upon the already impoverished people threatened for a time exceedingly dire results, but fortunately, it was speedily quelled. It served as a startling illustration, however, of the general depression in New England, and of the desperation to which men can be driven by ill condition. Possibly the outbreak gave a slight impetus to the progress of the Ohio company's project, by way of increasing the disposition of some citizens to seek in the west a new home. General Tupper, whose immediate neighborhood was "deeply infected with the sedition," returned from his second visit to the Ohio country in time to take a prominent part in subduing the revolt. The dawn of 1787 witnessed the pacification of the troubled country, but no marked increase in prosperity.

It was reported at the meeting held on the eighth of March at Brackett's tavern in Boston, that "many in the commonwealth of Massachusetts, also at Connecticut, Rhode Island and New Hampshire are inclined to become adventurers, who are restrained only by the uncertainty of obtaining a sufficient tract of country, collectively, for a good settlement."

It was now decided to make direct and immediate application to Congress for the purchase of lands, and General Putnam, Dr. Manasseh Cutler and General Samuel H. Parsons were appointed directors and especially charged with this business. General Parsons had previously been employed to negotiate for a private purchase, had petitioned Congress, and a committee of that body had been appointed to confer with him. "To that committee," says Dr. Cutler, "he proposed a purchase on the Scioto river," but as the proprietors in Massachusetts "were generally dissatisfied with the situation and lands on the Scioto and much preferred the Muskingum," the negotiation was suspended. The directors now employed Dr. Cutler to make a purchase upon the Muskingum. It was considered desirable that the negotiations be commenced and the purchase consummated as soon as possible, as other companies were forming, the spirit of private speculation rapidly increasing, and there was a fear that the lands which the Ohio company wished to possess would be bought by some other organization, or perhaps some part of them by individuals.

Just here the query arises: why were the New Englanders so anxious to purchase lands upon the Muskingum, rather than upon the Scioto, or elsewhere in the territory? To this question there are various answers. In the first place the greater part of the Federal territory was unfitted for settlement by the fact that it was occupied by the Indian tribes. None of these, however, had their residence in the lower Muskingum region, and it was only occasionally resorted to by them, when upon their hunting excursions. Then, too, the people who proposed making a settlement beyond the Ohio were very naturally influenced by the proximity of well established stations upon the east and south of the river; they doubtless preferred the Virginians rather than the Kentuckians, as neighbors. The lower Scioto offered no more alluring an aspect than the lower Muskingum. The best bodies of lands on each river are fifty miles from their mouth. To penetrate so far into the interior, however, as the site of either Chillicothe or Zanesville would have been, at the time the Marietta settlement was made, was unsafe. The location of Fort Harmar, which we have seen was built in 1785—86, doubtless had its influence upon the Ohio company. Thomas Hutchins, the United States geographer, who had formerly been geographer to the king of Great Britain, and had travelled extensively in the west, had said and written much in favor of the Muskingum country, and as we shall see in the following chapter strongly advised Dr. Cutler to locate his purchase in this region. Other explorers and travellers had substantiated what Hutchins had said. General Butler and General Parsons, who had descended the Ohio to the Miamis, were deeply impressed with the desirableness of the tract of country now designated as southeastern Ohio, and the latter, writing on the twentieth of December, 1785, from Fort Finney (mouth of the Little Miami), to Captain Jonathan Hart, at Fort Harmar, said: "I have seen no place since I left you that pleases me so well for settlement as Muskingum." General Benjamin Tupper doubtless added important testimony supporting that of Hutchins, Parsons, Butler, and others. General Parsons, it has been asserted, became most strongly possessed of the belief that the Muskingum region was the best part of the territory, because one of the Zanes who had been many years in the west told him that the Scioto or Miami regions offered superior attractions, and he suspected that the old frontiersman artfully designed to divert attention from the Muskingum that he might have the first choice of purchase himself when the lands were put on sale. It is probable, too, that the prospect of establishing a system of communication and commerce between the Ohio and Lake Erie, by way of the Muskingum and Tuscarawas and Cuyahoga, and between the Ohio and the sea board, by way of the Great Kanawha and the Potomac, (a plan which Washington had thought feasible before the Revolutionary war), had its weight. It is not probable that the New Englanders, interested in immigration, were ignorant of the existence of minerals in the Muskingum region, and they may have been far-seeing enough to have appreciatively estimated the value of their presence.

CHAPTER VI.

* THE ORDINANCE OF 1787 AND THE OHIO COMPANY'S PURCHASE.

Dr. Cutler as the Agent of the Ohio Company before Congress.—His Character and Qualifications.—Contrast between Cutler and Putnam.—Their Reciprocal and Mutual Esteem.—Dr. Cutler's Journal of his Visit to New York.—His Departure from Home.—Letters of Introduction to Prominent Men.—Introduced to Members of Congress by Colonel Carrington of Virginia.—Conference with Mr. Hutchins, United States Geographer.—Has Leave to Propose Amendments to the Ordinance.—It Passes with the Alterations and Additions made.—Character of the Ordinance.—Testimonials of its Worth from High Authorities.—Words of Daniel Webster, Judge Walker, and Chief Justice Chase.—The West Clothed with New England Law and made Free Soil.—Massachusetts Measures Adopted by Southern Votes.—The Claim to the Authorship of the Ordinance.—Its Connection with the Ohio Company's Purchase.—Shrewd Diplomacy Exercised to Cause its Adoption.—Strong Arguments in Favor of the Purchase and Settlement which were Dependent Upon the Nature of the Law Enacted.—Inducements to the South.—The Discontent in Kentucky and the Importance of having a Colony of Strongly Loyal People, Located in the West.—Concessions to the South.—The Reclaiming Clause Conducive to the Passage of the Anti-Slavery Ordinance.—Evidence that Dr. Cutler was the Author of the Provisions Against Slavery and for Education.—Letter from Dr. Torrey of Massachusetts.—From Temple Cutler.—Testimony from Judge Ephraim Cutler.—Coincidence between His Action in 1802 and His Father's in 1787.—Continuation of Dr. Cutler's Journal.—Method of Negotiating the Purchase of the Ohio Company.—Winthrop Sargent Assists in Securing the Contract.—General Arthur St. Clair's Favor Gained by the Proposition to make him Governor of the Territory.—The Agent Insists on Favorable Terms.—Abstract of Cutler's and Sergeant's Letter to the Board of Treasury.—Estimate of Dr. Cutler by Southern Congressmen.—His Mission Successful.—Congress Authorizes the Board of Treasury to Close the Contract on Terms Requested by the Ohio Company's Agents.—Five and a Half Million Acres of Land Secured.—Immense Scheme for Land Speculation.—Its Ultimate Failure.—Dr. Cutler's Report to the New Company Approved.—Contract for One and a Half Million Acres Closed October 27, 1787.—Lands Secured for a University for Religious Purposes.—Letter from Dr. Cutler in 1818.

THE Ohio company could have employed as their agent before the Congress of the old confederation, no better man than the Rev. Manasseh Cutler. He possessed an education of unusual solidity, and with it a versatile genius. These qualities of strength were rendered readily effective by his possession of a keen insight of human character, and of courtly grace in conversation. Dr. Cutler was at this time forty-five years of age, ripe and yet vigorous. Twenty-two years before he had graduated at Yale, and the intervening years had studied and taken degrees in the three learned professions—law, divinity and medicine. At the time he undertook the Ohio company's important mission he was the pastor of a congregational church at Ipswich (afterward Hamilton), Massachusetts, but he was best known as a scientist, and it has been said of him that in that capacity "he was, perhaps, second to no living American except Franklin." He had written upon meteorology, astronomy and botany, and was well known in the literary and social circles of New York and Boston.

It is probable that in the dignified divine, the student and book-worm which Dr. Cutler was, the people with whom he associated in New York did not suppose there existed a thorough and shrewd knowledge of the world, and they were doubtless thrown off their guard by his bland manners, genial social qualities and good humor, and swayed more powerfully by his diplomacy because he seemed almost entirely devoid of it, added to his varied qualifications for the work assigned him. Dr. Cutler had the great advantage of being wholly in earnest. He was an enthusiast upon the subject which engaged him. He lived in the midst of the men interested in the scheme of western immigration, knew nearly all of them personally, and was fully in sympathy with them. He had in fact seen, and shared in, their hardships during the war, having served as a chaplain in the army through two campaigns. He was present at the time of the organization of the Ohio company, and one of the committee who drew up its articles of association, and was afterward made a director with General Putnam and General Parsons. From that time on until the Ohio company as an organization had concluded its work, he was almost constantly engaged in its service, and it was through his activity and acumen that the great measures of the association were accomplished in Congress, not only in 1787 but in 1792. Dr. Cutler and General Putnam were from first to last the leading spirits of the Ohio company, the office of the former being principally the management of the difficult and delicate negotiations with the General Government, and that of the latter the superintendency of the internal affairs of the organization.

The relations of the two men were intimate and cordial. Each seems to have entertained the most thorough respect for the other. Yet they were as dissimilar as two men well could be. One was thoroughly educated, cultured, accomplished; the other a strong, rugged man, almost entirely lacking in knowledge, save by the kind acquired little by little in the experience of life, but full of wisdom, possessing the genius of uncommon common sense, great strength of purpose and vast executive ability.* Either of these men would undoubtedly have made a failure in the position of the other. But in the places which they did occupy no men could have been more efficient.

A journal† which Dr. Cutler kept during his stay in New York affords very interesting reading, and *Very complete biographies of Dr. Cutler and General Putnam will be found among the sketches of men prominent in the history of Washington county and the Ohio company.

†Dr. Cutler's journal was written at the request of one of his daughters, who brought him two blank books just as he was about to start upon his journey, and charged him, among other things, to write full descriptions of the toilets and dresses of the ladies whom he met. Hence we find many entries upon comparatively trivial subjects, interspersed with the grave descriptions of great men and the chronicling of important actions; but even the former, at this age, have a peculiar attractiveness, and give to the journal not only a graceful lightness but a vividness which it would lack undoubtedly had it been written under other circumstances. Only small portions of this invaluable diary have been published, and the part which is best known is probably that which has been given to the public in James Parton's "Life and Times of Benjamin Franklin," and which consists of a beautiful, personal description of the great philosopher. There are three manuscript copies of the journal, and it is from one of them, in the possession of Mrs. Sarah Cutler Dawes, of Marietta, a granddaughter of Dr. Cutler's, that we make the extracts given in this chapter.

*The ordinance of 1787 and the Ohio purchase were parts of one and the same transaction. The purchase would not have been made without the ordinance, and the ordinance could not have been enacted except as an essential condition of the purchase. William F. Poole, in North American Review for April, 1876.

is of great value, because the only account of the negotiation of that important purchase made by the Ohio company. It also contributes to the illumination of the somewhat mysterious history of the famous Ordinance of 1787. The journal reveals the breadth and depth of character, and the consummate shrewdness of its writer, and it also suggests to the reader something of the grace of person and address which Dr. Cutler possessed, and which have formed a prominent theme for many writers to dwell upon. The extracts we present, full as they are, form only a small part of the journal, for from a mass of matter on various topics, we quote little which has not a direct bearing upon our two allied subjects—the Ordinance of 1787 and the Ohio company's purchase.

Dr. Cutler left his home in Ipswich, afterwards called Hamilton, in the latter part of June for New York, where the Continental Congress was then in session. Public conveyances were not in common use, and he used his own, a one-horse shay or sulky. On Sunday, June 24th, he was in Lynn and preached there in Mr. Parsons' pulpit. He went on to Cambridge the same day and remained there over night, lodging with Dr. Williams, although he had intended "going to President Willard's, of Harvard college."

Of the next day we give his own account:

Monday, June 25th. Waited on Dr. Willard this morning, who favored me with a number of introductory letters to gentlemen at the southward.* Received several from Dr. Williams and went with him to Boston. Received letters of introduction from Governor Bowdoin, Mr. Winthrop, Dr. Warren, Dr. Dexter, Mr. Guild, Mr. Belknap, etc.; conversed with General Putnam; received letters; settled the principles on which I am to contract with Congress for lands on account of the Ohio company.

Dr. Cutler arrived at Middletown, Connecticut, on Saturday, the thirtieth of June, and preached there Sunday. This town was the home of General Parsons, who, as we have seen, was well acquainted with the western country. The doctor had a long talk with him concerning his business in Congress, and secured an addition to his bundle of letters to prominent public men. But to resume the journal:

Thursday, July 5th. About three o'clock I arrived at New York by the road that enters the Bowery. Put up my horse at the sign of the Plow and the Harrow, in the Bowery barns. After dressing myself I took a walk into the city. When I came to examine my letters of introduction I found them so accumulated that I hardly knew which to deliver first. As this is rather a curiosity to me I am determined to procure a catalogue, although only a part are to be delivered in New York.

[Here occurred a list of over fifty names, among them being Rev. Dr. Rogers, Sir John Temple, Lady Temple, General Knox and Hon. Richard Henry Lee, M. C., Melancthon Smith, M. C., Colonel Carrington, M. C.,* Hon. R. Sherman, M. C., General St. Clair, president of Congress, and others of New York, and among those at Philadelphia, Dr. Franklin, Dr. Rush, Dr. Shippen, Hon. Timothy Pickering, David Rittenhouse, etc.]

Friday, July 6th. This morning delivered most of my introductory letters to members of Congress. Prepared my papers for making my application to Congress for the purchase of lands in the western country for the Ohio company. At eleven o'clock I was introduced to a number of members on the floor of Congress chamber, in the city hall, by Colonel Carrington, member from Virginia. Delivered my petition for purchasing lands for the Ohio company and proposed terms and conditions of purchase. A committee was appointed to agree on terms of negotiation and report to Congress. Dined with Mr. Dane.

Saturday, July 7th. Paid my respects this morning to Dr. Holton and other gentlemen. Was introduced by Mr. Ewing and Mr. Rittenhouse to Mr. Hutchins, the United States geographer. Consulted him where to make our location. Dined with General Knox.

Monday, July 9th. Waited this morning very early on Mr. Hutchins. He gave me the fullest information of the country from Pennsylvania to the Illinois, and advised me, by all means, to make our location on the Murkingum, which was decidedly, in his opinion, the best part of the whole western country. Attended the committee before Congress opened and then spent the remainder of the forenoon with Mr. Hutchins.

Attended the committee at Congress chamber; debated on terms, but were so wide apart that there appears but little prospect of closing a contract.

Called again on Mr. Hutchins, consulted him further about the place of location. Spent the evening with Dr. Holton and several other members of Congress in Hanover square.

Tuesday, July 10th. This morning another conference with the committee. As Congress was now engaged in settling the form of government for the Federal Territory, for which a bill has been prepared, and a copy sent to me (with leave to make remarks and propose amendments) which I had taken the liberty to remark upon and prepare several amendments, I thought this the most favorable time to go on to Philadelphia. * Accordingly, after I had returned the bill with my observations, I set out at 7 o'clock.

Dr. Cutler returned from Philadelphia upon the seventeenth of July. We resume our quotation from his journal:

July 18th. Paid my respects this morning to the president of Congress, General St. Clair. Called on a number of friends. Attended at the City Hall on members of Congress and their committee. We renewed our negotiations.

July 19th. Called on members of Congress very early in the morning, and was furnished with the ordinance establishing a government in the western Federal Territory. It is in a degree new modelled. The amendments I proposed have all been made except one, and that is better qualified. It was that we should not be subject to Continental taxation, unless we were entitled to a full representation in Congress. This could not be fully obtained, for it was considered in Congress as offering a premium to emigrants. They have granted us representation with the right of debating, but not voting, upon our being first subject to taxation.

The ordinance of 1787† passed upon the thirteenth of * Dr. Cutler's visit to Philadelphia was for the purpose of seeing Franklin and other scientific men, with whom he had corresponded.

† Following is the full text of the instrument:

An ordinance for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio:

Be it ordained by the United States in Congress assembled, That the said territory for the purpose of temporary government be one district, subject, however, to be divided into two districts, as future circumstances may, in the opinion of Congress, make it expedient.

Be it ordained by the authority aforesaid, That the estates both of resident and nonresident proprietors in the said territory dying intestate, shall descend to and be distributed among the children, and the descendants of a deceased child, in equal parts—the descendants of a deceased child, or grandchild, to take the share of the deceased parent in equal parts among them; and when there shall be no children or descendants, then in equal parts to the next of kin in equal degree; and among collaterals, the children of a deceased brother or sister of the intestate shall have, in equal parts among them, the deceased parent's share, and there shall, in no case, be a distinction between kindred of the whole

* This is the first of several allusions which show the doctor's shrewd policy. He sedulously cultivated the acquaintance of the southern members, and evidently from the first relied upon their assistance in carrying his measures.

* Colonel Carrington, Richard Henry Lee and Melancthon Smith were three of the five members of Congress who reported the Ordinance of Freedom.

July, and from its most important provision often termed "the Ordinance of Freedom," was the "last gift of the Congress of the old confederation to the country, and it was a fit consummation of their glorious labors." It was the product of what we may call inspired statesmanship, the foundation upon which five great commonwealths were to be built up, the fundamental law, the constitution of the Northwest Territory, and a sacred compact between the old colonies and the yet uncreated States to come into being under its benign influence. It forever proscribed slavery upon the soil of the great territory that it organized, and it is undoubtedly true that to this ordinance the people of this great Nation owe thanks for the final complete suppression of slavery within its borders. Had the institution of slavery been established between the Ohio and Mississippi, its strength as a system would have resisted all reforming measures and crushing forces and the United States to-day have been a slave-holding power. And so the Congress of 1787 "built wiser than they knew," and more grandly. But when we pass the broader significance and vaster value of the ordinance, and look upon it simply as the act of legislation providing for the opening, development, and government of the territory, we find it alike admirable and effective. It provided for successive forms of territorial government, and upon it were based all of the territorial enactments and much of the subsequent State legislation. It was so constructed as to give the utmost encouragement to immigration, and it offered the greatest protection to those who became settlers, for "when they came into the wilderness," says Chief Justice Chase, "they found the law already there. It was impressed upon the soil, while as yet it bore up nothing but the forest." Mr. Chase further says: "Never, probably, in the history of the world, did a measure of legislation so accurately fulfil, and yet so mightily exceed the anticipation of the legislators," and again "the ordinance has well been described as having been a pillar of cloud by day and of fire by night, in the settlement and government of the northwest States." In and half blood, saving in all cases to the widow of the intestate her third part of the real estate for life and one third part of the personal estate; and this law relative to descents and dower shall remain in full force until altered by the legislature of the district; and until the governor and judges shall adopt laws, as hereinafter mentioned, estates in the said territory may be divided or bequeathed by wills, in writing, signed and sealed by him or her, in whom the estate may be (being of full age) and attested by three witnesses; and real estate may be conveyed by lease or release, or bargain and sale, signed, sealed and delivered by the person, being of full age, in whom the estate may be and attested by two witnesses, provided such wills be duly proved and such conveyance be acknowledged, or the execution thereof duly proved, and be recorded within one year after proper magistrates, court and registers shall be appointed for that purpose; and personal property may be transferred by delivery, saving, however, to the French and Canadian inhabitants and other settlers of the Kaskaskias, St. Vincent and the neighboring villages, who have heretofore professed themselves citizens of Virginia, their laws and customs now in force among them, relative to the descent and conveyance of property.

Be it ordained by the authority aforesaid, That there shall be appointed, from time to time, by Congress, a governor, whose commission shall continue in force for the term of three years, unless sooner revoked by Congress. He shall reside in the district and have a freehold estate therein in one thousand acres of land while in the exercise of his office. There shall be appointed, from time to time, by Congress a secretary, whose commission shall continue in force for four 1837, Judge Timothy Walker in an address delivered at Cincinnati, pronounced the ordinance as approaching "as nearly to absolute perfection as anything to be found in the legislation of mankind," and said "upon the surpassing excellence of this ordinance, no language of panegyric would be extravagant." Daniel Webster expressed his profound admiration of the instrument in his famous reply to Hayne, "We are accustomed," said he, "to praise the lawgivers of antiquity; we help to perpetuate the fame of Solon and Lycurgus; but I doubt whether one single law, of any lawgiver, ancient or modern, has produced effects of more distinct, marked and lasting character than the Ordinance of 1787. We see its consequences at this moment, and we shall never cease to see them, perhaps, while the Ohio shall flow."

This ordinance, New England in its character and prohibiting slavery, was impressed upon the northwest by southern votes. It was an act of legislation in close relation to the Ohio company's purchase, and the evidence that the man who negotiated that purchase was the author of its most important measures seems indisputable.

The authorship of the ordinance of 1787 has been variously ascribed to Nathan Dane, Congressman from Massachusetts, Rufus King of the same State, and Thomas Jefferson, and arguments more or less weighty have from time to time been advanced to support their claims or those of their friends. Thomas Jefferson went to France as Minister three years before the passage of the Ordinance of 1787 and did not return until eighteen months after. He was, however, identified with the inoperative ordinance of 1784, introduced the clause prohibiting slavery after the year 1800, which did not pass, and was probably the father of the idea of making the ordinance a compact, which was retained in the formation of the later ordinance. The country escaped the introduction of slavery under the specious plea that it was to exist only until 1800, and the northwest escaped the establishment of the geographical divisions with such names as Chersonesus, Assenisipia, Polypotamia, Pelesipia, Sylvania, years, unless sooner revoked; he shall reside in the district and have a freehold estate therein in five hundred acres of land while in the exercise of his office; it shall be his duty to keep and preserve the acts and laws passed by the legislature, and the public records of the district, and the proceedings of the governor in his executive department; and transmit authentic copies of such acts and proceedings every six months to the secretary of Congress. There shall also be appointed a court to consist of three judges, any two of whom to form a court, who shall have a common law jurisdiction, and reside in the district and have each therein a freehold estate in five hundred acres of land while in the exercise of their offices; and their commissions shall continue in force during good behavior.

The governor and judges, or a majority of them, shall adopt and publish in the district such laws of the original States, criminal and civil, as may be necessary and best suited to the circumstances, and report them to Congress, from time to time; which laws shall be in force in the district until the organization of the general assembly therein, unless disapproved of by Congress; but afterwards the legislature shall have authority to alter them as they shall think fit.

The governor, for the time being, shall be commander-in-chief of the militia, appoint and commission all officers in the same below the rank of general officers; all general officers shall be appointed and commissioned by Congress.

Previous to the organization of the general assembly, the governor shall appoint such magistrates and other civil officers, in each county or township, as he shall find necessary for the preservation of the peace

Michigania, Saratoga, Illinois, Metropotamia, and Washington—although as regards number merely the creation of ten rather than five States might have been very largely to the political advantage of the people of the territory. Mr. Jefferson's claim of authorship appears to end with the history of this ordinance. Mr. King was undoubtedly the author of the anti-slavery clause in an ordinance which secured some attention in 1785, but he was not even a member of the Congress of 1787. Mr. Dane's claim is combatted chiefly on the ground that it was never made while any of the other men, who, from their position, were supposed to know about the formation of the ordinance, were alive; on the ground that he had none of those graces of composition which are exhibited in the ordinance; and upon the ground that he was very young (thirty-four years) and did not enter upon the fullest understanding either of the work that had been done to prepare Congress for the action, or the importance of the measures under consideration. In addition to these facts there is the consideration that Massachusetts did not warmly favor the idea of the western emigration. Mr. King had been accused of introducing measures which were calculated to prevent immigration and in one or two entries in Dr. Cutler's journal, which we shall give in their proper place, it is shown that the writer did not have much confidence in Dane's friendliness to the Ohio company's purchase. If unfriendly to that measure or representing a constituency of which the majority were opposed to the plan, would he not also be unfriendly to the enactment of an ordinance, which must, from its nature, encourage emigration? And yet "Mr. Dane," says a student of the subject,* "doubtless wrote the draft and performed the clerical duties of the committee" who and good order in the same. After the general assembly shall be organized, the power and duties of magistrates and other civil officers, shall be regulated and defined by the said assembly; but all magistrates and other civil officers, not herein otherwise directed, shall, during the continuance of this temporary government, be appointed by the governor.

* William F. Poole in the North American Review for April, 1876. He has examined the whole subject of the authorship of the Ordinance in an elaborate but remarkably clear and concise article. We briefly summarize some of his evidence.

For the prevention of crimes and injuries the laws to be adopted or made shall have force in all parts of the district, and for the execution of process, criminal and civil, the governor shall make proper divisions thereof; and he shall proceed, from time to time, as circumstances may require, to lay out the parts of the district, in which the Indian titles shall have been extinguished, into counties and townships, subject, however, to such alterations as may thereafter be made by the legislature.

So soon as there shall be five thousand free male inhabitants of full age in the district, upon giving proof thereof to the governor, they shall receive authority, with time and place, to elect representatives from their counties or townships to represent them in the general assembly: provided that for every five hundred free male inhabitants, there shall be one representative, and so on, progressively, with the number of free male inhabitants shall the right of representation increase until the number of representatives shall amount to twenty-five; after which the number and proportion of representatives shall be regulated by the legislature: provided that no person be eligible or qualified to act as a representative unless he shall have been a citizen of one of the United States three years, and be a resident in the district, or unless he shall have resided in the district three years; and in either case, shall likewise hold in his own right, in fee simple, two hundred acres of land within the same: provided also that a freehold in fifty acres of land in the district, having been a citizen of one of the States and being resident in the district, or the like freehold and two years reported the ordinance. He took the liberty of withholding the anti-slavery clause until the second reading under the belief that it could not pass, but afterward, discovering the sentiment of Congress, added it. It was strange that Mr. Dane should have been in ignorance of the feeling that existed in Congress, for that feeling had been newly created. Very naturally he supposed that an anti-slavery clause could not be passed for every ordinance containing one had been voted down. The last ordinance had contained no restriction of slavery, no provision for education, and no articles of compact. Still it had come down to the ninth of July, 1787, only four days before the ordinance of freedom was passed, and was doubtless regarded as the future law of the Northwest Territory, only needing final action as it had passed its first and second readings.

But suddenly there came a change. The forces were put in operation which were to clothe the northwest with a beneficent law and forever to withhold slavery from five great States. The first outward intimation of the change was the appointment, on the ninth of July, of a new committee, authorized to prepare and submit to Congress a plan of government for the Federal Territory. It consisted of Colonel Carrington, of Virginia, Nathan Dane, of Massachusetts, Richard Henry Lee, of Virginia, Mr. Kean, of South Carolina, and Mr. Smith, of New York. The three new members were all southerners. Carrington was chairman. These southern Congressmen were the friends of Dr. Cutler. He had been introduced to most of the members, as his journal shows, by Colonel Carrington.

Dr. Cutler had come before Congress to purchase, for a company composed chiefly of Massachusetts men, a large body of public lands. The purchase would have been almost entirely valueless in the opinion of most of those Ohio company associates if they could not residence in the district, shall be necessary to qualify a man as an elector of a representative.

The representative thus elected shall serve for the term of two years; and in case of the death of a representative, or removal from office, the governor shall issue a writ to the county or township for which he was a member to elect another in his stead, to serve for the residue of the term.

The general assembly or legislature shall consist of the governor, legislative council, and a house of representatives. The legislative council shall consist of five members to continue in office five years, unless sooner removed by Congress, any three of whom may be a quorum; and the members of the council shall be nominated and appointed in the following manner, to wit: As soon as representatives shall be elected, the governor shall appoint a time and place for them to meet together, and when met, they shall nominate ten persons, residents in the district, and each possessed of a freehold in five hundred acres of land, and return their names to Congress, five of whom Congress shall appoint and commission to serve as aforesaid; and whenever a vacancy shall happen in the council by death or removal from office, the house of representatives shall nominate two persons, qualified as aforesaid, for each vacancy, and return their names to Congress, one of whom Congress shall appoint and commission for the residue of the term. And every five years, four months at least before the expiration of the time of service of the members of the council, the said house shall nominate ten persons, qualified as aforesaid, and return their names to Congress, five of whom Congress shall appoint and commission to serve as members of the council five years, unless sooner removed. And the governor, legislative council, and house of representatives shall have authority to make laws, in all cases, for the good government of the district, not repugnant to the principles and articles in this ordihave the land to which they proposed to emigrate, covered with the law to which they had been accustomed. They were fully in accord with the spirit which seven years before had prohibited slavery in Massachusetts. The ordinance of freedom was, as an act of legislation, the natural predecessor of the sale to the Ohio company. It was considered by Congress, after the plan had been fully examined, very desirable that the public domain should be advantageously disposed of, and that a colony should be established in the Federal Territory. Such a colony would form a barrier against the British and Indians, it was argued, and this initiative step would be followed speedily by other purchases in which additional settlements would be founded. The south had a greater interest in the west than had New England, and Virginia especially, from her past protection, future prospect and geographical location, was interested in, and eager for, the development of the country beyond the Ohio. There was a strong feeling of disaffection in Kentucky and imminent danger that that territory would embrace the first favorable opportunity to join her fortunes with Spain. "The desire of the people," says Albach in his Annals of the West, "for a separation from the district of Virginia had familiarized their minds to the idea of a separation from the confederacy." Virginia, and the south in general, may have justly regarded the planting in the west of a colony of men whose patriotism was well known, a measure calculated to bind together the old and new parts of the Nation, and promote union. It is presumable that much was said by Dr. Cutler upon these advantages and that it was their importance in the eyes of southern members which led them to permit the creation and enactment of such an ordinance as the Ohio company desired. Another inducement for the southern members of Congress to pass an anti-slavery ordinance rather than to relinquish the possibility of deriving a revenue from the sale of lands, and the benefits attending the colonization of the west, was undoubtedly a shrewd provision in the nance established and declared. And all bills having passed by a majority in the house, and by a majority in the council, shall be referred to the governor for his assent; but no bill or legislative act whatever, shall be of any force without his assent. The governor shall have power to convene, prorogue and dissolve the general assembly when, in his opinion, it shall be expedient.

The governor, judges, legislative council, secretary, and such other officers as Congress shall appoint in the district shall take an oath or affirmation of fidelity, and of office; the governor before the president of Congress, and all other officers before the governor. As soon as a legislature shall be formed in the district, the council and house assembled in one room, shall have authority, by joint ballot, to elect a delegate to Congress, who shall have a seat in Congress, with a right of debating, but not of voting, during this temporary government.

And for extending the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty, which form the basis whereon these republics, their laws, and constitutions, are erected; to fix and establish those principles as the basis of all laws, constitutions, and governments, which forever hereafter shall be formed in the said territory; to provide, also, for the establishment of States, and permanent government therein, and for their admission to a share in the Federal councils on an equal footing with the original States, at as early periods as may be consistent with general interest, anti-slavery clause itself. Article sixth of the ordinance, after prohibiting slavery in the territory northwest of the Ohio river contained the following words: "Provided always, that any person escaping into the same, from whom labor or service is lawfully claimed in any one of the original States, such fugitive may be lawfully reclaimed and conveyed to the person claiming his or her service." This allowance to the south of the right to reclaim fugitive slaves was made as a concession that the passage of the ordinance with the prohibitory measure might not be imperilled. This was an idea that had not before been broached in Congress, and the same or similar prohibitory measures in former ordinances (those advocated by Jefferson and Rufus King) without the concession, had resulted in their speedy rejection by the votes of the very States by which the Ordinance of 1787 was passed. The provision was a splendid stroke of diplomacy.

It is hereby ordained and declared by the authority aforesaid, that the following articles shall be considered as articles of compact between the original States and the people and States in the said territory, and forever remain unalterable unless by common consent, to-wit:

The committee having the ordinance in charge, as we have seen, conferred with Dr. Cutler, and were evidently anxious to please him, for, as his journal states, they sent him a copy of the ordinance "with leave to make remarks and propose amendments." He did make amendments, went to Philadelphia, returned, found that the ordinance had been passed and, to use his own language, "the amendments . . . all made except one" which "was better qualified." This was the one relating to taxation. The ordinance was adopted on the thirteenth of July, there being only one dissenting vote, that of Mr. Yates, of New York, which was neutralized, as there were two other delegates from the same State who voted to adopt. Eight States were represented (of which only three were northern)—Delaware, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, New York, New Jersey and Massachusetts. The ordinance was therefore carried by the southern States. What Dr. Cutler inserted was, according to good evidence, the clauses relating to religion, morality, education and slavery.

In his subsequent labors for the Ohio company his "ARTICLE 1. No person demeaning himself in a peaceable and orderly manner shall ever be molested on account of his mode of worship or religious sentiments in the said territory.

"ARTICLE 2. The inhabitants of said territory shall always be entitled to the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus and of trial by jury; of a proportionate representation of the people in the legislature, and of judicial proceedings according to the course of the common law. All persons shall be bailable except for capital offences, where the proof shall be evident or the presumption great. All fines shall be moderate, and no unusual or cruel punishment shall be inflicted. No man shall be deprived of his liberty or property but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land; and should the public exigencies make it necessary, for the common preservation, to take away any person's property, or to demand his particular service, full compensation shall be made for the same; and in the just preservation of rights and property it is understood and declared that no law ought ever to be made, or have force in the said territory, that shall in any manner whatever interfere with or effect private contracts or engagements, bona fide, and without fraud, previously formed.

"ARTICLE 3. Religion, morality, and knowledge, being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged. The utmost good faith shall always be observed towards the Indians; their lands and property shall never be taken from them without consent; and in their property, rights, and liberty, they shall never be invaded or disturbed, unless in just and lawful wars, authorized by Congress; but laws founded in justice and humanity shall, from time to time, be made for preventing course was precisely such as might have been expected of the man who would write, "Religion, morality and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged."

And now for the direct evidence that Dr. Cutler was the author of the clauses claimed—the two ideas which made the northwest what it is in civilization and morality.

In 1847 Dr. Joseph Torrey, of Salem, Massachusetts son-in-law of Dr. Cutler, writing to Judge Ephraim Cutler, of Washington county, about some papers he had examined at Temple Cutler's in Hamilton, says:

Saw among these documents the Ordinance of 1787 on a printed sheet. On its margin was written that Mr. Dane requested Dr. Cutler to suggest such provisions as he deemed advisable, and that at Dr. Cutler's instance was inserted what relates to religion, education and slavery. These facts have long been known to me as household words.

In 1849 Temple Cutler wrote to his brother, Judge Ephraim Cutler, of the ordinance, that "Hon. Daniel Webster is now convinced that the man whose foresight, suggested some of its articles, was our father."

In the same year as the above, and upon the twenty-fourth of November, Judge Cutler answered an inquiry as follows:

I visited my father at Washington during the last session he attended Congress (1804). . . . We were in conversation relative to the political concerns of Ohio, the ruling parties, and the effects of the constitution (of Ohio) in the promotion of the general interest; when he observed that he was informed that I had prepared that portion of the Ohio constitution which contained the part of the ordinance of July, 1787, which prohibited slavery. He wished to know if it was a fact. On my assuming that it was, he observed that he thought it a singular coincidence, as he himself had prepared that part of the ordinance while he was in New York negotiating the purchase of the lands for the wrong being done to them and for preserving peace and friendship with them.

"ARTICLE 4TH.—The said territory, and the States which may be formed therein, shall forever remain a part of this confederacy of the United States of America, subject to the articles of confederation, and to such alterations therein as shall be constitutionally made, and to all the acts and ordinances of the United States in Congress assembled, conformable thereto. The inhabitants and settlers in the said territory shall be subject to pay a part of the Federal debts, contracted or to be contracted, and a proportional part of the expenses of government, to be apportioned on them by Congress, according to the same common rule and measure by which the apportionments thereof shall be made on the other States; and the taxes for paying their proportion shall be laid and levied by the authority and direction of the legislatures of the district or districts, on new States as in the original States, within the time agreed upon by the United States in Congress assembled. The legislatures of those districts or new States shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil by the United States in Congress assembled, nor with any regulation Congress may find necessary for securing the title to such soil to the bona fide purchasers. No tax shall be imposed on lands the property, of the United States; and in no case shall non-resident proprietors be taxed higher than residents. The navigable waters leading into the Mississippi and St. Lawrence and the carrying places between the same, shall be common highways, and forever free, as well to the inhabitants of the said territory as to the citizens of the United States, and those of any other States that may be admitted into the confederacy, without any tax, import, or duty therefor.

ARTICLE 5TH.—There shall be formed in the said territory not less than three nor more than five States; and the boundaries of the States as soon as Virginia shall alter her act of cession and consent to the same, shall become fixed and established as follows, to wit: The western State in the said territory shall be bounded by the Mississippi, the Ohio and Wabash rivers; a direct line drawn from the Wabash and Port Vincents due north to the territorial line between the United States

Ohio company. I had then not seen the journal he kept while he was in New York at that time.*

We now resume our extracts from Dr. Cutler's journal, taking it up where it was left and following its entries respecting the purchase through to the close. That portion of the entry under date of July 19th, not already given, is as follows:

As there are a number in Congress opposed to my terms of negotiation and some to any contract, I wish now to ascertain the number for and against, and who they are; and must then, if possible, bring the opponents over. This I have mentioned to Colonel Duer, who has promised to assist me. Grayson, R. H. Lee, and Carrington, are certainly my warm advocates. Holton, I think, may be trusted. Dane must be carefully watched, notwithstanding his professions. Clark, Bingham, Yates, Kearney, and Ford, are troublesome fellows. They must be attacked by my friends at their lodgings. If they can be brought over I shall succeed; if not, my business is at an end. Attended the committee this morning. They are determined to make a report to-day, and try the spirit of Congress. Dined with General Knox and about forty-two gentlemen, officers of the late Continental army, and among them Baron Steuben. General Knox gave us an entertainment in the style of a prince. I had the honor to be seated next the baron, who is a hearty, sociable old fellow. He was dressed in his military uniform, and with the ensigns of nobility, the shoe and garter. Every gentleman at the table was of the Cincinnati except myself, and wore his appropriate badges. Spent the evening at Dr. Holton's with Colonel Duer and several members of Congress, who informed me that an ordinance was passed in consequence of my petition, but, by their account of it, it will answer no purpose.

July 20th.—This morning the secretary of Congress furnished me with the ordinance of yesterday which states the conditions of a contract, but on terms to which I shall by no means accede. I informed the committee of Congress that I could not contract on the conditions proposed; that I should prefer purchasing lands from some one of the States, who would give incomparably better terms; and therefore proposed to leave the city immediately. They appeared to be sorry no better terms were effected, and insisted on my not thinking of leaving Congress until another attempt was made. I told them I saw no prospect of contracting, and wished to spend no more time and money in a business so unpromising. They assured me that I had many friends in Congress who would make every exertion in my favor; that it was an object of great magnitude, and that I must not expect to accomplish it in less than two or three months. If I desired it they would take the and Canada; and by the said territorial line to the Lake of the Woods and Mississippi. The middle State shall be bounded by the said direct line, the Wabash from Port Vincents to the Ohio, by the Ohio, by a direct line drawn due north from the mouth of the Great Miami to the said territorial line, and by the said territorial line. The eastern State shall be bounded by the last mentioned direct line, the Ohio, Pennsylvania, and the said territorial line; provided, however, and it is further understood and declared, that the boundaries of these three States shall be subject so far to be altered that, if Congress should hereafter find it expedient, they shall have authority to form one or two States in that part of the territory which lies north of an east and west line, drawn through the southerly bend or extreme of Lake Michigan. And whenever any of the said States shall have sixty thousand free inhabitants therein, such State shall be admitted, by its delegates into the Congress of the United States, on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever, and shall be at liberty to form a permanent constitution and State government; provided the constitution and government so to be formed shall be republican, and in conformity to the principles contained in these articles; and so far as it can be consistent with the general interest of the confederacy, such admission shall be allowed at an earlier period and when there may be a less number of free inhabitants in the State than sixty thousand.

* From William F. Poole's article in the North American Review for April, 1876.

ARTICLE 6TH.—There shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the said territory otherwise than in the punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted; provided, always, that any person escaping into the same from whom labor or service is lawfully claimed in any one of the original States, such fugitive may be lawfully reclaimed, and conveyed to the person claiming his or her labor or services as aforesaid.

matter up that day on different grounds and did not doubt they should obtain terms agreeable to my wishes. Colonel Duer came to me with proposals from a number of the principal characters of the city, to extend our contract and take in another company, but that it should be kept a profound secret. He explained the plan they had concocted and offered me generous conditions if I would accomplish the business for them. The plan struck me agreeably; Sargent insisted on my undertaking it, and both urged me not to think of giving the matter up so soon. I was convinced it was best for me to hold up the idea of giving up a contract with Congress, and making a contract with some of the States, which I did in the strongest terms, and represented to the committee and to Duer and Sargent the difficulties I saw in the way, and the improbability of closing a bargain when we were so far apart; and told them I conceived it not worth while to say anything further to Congress on the subject. This appeared to have the effect I wished. The committee were mortified and did not seem to know what to say; but still urged another attempt. I left them in this state but afterward explained my views to Duer and Sargent who fully approved my plan. Promised Duer to consider his proposal. We had agreed last evening to make a party to Brookly, on Long Island, which is a small village opposite New York, divided from it by East river; Duer, Webb, Hammond, Sargent, with others were of the party. * * I spent the evening closeted with Colonel Duer and agreed to purchase more land, if terms can be obtained, which will probably forward the negotiation.

July 21st.—Several members of Congress called on me early this morning. They discovered much anxiety about a contract, and assured me that Congress, on finding that I was determined not to accept their terms, and had proposed leaving the city, had discovered a much more favorable disposition, and believed, if I renewed my request, I might obtain conditions as reasonable as I desired. I was very indifferent, and talked much of the advantages of a contract with one of the States. This I found had the desired effect. At length I told them that if Congress would accede to the terms of my proposal, I would extend the purchase from the tenth township from the Ohio and to the Scioto inclusively; by which Congress would pay more than four millions of the public debt; that our intention was to secure, a large and immediate settlement of the most robust and industrious people in America; and that it would be made systematically, which must instantly enhance the value of Federal lands, and prove an important acquisition to Congress. On these terms I would renew the negotiation, if Congress was disposed to take the matter up again. Dined with General Webb at the Mess house in Broadway, opposite the Play house. Spent the evening with Mr. Dane and Mr. Millikin. They informed me that Congress had taken up my business again.

July 23rd.—My friends had made every exertion in private conversation to bring over my opponents in Congress. In order to get at some of them so as to work powerfully on their minds, we were obliged to engage three or four persons before we could get at them. In some instances we engaged one person who engaged a second, and he a third, and so on to the fourth, before we could effect our purpose. In these manoeuvres I am much beholden by the assistance of Colonel Duer and Major Sargent. The matter was taken up this morning in Congress and warmly debated until three o'clock, when another ordinance was obtained. This was not to the minds of any of my friends, who were considerably increased in Congress, but they conceived it to be better than the former, and they had obtained an additional clause empowering the board of treasury to take order upon this ordinance and complete the contract upon the general principles contained in it, which still left room for negotiation. Spent the evening with Colonel Grayson and members of Congress from the southward, who were in favor of a contract. Having found it impossible to support General Parsons as a candidate for governor, after the interest that General St. Clair had secured, and suspecting that this might be some impediment in the way (for my endeavors to make interest for him were well known), and the arrangements for civil officers being on the carpet, I embraced the opportunity frankly to declare that for my own part—and ventured to engage for Major Sargent—if General Parsons could have the appointment of first judge and Sargent, secretary, we would be satisfied; and I heartily wished that his excellency, General St. Clair, might be governor, and that I would solicit the eastern members to favor such an arrangement. This I found rather pleasing to the southern members, and they were so complacent as to ask repeatedly what office would be agreeable to me in the western country. I assured them I wished for no appointment to the civil line. Colonel Grayson proposed the office of one of the judges, which was seconded by all the gentlemen present. The obtaining an appointment, I observed, had never come into my mind, nor was there any civil office I should at present be willing to accept. This declaration seemed to be rather surprising, especially to men who were so much used to solicit or be solicited for appointments of honor or profit. They seemed to be the more urgent on this head. I observed to them, although I wished for nothing for myself, yet I thought the Ohio company entitled to some attention; that one of our judges besides General Parsons should be of that body, and that General Putnam was the man best qualified and would be most agreeable to that company, and gave them his character. We spent the evening very agreeably until a late hour.

July 24th.—I received this morning a letter from the board of treasury, inclosing the resolutions of Congress, which passed yesterday, and requesting to know whether I was ready to close a contract on those terms. As the contract had now become of much greater magnitude than when I had only the Ohio company in view, I felt a diffidence in acting alone and wished Major Sargent to be joined with me, although he had not been formally empowered to act, for the commission from the directors was solely to me. It would likewise take off some part of the responsibility from me if the contract should not be agreeable. After consulting Duer I proposed it to Sargent, who readily accepted. We answered the letters from the board as jointly commissioned in making the contract. We informed the board that the terms in the resolve of Congress were such as we could not accede to, without some variation. We therefore begged leave to state to the board the terms on which we were ready to close the contract, and that those terms were our ultimatum. This letter* was sent to the board, but the packet having just arrived from England, and another to sail next morning, it was not in their power to attend any further to our business for the day. Dined with Mr. Hilleyas, treasurer of the United States. I spent the evening with Mr. Osgood, president of the board of treasury, who appeared to be very solicitous to be informed fully of our plan. No gentleman has a higher character for planning and calculating than Mr. Osgood. I was therefore much pleased with having an opportunity of fully explaining it to him. We were unfortunately interrupted with company. We, however, went over the outlines, and he appeared well disposed.

July 25th. This morning the board of treasury sent our letter to the secretary of Congress, requesting him to lay it before Congress for approbation or rejection. But the dispatches from Europe received yesterday by the British packet, occupied the attention of Congress for that day. Mr. Osgood desired me to dine with him, assuring me that he had purposely omitted inviting any other company, that we might not be interrupted in going over our plan. I had been repeatedly assured that Mr. Osgood was my friend, and that he had censured Congress for not assenting to the terms I had offered; but such is the intrigue and artifice often practiced by men in power, I felt very suspicious, and was as cautious as possible. Our plan, however, I had no scruple to communicate, and went over it in all its parts. Mr. Osgood made many valuable observations. The extent of his information astonished me. His views of the continent of Europe were so enlarged that he appeared to be a perfect master of every subject of this kind. He highly approved of our plan, and told me he thought it the best formed in America. He dwelt much on the advantages of system in a new settlement; said system had never before been attempted; that we might depend upon accomplishing our purposes in Europe, and that it was a most important part of our plan. If we were able to establish a settlement as we proposed, however small in the beginning, we should then have surmounted our greatest difficulty; that every other object would be within our reach, and if the matter was pursued with spirit

* The letter, which was signed by Manasseh Cutler and Winthrop Sargent, addressed to this board of treasury, proposed the following conditions:

The subordinate surveys to be completed as mentioned in the act, unless the frequency of Indian interruption should prevent; the mode of payment to be half a million of dollars when the contract should be executed, another half million when the tract should be surveyed by the proper officers of the United States, and the remainder in six equal payments; the lands assigned for the establishment of a university to be as nearly as possible in the centre of the first million and a half acres paid for, for to fix it in the centre of the proposed purchase, might too long defer the establishment. (That is, the lands are to be located in the Ohio company's purchase proper, and not beyond these bounds, in the lands bought merely in the name of the company, and for which they had the refusal.) The letter further suggested that the purchasers, when the second payment should be made, should receive a deed for as great a quantity of lands as a million would pay for at the price agreed upon; that as most of the associates had embarked their private fortunes in the support of the purchase, no security should be required of them but the lands; and that they, the purchasers, should be entitled to no right of entry, or occupancy, except on the lands actually paid for, and to receive no deeds until their payments amounted to one million of dollars, and then only in proportion to such payment.

M. Cutler

he believed it would prove one of the greatest undertakings ever yet attempted in America. He thought Congress would do an especial service to the United States, even if they gave us the land, rather than that our plan should be defeated; and promised to make every exertion in his power in my favor. We spent the afternoon and evening alone, and very agreeably.

July 26th. This morning I accompanied General St. Clair and General Knox on a tour of morning visits, particularly to the foreign ministers: Sieur Otto, French charge; Don Diego Guardoqui, Spanish; Van Berckle, Dutch, a frank open Dutchman, who speaks bad English, but is very talkative. He is fond of conversing about the western country, and seems to interest himself much in the settlement of the western lands.

Being now eleven o'clock, General St. Clair was obliged to attend Congress. After we came into the street General St. Clair assured us he would make every possible exertion to prevail with Congress to accept the terms contained in our letter. He appeared much interested and very friendly, but said we must expect opposition. I was fully convinced it was good policy to give up Parsons and openly to appear solicitous, that St. Clair might be appointed governor. Several gentlemen have told me that our matters went on much better since St. Clair and his friends had been informed that we had given up Parsons and that I had solicited the eastern members in favor of St. Clair's appointment. I immediately went to Sargent and Duer. We now went into the true spirit of negotiation with great bodies. Every machine in the city it was possible to set to work we now put in motion. Few, Bingham and Kearney are our principal opposers. Of Few and Bingham there is hope, but to bring over that stubborn mule of a Kearney is beyond our power. The board of treasury, I think, will do us much service, if Dr. Lee is not against us, though Duer assures me that I have got the length of his foot, and that he calls me a frank, open, honest New England man, which he considers as an uncommon animal; yet from his zealous, cautious make, I feel suspicious of him, especially as Mr. Osgood tells me he has made every attempt to learn his sentiments, but is unable to do so. His brother, Richard Henry Lee, is certainly our fast friend, and we have hopes he will engage him in our interests. Dined with Sir John Temple in company with several gentlemen. Immediately after dinner I took my leave of them and called on Dr. Holton. He told me Congress had been warmly engaged in our business the whole day; that the opposition was lessened, but our friends did not think it prudent to come to a vote, lest there should be a majority in favor. I left much discouraged, and told Dr. Holton I thought it in vain to wait any longer, and should certainly leave the next day. He cried out on my impatience; said if I obtained my purposes in a month from that time I should be far more expeditious than was common in getting much smaller matters through Congress; that it was of great magnitude, for it far exceeded any private contract ever made before in the United States; that if I should fail now I ought still to pursue the matter, for I should most certainly finally obtain the object I wished. To comfort me, he assured me it was impossible for him to conceive by what kind of an address I had so soon and so warmly engaged the attention of Congress; for since he had been a member of that body he assured me, on his honor, that he never knew so much attention paid to any one person who made application to them on any kind of business, nor did he ever know them more pressing to bring it to a close. He could not have supposed that any three men from New England, even of the first characters, could have accomplished so much, in so short a time. This I believe was mere flattery, though it was delivered with a very serious air; but it gave some consolation. I now learned very nearly who were for and against the terms. Bingham has come over, but Few and Kearney are stubborn. Unfortunately there are only eight States represented, and unless seven of them are in favor no ordinance can pass.* Every moment of this evening until two o'clock was busily employed. A warm siege was laid on Few and Kearney from different quarters, and if the point is not effectually carried, the attack is to be renewed in the morning. Duer, Sargent and myself have agreed that if we fail, Sargent shall go on to Maryland, which is not at present represented, and prevail on the members of that State to come on and interest themselves, if possible, in our plan. I am to go on to Connecticut and Rhode Island to solicit the members from those States to go on to New York, and to lay an anchor to windward with them. As soon as those States are represented Sargent is to renew the application, and I have promised Duer that if it is necessary I will then return to New York again.

The contingency for which this careful provision was made did not arise. We come now to the entry in the journal which describes the last day's action and the success of Dr. Cutler's labors:

Friday, July 27th.—I rose very early this morning, and after adjusting my baggage (for I was determined to leave New York this day) I set out on a general morning visit and paid my respects to all the members of Congress in the city, and informed them of my intention to leave the city that day. My expectations of forming a contract, I told them, were nearly at an end. I should, however, wait the decision of Congress, and if the terms which we had stated, and which I considered to be very advantageous to Congress, considering the state of the country, were not accepted, we must turn our attention to some other part of the country. New York, Connecticut, and Massachusetts, would sell us lands at half a dollar an acre, and give us exclusive privileges beyond what we had asked of Congress. The speculating plan concerted between the British of Canada, and the New Yorkers, was now well known. The uneasiness of the Kentucky people with respect to the Mississippi was notorious. A revolt of that country from the Union, if a war with Spain took place, was universally acknowledged to be highly probable; and most certainly a systematic settlement in that country, conducted by men strongly attached to the Federal Government, and composed of young, robust, hardy, and active laborers, who had no idea of any other than the Federal Government, I conceived to be an object worthy of some attention. Besides, if Congress rejected the terms now offered, there could be no prospect of any application from any other quarter. If a fair and honorable purchase could now be obtained, I presumed, contracts with the natives, similar to that made with the Six Nations, must be the consequence, especially as it might be much more easily carried into effect. These, and such like, were the arguments I urged. They seemed to be fully acceded to, but whether they will avail is very uncertain. Mr. R. H. Lee assured me he was prepared for one hour's speech, and he hoped for success. All urged me not to leave the city so soon, but I assumed an air of perfect indifference, and persisted in my determination, which had, apparently, the effect I wished. Passing the city hall as the members were going into Congress, Colonel Carrington told me he believed Few was secured; that little Kearney was left alone, and that he was determined to make one trial of what he could do in Congress. Called on Sir John Temple for letters to Boston; bade my friends good-bye, and as it was my last day, Mr. Henderson insisted on my dining with him and a number of his friends whom he had invited.

At half-past three I was informed that an ordinance had passed Congress on the terms stated in our letter, without the least variation, and that the board of treasury was directed to take order and close the contract. This was agreeable but unexpected intelligence. Sargent and I went immediately to the board, who had received the ordinance, but were then rising. They urged me to tarry the next day, and they would put by all other business to complete the contract; but I found it inconvenient, and after making a general verbal adjustment, left it with Sargent to finish what was to be done at present.

Dr. Lee congratulated me and declared he would do all in his power to adjust the terms of the contract, so far as was left to them, as much in our favor as possible. I proposed three months for collecting the first half million of dollars, and for executing the instruments of Congress, which was acceded to. By this ordinance we obtained the grant of near five millions of acres of lands, amounting to three and a half millions of dollars. One million and a half acres for the Ohio company, and the remainder for a private speculation, in which many of the principal characters in America are concerned. Without connecting this speculation similar terms and advantages could not have been obtained for the Ohio company. On my return through Broadway I received the congratulations of my friends in Congress and others with whom I happened to meet. At half-past six I took my leave of Mr. Henderson and family, where I had been most kindly and generously entertained. Left the city by way of the Bowery.

On his way home Dr. Cutler again stopped at Middleton, Connecticut, and called on General Parsons. Under date of July 30th he enters the following in his journal:

When I had informed the general of my negotiations with Congress, I had the pleasure to find it not only met his approbation, but he expressed his astonishment that I had obtained terms so advantageous, which, he said, were beyond his expectation. He assured me he pre-

*The vote of seven out of the thirteen States was necessary to carry any measure. No State could vote unless two of its delegates were present, and in that case both must vote the same way or their ballots would be neutralized. If three delegates were present the vote of two would carry the State.

ferred the appointment of first judge to that of governor, especially if General St. Clair was governor. He proposed writing to General St. Clair and his friends in Congress that they would procure an appointment for me on the same bench; but I absolutely declined, assuring him I had no wish to go in the civil line.

The reader who has followed the extracts given from Dr. Cutler's journal has seen that the diplomatic lobbyist accomplished far more than he first set out to achieve. Instead of a million and a half acres of land, he made arrangements to purchase five and a half millions of acres.

A colossal scheme of land speculation and immigration was concocted, which looked for fulfilment not simply to New England but to the countries of the old world, especially Holland and France. There was reason to believe that the vast plan could be successfully carried out; and, had it been, results would have been exhibited in the west which we cannot imagine. Unfortunately, however, the sanguine men who joined in securing the services of Dr. Cutler to negotiate a purchase for them, in connection with his bargain for the Ohio company, were doomed to disappointment. One of the illy developed results of that stupendous scheme was the settlement of the French at Gallipolis, in 1790, under the auspices of the Scioto company. They were defrauded, suffered innumerable hardships incident to pioneer life, for which they were poorly fitted; and, finally, failing to secure the lands for which they bargained, the larger part of them left Gallipolis, and, with much painful privation, found homes elsewhere, though a few remained at the scene of their early suffering, where some of their descendants still dwell. Much of the history of the Scioto company is shrouded in oblivion. It is certain, however, that Dr. Cutler and the Ohio company were in no degree responsible for the sad failure of that plan of immigration which brought the poor Frenchmen to America. Dr. Cutler acted only as the agent for the parties interested in the purchase, who could not by their own efforts secure the attention or favor of Congress. It is undoubtedly true that he obtained better terms for the Ohio company by including the other and making a huge purchase. To go further, it is improbable that Barlow and Duer had any wrong intent in their management of the Scioto company's business, but that really culpable parties were their sub-agents upon the other side of the Atlantic. But this is a topic, the consideration of which would take us far outside our province in writing a history of Washington county.

The amount of land for which Dr. Cutler secured the refusal for the Ohio company was one million five hundred thousand acres, but for reasons which will be hereafter shown, they finally became possessed of only nine hundred and sixty-four thousand two hundred and eighty-five acres.

At a meeting of the directors and agents of the Ohio company held at the Bunch of Grapes tavern, in Boston, August 29, 1787, Dr. Cutler made the following report of his action at New York:

That in consequence of resolves of Congress of the twenty-third and twenty-seventh of July last, he agreed on the conditions of a contract with the board of treasury of the United States, for a particular tract of land containing in the whole as much as the company's funds will pay for. Should the subscriptions amount to one million of dollars, agreeably to the articles of association, at one dollar per acre—from which price is to be deducted one-third of a dollar for bad lands and defraying the expenses of surveying, etc., etc.

That the land be bounded on the east by the western boundary of the seventh range of townships; south by the Ohio; west by a meridian line to be drawn through the western cape of the Great Kanawha river, and extending so far north that a due east and west line from the seventh range of townships to the said meridian line, shall include the whole.

This tract to be extended so far northerly as to comprehend within its limits, exclusively of the above purchase, one lot of six hundred and forty acres in each township for the purposes of religion; an equal quantity for the support of schools, and two townships of twenty-three thousand and forty acres each for an university, to be as near the centre of the whole tract as may be; which lots and townships are given by Congress and appropriated for the above uses forever; also three lots of six hundred and forty acres each in every township, reserved for the future disposition of Congress; and the bounty lands of the military associators to be comprised in the whole tract; provided they do not exceed one-seventh part thereof.

That five hundred thousand dollars be paid to the board of treasury upon closing the contract.

In consideration of which, a right of entry and occupancy for a quantity of land equal to this sum, at the price stipulated be given, and that as soon as the geographer or some proper officer of the United States shall have surveyed and ascertained the quantity of the whole, the sum of five hundred thousand dollars more be paid, amounting in the whole to one million dollars, for which the company are to be put in possession of the whole moiety of the lands above described, and receive a deed of the whole from the said board of treasury.*

It was resolved "that the above report and the proceedings of Dr. Cutler be fully approved, ratified and confirmed," and on the first of September it was ordered that the contract be closed. The same day the record shows that directors' and treasurer's bonds were entered into "in the sum of twenty thousand dollars each, at six shillings the Mexican dollar."

On the twenty-seventh of October, 1787, the contract was closed at New York, and signed by Samuel Osgood and Arthur Lee of the board of treasury of the United States, and Manasseh Cutler and Winthrop Sargent, for the Ohio company.* It was formed in all respects as foreshadowed by Dr. Cutler's report (which we have presented above), even to the provisions in regard to college, townships, and ministerial lands.

In this connection a letter from Manasseh Cutler to his son, Judge Ephraim Cutler, written as late as 1818, is very interesting. He says:

The fact is, the people of Ohio are wholly indebted to me for procuring the grant of those townships (for the university) and the minister's lands in the Ohio company's purchase; and, indeed, for similar grants in Judge Symmes' purchase. When I applied to Congress for the purchase, no person, to my knowledge, had an idea of asking for such grants. When I mentioned it to Mr. Sargent and others friendly to the measure, they were rather opposed, fearing it would occasion an increased price for the lands. I had previously contemplated the vast benefit that must be derived from it in a future time, and I made every exertion to obtain it. Mr. Sargent, indeed, cordially united with me in endeavoring to surmount the difficulties which appeared in the way, till the object was obtained. It is well known to all concerned with me in transacting the business of the Ohio company, that the establishment of a university was a first object and lay with great weight on my mind.*

* From the Ohio company's journal.

* The original contract is in the library of Marietta college.

† From William F. Poole's article in North American Review.

CHAPTER VII.

FROM NEW ENGLAND TO OHIO.

Preparations for Planting a Colony at the Mouth of the Muskingum.—Activity of Leaders in the Ohio Company.—Personal Persuasion.—Dissemination of Information Concerning the West.—A Pamphlet on the Ohio Country Published by Dr. Cutler in 1787.—Prediction that in Fifty Years the Northwestern Territory would Contain More People than all New England.—Prophecy that Western Rivers would be Navigated by Steamboats, Made Twenty Years before Fulton's Success on the Hudson.—Causes which Operated to Prevent Immigration.—Opposition Brought into Existence, and Taking the Form of Ridicule.—"Putnam's Paradise" and "Cutler's Indian Heaven."—Quotations from Contemporaneous Correspondence of Hazard and Belknap.—Cutler and Sargent as Enthusiasts.—Various Inquiries in Regard to the West.—Anxiety Regarding the Attitude of the Indians.—Letter from Washington to Lafayette.—Preparations of the Ohio Company as an Organization.—Plan Agreed upon for a City at the Confluence of the Muskingum and Ohio.—Scheme for the Division of the Lands.—Surveyors Employed.—Boat Builders and Mechanics.—General Rufus Putnam Appointed Superintendent of the Colony.—Meeting of the Company at Providence, Rhode Island.—Measures Taken for Securing Education and Religious Instruction in the New Settlement.—Boat Builders and Mechanics Leave Danvers., Massachusetts, December, 1787, for the Youghiogeny.—The Second Party Rendezvous at Hartford, Connecticut, January 1, 1788.—Putnam Detained by Business at New York.—He Overtakes the Party.—Crossing the Alleghenies in Winter.—Slow Progress and Privations of the Pioneers.—Arrival at the "Yoh."—Boats Built, and Provisions Bought.—The "Mayflower."—The Company Leaves Sumrill's Ferry April 1st.—Extracts from the Journal of Joseph Buell.—Stopping by the Way.—Beauty of the Ohio.—Advancement of Vegetation.—Arrival at the Muskingum.—An Apocryphal Account of the Origin of the Term "Buckeye State."—Names of the Forty-seven Pioneers.

THE year 1787 was one full of doing and rich in result. The constitution of the United States was adopted, the Ordinance of Freedom enacted, and the Ohio company's purchase negotiated—the first of a series of transactions by which a revenue was obtained from the public domains to lessen the National debt and restore prosperity.

The year was a busy one with the leading men of the Ohio company. Both before and after the passage of the ordinance and the negotiation of the purchase, they were actively engaged in securing subscriptions and in finding men to go out to the Ohio country. General Putnam, General Tupper, General Parsons, Winthrop Sargent, and Dr. Cutler were using all of their influence to promote the affairs of the company, and to induce emigration. The latter was a difficult work. Personal persuasion was resorted to, and the public prints were used to disseminate knowledge concerning the west and the scheme for its settlement. Dr. Cutler published at Salem a pamphlet (though anonymously), which had a large circulation. It gave the fullest information attainable in regard to the lands beyond the Ohio, especially the Muskingum region, and contained some prophecies which were probably regarded as the wildest kind of improbabilities born of an imaginative brain, and yet nearly all that was said in the sanguine prophecies of Dr. Cutler, came to pass. He asserted that in fifty years the Northwestern Territory would contain more people than all New England, and that many people then living would see the western rivers navigated by steam. We find the following passage, copied from the original pamphlet:

The current down the Ohio and Mississippi, for heavy articles that suit the Florida and West India markets, such as Indian corn, flour, beef, lumber, etc., will be more loaded than any streams on earth. The distance from the Muskingum to the Mississippi is one thousand miles, from thence to the sea is nine hundred miles. The whole course is run in eighteen days, and the passage up these rivers is not so difficult as has been represented. It is found by late experiments that sails are used to great advantage against the current of the Ohio; and it is worthy of observation, that in all probability, steamboats will be found to do infinite service in all our river navigation.

This was written twenty years before Fulton's successful application of steam to navigation. But Miller, in Scotland, the same year that Dr. Cutler wrote, had demonstrated the practicability of the employment of steam for propelling boats. Dr. Cutler was a scientific man, in every way abreast of the age in which he lived—in many ways ahead of it. He doubtless knew of Miller's encouraging experiments, and his prediction regarding steamboats on the western rivers may have been principally based upon the achievement of that genius toiling on the other side of the Atlantic. But the people generally in that time, more than now, regarded the success of almost all novel and wonderful undertakings as impossible. There were doubtless many good New Englanders who regarded as an impracticable visionary the man who predicted steam navigation on the Ohio, and he was doubtless derided for this prophecy (if the authorship of the pamphlet was discovered) as he was for his zeal in advocating immigration.

After the purchase had been made preparations for removal to the Muskingum were carried on more actively than before, and as the time for an actual emigration approached, adverse criticism became more outspoken than it had been before.

There were various incentives to combat the movement that was steadily gaining ground. Families were divided as to opinions upon western settlement, and arguments arose between friends upon personal grounds as well as differences between factions. It must often have been the case that a father opposed his sons in their desire to seek their fortune in a new land, that wives opposed their husbandss, and sweethearts their lovers. People who could not or would not emigrate, themselves very naturally disliked the idea of having their relatives and friends venture into the far west to find permanent homes. Opposition often took the form of ridicule. The enthusiasm with which the chief characters of the Ohio company labored to develop their plans, and the roseate-hued accounts that were given of the country to which a colony was to be sent, provoked some merriment and some sneering. The Ohio valley was dubbed "Putnam's Paradise" and "Cutler's Indian Heaven," and these and other names came into quite common use even among the men who were friendly to the movement these phrases were intended to ridicule. From the prominence in negotiating the purchase and his subsequent devotion to the Ohio company's interest, Dr. Cutler's name seemed to have been oftener mentioned in connection with the colonization movement than any other. Ebenezer Hazard,* writing to the * Hon. Ebenezer Hazard was at this time Postmaster General and Treasurer of Congress. The Rev. Jeremy Belknap was in 1787 pastor of a church in Boston. Both were quite eminent historians. Their correspondence has been published.

Rev. Jeremy Belknap in 1787, says: "Cutler and Sargent are enthusiasts in the cause; and really, some degree of enthusiasm is necessary in all great undertakings." As the time drew nigh when the Ohio company was to send out the pioneers the people became more and more familiar with the subject of emigration, which was then a new one in Massachusetts and her sister states, and people began to make intelligent inquiries in regard to the country toward which the movement was directed, and the prospects of peace or war with the Indians. In a letter from Belknap to Hazard the writer after speaking of the lawlessness and vindictiveness of the Kentuckians, propounds the queries:

Whether the neighborhood of such a set of rascals will not be injurious to the Muskingum? Will the Indians make a distinction if the New England people should behave themselves differently towards them? Have they a good title from the Indians to the land? Or, if they have from some, will not others put in a claim?

Similar questions to these were doubtless asked by hundreds. Mr. Hazard writes that he "should not be fond of going there (to Muskingum) before the settlers had enjoyed one year's profound peace." There were many who were of this way of thinking. But notwithstanding danger, there were a few who had decided to be of the first company of adventurers, many more who had determined to go later, after a beginning had been effected, and it appears that in September, 1787, at least two families were on their journey to the Ohio company's purchase, though they must have fallen by the way as they did not reach their destination. On the twenty-ninth of the month Mr. Hazard wrote to Mr. Belknap:

Two families from Cutler's parish, Sawyer and Porter, by name, passed through here yesterday on their way to this Indian Heaven, with two or three wagons, built in the western styles. Some people pitied them as sheep going to the slaughter; others wished themselves in company, so different are the opinions of men, and I might add, women on the subject.

Mr. Hazard himself thought favorably of the Ohio company. He wrote:

I have thoughts of hiring a farm and retiring into the woods, where I may at least enjoy liberty, and that not without some hopes of independence, and Cutler's Indian Heaven (where I own a seat) has been more than half seriously in contemplation.

What Washington thought of the emigration scheme of some of his old officers and brother patriots is shown by a letter he wrote February 7, 1787, to Lafayette:

A spirit of emigration to the western country is very predominant. Congress has sold in the year past a pretty large quantity of lands on the Ohio for public securities, and thereby diminished the public debt considerably. Many of your military acquaintances, such as Generals Parsons, Varnum and Putnam, Colonels Tupper, Sproat and Sherman, with many more, propose settling there. From such beginnings much may be expected.*

While individual efforts were being made to induce emigration, and with the result of producing a very general interest in the subject, the Ohio company as an organization was engaged in measures of practical preparation for the great work that lay before its members. On the thirtieth of August, 1787 (the day after Dr. Cutler had made his verbal report of the action of Congress in granting him the refusal of the lands), the company roughly mapped out upon paper the city near the confluence of the Muskingum and Ohio, which was to be Marietta. Five thousand seven hundred and sixty acres were to be reserved for the city and common. It was resolved that "within the said tract and in the most eligible situation there be appropriated sixty squares, in an oblong form of ten squares in front and six deep, with streets one hundred feet in width; that four of the said squares be reserved for public use, and the remaining fifty-six divided into house lots, each to contain twelve of sixty feet front and one hundred feet depth, and six of fifty-three feet front by one hundred and fifty feet depth, amounting in the total to one thousand and eight lots." This plan was to be followed as nearly as the situation of the ground would permit. (It was afterwards changed considerably.) It was also decided that the lots should be drawn for, and that each one should become a part of each proprietary share. It was further resolved that one hundred houses should be built, thirty-six by sixteen feet in dimensions, on three sides of one of the oblong squares, and that for their protection they should be connected or surrounded by a stockade. (Here is the first suggestion of Campus Martius.) At this meeting General James M. Varnum was elected a director, and Richard Platt, of New York, treasurer. The meeting was continued to the first of September, and on November 21st (the contract having been closed October 27th), another meeting was held, at Cromwell's Head tavern, Boston, for the consideration of various important details in the arrangements. At this meeting the plan of the proposed city was altered by the insertion of a provision that the lots should be ninety feet front by one hundred and eighty in depth, and that the centre street should be one hundred and fifty feet in width. The following resolutions were adopted, a part of which never came into effect, because the lands to which they would have applied never came into the possession of the company:

Resolved.—That the lands of the Ohio company may be allotted and divided in the following manner, anything to the contrary in former resolutions notwithstanding, viz: Four thousand acres near the confluence of the Muskingum and Ohio rivers for a city and commons and contiguous to this, one thousand lots of eight acres each, amounting to eight thousand acres.

Upon the Ohio in fractional townships, one thousand lots of one hundred and sixteen and forty-three one hundredths acres, amounting to one hundred and sixteen thousand four hundred and eighty acres.

In the townships on the navigable rivers, one thousand lots of three hundred and twenty acres each, amounting to three hundred and twenty thousand acres.

And in the inland towns one thousand lots of nine hundred and ninety-two acres each, amounting to nine hundred and ninety-two thousand acres, to be divided and allotted as the agents shall hereafter direct.

Resolved, further, That there be the following reservations, viz: One township at the falls of the Great Hocking river; one township at the mouth of the Great and Little river of that name, and one township opposite the mouth of the Great Kanawha river; which reservations may be allotted and decided as the directors and agents shall see fit.

Resolved. That the army bounty rights be considered in part payment of the shares of military associates in the ratio of one dollar to every acre to which they are entitled; and that this rule be observed by the agents of the subscribers in rendering their returns, and by the agents appointed by the directors for the several payments to the board of treasury.

Resolved. That no further subscriptions be admitted after the first day of January next, and that all interest, arising on sums paid since the payment of the first half-million to the board of treasury, until the second payment be completed, shall accrue to the benefit of the company's funds; and that the agents pay all the money they may have in their possession into the treasury of the company by the first day of March next.

* Sparks' Life of Washington, volume 19, page 319.

Resolved. That the eight acre lots be surveyed and a plat or map thereof be made, with each lot numbered thereon, by the first Wednesday in March next, and that a copy thereof be immediately forwarded to the secretary and the original retained by the company's superintendent; that the agents meet on the first Wednesday in March next, at Rice's tavern, in Providence, State of Rhode Island, to draw for said lots in numbers, as the same shall be stated upon the plat; that a list of the drawings be transmitted by the secretary to the superintendent, and a copy thereof preserved in the secretary's office.

Resolved. That this meeting of the directors and agents of the Ohio company be and is hereby adjourned to the first Wednesday in March, 1788, to be then holden at Rice's tavern, in the town of Providence, and State of Rhode Island.

Although the company had adjourned to meet in March the directors and agents came together again only two days later, or upon the twenty-third of November, at Brackett's tavern, where the following decisions were agreed upon and placed on file in the company's records:

Ordered. That four surveyors be employed under the superintendent hereinafter named; that twenty-two men shall attend the surveyors; that there be added to this number twenty men, including six boat-builders, four house carpenters, one blacksmith, and nine common workmen.

That the boat-builders shall proceed on Monday next, and the surveyors shall rendezvous at Hartford the first day of January next, on their way to the Muskingum.

That the boat-builders and men, with the surveyors, be proprietors in the company; that their tools and one axe and one hoe to each man and thirty pounds weight of baggage shall be carried in the company's wagons, and the subsistence of the men on the journey be furnished by the company.

That upon their arrival at the places of destination, and entering on the business of their employment, the men shall be subsisted by the company and allowed wages at the rate of four dollars each per month until discharged.

That they be held in the company's service until the first day of July next, unless sooner discharged, and that if any of the persons employed shall leave the service, or wilfully injure the same, or disobey the orders of the superintendent, or others acting under him, the person so offending shall forfeit all claim to wages,

That their wages shall be paid the next autumn in cash, or lands, upon the same terms as the company purchased them. That each man furnish himself with a good small-arm bayonet, six flints, a powder-horn and pouch, priming wire and brush, half a pound of powder, one pound of balls, and one pound of buckshot. The men so engaged shall be subject to the orders of the superintendent and those he may appoint, as aforesaid, in any kind of business they shall be employed in, as well for boat building and surveying, as for building houses, erecting defences, clearing lands, and planting, or otherwise, for promoting the settlement; and as there is a probability of interruption from enemies, they shall also be subject to orders as aforesaid in military command during the time of their employment.

That Colonel Ebenezer Sproat, from Rhode Island; Mr. Anselem Tupper, and Mr. John Mathews, from Massachusetts, and Colonel R. J. Meigs, from Connecticut, be the surveyors.

That General Rufus Putnam be the superintendent of all the business aforesaid, and he is to be obeyed and respected accordingly; that he be allowed for his services forty dollars a month and his expenses, to commence from the time of his leaving home.*

On March 5th the directors and agents assembled pursuant to adjournment, at Rice's tavern, Providence, Rhode Island, General Parsons being chairman. On this occasion the lots of the city (on paper) at the mouth of the Muskingum, were drawn for in the names of the proprietors, each share being entitled to one. One thousand shares were represented, the agents and the number of proprietary shares they represented being as follows: Edward Harris, forty; John May, thirty-five; Eliphalet Day, eighteen; Manasseh Cutler, one hundred and fifty-one; William Dodge, seventeen; Ephraim Cutler, nineteen; Winthrop Sargeant, one hundred and sixty-six; Benjamin Tupper, thirty-seven; Henry Jackson, thirteen; William Corliss, one hundred and twelve; Nathaniel Freeman, twelve; Rufus Putnam, sixty-two; S. H. Parsons, ninety-nine; Joel Barlow, twenty-seven; Archibald Crary, one hundred and two; Ebenezer Sproat, forty-three; Benjamin Tallmadge, forty-seven—one thousand.

A number of the agents mentioned were represented, as were of course the proprietors, by proxies. While this business was being transacted the pioneer party were on their way to the Muskingum country.

By far the most important measure acted upon at this meeting was that looking toward the establishment of schools and churches. The action was of importance in itself, and doubly interesting as showing the spirit of the men who formed the New England Ohio company. It was in exact accordance with the desires exhibited by Dr. Cutler in the ordinance and conditions of purchase. A committee was appointed "to consider the expediency of employing some suitable person as a public teacher at the settlement now making by the Ohio company." Its members were Dr. Cutler, General Varnum, and Colonel John May. They made a report in the following language:

That the directors be requested to pay as early attention as possible to the education of youth and the promotion of public worship among the first settlers; and that, for these important services, they employ, if practicable, an instructor eminent for literary accomplishments and the virtue of his character, who shall also superintend the first scholastic institutions, and direct the manner of instruction; and to enable the directors to carry into execution the intentions expressed in this resolution, the proprietors, and others of benevolent and liberal minds are earnestly requested to contribute, by voluntary donation, to the formation of a fund to be solely appropriated thereto.*

Prior to the later transactions we have chronicled the Ohio company's party of pioneers were on their way to the Muskingum. The first party, consisting of twenty-two men, and including the boat-builders and mechanics, started from Danvers, Massachusetts, on the first of December, 1787.† They were under the command of Major Haffield White, who seems also to have been commissary, and were sent ahead to build boats on the Youghiogheny which, in western parlance, was commonly called the "Yoh." The advance company arrived at Sumrill's Ferry on this stream (about thirty miles above Pittsburgh), on the twenty-third of January, after a wearisome journey.

The other party, including the surveyors and their assistants and a number of the proprietors of the Ohio company, rendezvoused at Hartford, Connecticut, on the first of January, 1788. They were met here by General Putnam who was to have commanded the march, but as he was under the necessity of going to New York, the company went forward in command of Colonel Ebenezer Sproat. General Putnam dispatching his business at New York, pressed forward and overtook the company at Lincoln's inn on the Lanterdale creek, January 24th. In his autobiography General Putnam says that this creek "was hard frozen, but not sufficient to bear the wagon, and a whole day was spent in cutting a passage. So great a quantity of snow fell this day and night, as quite blocked up the road; it was with much difficulty we got the wagon so far as Coopers, at the foot of the Tuscarawas mountains (now Strawsburg), where we arrived the twenty-ninth." As serious an obstacle to the progress of the pioneers as the snow had been up to this time it was much worse in the mountains. General Putnam says that they "found nothing had crossed the mountains since the great snow and in the old snow, twelve inches deep, nothing but pack horses." But the march of these resolute, hardy men toward their destination was not to be stayed by storm or the almost impossible condition of the narrow winding mountain trails which were dangerous enough at any time. "Our only resource" reads the brief, and simple narrative, "was to build sleds, and harness tandem, and in this manner with four sleds, and men marching in front, we set forward and reached "Yoh" the fourteenth of February.

* It was under the provisions of this resolution that the Rev. Daniel Story was employed and sent to the Ohio company's settlement, as the first ordained minister in the Northwest Territory. His character and services are spoken of at length in the chapter on the churches of Marietta.

†Autobiography of General Rufus Putnam (MS).

†The Ohio company's journal.

For two weeks the little company consisting of a few more than a score of men, but all active, strong and hopeful, were winding slowly around the mountain passes, breaking a way through the deep snow for their jaded horses to draw along the cumbersome sledges with their heavy loads of baggage and provisions. Only a few miles were gained each day and that with the utmost toil. At night the men slept around huge blazing fires, which they often had difficulty in kindling. They suffered much from the arduousness of their labor by day and their exposure at night. General Putnam writing to Dr. Cutler some time after the arrival of the pioneers at the Muskingum said: "It would give you pain and me no pleasure to detail our march over the mountains or our delays afterwards on account of bad weather or other misfortunes."

Arriving at the Youghiogheny in the middle of February, and expecting to find preparations so far advanced for the journey down the Ohio that they could soon start, General Putnam and his associates were again disappointed. It is stated in the same letter from which we have quoted above, that there were "no boats built, no boards or planks in readiness, or person capable of building a canoe, much less a boat, among the party—mill froze up and no boards to be had. He (Major White) had, however, three canoes such as they were, on the stocks; and five of his men were sick with the small-pox, which they took by inoculation."

The latter part of February and the whole of the month of March was consumed in building boats. The three canoes which Major White had on the stocks were completed, and lumber being brought from a considerable distance a galley was built, which had an estimated capacity of fifty tons, and a flatboat of about three tons burthen, designed to be used as a ferry boat by the settlers at the station, and was named the Adelphia. The canoes were hewn from logs. The large boat, which was called the Adventure Galley, and which General Putnam speaks of as the Union Galley, was afterwards appropriately named the Mayflower, in commemoration of the ship which brought across the ocean the Plymouth colony. Her bows were raking or curved; she was decked over and strongly built throughout. She was designed to pass and repass between Marietta and Buffalo creek or Cross creek, to carry letters and merchandise, but proving too large and unwieldy she was used only for a few trips.

In the afternoon of the first day* of April, which was a Tuesday, the little flotilla left Sumrill's ferry, on the Youghiogheny, and, floating down that stream to the Monongahela, was borne onward to the Ohio. Several stoppages were made to take on provisions, which had been bought the few weeks previous and brought to the river. Among other stores were "three thousand weight of flour, two thousand of which was at nine shillings a hundred, and one thousand at ten shillings, or one dollar sixty-six cents," bought of one man, and seven thousand pounds of another at the price last mentioned, also several bushels of beans. Many of the purchases were made by John Mathews, a nephew of General Putnam, who had been in the west since the summer of 1786 as a surveyor. Numerous extracts from his journal have been given in a former chapter of this work, and we now present several more, which, however unimportant, are interesting as contemporary jottings in regard to the journey of the colony:

Thursday, April 3rd. . . . General Putnam arrived with coals at the mouth of Harman's creek before sunrise, and not being acquainted, fell some below the landing. Esquire Foster and myself attended to getting the provisions to the river, and a very disagreeable time we had of it, on account of the rain. I am to take General Putnam's horse by land to Buffalo tomorrow.

Friday, 4th. I left Greathouse's in the morning. Found Colonel Sproat at McMahan's, and rode with him to Wells' mills, and hurried on the provisions to the landing. From thence we went to the mouth of Buffalo, where the boat had arrived. She will not be loaded to-day.

Saturday, 5th. . . . Our boats tarried all day in the mouth of the creek, and we have everything to put on board in the morning. They also took on here a quantity of poplar boards for the erection of temporary huts, until more substantial buildings could be built.

Sunday, 6th. Cloudy and rainy all day. At half past eight o'clock A. M. everything on board, and we started for Muskingum. . . . At four o'clock P. M. came to at "Round Bottom" and proposed waiting until nine or ten o'clock in the evening, in order to arrive at Muskingum in the forenoon. At half-past nine got under way and run all night, without meeting with any accident.

One may imagine something of the feelings of those first adventurers to Ohio as they floated down la belle riviere. The season was well advanced and there was a noticeable difference between the condition of the vegetation in the country passed on the last half of the journey and that of the upper Ohio. The forest which clad the hills was etherialized by the first touch of kindly spring and the virgin soil of the many beautiful islands was mantled with the vernal green of scores of luxuriant shrubs and grasses and vines, strange to the eyes which now beheld them. The shores were for the most part devoid of the indications of human life. Only upon the Virginia side did the voyagers see an occasional cabin, and they lost even the slight sense of companionship that these afforded as they drew nearer to their destination, so that they looked with even more of joy than they otherwise would upon the rough log buildings and bristling stockade of Fort Harmar, and the little cabins of Isaac Williams and his fellow pioneers on the Virginia bank. As their boats swept around the curves and new landscapes were revealed how eagerly must those pioneers have watched for the first appearance of the place that was to be their home, the lands that some of them were individually to own, till, live and die upon. We can imagine groups of questioners gathered about John Matthews and Anselm Tupper, the only men in the company who had any personal knowledge of the "lands at the confluence of the Muskingum and Ohio," on which it had been decided far away in Massachusetts that a city should be built.

* In Hildreth' Pioneer History and Charles M. Walker's History of Athens County, it is stated that the journey from the Youghiogheny was begun upon the second of April. General Putnam's autobiography is authority for the statement that it was upon the first.

The morning of the seventh of April (which was Monday) was cloudy and during the greater part of the day rain fell. As the afternoon passed away the pioneers knew that the place of their destination could not be far away, and watched closely for some sign which would indicate it. Just as they had floated by the foot of Kerr's Island Captain Devol said to General Putnam, "I think it is time to take an observation; we must be near the mouth of the Muskingum." The current bore the boats onward at a good speed, and although many eyes were watching anxiously for the Muskingum they did not see it until too late to round into the harbor it afforded. The rain and fog and the huge sycamores upon the banks leaning over the outlet obscured it, undoubtedly, until they were quite near it. Fort Harmar was also unseen. The strong current of the Muskingum swerved the boats from their course, shot them way out into the Ohio, and before the pioneers were fully conscious of their whereabouts they had swept so far down the stream that they were unable to regain the place where they had intended to disembark. A landing was affected not far below the fort, and the commandant, Major Doughty sending some soldiers to their aid General Putnam's little band towed the boats up the stream, and, crossing the Muskingum, landed upon the site of Marietta (at the point) about noon.*

* It is traditionally asserted that in an episode which speedily followed the landing at Marietta originated the application to the early settlers of the name "Buckeyes," which afterwards became a kind of genuine appellation for all the people of Ohio, and led in fact to the second christening of the first commonwealth of the Northwest Territory with the sobriquet of "the Buckeye State."

It has been frequently related that two of the pioneers on springing ashore at the point, selected trees to be felled to the earth, and began a good-natured rivalry in chopping to see which one should first lay low a monarch of the forest. Strict regard for probability compels one to doubt whether either tree could with propriety be called a "monarch." They were undoubtedly about the smallest trees discoverable which were still large enough to have passed the undignified age of saplings. But however this may have been does not effect the story. One man selected, according to the tradition, a hard wood tree—a gum tree—and

They were welcomed by a party of about seventy Wyandot and Delaware Indians, warriors, women, and children, of whom the famous Captain Pipe was the principal character. The pioneers undoubtedly looked upon this friendly greeting as an omen of peace and good-will and their vague fears were tranquillized. The work of landing a portion of their provisions and the boards brought from Buffalo creek for the erection of temporary places of shelter was begun immediately, and General Putnam's large tent, known as a marquee,* was soon riased.

The pioneers who arrived on the "Mayflower" at the site of Marietta, were forty-seven† in number, and their names are embraced in the following list:

* This marquee was a very large one, and was taken, with some other baggage, on board the store boats of Burgoyne's army, a few days before its surrender, by the intrepidity of Major Goodall, who was attached to General Putnam's regiment. It had probably belonged to some of the general officers of the enemy. In the division of the spoils it fell to General Putnam, and now, eleven years after that event, was doing service on the banks of the Ohio, in the far wilderness of the Northwest Territory. . . . New England Historical and Genealogical Register, October, 1860. Note to journal of Rev. Manasseh Cutler (Journey to Marietta, 1788), by Dr. S. P. Hildreth.

† The number is commonly stated as forty-eight. Colonel Return Jonathan Meigs, however, who is usually included in the list and who was really with the pioneer party on the upper Ohio, is shown by Joseph Buell in his journal, and by other authorities, to have arrived on the twelfth of April.

the other, a buckeye, the wood of which is very soft. Very naturally the buckeye fell first to the ground, and from this circumstance its name is said to have been given to the settlers and to the State. The successful man is said to have been Captain Daniel Davis, of Killingly, Connecticut. The chief champion of the story has been a New England clergyman of the Reformed Episcopal church, J. P. Davis, by name, who had been engaged in compiling a genealogy of the Davis family, and who, when in Ohio in 1879, made several contributions to the newspapers upon this subject. He accounts for the fact that Ohio is called "the Buckeye State," and its people "Buckeyes" by the result of the chopping competition, and supports the authenticity of the story handed down from one generation to another by the statement that "during ninety years it has not been contradicted by any history or denied by any counter-statement."

In this the reverend writer was mistaken, not only has a counter-statement been made, but it was published many years ago, and by a most excellent authority, Dr. S. P. Hildreth. In his biography of Colonel Ebenezer Sproat, he says that his "tall commanding person, . . . soon attracted their (the Indians) attention, and they gave him the name of Hetuck, or Big Buckeye. From this, no doubt, originated the name of buckeye, now applied to the natives of Ohio, as the phrase was familiar to all the early settlers at Marietta. The name was commonly used at as early a date as 1791. Thus it appeared that Dr. Hildreth, himself a resident of Marietta, early in the present century, writing many years ago—prior at least to 1852—when he had exceptionally good advantages for gleaning items of pioneer history, either knew nothing of the Davis story or regarded it so doubtful as not to be entitled to a place in either of his two volumes made up of the minutiae of early local occurrences. Still the Davis story may be true.

Standing against its plausibility, however, is the common trend of evidence, afforded by a number of early pioneers who have left accounts of the application of the term Buckeye. Some of them seem to have had knowledge of the Davis tradition, but their explanations agree with, rather than contradict, Dr. Hildreth's statement. Briefly to summarize what has been given as the opinion of many of the pioneers and their descendants, we may say that the company of forty-seven, the first settlers of Marietta, arrived early in a well-advanced spring; that the flowers of the Buckeye were the first that met their sight, and from this circumstance they may have called the country in which they had taken up their residence Buckeye land or Buckeye settlement, or alluded to themselves as Buckeyes, from the fact that they appeared simultaneously with the blossoms of these trees. Again, it has been suggested by some that because of the tall, erect forms, and the soldierly bearing

General Rufus Putnam, superintendent of the colony.
 Colonel Ebenezer Sproat, Major Anselem Tupper, and John Mathews, surveyors.
 Major Haffield White, steward and quartermaster.
 Captain Jonathan Devol.
 " Josiah Munroe.
 " Daniel Davis.
 " Peregrine Foster.
 " Jethro Putnam.
 " William Gray.
 " Ezekiel Cooper.
 Phineas Coburn.
 David Wallace.
 Gilbert Devol, jr.
 Jonas Davis.
 Hezekiah Flint.
 Josiah Whitridge.
 Benjamin Griswold.
 Pheophilus Leonard.
 William Miller.
 Josiah White.
 Henry Maxon.
 William Moulton.
 Benjamin Shaw.
 Jervis Cutler.
 Samuel Cushing.
 Daniel Bushnell.
 Ebenezer Corry.
 Oliver Dodge.
 Isaac Dodge.
 Jabez Barlow.
 Allen Putnam.
 Joseph Wells.
 Israel Danton.
 Samuel Felshaw.
 Amos Porter, jr.
 John Gardner.
 Elizur Kirtland.
 Joseph Lincoln.
 Earl Sproat.
 Allen Devol.
 William Mason.
 Simeon Martin.
 Peletiah White.

These men, on Monday, the seventh of April, 1788, made the first lawful, organized English settlement within the limits of the great Northwest Territory.

of many of those pioneers of 1788, the Indians may have called them Buckeyes, or given them the appellation in their language equivalent to that term, after that species of tree, which is notably tall and perfectly straight. Or, the name might have been given by the Indians on account of the time of their advent. Either of these motives for the bestowal of the name would have been in entire accordance with the poetical and descriptive system of Indian nomenclature. The name having once been applied in a general way, it followed naturally that Colonel Sproat, who "towered like a Saul, a full head above the height of other men," should have been dubbed by the Indians as Dr. Hildreth says, the Big Buckeye.

There is another possibility. Muskingum (originally Mooskingom) means Elks Eye river. May it not also have been called Bucks Eye or Buckeye river, and the name have been either adopted by the settlers at its mouth, or applied to them by the Indians?

It has been very generally believed that Jervis Cutler, son of Dr. Manasseh Cutler, was the first one of the forty-seven to jump ashore at the mouth of the Muskingum, but upon the west or Fort Harmar side. He there cut down a small tree with a small axe which he drew from his coat.

When the boat reached the east or Marietta side of the Muskingum, it is said Allen Putnam and Amos Porter had a race, and both made desperate leaps to see who should have the honor of first putting foot on the shore. Putnam won, springing on to the bank five seconds ahead of Porter, and so was the first pioneer who landed at Marietta.

CHAPTER VIII.

PROGRES OF SETTLEMENT AND IMPROVEMENT.

The Farmers Delighted with their New Home.—Bright Prospects.—General Putnam to Dr. Cutler.—Washington's Opinion of the Colony.—Hopes Disappointed.—Combination of Adverse Circumstances.—Opposition to Emigration in New England from various motives.—Fear of Indian Hostility.—Derision of the West by Wits and Wags.—Parodies upon Panegyrics.—Caricatures Published.—"I am going to Ohio" and "I have been to Ohio."—Employment of the Settlers During the first Season Clearing Land, Planting and Surveying.—The Great Cornfield.—Uneasiness Regarding the Attitude of the Indians.—The Building of Campus Martius.—Dwelling-Houses.—New Arrivals in the Colony.—The first Families.—General Arthur St. Clair Governor of the Territory.—His Formal Reception at the "Bowery."—Opening of the first Court.—Proceedings of the Ohio Company.—Troubles Respecting Section Twenty-nine.—The "City" and the Ancient Works Named.—Measures for the Encouragement of Settlement —A Plan for Donating Lands Agreed Upon.—Lots of One Hundred Acres Each to be given Actual Settlers.—A Committee Appointed to Explore the Purchase and Select Locations for Settlements.—The first Offshoots of the Original Colony.—Belpre and Waterford.—Wolf Creek Mills.—Settlements at Big Bottom, Meigs' Creek, and the Forks of Duck Creek.—Measures for the Encouragement of Improvements.—Kindly and Protective Policy of the Ohio Company.—Loans Made to Needy Settlers.—General Putnam's Contract with the Scioto Company.—Houses Built at Gallipolis.—Arrival of Four Hundred French Emigrants.—Their Pitiable Condition.—Number of Men and Families in the Ohio Company's Territory.—Complete List of Arrivals During 1788, 1789, and 1790.

THE members of the little pioneer company who landed from the Mayflower April 7th, and the few who followed them to the Muskingum during the early months of the season, found much to delight them, and were happy in the midst of their strange surroundings. Doubtless there were some who felt at times the comparative isolation and loneliness of their condition, and whose minds fondly and sadly reverted to the friends they had left behind them, and the old familiar scenes—the happy homes—in little New England villages. But such feelings were transitory. There was food for other thought in the busy bustling life of the new colony—the activity impelled by varied human interests. The forest was to be cleared away, the ground was to be tilled, seed planted, houses built, preparations made for the reception of loved ones who could not immigrate with their husbands and fathers, and who were looking eagerly forward for a reunion with them in the land of their adoption. And so these pioneers labored with a zest and earnestness of purpose which doubled their accomplishment. To them the country seemed all that was desirable. There was a suggestion of New England in the rugged hills which surrounded them, and a fertility in the soil of the valleys which they had never seen equalled. Their new life, or the new chapter in life, had opened auspiciously, and the future appeared bright with promise.

Gen. Putnam wrote to Dr. Cutler, about the middle of May: "The men are generally in good health, and I believe much pleased with the country; that I am so myself you may rest assured. I can only add, the situation of the city plat is the most delightful of any I ever saw." And another of the colonists said: "This country, for fertility of soil and pleasantness of situation, not only exceeds my expectations, but exceeds any part of Europe or America I ever was in."

The prospects of the colony were as fair as its best friends could have wished. The aspect of its affairs appeared promising alike to those immediately interested and to those who were outsiders. George Washington wrote from Mt. Vernon on the nineteenth of June, 1788, to Richard Henderson, an inquirer in regard to western lands, the following eulogium of the Ohio company's settlement:

No colony in America was ever settled under such favorable auspices as that which has just commenced at the Muskingum. Information, property, strength, will be its characteristics. I know many of the settlers, personally, and there never were men better calculated to promote the welfare of such a community. If I was a young man, just preparing to begin the world, or if in advanced life and had a family to make a provision for, I know of no country where I should rather fix my habitation than in some part of the region for which the writer of the queries seems to have a predilection.*

But notwithstanding the qualifications of these men of whom Washington wrote in glowing terms; in spite of the fair prospect which opened before the Ohio company, no one of the characteristics mentioned in the letter except "information" was soon to be possessed by the settlement began April 7, 1788, at the Muskingum. "Property and strength" were attained very slowly and only through a long, hard struggle. With its splendid organization, systematic methods and capable men, the Ohio company, there was every reason to believe, would rapidly develop its purchase and present every aspect of thrift and prosperity in its settlements. But there was a great disparity between the actual results achieved and the sanguine expectations which the pioneers indulged. The period of five years of Indian war, which closely followed the inauguration of the settlement, was the principal preventive of progress. Other causes conspired to retard the fulfilment of well grounded hopes. The failure of the Scioto company doubtless led some people to mistrust the ability of the Ohio company to carry out its plans, and the organization suffered in some degree from unwise elements in its own policy, from the failure of its treasurer and from the strong opposition to western settlement which was aroused in New England. When all of the unusual obstacles which lay in the way of the company are considered in addition to those which are common to pioneer life, the small advancement of the colony during the first ten or twenty years of its existence does not seem strange, but on the other hand there is cause for wonder that the New Englanders in Ohio were not completely and irretrievably overwhelmed.

Relegating to subsequent chapters the sad story of the Indian war, the cessation of improvement and the embarrassment of the Ohio company, which was caused by it, we shall endeavor to give an idea of the earlier impediments to progress and of what was accomplished anterior to 1791. And, that the reader may more thoroughly understand why the increase in population was so small, comparatively, during the earliest years of the settlement, before the Indian war had opened in earnest, let us turn again to glance at the condition of public feeling in Massachusetts. It is a question whether the worst results of the Indian war would not have been averted had not the undue fear of that war restrained emigration.

In other words, if the progress of settlement had not been stayed by the dread of Indian hostilities, would not the Ohio company's colony have become strong enough by 1791 to have passed in perfect safety through the period of five years succeeding. The exact effect upon emigration of the few Indian depredations and hostilities prior to 1791 cannot be known, but the exaggerated stories of border barbarities circulated in New England must have served to keep many a would-be pioneer at home.

But the uncertainty in regard to the attitude of the Indians, at first, and the terror created by the appalling colors in which at a later day pictures of their incursions were painted, were by no means the only agencies operating against emigration.

One of the most potent of the causes tending to defeat the full accomplishment of the Ohio company's plans was the ridicule of western emigration in New England. Timothy Flint, a Massachusetts man, personally acquainted with many of the Ohio company settlers, in his little book on the west,* has the following paragraph describing the feeling which had an existence in the region in which he dwelt:

The first travellers to explore Ohio availed themselves of the full extent of the traveller's privilege in regard to the wonders of this new land of promise and the unparalleled fertility of the soil. These extravagant representations of the grandeur of the vegetation and the fertility of the land at first excited a great desire to emigrate to this new and wonderful region. But some returned with different accounts, in discouragement. . . . A reaction took place in the public mind.

The wags of the day exercised their wit in circulating caricatured and exaggerated editions of the stories of the first adventurers, that there were springs of brandy, flax that bore little pieces of cloth on the stems, enormous pumpkins, and melons and the like. Accounts the most horrible were added of hoop snakes of such deadly malignity that a sting which they bore in their tails, when it punctured the bark of a green tree, instantly caused its leaves to become sear and the tree to die. Stories of Indian massacres and barbarities were related in all their horrors. The country was admitted to be fertile, but was pronounced excessively sickly, and poorly balancing by that advantage all these counterpoises of sickness, Indians, copper-headed and hoop snakes, bears, wolves and panthers.

Much of derision seems to have been directed against Dr. Cutler, no doubt because he was a leading man in the Ohio company and because he was an enthusiast. The author from whom we have already quoted, says:

Dr. Cutler, at the time of his being engaged in the speculation of the Ohio company's purchase, had a feud—it is not remembered whether literary, political or religious—with the late learned and eccentric Dr. Bently, of Salem, Massachusetts. Dr. Bently was the chief contributor to a paper, which he afterward edited. The writer still remembers, and can repeat doggerel verses by Dr. Bently upon the departure of Dr. Cutler on his first trip to explore his purchase on the Ohio.

Very interesting reading indeed, would these verses make for the present generation of the men of the west.

One word said against the western country had doubtless more effect than ten said in its favor, and so the few people who returned from the settlement of the Muskingum may have done much to prevent others from journeying thither. One of them, Theophilus Knight, an adventurer to the west in the summer of 1788, said that himself and two companions returned because they did not think "it was so much better than any other country that it would pay a man for carrying a large family to such a wilderness, inhabited by savages and wild beasts of the forest."

*Spark's Life of Washington, volume IX, page 385.

* Indian Wars of the West, page 144.

At a later period than that of which we have written the opposition to emigration was increased rather than diminished, and derision of the Government and its friends became more general, more outspoken and more broad. It assumed in fact the form of burlesque. One early resident* of Ohio has said:

The powerful engine of caricature was set in motion. I have a distinct recollection of a picture I saw in boyhood, prefixed to a penny anti-moving-to-Ohio pamphlet, in which a stout, ruddy, well-dressed man on a sleek, fat horse, with a label "I am going to Ohio," meets a pale and ghastly skeleton of a man, scarcely half dressed, on the wreck of what was once a horse, already bespoken by the more politic crows, with a label "I have been to Ohio."

The attention of the little band of pioneers, who landed at the Muskingum the seventh of April, 1788, was first directed to the building of small cabins or huts for shelter. These were in part constructed of the poplar boards brought from Buffalo creek, and they were of the smallest and rudest kind which would afford any protection from the weather; for a more important work than building comfortable or commodious houses lay before the company. They had to make preparations for those whom they expected soon to arrive, and also to sow and plant that they might have a harvest for their maintenance in the autumn.

The survey was commenced on the ninth of April that the lots might be ready to assign to the new immigrants as soon as they should arrive.

Colonel Ebenezer Sproat and John Mathews, with thirteen men, engaged in this work, but their progress was slow, as General Putnam wrote to a friend, "because of rainy weather and their being obliged to survey so much more land than was expected in order to obtain lands suitable to the purpose. They did not complete their work of laying off the necessary lots until the middle of May. At that time General Putnam wrote: "The city lots will be ready to draw by the first Wednesday of July, as proposed at the meeting in Providence, but the others will not."

While the surveyors were carrying on their work, the remainder of the men were engaged under the immediate supervision of General Putnam in clearing land and deadening timber. The first clearing was at the point, on the east side of the Muskingum, and it is there that the first houses were built. In six days as many acres were cleared, though of course roughly. The forest fell fast under the blows of a score of axes, and by the latter part of May the greater part of the land had been planted. Several small pieces of ground cleared by individual labor—by the several proprietors who were of the pioneer company, or who had arrived later in the spring—had been planted earlier. But the great cornfield, planted for the common good of the colony, cleared and made ready for a crop by the men in the employ of the Ohio company, was not seeded until the time designated. It included nearly or perhaps quite an hundred and thirty acres, and the settlers were gratified at the richness of the soil which was exhibited by the rapid growth of this fine crop. One letter writer chronicled the fact that "the corn has grown nine inches in twenty-four hours, for two or three days past." It was of this cornfield of which Dr. Cutler, when visiting the colony in August, said: "It astonished me on account of its magnitude. I should be as soon lost in it on a cloudy day as in a cedar swamp." The field occupied a portion of the high plain back of the site of Campus Martius (which was not built until after the crop was planted) and extended southward towards the Ohio, so as to include in its limits the great mound. It must not be understood that all of this land was cleared. In a portion of it the trees were deadened by girdling, and the leaves remaining upon some of them so shaded the ground as to interfere with the growth of the crop. Only about one-third of the field was plowed or harrowed, the rest being broken up for planting with hoes. Very little besides corn was raised the first season.* The other crops planted were chiefly those of the garden, and were grown in small quantity. Beans and potatoes were the principal of these.

During all the time that the labor of surveying, clearing and planting land was going on, we may imagine that the pioneers found much beside to interest them, and to form subjects for conversation. The ancient works with their far extending walls, the great mound, the graded way leading down to the Muskingum, and the huge platforms of earth, or truncated pyramids caused universal wonder alike among the educated and the unlearned, and were carefully examined. There was much to admire in the verduer-clad hills and the beautiful valleys of which the fertility was asserted by the most luxuriant growth of herbage and every variety of plant life which had a home in this latitude. Many strange forms of vegetation greeted the eyes of the curious and admiring. Game was abundant in the woods, and during the first few months richly furnished the rude but substantial larders of the pioneers. Later in the year the Indians drove away or killed off the larger game, but during the summer and early fall of 1788 nearly all varieties of animals and fowl known to the western country abounded in the woods. Hunting was engaged in with zest not alone for the sport which it afforded but for the value of the products of the chase. One of the pioneers writing home to New England, says: "We have started twenty buffaloes in a drove. Deer are as plenty as sheep with you. Beaver and otter are abundant. I have known one man to catch twenty or thirty of them in two or three nights. Turkeys are innumerable."

A general feeling of content existed among the settlers. All were pleased with their surroundings, with the climate of the country, the prospect for the future, and the attainments of the first few months. They had reason to be thankful for the enjoyment of good health. As late as *Judge Timothy Walker, in address delivered before the Ohio Historical and Philosophical society at Cincinnati in 1837, and published in the "Transactions."

* The first wheat sown in the Ohio company's purchase, and in the State of Ohio, was a small quantity sown near Campus Martius, late in the fall of 1788, by Captain Trueman Guthrie, who brought a small quantity of seed with him from Connecticut.

July no man in the colony had been sick. This in a new country was remarkable.

But one cause of uneasiness remained, though it was probably little thought of except by General Putnam and a few others who occupied stations of responsibility in the colony. Some precaution was deemed necessary to insure safety in case of the manifestations of Indian hostility. The fortification known as Campus Martius (military camp) arose as an expression of this fear, as an evidence of the isolation of the colony and a tangible reminder of its danger. Little did the builders of that defence apprehend the hardships, perils, and atrocities of which its picture reminds their descendants of to-day. General Putnam had suspended the survey about the middle of May, because of the uncertainty of the Indians remaining at peace, but it was resumed and carried on with little interruption—and that not because of hostilities—through the season and, in fact, through the year 1788. Preparations for a treaty had been made soon after the landing of the pioneers, but it was not finally negotiated until the beginning of 1789 (as will be shown in the following chapter). Several times during the summer Captain Pipe of the Delaware tribe and other chiefs and warriors visited Fort Harmar and the little settlement on the east side of the Muskingum. They had dined with General Putnam in his marquee and made great professions of friendship, but had expressed displeasure at the building of houses and planting of crops before the making of a treaty.

Taking into consideration the feeling that existed among the Indians, the Ohio company decided to carry out a plan which should give the settlers protection in case it was needed. The first measure taken toward this work was the cutting of a road through the woods from "the point" where most of the houses were built, to the site which was selected for the stockade, which was a mile away, up the Muskingum. The ground was well chosen. It was the margin of the plain which had once been the bank of the Muskingum. On either side there were small ravines; in the rear stretched the smooth and gently rising plain, and in the front there was a somewhat abrupt descent to the lowest river terrace which, about one hundred and fifty yards distant, was washed by the Muskingum. The location is best described to those not familiar with it by the statement that it is bounded by Washington and Second streets, respectively upon the south and east. Here in the form of a parallelogram, the sides of which measured one hundred and eighty feet each, was built the stockade which for five years was to be the dwelling place and refuge of a large portion of the Ohio company's colony. The sides were formed of continuous lines of dwelling houses two stories in height. They were constructed of timber four inches thick, sawed by hand, and fitted together at the corners in the same manner as those of a hewed log house. At the corners were block-houses, solidly made and of quite imposing appearance. They were a trifle higher than the houses which formed the sides of the fort, were covered with shapely four square roofs, three of which were surmounted at their apexes with towers intended to be used as sentry boxes, large enough to accommodate four men each. On the fourth there was a tower very similar to the others, but capped with a cupola for the reception of a bell, "which," says a letter writer of the period, "we are told is coming on as a present from a gentleman in Boston."*

The block-houses projected six feet beyond the sides of the stockade. They were twenty feet square at the ground, and the second story of each projected two feet over the lower. Heavy gates were hung at the entrances in the south and west fronts, and over that in the latter (toward the Muskingum) was a house of logs or hewed timber, projecting like the second floors of the corner block-houses. This was intended for the protection of the gate in case of an attack. The watch-towers were found inconvenient of access after the Indian war broke out, and small, square bastions were built at each angle of the stockade for the accommodation of the sentries. In those at the southwest and northeast angles small cannon were placed. In addition to the two rows of windows along the sides of the fort, the walls were pierced with loop-holes for musketry. The houses were nearly all provided with good brick chimneys, the bricks being made upon the ground and burned by men experienced in that line of industry. Good shingle roofs afforded a protection from the weather. Shingle-making was then a difficult and slow work. They were split from blocks about two and a half feet long, and sloped with the axe, and at the end exposed to the weather were nearly or perhaps quite an inch thick. Several of the houses included in Campus Martius were built at private expense, and were finished in detail as the owner's fancy dictated, but all conformed in general design to the plan by the superintendent and considered most advantageous to the general good. There were seventy-two rooms of eighteen feet square and upwards, in this work of defence, and it was estimated that when necessity required nearly nine hundred people could be shielded from an enemy in the enclosure.

As a basis of this estimate it is supposed that twelve persons should occupy a room. Campus Martius, however, never contained half as many people as the number mentioned. In the centre of the enclosure, which measured one hundred and forty-four feet each way, a well eighty feet deep (which still remains in use), was dug to supply water in the event of a siege. Near the well was placed a large sundial† made by Major Anselm Tupper, which marked the flight of time—slow albeit—through all the Indian war, and was kept for many years as an interesting relic of the pioneers.

Although the greater part of the work of building Campus Martius was accomplished during the first year

* In the MS journal of the Ohio company appears the following entry:

Upon information from Colonel May that Mr. Joseph May, of Boston, had presented a bell to the Ohio company for the first public building to be erected in the territory of the company, and such building-ordered by the agents,

Resolved, That the thanks of the company be presented to that gentleman, and the directors be requested to take measures for transferring it from Boston to the Muskingum.

†This sundial was owned for many years by A. T. Nye, esq., and was consumed in his hardware store on the occasion of the great fire in Marietta in 1857.

of the settlement, and in fact much of it by August, the details of the defence were not completed until the Indian war broke out in earnest in 1791. The illustration represents it at that time in its finished state. Rows of palings were planted from corner to corner of the block-houses, sloping outward at an angle of forty-five degrees, and supported by posts and railing. At a distance of twenty feet from these sharp raking pickets, and surrounding the entire work, was a line of heavy palings eight or ten feet in height; and again outside of this there was an abatis formed of the boughs of trees with the smaller limbs pointed and projecting outwards. The work thus perfected was almost absolutely impregnable. It is probable that the obvious strength of the defence discouraged attack, for during the whole period of Indian disturbance no attempt was made against it, and so far as is known no plan ever formed for an assault.

Campus Martius, judging from the picture of it (which is in all essential matters historically correct), must have presented a striking appearance with its background of fields and wooded hills, and really have merited the enthusiastic words of one of the pioneers, who, in writing home, said it was "the handsomest pile of buildings on this side of the Alleghany mountains."

Upon the shore of the Muskingum, directly in front of the stockaded fort, was constructed a substantial timber wharf at which lay moored the Mayflower, the lesser craft and canoes when not in use, plying back and forth between Campus Martius and Fort Harmar, or "the point."

Beside the dwellings in Campus Martius about twenty-five, mostly at "the point," were built during the season.

We must now return to the narrative of some important history of the year 1788 over which we have passed in chronicling the building of Campus Martius.

The first company of pioneers of the Ohio company's settlement were followed to the shores of the Muskingum during the summer of 1788 by many more, of whom some were adventurers, but the majority people seeking permanent homes.

In May came General Samuel Holden Parsons, a man already familiar with the western country, who was now under appointment as judge of the territory. Also in the same month there arrived Captain William Dana, Ebenezer Battelle, Major Jonathan Haskell, Colonel Israel Putnam, Aaron Waldo Putnam, Major Robert Bradford, Jonathan Stone, Major Winthrop Sargent, Colonel William Stacey, and Colonel John May.* The latter came down the river from Pittsburgh with quite a party, not all of whom, however, were settlers. He has made note of the fact that on board of the boat forty-two feet long were "twenty-seven men, two cows, two calves, seven hogs and nine dogs, besides eight tons of baggage."

* Colonel John May, of Boston, kept a journal which has been published and is very interesting reading for the antiquarian and student of western history. We shall have frequent occasion to quote from it. It appears from this journal that Colonel May arrived at "the delightful Muskingum" at three o'clock in the afternoon of Monday, May 26th. Colonel May was one of the agents of the Ohio company. He cherished the hope of settling permanently in the colony, but did not realize it. He died in Boston in 1812.

In the month of June there were many more arrivals, among them Hon. James M. Varnum, judge of the territory, Major Dean Tyler, Griffin and Charles Greene, Colonel Joseph Thompson, Dr. Jabez True and Paul Fearing. The two last named are known to have arrived on the sixteenth. Judge Varnum, as is shown by Colonel May's journal, came upon the fifth, "with about forty souls in company."

Judge Varnum, one of the ablest and noblest men in the Ohio company's colony, was an invalid when he came to the Muskingum. His wife was unable to accompany him. James Owen and wife were of his party, and Mrs. Owen acted as his nurse until death claimed him, early in 1789. She was the first woman who settled in the Ohio company's colony. There were, however, several at Fort Harmar, the wives of the officers, before the arrival of the forty-seven pioneers. They could not be called with propriety settlers. They were merely temporary sojourners at a United States military post. The Owen family did not remain in the country through the Indian war, but returned soon after, and were known as most estimable people. Some of their descendants now reside in Washington county. Mrs. Owen performed very valuable humane services during the prevalence of small-pox in Marietta in 1790, and from this fact, and also, perhaps, in consideration of her being the first woman inhabitant of Marietta, the Ohio company gave her one of the donation lots of one hundred acres in extent. The family emigrated from South Kingston, Rhode Island. Mrs. Owen died in 1800* and her husband ten years later.

No other families arrived in the settlement until August. †On the nineteenth of that month six families landed. They were those of General Benjamin Tupper, Colonel Ichabod Nye (son-in-law of the former) Major Nathaniel Cushing, Major Nathan Goodale, Major Asa Coburn, sr., and Andrew Webster, his son-in-law. The first four mentioned reached Wellsburgh (Buffalo creek), Virginia, in July, and waited there six weeks for Major Coburn and Andrew Weber. Colonel Ichabod Nye left them, and with two single men came down the river on the Virginia side, bringing the horses. He arrived August 9th. The ladies of the above families, within a day or two after their arrival, were called upon by the wives of the officers at the fort and soon invited them to partake of the hospitality that the garrison afforded. Other families came out later, but the dates of their arrival, with one or two exceptions, have not been preserved. The family of Ebenezer Battelle undoubtedly landed in December. He had come out in May, with Colonel John May, but went to Baltimore to meet his family in October. Colonel Robert Oliver's family arrived November 18th, as is shown by a letter written that day by Rowena Tupper. She says: "What do I hear below? Colonel Oliver is now landing. I fly to meet them." Arrivals were, indeed, the cause of excitement and joy to a degree which can hardly be realized in this age of quick mail and telegraph facilities. Altogether, says General Putnam, fifteen families arrived during 1788. Hildreth says the same. But in a list made of settlers, General Putnam gives the names of nineteen families who were in Marietta before the close of the year. There were sixteen at least whose names have been preserved, as follows: General Benjamin Tupper, Andrew Webster, Colonel Ichabod Nye, James Owen, Nathaniel Cushing, Asa Coburn, sr., Major Nathan Goodale, Asa Coburn jr., Benjamin Converse, Griffin Greene, Charles Greene, Benoni Hurlburt, Nathaniel Moody, Israel Pierce, Robert Oliver, and Ebenezer Battelle. Commodore Abraham Whipple was a noted arrival of this year. Colonel Ichabod Nye says in his autobiography that "during the fall five or six other families arrived and other adventurers and workmen. Some had returned to New England for their families. The winter began with about a hundred or more in the settlement." Rufus Putnam states that in addition to the pioneer party eighty-four men came to the settlement during 1788, making in all one hundred and thirty-two.*

* A. T. Nye in Marietta Register.

† With the party who arrived on the nineteenth of August was one man who had a keen and curious interest in seeing the territory owned by the Ohio company. That man was the Rev. Manasseh Cutler, who had negotiated the purchase with Congress—a leading man in the counsels of the company from the first. He came not as a settler, but as an observer of the colony he had been so largely influential in planting upon the Ohio. He remained at Marietta until the ninth of September, and then went up the river with Colonel Vigo to Pittsburgh, from whence he returned to Massachusetts.

COMMODORE ABRAHAM WHIPPLE.

General Arthur St. Clair, governor of the Northwest Territory, arrived in Marietta on the ninth of July. He had been commissioned by Congress October 16, 1787, the commission to take effect on the first of February, 1788. At the time of his appointment he was president of Congress, but prior to that had been a general in the Revolutionary war; had fought gallantly in the French and Indian war, and carried a standard at the storming of Quebec, in 1759. Like most of the Revolutionary officers, he was impoverished by the long struggle for independence.† He was undoubtedly in full sympathy with the worn-out veterans who were the leading men of the only English settlement in the territory he was to govern, and his appointment was certainly agreeable to their desires. His arrival was an event of importance to the little community. "This," says Colonel May, "is in a sense the birthday of this western world." Hitherto law had only a nominal existence. Now government was to be organized; the governor was to dwell in the new settlement. It had already been foreseen by some of the leading men of the Ohio company that when other settlements were founded the governor might make one of them his residence. This they wished to prevent. Colonel May who, when on his way to the Muskingum, met St. Clair at Pittsburgh, and felt obliged to tarry and make him a visit, says:

For one I confess I am moved to the visit by two motives; one the respect due to the governor of the Western Territory; the other, a little selfish, as we wish him to make the Muskingum the seat of government and place of his residence. And we have no doubt if proper attention is paid to these little matters, as well as to those of greater magnitude, the object will be accomplished."*

The formal reception of the governor was postponed until the fifteenth, but "his landing was announced by the discharge of fourteen cannon, and all rejoiced at his coming."† He was domiciled at Fort Harmar.

In the afternoon of the day set for the official welcoming, the governor came over to the Marietta side of the Muskingum in the barge belonging to Fort Harmar, on the oars of which, we are told, the word "Congress" was painted in bright letters. He was escorted by the garrison officers and by Major Winthrop Sargent, secretary of the territory, and was received, says Hildreth, "by General Putnam, the judges of the territory, and the principal inhabitants of the new colony." The formal inauguration of government in the Northwest Territory took place in the "Bowery," which was not as might be supposed one of Nature's shady temples but a structure reared with hands.‡ The secretary read the Ordinance of Freedom, the commission of the governor, those of the judges, and his own; a short address of welcome was made to his excellency and "three cheers closed the ceremonies of the day." The people generally were presented to Governor St. Clair and the utmost good feeling prevailed. One of the officers present wrote of the occasion "These people appear the most happy folks in the world, greatly satisfied with their new purchase, and they certainly are the best informed, most courteous and civil to strangers of any people I have yet met with."§ Shortly after this occasion, and within the month of July, the first laws of the territory were framed and published, and Washington county was established—but of these subjects we shall speak elsewhere.

Another interesting ceremonial which occurred not long after the governor's arrival in the colony was the opening of the first court in the Northwest Territory. The demonstration was simple from necessity; there was not much of pomp or splendor in the ceremony, but it must have been suggestive to the denizens of this isolated pioneer settlement of an idea that was majestic. The formal establishment of the institution which is at once the people's palladium and the organized exemplar of civilization's most distinctive force and characteristic quality, could not have been other than an absorbingly interesting incident in the lives of those who witnessed it. On Tuesday, the second of September, 1788, the people and the officers from Fort Harmar formed in procession at "the point" and marched to Campus Martius, escorting the governor, territorial judges, and the judges of the court of common pleas. In front was the sheriff of the county of Washington, Colonel Ebenezer Sproat, tall, erect and of a fine military bearing, with his drawn sword and wand of office. The spectacle was a strange one to the few friendly Indians who were present, for it was the first

* Colonel May's journal, page 53.

† Ibid, page 83.

* The subject of settlement is briefly treated here, as a full and correct list of the settlers of 1788, 1789 and 1790 is presented at the conclusion of this chapter.

† See Biography.

‡ "Our long bowery is built on the east bank of the Muskingum."—Colonel May's journal, page 78.

§ Major Denny's military journal.

ceremonial which they had seen the white men perform, and it doubtless had upon their minds an awing effect. Arrived at the garrison the procession filed into the north-west corner of the block-house, and the great hall was filled with people. The Rev. Manasseh Cutler opened the exercises of the day with solemn prayer. The commissions of the judges, the clerk, and the sheriff were then read, after which the court of common pleas of Washington county was opened for business by the proclamation of the sheriff, beginning in the old form with the monitory, "Oyez, oyez, oyez." "Although this scene was exhibited thus early in the settlement of the State, few ever equalled it in the dignity and exalted character of its principal participators."* As there were no cases to be tried, the court was immediately adjourned. The first judges were General Rufus Putnam, General Benjamin Tupper, and Colonel Archibald Crary, the sheriff, as has been stated, Colonel Sproat, and the clerk, Colonel R. J. Meigs. Paul Fearing, esq., was admitted an attorney, and was the first in the territory.

The Ohio company was actively engaged during the whole of the period that has been sketched. Consideration of the unforeseen difficulties which arose occupied much of the time of the directors and agents. New plans had to be devised and put in operation, and in many cases measures which had been deemed adequate to the end in view had to be materially modified to meet existing circumstances. The progress of the company's affairs, although for the most part smooth enough, was not entirely without the halting and unevenness which indicated cross purposes on the part of some of the members. There was something in the way of internal strife, though it was not serious. Colonel May gives some intimation of this in an entry in his journal:

General Varnum and his party are making difficulties about the eight acre lots not being drawn contiguous to the city; also with respect to the Scioto purchase. . . . General Putnam did not strictly adhere to orders given at Brackett's tavern at Boston and Rice's at Providence.†

The same writer found considerable fault with the slow progress that had been made in the company's colony, late in May, the day after his arrival, jotting down the following language:

As to our surveying, buildings, etc., they are in a very backward way. Little appears to be done and a great deal of time and money mispent.‡

The first meeting of the Ohio company, west of the mountains, was held July 2nd, and continued by adjournment, until August 14th. There were present Samuel Holden Parsons, Rufus Putnam, and James M. Varnum, directors, and the following agents (each of whom represented the number of shares indicated): Colonel John May, 36; Major Winthrop Sargent, 166; Colonel Archibald Crary, 102; Major William Corliss, 112; Colonel Return Jonathan Meigs, 99; Captain Aaron Barlow, 25; Colonel Ebenezer Sproat, 43; Major Haffield White, 20; General Putnam, 66. Total shares represented, 669.

At this meeting the city at the mouth of the Muskingum was named Marietta. Among other business transacted the first day, was the action in regard to the three-acre lots. It was moved, as a measure looking toward the safety and well-being of the colony, "that the lots 21, 30, and fractional parts of 35 and 36, of township number 2, in range 8, and numbers 19, 25, and 20, and fractional parts of 31 in the third township of range 8, the same being in commons laid out adjoining the city, be laid out in one thousand and five three-acre lots."

The mile square section No. 29, reserved out of every township for the support of religion, happening to be that on which the city was laid out, the company made a strenuous effort to have an exception made in this case. It was proposed to Congress that other lands should be reserved instead of this section, but the arrangement could not be effected. Hence it was given up, greatly to the disappointment of the proprietors, and other lots were laid out at the mouth of the great Hockhocking. Portions of the section, however, were leased for a term of years. Section No. 16, set apart for the use of schools, which fell near the mouth of Duck creek, was also leased in lots. The common lands, "between the highway and Muskingum and in Market square," it was decided might be assigned to individuals for gardens for the term of ten years (from March 1, 1788), on condition that they should be cleared within two months, fenced by March 1, 1792, and that within three years trees should be set out.

The ancient works received attention at this meeting. It was resolved that the elevated square, No. 11, be called Quadranaou; No. 19, Capitolium; No. 61, Cecelia; and that "the great road through the covert way" be named Sacra Via. It was further resolved that the reserved public square in the city, including the buildings at the block-house, be called Campus Martius.

The company took action on many matters intended to advance the interests of the colonists, and among the other resolutions which appear in their record* is the following, under date of August 13, 1788:

WHEREAS, It is necessary that mills be erected as soon as possible, it is ordered that any persons who shall build a wind-mill on the banks of the Ohio, and near the mouth of the Muskingum, by the first of December next, shall have right to occupy a tract of land one hundred and fifty feet east and west and two hundred feet north and south for a term of twenty years.

This tempting offer was not accepted, and it was not until sometime later that the colonists had the benefit of a mill within the limits of their purchase.

"It soon became evident," says General Putnam,† "that some new plan must be adopted to divide lands or the settlement would come to naught, and to remedy this the proprietors were notified to meet at Marietta the first Wednesday of December, 1788, and devise a plan. This they failed to do, and the agents, under the circumstances, conceiving that they had the authority to act in the matter, on February 6, 1789, repealed the resolutions for the division of lands passed at Boston November 21, 1787, and adopted the following:

* Marietta Intelligencer, March 10, 1842.

† Colonel May's journal, page 63.

‡ Ibid, page 59.

* MS. Journal of the Ohio Company,

† Autobiography of General Rufus Putnam (MS).

Resolved, That there shall be granted to persons who shall settle in such places within the purchase as the agents may think most conducive to advance the general interest of the proprietors, and under such restrictions and limitations as they shall think proper, lands not exceeding one hundred acres, out of each share in the fund of the company, and that a committee be appointed to investigate the purchase so far as may, in their opinion, be necessary in order to point out and fix upon proper plans and places for settlements.

As early as July this matter had been under consideration. The inability of the directors to dispose of any lands within the purchase had prevented the growth of the settlement, for thousands of emigrants had passed down the Ohio, many of whom it was believed would have located in the Ohio company's purchase had they been able to buy lands. Most of them were on their way to Kentucky but were not the owners of any lands there. General Putnam, Samuel Parsons, and Colonel Archibald Crary, who were appointed a committee for the consideration of this matter, rehearsed the foregoing facts to the shareholders and made a report, in concluding which they said: "We are of the opinion that giving a part of the lands to industrious people, on performing certain duties in settling, clearing, etc., will be very much for the interest of the proprietors." It was in accordance with this spirit that the action was taken by the agents which we have above indicated.

A committee, consisting of General Rufus Putnam, John Dodge, Griffin Greene, Alexander Oliver, Jonathan Devol, Colonel Robert Oliver, R. J. Meigs, Captain Dana, and Major Nathan Goodale, was appointed to explore the purchase and select suitable locations for settlements. It was decided to grant lands in one hundred acre parcels as contemplated by the resolution, and it was further provided that "no settlement should consist of less than twenty men able to bear arms, they to be well provided with arms and ammunition, and to erect such works of defense as should be appointed by the committee. The company made the following further requirements, viz: Each settler to furnish lands for highways when needed; to build, within five years, a dwelling house to be at least eighteen by twenty-four feet in dimensions; to plant not less than fifty apple and twenty peach trees within three years; to clear and put in meadow or pasture fifteen acres and into tillage not less than five acres within five years; to be constantly provided with arms and be subject to military duty.

The time had now arrived when Marietta should put forth her first off-shoot. Among the locations favorably mentioned by the exploring committee was the tract of land extending along the Ohio, a short distance above and four or five miles below the Little Kanawha, terminating two miles above the Little Hocking, and the broad alluvial bottom below the latter stream. During the winter of 1788-89 lots were surveyed and platted in these localities, and a company of about forty associates (as they were called) was organized to make a settlement. In reality there were four settlements (the lower being usually called Newbury), and they included sixty-eight lots. The lots being drawn the settlers began moving onto them early in April, 1789. Here the same slow, hard processes were repeated, which had resulted in the attainment of the improved condition of things at the mouth of the Muskingum. The settlers built little cabins along the river bank, clearing away the forest around them. The community was made up of men of sterling character—most of them schooled in the long struggle of the Revolutionary war for the future that was before them. They began hopefully and toiled on in privation, patiently enduring the many hardships of their lot, and endeavoring to see in the future a reward for their labors. They did not know how soon they should suffer other ills than those which they already encountered, but the time was fast approaching when the fortitude of every man should be put to the severest test. This group of settlements was called Belle Prairie, which term became contracted to Belleprie, and finally to the present form—Belpre.

What was called the "second association" was formed also in the winter of 1788-89, for the purpose of making a settlement about twenty miles up the Muskingum on an allotment of donation lands, and also upon Wolf creek. The association numbered thirty-nine members and being afterward increased by the addition of one new member, took forty lots of one hundred acres each. A village, now Beverly, was laid out on the "peninsula," on the west side of the Muskingum and in a bend of Wolf creek. The settlement was made on the twentieth of April, 1789, by nineteen men, who leaving Campus Martius rowed up the Muskingum in canoes to the place of their destination. By the middle of May cabins were built for each family and gardens made. By the middle of July corn was growing among the girdled trees and upon the fertile plain, which had probably been tilled by the Indians, as when the settlement was made it was covered only with bushes and small saplings. A block-house was also erected during the summer. As the Wolf creek settlement was made simultaneously with that on the Muskingum (and, in fact, depending upon it) Colonel Robert Oliver, Major Haffield White, and Captain John Dodge, with a company of laborers erected what was known as the Wolf Creek mills, the first mill in the State of Ohio. This name was applied not alone to the building but to the settlement—the little cluster of houses which were also erected at this point, one mile from the mouth of the creek, though the term Millersburgh was also often used. These two settlements (that upon the Muskingum and that upon Wolf creek) were covered by one name, Plainfield, which, however, remained in use but a short time, being superseded by Waterford. The mill was of great service to the settlers in the immediate vicinity and also to the people of Marietta, both before and during the war. We have now mentioned briefly the two principal offshoots of the Marietta colony.*

There were several other small settlements made prior to the war. In the fall of 1790 an association of thirty-six members founded the ill-fated settlement at Big Bottom, which is fully described in the following chapter.

*For a full account of the early affairs of Belpre and Waterford the reader should see the chapters devoted respectively to them, and for the occurrences during the Indian war, the two chapters which follow this.

The same season a block-house was built for twenty men at Meigs creek, and a few settlers took up hundred acre donation lots at the forks of Duck creek, and in the meantime a few cabins appeared along the Ohio from the Muskingum to Duck creek.

Lands had been granted Captain Enoch Shepherd early in 1789, for the erection of mills on Duck creek, but the project did not result successfully, and Shepherd and his partners, Colonel Ebenezer Sproat and Thomas Stanley, lost all of the time and money they had expended. This saw-mill was completed in September, 1789, but a flood so injured it and the dam that they could not easily be repaired, and as the Indian war soon afterwards came on, the enterprise was abandoned.

In the year 1790 one hundred and twenty acres of land was granted Dudley Woodbridge in section three, township number four, range eleven, on condition that he should build a good horse-mill, and at the same time Robert Potts, from New London, Connecticut, was given permission to build a mill, and land was granted him for that purpose on Mill creek, two miles north of Marietta. Neither of these projects was realized, because of the more frequent occurrence of Indian hostilities which indicated an increased hazard in following any occupation, which necessitated removal from the immediate vicinity of the garrisons. The Robert Potts mill building was nearly completed when the danger became so great as to cause the workmen to abandon the building, and it was soon after destroyed by the Indians.

It must be borne in mind that during the years 1789 and 1790 the settlers were almost constantly harassed by the savage neighbors, and several murders were committed, but we have reserved for full consideration in subsequent chapters the topics of Indian affairs and the period of war.

Another grist-mill was projected by some of the Belpre settlers, among whom were Griffin Greene and Robert Bradford. The mouth of the Little Hocking was chosen as the location and the Ohio company donated to the builders a tract of one hundred and sixty acres of land. Work was begun in 1790 under the supervision of two experienced millwrights from Redstone, Pennsylvania, and very gratifying progress made, but the opening of the Indian war in January, 1791, put a stop to operations, and no mill was erected at this locality until after the restoration of peace. The people returned to the laborious method of grinding their corn by hand or pounding it in mortars until the completion of the famous floating mill, at Belpre, built by Captain Jonathan Devol, an ingenious mechanic, at the suggestion of Griffin Greene, who had seen one in Holland a number of years before. This mill was built upon two boats, one a large canoe made from a sycamore tree trunk, and the other a flat boat forty-five feet in length and ten feet wide. The grinding stones were placed upon the largest boat and the water wheel between this and the smaller. A small frame house was erected over the machinery. When the mill was in readiness for use it was towed to a point not far from Farmers Castle, and abreast of the middle of Backus' (afterward Blannerhassett's) island, where it was anchored in a strong current. This mill was owned by seven persons, and the capital of the stock company which they formed was divided into twelve shares. The cost of construction was fifty-one pounds and eight shillings in Massachusetts currency. This was quite a large sum of money to be expended at that time, but it proved a good investment. The situation of the mill rendered it safe from destruction at the hands of the Indians, and it was of immense service during the whole period of the war, not alone to the people of Belpre, but to the residents of Marietta as well. It is said that from twenty-five to fifty bushels of grain could be ground per day at this mill, according to the swiftness of the current.

Turning backward chronologically to the year 1789, we see in Marietta a continuation of the work of improvement carried on so diligently in 1788. The settlement felt severely the loss of those men who had gone out to Belpre and Waterford, for although quite a large number of accessions were made to the population, not many of the late comers were men to be compared in character with those who had taken their departure.

The results accomplished showed plainly the loss, for although the best was done under the circumstances, no more corn was planted than during the first season, and comparatively little building or other improvement was carried on.

General Varnum died in January of this year, and his place as director of the Ohio company was filled by the election of Griffin Greene. The company in February passed a resolution ordering that "the seventh of April should forever be considered as a day of public festival in the territory of the company." The Rev. Daniel Story, of Massachusetts, employed by Dr. Cutler for the Ohio company as preacher and teacher, arrived in the spring and began his labors as chaplain of the new settlement. He preached not only at Campus Martius and the Point, but made pastoral visits to Belpre and Waterford, using on those occasions a log canoe. His visits were made quite regularly through the years 1789 and 1790, and only suspended when the danger from Indian attacks was considered too great.

The Ohio company continued in the exercise of its wise and kindly policy toward the people in its settlements. The surveys were continued when the attitude of the Indians would permit, and donation allotments were surveyed in several localities, amounting in all to fifty-seven thousand acres.

The condition of healthfulness among the settlers, which has been remarked upon as existing through the summer of 1788 did not prevail during the two years following, and a dearth of food became an additional and serious evil. Under these circumstances the Ohio company humanely came to the assistance of its people and made small loans without interest to those among them who were sick or destitute, supplying a total of about three thousand dollars. Much of this sum was lost, as when the Indian war came on many of the settlers were unable to carry on their avocations by which they otherwise would have obtained money with which to discharge their indebtedness.

In the summer of 1790 General Putnam, who had contracted with William Duer, of the Scioto company, to erect houses at Gallipolis for the expected French emigrants, employed, at his own expense, Captain William Burnham and forty men, to perform the work. General Putnam expended two thousand dollars, which was a total loss. The Scioto company had been premature in selling lands and inducing emigration before they had completed their purchase of Congress. The company failed, and Duer became a bankrupt. The poor duped Frenchmen arrived in this country in the summer, and on the sixteenth of October were at Marietta on their way to the village which Putnam's men had built for them. They came to Marietta in six Kentucky flatboats, and numbered four hundred souls. The odd dress, wooden shoes, and strange tongue of the emigrants made them the subject of much curious observation, and awakened a general interest among the settlers. There was no little pity for these unfortunate foreigners among those at Marietta who knew the probabilities in regard to their losing the lands which they expected to settle upon, and the almost peniless condition of the majority made their situation doubly deplorable. All that was possible was done to make their condition bearable, and a few of the French who remained permanently at Marietta were cared for until able to provide for their own wants. The greater proportion of the four hundred tarried briefly and went on to Gallipolis, and, owing to the troubles which soon after beset the Ohio company settlers, the woes of the French were less thought of than would otherwise have been the case. The Ohio company was obliged to exert every power to provide for its own emigrants. The total number of men in the company's territory was now upwards of three thousand. The total number arrived was about five hundred, but fully two-fifths had come as adventurers, or if emigrating with the intention of making a permanent settlement, had either returned to New England, or sought homes in Pennsylvania, Virginia, or Kentucky. During the first year the number of males who came to the colony was one hundred and thirty-three; during 1789 the number was one hundred and fifty-two, and during 1790, one hundred and sixty-five. Nearly one hundred families had come to the settlement during the three years.

In conclusion we present General Putnam's list* of the * Among the papers of General Putnam there appears a list of the settlers in the Ohio company's purchase during the years 1788, 1789 and 1790, or to the opening of the Indian war. This list, which is undoubtedly reliable, forms the only complete record of the settlement of Washington county, and has never heretofore appeared in print. It includes all who came to the county during the years above mentioned, except those men who were hired by the Ohio company, most of whom had no intention of remaining permanently in the colony. Many of those whose names are given did not continue in the Ohio company's lands, but either removed to other settlements in Ohio, Virginia or Kentucky or returned to New England. Those who remained through the Indian war (or fell victims to it) are indicated by a star. The French settlers, and those who removed to Gallipolis (quite a large class) are designated by General Putnam, and as we have thought that part of the record might be of interest to many readers, it is copied with the original indications or notes opposite the names. The whole is a literal transcript of the original document by the painstaking and careful superintendent of the colony.

arrivals in the Ohio company's purchase during the first three years of settlement.

A LIST OF THE EMIGRANTS OF 1788, 1789 AND 1790.

SEVENTEEN HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-EIGHT.

[The list does not include the members of the pioneer party who arrived April 7th.]

|                                      |                                 |
|--------------------------------------|---------------------------------|
| Bryant, Bazaleel,                    | Backus, James,                  |
| Battelle, Ebenezer, family,          | Brayman, James,                 |
| Cushing, Nathaniel, family,          | Converse, Benjamin, family,     |
| Converse, James,                     | Crary, Archibald,               |
| Crary, Frederick,                    | Cheever, Joshua,                |
| Cheever, Lot,                        | Chouchip, Jeffrey,              |
| Coburn, Asa, family,                 | Coburn, jr., Asa, family,       |
| Coburn, Nicholas,                    | Dana, William, family (1789),   |
| Dana, Luther,                        | Dana, Edmund,                   |
| Denney, Samuel,                      | Dicks, Nathan,                  |
| Dunham, Daniel, family (1789),       | Delano, Cornelius,              |
| Dorrenie, Samuel,                    | Elliott, Richard,               |
| Eldridge, Sylvanus,                  | Fearing, Paul,                  |
| Fuller, Oliver,                      | Greene, Griffin, family,        |
| Greene, Richard,                     | Greene, Philip,                 |
| Greene, Charles, family,             | Gilbert, Jonathan,              |
| Goodale, Mayor Nathan, family,       | Goodale, Timothy,               |
| Gridley, William, family (1789),     | Hurlburt, Benoni, family,       |
| Hart, Selah,                         | Hutchinson, Thomas,             |
| Holland, ———,                        | Ingersoll, George,              |
| Kimble, Ephraim,                     | Knowles, Charles,               |
| Knight, Theophilus,                  | Kerr, Hamilton,                 |
| Lasa, John,                          | Lunt, Ezra,                     |
| Lunt, William P.,                    | Leach, James,                   |
| Lord, Thomas,                        | Laughton, Dick (half Indian),   |
| Minot, James,                        | Miller, John (half Indian),     |
| Mitchell, John,                      | Mitchell, Samuel,               |
| Matthewson, Jeffrey,                 | Mathews, Abel,                  |
| McGuffey, Neil,                      | Moody, Nathaniel, family,       |
| Owen, James, family,                 | Nye, Ichabod, family,           |
| Pierce, Stephen, family (1789),      | Parsons, Samuel H.,             |
| Oliver Robert, family,               | Pierce, Israel, family,         |
| Oliver, Launcelot,                   | Oliver, Alexander, family,      |
| Putnam, Israel,                      | Oliver, William,                |
| Rice, Oliver,                        | Putnam, Waldo A.,               |
| Stratton, John,                      | Sargent, Winthrop,              |
| Skinner, John,                       | Stratton, Samuel,               |
| Stanley, Elias,                      | Stone, Jonathan, family (1789), |
| Stacey, Col. William, family (1789), | Stebbins, Samuel,               |
| Tupper, General Benjamin, family,    | Shipman, Joshua, family (1789), |
| Tyler, Dean,                         | True, Jabez,                    |
| Tupper, Edward W.,                   | Tupper, Judah (died in war),    |
| Varnum, James (died Jan. 1789),      | Tupper, jr., Benjamin,          |
| Woodward, Levi,                      | Wright, Simeon,                 |
| Whittemore, Ebenezer,                | Webster, Andrew, family,        |

[In all eighty-five men, making with the first party forty-eight, a total of one hundred and thirty-three arrivals of males during the year.]

SEVENTEEN HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-NINE.

|                               |                                  |
|-------------------------------|----------------------------------|
| Ayres, Ebenezer, family,      | Brown, David, family,            |
| Babcock, Abijah,              | Baker, Thaddeus,                 |
| Bull, Howell,                 | Breck, William,                  |
| Buell, Joseph, family (1790), | Bradford, Robert, family,        |
| Bullard, Asa,                 | Baldwin, Abel,                   |
| Bull, Aaron,                  | Bent, Silas, family,             |
| Bent, Silas, jr.,             | Beadle, Benjamin,                |
| Barker, Joseph, family,       | Baldwin, Davis, (Gallipolis)     |
| Barker, Isaac, family,        | Blake, David, family,            |
| Blake, Simeon,                | Burnham, William,                |
| Baldwin, David,               | Baker, Benjamin,                 |
| Bullard, Eleazer,             | Bagley, Henry                    |
| Cummins, Joseph,              | Cald, Arnold,                    |
| Casey, Wanton,                | Cady, Squire,                    |
| Cushing, Elijah,              | Cogswell, Daniel, family,        |
| Clark, Arnold,                | Clough, Aaron,                   |
| Cory, Thomas,                 | Clark, Joseph,                   |
| Dodge, John, family,          | Devol, Gilbert, esquire, family, |

|                                      |                                   |                                   |                                    |
|--------------------------------------|-----------------------------------|-----------------------------------|------------------------------------|
| Devol, Wanton, family,               | Devol, Gideon,                    | Brown, Aaron (Gallipolis),        | Brow, Nathaniel, "                 |
| Devol, Jonathan,                     | Drown, Solomon,                   | Batchelder, Gideon (Gallipolis),  | Butler David, "                    |
| Davis, William,                      | Dodge, John T.,                   | Bebee, Frederick, "               | Beau, Daniel, "                    |
| Davis, Samuel,                       | Flagg, Gersham, family,           | Call, David,                      | Carson, David,                     |
| Foster, Paul,                        | Farley, Thomas,                   | Cushman, Nathaniel,               | Chople, Antoine (French),          |
| Fairchild, Major,                    | Fearing, Noah,                    | Comas Lansnett (French),          | Choate, Francis,                   |
| Greene, John,                        | Greene, Abraham,                  | Choate, Isaac,                    | Choate Joshua,                     |
| Gibson, Thomas,                      | Gilman, Joseph, family,           | Chopman, Joseph                   | Carroll Michael (Gallipolis),      |
| Gilman, Benjamin, family (1790),     | Griffin, Caleb,                   | Caldwell, James,                  | Camp, John (killed at Big Bottom), |
| Hamilton, Nathaniel,                 | Haskell, Jonathan,                | Comas, John,                      | Calter (French),                   |
| Kelley, James, family (killed 1791), | Knight, Theophilus,               | Callin, French,                   | Chevelett (French),                |
| Kinney, Nathan,                      | King, Zebulon (killed 1789),      | Christophe, French,               | Crage, William (French),           |
| Leaveus, Joseph, family,             | Lathbe, John,                     | Dudley, Asa,                      | Davenport, Gould,                  |
| Lucas, Isaac,                        | Leaveus, John,                    | Dorsey, James,                    | Day, John,                         |
| Lord, Elisha,                        | May, John,                        | Drown, John,                      | David (French),                    |
| McClure, Andrew,                     | Mitchell, Robert,                 | Dennit (French),                  | Delatre (French),                  |
| Mixer, Isaac,                        | Mills, William,                   | Devol, Christopher,               | Dodge, Abraham (Gallipolis),       |
| Miller, Edward,                      | Meigs, R. J., jr., family (1791), | Demsey, Isaac (Gallipolis),       | Dunlay, William, "                 |
| Munsell, Levi, family,               | Miles, Benjamin, family,          | Ford, William, family,            | Ford, William, jr.,                |
| Mayo, Daniel,                        | Mervin, Picket                    | Frothingham, Peter,               | Frye, Joseph,                      |
| Mitchell, John,                      | Mills, Charles,                   | Fustlay (French),                 | Fulham, John,                      |
| Miles, John,                         | Morse, Moses,                     | Farewell, Jonathan,               | Fleming, Aride (Gallipolis),       |
| Newton, Sylvanus, family,            | Newell, Samuel, family,           | Fleming, Andrew (Gallipolis),     | Gilbraith, Thomas (Gallipolis),    |
| Newell, William,                     | Oaks, Joel,                       | Goldsmith, Zaccheus (Gallipolis), | Griffin, Asabel,                   |
| Patten, James,                       | Putnam, Ezra, jr.,                | Guthrie, Stephen,                 | Guthrie, Elias,                    |
| Putnam, David,                       | Pierce, Phineas,                  | Guthrie, Truman,                  | Guthrie, Joseph, family,           |
| Parson, Enoch,                       | Porter, Ebenezer, family,         | Greene, Casey,                    | Goodenough, Daniel,                |
| Porter, Thomas, family,              | Prime, Joseph, family,            | Henderson, Edward,                | Hart, William,                     |
| Parker, William, family,             | Plummer, Jonathan,                | Hackney, Joseph,                  | Harris, Edward, family,            |
| Phillips, Ezra,                      | Russell, John,                    | Hawkins, Christopher,             | Hinckley, Nathaniel,               |
| Rouse, Michael,                      | Rouse, John, family,              | Harris, John,                     | Hammon, Zoath, family,             |
| Rowel, Daniel,                       | Smith, James, family,             | Harte, John (Gallipolis),         | James, John, family,               |
| Sprague, Joshua, family,             | Story, Daniel,                    | James, John, jr.,                 | James, William,                    |
| Strong, Joseph,                      | Shepherd, Enoch, family,          | Jennings, Joshua,                 | Isham, Russell,                    |
| Shepherd, Enoch, jr.,                | Shiner, William,                  | Jordan & Son (French),            | Jowrdom (French),                  |
| Story, William,                      | Slocumb, Benjamin, family,        | Lewis, Samuel (Gallipolis),       | Loring, Daniel family,             |
| Stacey, William, jr.,                | Stacey, Joseph, family,           | Loring, Israel,                   | Lake, Thomas, family,              |
| Stacey, John,                        | Stacey, Philip,                   | Lake, Archibald, family,          | Lake, Andrew,                      |
| Smith, John,                         | Story, Andrew, family,            | Lake, William, family,            | Little, Nathaniel, family,         |
| Sawyer, Nathaniel, family,           | Sprague, William, family,         | Little, Nathaniel, jr., family,   | Lygnum, Joseph,                    |
| Stone, Israel, family (1790),        | Sprague, Jonathan,                | Lynot, William,                   | Luxumburgh (French),               |
| Stanley, Thomas, family,             | Springer, Peleg,                  | Lalorcey (French),                | Leggett, Alexander,                |
| Smith, Jonathan,                     | Stacey, Rufus,                    | Lloyd, David,                     | Labelle, Francis (French),         |
| Smith, Stephen,                      | Shaw, Thomas, family (1790),      | Label (French),                   | Maynard, Daniel (Gallipolis),      |
| Platt, Smith,                        | Thompson, Joseph,                 | Moor, John (Gallipolis),          | McElwee, John,                     |
| Tias, Eliphalet,                     | Tilas, Alexander,                 | McIntosh, Nathan,                 | Merrill, Simeon,                   |
| ——, Daniel,                          | Tuttle, Joel, family,             | Miller, Joseph,                   | McLeland, Samuel,                  |
| Tuttle, Linus,                       | White, John,                      | Mark (French),                    | Meacham (French),                  |
| Woodbury, Nathan,                    | Woodbridge, Dudley, family,       | Meron (French),                   | Lewis (French),                    |
| Webster, Luke,                       | Walker, James,                    | Athone (French),                  | Nealy, Thomas,                     |
| Whiting, Elisha,                     | Warren, Elijah,                   | Nye, Ebenezer, family,            | Nisewonger, John, family,          |
| Winsor, Christopher, family,         | Wells, David, family,             | Mills, Benjamin,                  | McNemarre, John,                   |
| Wilson, George, family,              | Wilson, William, family,          | Olney, Cogswell, family,          | O'Brien, Ichabod,                  |
| Wilson, Jeremiah, family,            | Whipple, Abraham, family,         | McCulloch, William,               | Ovrey (French),                    |
| Whipple, John H.,                    | Wells, Thomas,                    | Putnam, Ezra, family,             | Porter, Samuel,                    |
| Dunham, jr., Daniel,                 | Maxon, Richard, family,           | Patterson, Benjamin, family,      | Potts, James,                      |
| Patterson, James, family,            | Patterson, Nathaniel,             | Potts, Robert,                    | Potter, Rouse,                     |
| Story, Joseph,                       | Smith, Benjamin,                  | Petal, Joseph (French),           | Pamey, Jean (French),              |
| Delano, Cornelius.                   |                                   | Piana (French),                   | Pierre, Jean (French),             |

[The total number of men who arrived during 1789 was one hundred and fifty-two, and the number of families fifty one.]

SEVENTEEN HUNDRED AND NINETY.

|                                  |                                 |                                 |
|----------------------------------|---------------------------------|---------------------------------|
| Bliss, Amos, family,             | Allen, Justus,                  | Brown, David, jr. (Gallipolis), |
| Allison, Robert, family,         | Andre (French),                 |                                 |
| Arvin (French),                  | Applegate, Joseph,              |                                 |
| Anthony (French),                | Andrews, John (Gallipolis),     |                                 |
| Backus, Elijah,                  | Baker Timothy,                  |                                 |
| Bethel, Edward,                  | Bailey, Caleb,                  |                                 |
| Buck, John,                      | Baldwin, Jonathan (Gallipolis), |                                 |
| Blackburn, Andrew,               | Bureau, Peter (French),         |                                 |
| Begnear (French),                | Badwell, Elijah (Gallipolis)    |                                 |
| Barber, Ezekiel, family,         | Bent, Rufus,                    |                                 |
| Browning, William,               | Barnes, Samuel,                 |                                 |
| Burlingame, Christopher, family, | Bridge, William,                |                                 |
| Bridge, Samuel,                  |                                 |                                 |

|                                 |                                     |
|---------------------------------|-------------------------------------|
| Thierry, —, family (French),    | Tantroff, Antoine (French),         |
| Tryon, —, family, (French),     | Vanmetre, William,                  |
| Votier, —,                      | Venard, Pierre (French)             |
| Utter, Joseph, family,          | Vellermine, —,                      |
| Utter, Samuel,                  | Utter, Reuben,                      |
| Waterman, John,                 | Waterman, Sherman (killed in 1794), |
| Worth, John,                    | Weight, Jonathan,                   |
| Waldow, Zachariah,              | Wiser, Jacob,                       |
| Wood, Joseph,                   | Worth, George,                      |
| Waugh, Joseph,                  | Wasson, William, (Gallipolis),      |
| Kerr, Matthew (killed in 1791), | Troop, Zebulon (killed at Big Bot-  |
| Warth, Robert (killed in 1791), | tom),                               |

[The total number of arrivals (men) in 1790, was two hundred; inclusive of French one hundred and sixty-five—number of families thirty-one. Of the whole number of French people, thirty-five men and two families remained some time at Marietta.]

CHAPTER IX.

THE INDIAN WAR.

Causes of Indian Hostility—The Indians' Hatred of the "Long Knives"—Old Injuries—Dissatisfaction with Treaties—Intrigues of the British—Gouverneur St. Clair Prepares for a Treaty Hoping to Produce an Amicable Feeling—Murder of Soldiers at Duncan's Falls on the Muskingum—Petty and Annoying Indications of the Indians' Hostility—Game Killed or Driven from the Country—The Friendship of Gyantwahia the Cornplanter—Two Hundred Warriors Arrive at Fort Harmar in December, 1788—Treaty Concluded in January, 1789—Heckewelder Acts as Interpreter—The Marietta Settlers Joyous Over the Prospect of Peace—Indian Chiefs Invited to Dine at Campus Martius—Rude Awakening from the Dream of Peace—Hostilities Commenced in the Spring of 1789—Captain Zebulon King Killed at Belpre—Apprehensions of the Settlers—Two Boys Killed on the Little Kanawha—John Mathews and His Party of Surveyors Attacked—Several Men Killed—A Block-house Built by Mathews and Meigs—Another Built at Waterford—Capture and Escape of John Gardner—Ominous Indications—Fear of a General War—Expedition of General Harmar in the Fall of 1790—Governor St. Clair's Letter to the British Commandant at Detroit—Perilous Journey of Return J. Meigs, jr.—Campus Martius Strengthened—The Settlement at Big Bottom Described—Fancied Security of the Settlers—Lack of Precaution—The Massacre of January 2, 1791—Twelve Persons Killed and Five Taken Prisoners—Effect of the Horrible News at Wolf Creek Mills and Waterford—Hurried Preparations for Defence—A Night of Suspense—Seventy Persons in One Log Cabin at Waterford—Scene of the Massacre Visited by Parties of Men Under Captain Rodgers and Anselem Tupper—Burial of the Victims—Present Aspect of Big Bottom—Alarm at Marietta Caused by the Massacre—Hasty Adjournment of the Court of Quarter Sessions—The News at Belpre—Meeting of the Ohio Company—Prompt and Spirited Action—A Stirring Appeal for Assistance—General Putnam's Letter to the Secretary of War—Defences Built at the Point—"Farmer's Castle" built at Belpre and Fort Frye at Waterford.

NOTWITHSTANDING the fact that Campus Martius had been built and some other measures taken, such as common prudence would suggest, the New Englanders, in their western home, had no very serious apprehensions of a state of general Indian hostility. As has been shown they were welcomed to the banks of the Muskingum by a large party of Delawares, under Captain Pipe, who made many protestations of friendship; their settlement was made under the conditions of an ordinance which exhibited a great and humane consideration of the Indians' right; the General Government had entered upon a policy which promised an amicable, advantageous and speedy arrangement of Indian affairs in the west, and the settlers themselves, with no past record of antagonism toward the red man of the forest, sought, by fair and honorable treatment, to merit and retain his good-will. They certainly were regarded much more favorably by the Indians than were the pioneers upon the other side of the Ohio. The frontiersmen of western Pennsylvania and Virginia, and the Kentucky borderers, had been engaged for a long term of years in a warfare that was both defensive and offensive against the north-western tribes, and looked upon the Indian as a creature without any rights they were bound to respect; as something little better, if any, than a wild beast, and equally with the latter a pest to be exterminated, if possible, by rifle and tomahawk, and every savage means known to the frontier.

The Indians at once hated and feared the "Long Knives," as they had named the Virginians, and they doubtless formed their idea of the whole white race upon their knowledge of this class, which they had known the longest and most unfavorably. During the seven years previous to the war, which began on Ohio soil in 1791, it was estimated, says Colonel and Judge Barker,* that on the frontiers south and west of the Ohio river, the Indians killed and took prisoners fifteen hundred people, stole two thousand horses and other property to the value of fifty thousand dollars.

Let it be borne in mind by those who would seek for cause, and endeavor to locate right and wrong, that these denizens of the western world, savages as they were, had only to look a few years backward to be reminded of the perpetration of the most perfidious outrages against their race, by the whites. Savages as they were, they had never struck at the civilized people such cruel and treacherous blows as those by which the kindred of Logan fell at Yellow Creek, or those by which were massacred the peaceful Moravian Delawares, upon the Tuscarawas. No atrocities of the Indians equalled in enormity those of the whites. We only allude to these occurrences to suggest the feeling which doubtless lurked in the breasts of the western Indians when the first settlements were made northwest of the Ohio. There were other causes, more immediate and more potent, which combined, ultimately wrought the nations of the northwest into the heat of that hostility which terrorized the whites from 1790 to 1795. Many of the tribes had only imperfectly comprehended the treaties of Fort McIntosh, Fort Stanwix, and Fort Finney; some were illy satisfied with the provisions which they did understand, and reluctantly assented to, while others refused to attend the treaties, or were improperly represented in them, i. e., by their young men, who were unauthorized to act in council. Those who had entered into the compacts and ceded right in the soil, in good faith, regretted their assent when they saw the white man actually enter their old-time domain, and cabins arise in the clearings; for the great natural boundary once crossed, the Indians seem to have realized that the tide could not be long stayed, even at treaty boundaries, and were jealous of future encroachments. Their disquietude was augmented by the intrigues of the British, who still held their posts in the northwest, traded with the Indians, wishing to retain them as allies, and to prevent the settlement of this region by the Americans, desired them to hold possession of it. The temper of the Indians was influenced by the white men among them to the highest pitch, and eventually, by the artifices of British agents, the services of Brant, the famous half-breed, were secured, and he effected the powerful confederation by which St. Clair was defeated.

*Colonel Barker's Reminiscences.

Having given the reader a general view of the causes which conspired to bring on the war, we shall revert to some occurrences of which it is our province to treat specifically. The war did not commence in the Ohio company's purchase until January, 1791, but for the sake of unity, and to give an adequate idea of the situation, we shall in this chapter give an account of a number of events which occurred in 1788 and 1789.

It was the policy of the General Government to allay, as far as possible by peace processes, the dissatisfaction among the Indians, and Governor St. Clair had been especially charged with this delicate and difficult duty. In anticipation of his arrival in the territory preparations were made for holding a treaty, which it was intended should be confirmatory of the previous treaties, and should also embody some additional pacificatory measures. In June, 1788, the locality soon after named Duncan's Falls, upon the Muskingum, about sixty miles from its mouth, was designated as a place of meeting, and in the latter part of the month Lieutenant McDowell, with a party of thirty men from Fort Harmar, was sent out to convey to this spot provisions and presents, and to build there a council-house and huts for the shelter of those who might attend the contemplated treaty. The locality had been agreed upon rather than Fort Harmar, as really a concession to the Indians, being one of their favorite gathering places, and near a region in which they had one of their most considerable populations. The men from the fort encamped and proceeded with the work they had been instructed to perform, and in the meantime the Indians assembled in large numbers, among them being Delawares, Wyandots, members of the Six Nations, Ottawas, Chippewas, and others. On the night of July 12th an attack was made on the tent in which the goods were stored. The sentries were suddenly fired upon and a movement quickly made to follow up the surprise, but the Indian volley being promptly returned by the sentries, and the remainder of the guard being roused from their slumber, coming to the rescue, the party was repulsed before they could effect their purpose, which was doubtless to obtain plunder. The attacking party lost one member and had one wounded by the volley from the soldiers' muskets. In the morning it was found that the dead Indian was a Chippewa, and the Delawares coming into the camp and disclaiming any connection with the attack, to show their friendliness, brought to Lieutenant McDowell six of the Chippewas, whom they avered were of the assailing party. These Indians, whom the Delawares instructed the commandant to do with as he saw fit in retaliation for the hostility of the night before, were taken to Fort Harmar and there held as prisoners until they made their escape.* All thought of making a treaty at this time and place was now given up, and the labor that had been expended in making preparations was a loss. The goods were sent back to Fort Harmar in the large boat belonging to the Ohio company, which, with another, had been sent up the Muskingum immediately after the arrival at Marietta by rumor of the Indians' perfidy. The boats made the trip to Duncan's Falls and back in seven days. Duncan's Falls† was so named from Major Duncan, a trader who was waiting for the assembling of the Indians to barter for their furs and skins. A mulatto servant who was with him was killed by the Indians the same night they attacked the soldiers.

During the summer and fall of 1788 the Indians remained in the vicinity of the infant settlement and evinced in many ways their hostility toward the whites. Their hatred seemed to constantly increase during this period, and some individuals and tribes who had formerly been considered friendly showed signs of disaffection. Some, however, maintained a respectful attitude throughout the season, and a few exhibited unmistakable sincerity and much warmth of regard for the pioneers. At council held by the several tribes, congregated at Duncan's Falls, the Chippewas and Ottawas announced themselves as against making any treaty, and in favor of war which should only be suspended when the white settlers were driven south and east of the Ohio. The Delawares, Wyandots, and Indians of the Six Nations would not join with them in this expression of enmity, and after a delay of some weeks the Chippewas and Ottawas affected to be reconciled, and asserted that they had no evil intentions. They were too weak of themselves to make war upon the whites, and being unable to draw the more powerful tribes, such as the Delawares and Wyandots, into an offensive alliance, they put on an appearance of friendliness and confined their animosities to the destruction of game in the vicinity of the settlements, and an occasional covert attack upon isolated and unprotected individuals. The Delawares were represented among the hostile bands who roamed the country by a few renegades who had deserted the tribe. The great body of this nation, however, maintained, until the war had commenced in earnest, an honorable peace. Captain Pipe, their leading chief, who, it will be remembered, welcomed the pioneers to the shores of the Muskingum April 7th, dined on several occasions with General Putnam and with the officers at Fort Harmar. He expressed warm friendship, but deprecated the building of houses in Marietta and raising of crops until the treaty had been made.

*July 28th.—(1788)—At five o'clock A. M., as I was cleaning my rifle . . . I heard a confused noise at the garrison of men and dogs, and two guns went off. This drew my attention more particularly. Presently I saw two Indians come tumbling over a fence into a field of corn. It proved to be two of the Indian prisoners who had made good their escape. The sentinels who lost them were tried by court-martial, and whipped one hundred lashes in the evening.—Colonel May's journal.

†Duncan's Falls, of the Muskingum, were where the town of Taylorsville, Muskingum county now is, but were obliterated by the slack-water improvement of the river.

The whites had constant knowledge of the presence of evil disposed savages in the country, as well as of those who were friendly. The woods about Marietta were full of carrion, and it was evident that some of the hostile parties were killing all of the game they could under the impression that the food supply of the settlers might be thus cut off. Stripping the slain animals of their skins, they left the carcasses to rot or be devoured by bears and wolves. Alarming rumors of impending danger from attack were occasionally received by the settlers.* The season passed, however, without the occurrence of any actual hostilities.

Impatience was felt on the part of the Ohio company's settlers and the officers at Fort Harmar to effect a treaty as soon as was possible.

Gyantwahia the Cornplanter, a leading chief of the Six Nations (Seneca tribe, the same to which Logan belonged) with about forty Indians arrived at Fort Harmar in September, escorted by a company of soldiers from Fort Pitt, under command of Captain Zeigler. He was a civilized savage, friendly to the United States, and he used his best endeavors to enhance the interests at once of the whites and his own race, by preserving peace. The Ohio company were not unmindful of his great influence or unthankful for his exercise of that influence.†

In November a son of the famous Brant came with two hundred warriors to Duncan's Falls and sent an express to Governor St. Clair, asking that the treaty should be held at that place. The governor's refusal to meet in treaty at the spot where but a few months before the Indians had treacherously assailed the guard, incensed Brant, and it was suspected that he used his influence to deter the Shawnees and some other Indians from attending the treaty, when it was finally held at Fort Harmar.

Two hundred warriors arrived at Fort Harmar on the thirteenth of December. They came from the northward along the west shore of the Muskingum, quite a number of them mounted, but the greater proportion of them walking. The flag of the United States was borne aloft at the head of the column, and as they drew near the fort they fired three rifles in the air to indicate that they were friendly and had no use for loaded guns. "The salute," says Hildreth, "was returned by the cannon and musketry of the soldiers, for several minutes, sounding so much like a real engagement of hostile bands that the old officers at Campus Martius were quite animated with the sound." Troops, with music playing, escorted the visitors into the fort, and then began the formal preliminaries which led to the formation of the treaty, a slow work, which was not consummated until January 9, 1789. The negotiations were carried on in the council house, which stood near the bank of the Muskingum, a short distance north of the garrison. A council fire was kindled here, and around it gathered the Indian sachems and chiefs in their conference with Governor St. Clair, his staff of civilians and the officers from Fort Harmar. The venerable John Heckewelder, Moravian missionary, who had been for many years among the Delawares on the Tuscarawas, was present and exerted a benign influence during the progress of the treaty. General Richard Butler served as a commissioner at this treaty. Three interpreters, Nicholson, Williams and La Chappelle, acted as the principal agents between the Indians and whites when their services were needed, which was not continually, as some of the chiefs could speak the English tongue quite fluently. Governor St. Clair was subject to the gout, and during the treaty suffered from an acute attack. He was carried on a chair daily by the soldiers to the council house.

In reality two treaties were made on this occasion, each of which, so far as appearances indicated, was highly satisfactory to all parties concerned. The first treaty was with the Indians of the Six Nations, and was signed by twenty-four of their chiefs. It was merely confirmatory of the previous treaties, but for the renewal of their assent to the provisions which had been stipulated the Six Nations were given presents, in goods, to the value of three thousand dollars. Simultaneously with the progress of this treaty a council was carried on from day to day with the Wyandots, Delawares, Ottawas, Chippewas, Pottowtoamies and Sacs, which confirmed and extended the treaty of Fort McIntosh. In addition to the provisions of former treaties in regard to councils, some of the measures of the treaty of Fort Harmar were as follows: The Indians were to be allowed to hunt within the territory ceded to the United States so long as they should demean themselves peaceably. Trade was to be opened with the several nations. They were enjoined to afford protection to all regularly licensed traders in their midst, and the treaty stipulated that to the end that they might not be imposed upon in their traffic, no person should be allowed to reside at the towns or hunting camps who was

*Colonel May's journal under date of Monday, July 25, contained mention of one such rumor:

"Henry Williams alarmed us a little this evening when he returned from the Virginia shore; he brought information that our settlement was to be attacked this night by three strong parties of Chippewa Indians—so said the report—to relieve the prisoners. We have sent this information over to the garrison. It proved false, however; but it made some trouble for us. We may always expect trouble while travelling through this life, which is nothing more than a wilderness world. We ought to make the best use we can of these matters, small and great. At Boston we have frequent alarms of fire and inundations of the tides; here the Indians answer the same purpose."

†The agents of the Ohio company at a meeting held in January, 1789, passed the following:

"WHEREAS, the Gyantwahia, or the Cornplanter, a chief of the Seneca nation, has since the treaty of peace in 1784, between the United States and Indian nations, in many instances been of great service to the United States, and the friendship he has manifested to the proprietors of lands purchased by the Ohio company has been of particular service to them, therefore

Resolved, That one mile square of the donation lands be granted to the Gyantwahia and his heirs forever, in such place as the committee appointed to examine proper places of settlement shall assign, and that the duties and conditions required of other settlers shall in this case be dispensed with, and the committee are directed to give him a deed.—Ohio company's journal, page 54.

Subsequently the directors passed a resolution referring to the above, and authorizing the exploring committee to lay out a mile square of land on the river Muskingum.

Cornplanter died at Cornplanterstown, Pennsylvania, February 18, 1836, aged about one hundred years. A monument was erected to his memory by authority of the legislature of Pennsylvania, expressed by act of March, 1866, and upon the occasion of its completion and unveiling Hon. James Snowden, of Philadelphia, delivered an address.

not provided with a license bearing the seal of the governor of the territory northwest of the Ohio. Should any nation of Indians meditate a war against the United States, and knowledge of the same come to any of the tribes party to the treaty, they were to give immediate notice to the governor, and they were to attempt to prevent any hostile nation from marching through their country against the United States, or any one of them. In like manner the United States was to give notice to the Indian nations of any harm that might be meditated against them. Settlement by white men upon the lands of the Indians was forbidden, and stipulations were made that each party to the treaty should give up murderers.* A memorandum was annexed, to the effect that the Wyandots had laid claim to the lands that had been granted to the Shawnees at the treaty held at Fort Finney, and had declared that as the Shawnees had been so restless and made so much trouble, they now dispossess them unless they should now assent to peace. The treaties were concluded upon the ninth of January and ratified upon the twelfth.

So overjoyed were the Marietta settlers with the result of Governor St. Clair's conference with the Indians, that they provided a dinner at Campus Martius, to which the principal chiefs were invited,† and also the officers from Fort Harmar. The feast passed off pleasantly and harmoniously, the Indian chiefs behaving with "very great decorum." Wine was served, and Cornplanter and other chiefs made speeches breathing the spirit of warmest friendship. On the day following the Indians dispersed. Then the year 1789 opened auspiciously for the frontier settlements.

The people at Marietta felt a deep sense of gratitude toward Governor St. Clair for the peace he had secured, and at a public meeting held on the fourth of February, they appointed Colonel Archibald Crary, Colonel Robert Oliver, Mr. Backus, Major Haffield White and Major Sargent, to draw up an address which should express to him their appreciation of his services. They fulfilled the task, and subsequently the following was forwarded to him as voicing the sentiments of the people—and, by the way, a testimonial which must have given the old Federalist governor some pleasant thoughts to relieve the pain caused by the bitter aspersions generally made when his great reverse of fortune came upon him:

To His Excellency, Arthur St. Clair, esq., Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the River Ohio:

We, the citizens of Marietta, assembled at Campus Martius, beg leave to address your excellency with the most cordial congratulations upon the happy issue of Indian affairs. For this event, so interesting to the United States at large, and to this settlement in particular, we hold ourselves indebted, under God, to your excellency's wisdom and unremitting exertions displayed during the long and tedious negotiation of the treaty. It was with pain and very affectionate sympathy that we beheld this business spun out by the Indian nations through so many tedious months and to a season of the year, which from its inclemency must have endangered and perhaps impaired the health and constitution of a character under whose auspices and wise administration of government we hope to be a good and happy people,

But the inhabitants were not long to rest in the lull of peace which they had secured and fondly fancied they should permanently enjoy. Some of the Indian tribes were not represented in the treaty at all. Some, as the Shawnees, by but few of their braves and others, as they afterward claimed, not by their chiefs, but by young men who were unauthorized to act.* The Chippewas asserted that they had had no share of the goods distributed at the treaty.† [Tahre, the Crane of the Wyandots, and Captain Pipe of the Delawares, were among the well known chiefs who acknowledged the treaty of Fort Harmar to be binding.] The truth seems to have been that many of the tribes not present at the treaty resented the right of those who were there to barter away their lands, basing their opinion upon the agreement which they averred had been made in their general council in 1788, that no bargain or sale would be considered valid unless generally assented to.

Hostilities were commenced in the spring following the making of the treaty, the Indians passing by the Ohio company's settlements to strike their old enemies, the "Long Knives." Over twenty Virginians were killed or taken prisoners. The Wabash Indians and the Shawnees harassed travellers going up or down the Ohio. Depredations were committed all along the border from Pittsburgh to Louisville.

Upon the first of May, 1789, the first blow was struck within the limits of the Ohio company's purchase. Captain Zebulon King was killed at Belpre. He had located at the middle settlement with the Belpre company of associates a short time before, had been allotted his land and was engaged in clearing it when he was shot down * American State Papers—Indian Affairs, vol. V.

† The following letter of invitation to the Indians was published in the Massachusetts Spy soon after the occurrence narrated, and reproduced in Hildreth's Pioneer History:

"To Messrs. Nicholson, Williams, and LaChappelle, Indian interpreters at Fort Harmar:

"You are requested to inform the Wyandots, Delawares, Chippewas, Ottawas, Miamis, Pottawatomies, and Sacs, with the Senecas and such of the Five Nations as are present, that we are desirous of celebrating the good work which the Great Spirit has permitted our father, the governor, with our brother, General Butler, and their sachems and chiefs so happily to accomplish; for which purpose we will prepare an entertainment on Monday next, at two o'clock, and our brothers, the sachems and chiefs, to whom we now send tokens, are requested to attend at that time; that we may in friendship and as true brothers, eat and drink together, and smoke the pipe of everlasting peace; and evince to the whole world how bright and strong is the chain which the thirteen United States hold fast at one end, and the Wyandots, etc., at the other. We are very sorry we cannot entertain all of our brethren together, with their wives and children; but as we have come into this country a very long way, some of us forty or fifty days' journey toward the rising sun, and could not bring much provision along with us, it is now out of our power. We trust the Great Spirit will permit us to plant and gather our corn, and increase our stores, and their children and children's children may be told how much we shall all rejoice to make glad their hearts when they come to see us."

* Le Gris, the great chief of the Miamis, in April, 1790, said to Gambelin that the Muskingum treaty was not made by chiefs or delegates, but by young men acting without authority.—Albach's Annals of the West, p. 525.

† Massass, a Chippewa, and one who had signed the treaty at Fort Harmar, said at Greenville in 1795, "at that treaty (Fort Harmar) we had not good interpreters, and we were left partly unacquainted with many particulars of it. . . . If our uncles, the Wyandots, and grandfathers, the Delawares, have received presents, they have kept them to themselves.—Ibid, p. 524.

by an enemy in concealment, who, as soon as he had fallen, sprung to his side, scalped him and fled. Two Indians were engaged in the murder. The settlers at Belpre were thrown in a state of terrible consternation by this sudden taking off of one of their number.

This act had proved, conclusively, that the Indians could not be trusted, and no one knew how soon they might claim another victim, or surprise and destroy the whole of the little band.

From this time on, not alone at Belpre, but at Marietta and the other settlements, there was great distress. Indian signs were frequently found in the woods, and it was well known that they were often lurking in ambush to take advantage of those who should expose themselves. Men went forth to their work of clearing with apprehensions which made them ill at ease, and the women remaining in the cabins were filled with a nameless dread of danger to themselves and their loved ones away. The dark forest, surrounding the little clearings where the white man's axe had made it possible for the warm sun to reach the virgin soil, was a terra incognita, which imagination peopled with hords of savages plotting the destruction of the pioneers' cabins. As a matter of fact there were but few Indians in the immediate vicinity of the Ohio company's settlements, even at the time the greater outrages were perpetrated, and they were roving bands who came down from what is now the interior of the State. But the terror of the pioneers was none the less deep and intense if it was very often vague and the product of excited fancy. Any sound, however common, echoing through the forest—the cry of a bird, the snapping of a dry twig, caused man or woman to start with fright, such was the tension of their nerves, and to listen with anxious and troubled looks for any further breaking of silence that might possibly indicate the proximity, or the approach of a stealthy enemy.

In the month of August the little Belpre settlement was again horrified by the commission of an Indian atrocity. Two boys were killed at Meig's station, a small stockade on the Little Kanawha, a mile from its mouth. They had gone out Saturday, towards night, from their home, a small log cabin, to the block-house, not more than forty rods away, and their parents were alarmed at their failure to return. The next day their bodies were found in the edge of the woods, near a corn-field, where they had gone to feed the cows. They had been tomahawked; no gun had been fired, and the boys had probably made no outcry. The same night a woman, sleeping near the port-hole in the block-house, was awakened by a glare of light by her bedside and a stifling sensation caused by smoke. A fire brand had been thrust through the port-hole and was blazing upon the floor. The woman's awakening had doubtless saved the occupants from death by fire, or if they had escaped that, butchery by the Indians. A party of men went out from Belpre, under arms, and assisted in the burial of the murdered boys.

Upon the seventh of August John Mathews, the surveyor, and his party of assistants and soldiers were attacked by a strong band of Indians in what is now

Lawrence county. Several were killed in this attack, and Mathews narrowly escaped. In spite of the admonitions of his friends and a full personal knowledge of the danger to which he was exposed, Mr. Mathews had carried on the labor of surveying the ranges west of Marietta, all through the season. The Indians had an especial dislike for the surveyors, who were running lines through the forest, and had frequently exhibited their hostility toward the men who three years previously had surveyed the "seven ranges." Mr. Mathews had become accustomed to the dangers of the wilderness while assisting in the work to which allusion has been made, and hence was not seriously alarmed when he discovered evidences that the Indians were about. On the morning of the sixth he had seen the tracks of a man and a horse, and had discovered that one of his own horses was missing. At night one of his assistants, Patchen by name, reported that he had seen moccasin tracks in several places and followed them to where they joined the trail found in the morning. It was the almost universal belief among the men that the trail they had discovered was that of a party of Indians who had made a plundering expedition to some of the Virginia settlements and were now returning toward the Scioto, where doubtless their villages were situated. As a measure of proper precaution, however, the corporal of the guard was ordered to keep sentries out during the night, and just before dawn, when the darkness of night was turning to gray, (this being the favorite time among the Indians for making their attacks), the whole force was called to arms and a reconnaissance made. No signs of a foe were to be seen, and at broad day, all danger past, as it was supposed, the soldiers went into camp. They had not been long returned and were scattered about the camp, some sitting upon their blankets and some kindling fires, when they were startled by two rifle shots, occurring almost simultaneously. Mathews was sitting upon his blanket, only partly dressed, and Patchen was by his side. The latter threw up his hands and exclaimed: "My God, I am killed!" and fell backward, dead. Mathews, turning toward him, saw a wound in his breast from which the blood gushed forth. He had scarcely time to notice the fate of his companion and friend, for the first shots were quickly followed by a volley, the Indians rising from their concealment and taking aim with a deliberation which made their fire a deadly one. The soldiers had sprung to their feet at the first discharge, only to become better targets for the Indians' rifle balls, and they all fell, either mortally wounded or dead, with the exception of the corporal, between whom and the assailants there was a large tree which hid him from their view and saved his life. With a wild and horrible yell the Indians sprang forward into the camp, and as they rushed upon their dead and wounded victims with tomahawks and knives, Mathews and three other men fled in an opposite direction, followed by several of the enemy, who, however, soon gave up the chase. Mathews legs and feet were bare, and he suffered in his flight through the stiff underbrush and briers, exceedingly. His companion's coat was arranged to shield him, but his feet, still uncovered, became so blistered after he had run several miles and reached the Ohio, that he could not endure the pain; so the two men set about making a raft of logs which they fastened together with grape vines. Before they had completed this work a Kentucky boat came down the river, which they boarded and upon which they found the other two men, who had reached the river farther up stream. Four miles down the Ohio they came upon the Ohio company's boat, in charge of Colonel Return J. Meigs. Before night the corporal arrived and the survivors were reunited. He had fallen over a log in his flight, and had lain behind it and watched the Indians until they had plundered and abandoned the camp. They had scalped the killed, broken the muskets of the soldiers upon the trees and rocks, taken everything of value, including some of the dead men's clothing. The compass, with its delicately vibrating needle, they had contemplated with mingled wonder, admiration and amusement. On the same day that this bloody attack was made Colonel Meigs, lying on his boat in the river, had become alarmed at the discovery of fresh Indian signs, and dropped down stream to the point where is now situated the village of Burlington. Here his men had hastily built a block-house for defence in case of necessity. Meigs and Mathews now resorted to this little stronghold and remained there until the tenth of August, when another party of surveyors, who had been out under a Mr. Backus, arrived, and they then went up the river, resolving to give up the work of surveying for an indefinite time. Three days later, having stopped at a convenient point, a squad of well armed men accompanied Mathews to the scene of the attack. He discovered the ghastly remains of the murdered men, which had been torn and partly devoured by wolves. It was thought that the attacking party on this occasion were Shawnees, and the testimony of some friendly Wyandots and Delawares was to that effect.

Not many more incidents of Indian hostility were to be set down in the annals of 1789, and in spite of the several alarming events which occurred during the summer, the inhabitants of the several settlements carried on their usual avocations and were fairly prosperous. Some precautions were taken, but after a time individuals and communities ceased to exercise that constant care and watchfulness, which was their surest safeguard. They became accustomed to danger, and to a certain extent contemptuous of it. The settlers at Waterford (then called Plainfield), which was now the frontier post, received upon the third of May, a letter from General Putnam, which informed them of the murder of Captain King, at Belpre, upon the first. They assembled, organized a military company and made plans for the building of a block-house, which was finished early in July, under the direction of Colonel Robert Oliver. William Gray was chosen captain of the military; David Wilson, sargent; and Andrew Webster, corporal. The block-house and the military organization were happily not necessary during 1789 and 1790, but there came a time when their practical utility was beyond dispute.

The capture of John Gardner, at Waterford, in September, 1789, was a peculiar incident, illustrating the boldness and ingenuity of the Indians, and the thoughtlessness of the whites at this period. It is true that it was nominally a time of peace, and yet several evil acts had been committed by the savages within a few months, and it is difficult to see how a man who had been all of this time in the frontier country would allow himself to fall into such a trap as did Gardner. He was a young man from Marblehead, Massachusetts, had been bred a sailor, and had come to the west as did many others, in search of fortune and adventure. He had entered into a kind of a partnership with Jervis Cutler to clear up some land, and on the day he was taken prisoner was alone in the woods, Custer having gone to Marietta for the purpose of procuring provisions. Four Indians and a white man came within a few feet of him before they were perceived, and when he chanced to raise his eyes and did see them, they beckoned to him; he walked over to them and they coolly made him their prisoner. One relieved him of his gun, another threw a slip noose over his head, and two of them taking hold of his hands led him away. This was done so close to other men engaged at work that the Indians would scarcely have dared to fire their guns. As the captive was led away and the party passed along the ridge near Wolf Creek mills, then building, Gardner could catch an occasional glimpse through the hazel thicket which bordered the path of the men, his comrades and fellow pioneers, hewing timbers and placing them in position. He could easily have made himself heard by them, but had he called out a tomahawk sunk in his brain would have been the penalty. What thoughts passed through the mind of the young man can be better imagined than described. He was a captive of ten savages, marching away he knew not whither, to a fate which he dared not think upon, while down below him in the valley were friends, who, ignorant of his misfortune, were cheerily laboring at the mill. Gardner was not destined, however, to long remain a prisoner with the Shawnees (for to that tribe his captors belonged), and on the second night effected his escape, a proceeding which required much patience and nerve. He slept tightly bound with deerskin thongs, and lying across a bowed sapling, to which he was also made fast, and upon the boughs of which the Shawnee warriors had tied cow-bells, which, should the prisoner make an unusual movement, would produce a clangor sufficient to bring every Indian from slumber to his feet. A gentle rain fell that night and favored the plans of the captive, who had resolved even at the risk of his life to escape. The leathern thongs softened and made pliable by the moisture were by two or three hours of straining so stretched as to permit Gardner to slip his hands through them, and that being done he released with fearful slowness the bent sapling, fearing that on any instant some of his captors would awake, and that he would either be killed or retaken and subjected to torture. At last the tree had risen to its natural position, and not a bell had sounded however faintly. Stepping silently among the prostrate and oblivious Indians the young man secured his gun and went out into the darkness of the forest, proceeding slowly and cautiously at first least he should yet wake the sleepers at the camp, but as he got farther away from them, and the sound of the snapping of the dry twigs under his feet could not by any possibility reach their ears, running at full speed. He walked or ran all day, travelling eastward, and never stopping save to drink from the little streams that he crossed. He was without food and dared not fire his gun as he had but one load of ammunition, and knew not when he should need that for a sterner purpose than bringing down game. At night he feared to kindle a fire, least it should reveal to those who he imagined pursued him his whereabouts. He slept in a hollow log, the ends of which he filled with brush to keep away wolves. The second day of his flight, towards evening, he came to the Wolf Creek mills, and there met Jervis Cutler, who was on his way back to Waterford from Marietta, and entirely ignorant of his friend's disappearance and his four days of thrilling experience.

This is the simple story of one of those few romantic and exciting Indian adventures of which southeastern Ohio was the theatre, which, although serving to illustrate the dangers to which the inhabitants were daily exposed, still presents no element of blood-curdling horror. Well had it been for the pioneer settlements of Washington county if the chronicling of this history made no page sadder than is this.

During the spring of 1790 many reports and rumors reached Marietta of outrages perpetrated by the Shawnees at the mouth of the Scioto, but the Ohio company's settlements were left undisturbed.

By fall, however, there were ominous indications of a general war. In June Major Doughty, with one hundred and fifty men from Fort Harmar, had gone down the Ohio and commenced building Fort Washington, within the present limits of Cincinnati. A little later, General Harmar arrived there with three hundred men, and his force being increased by the addition of nearly a thousand militia men from Kentucky, Virginia, and Pennsylvania, he marched into the Indian country, and destroyed several large villages upon the Miami of the Lakes (Maumee). General Harmar's force suffered two defeats, one upon the nineteenth and the other upon the twenty-second of October, and lost a large number of men. The failure of this expedition was doubtless largely due to the inefficiency of the militia, and dissensions among the officers. General Harmar was severely condemned, and his action was investigated by a court of inquiry, with the result, however, of entirely exonerating him from blame. The Indians did not regard seriously the destruction of their towns, and seemed to magnify their victory over the army, it being currently reported among them that five hundred of the Americans had been killed. They were exasperated by the slight losses they had sustained through the invasion of their country, and emboldened by the fact that they had defeated the forces sent out against them. They made open threats now that "before the leaves should again come forth, not a single cabin fire of the whites should burn north of the Ohio." It was rumored that they were marching in large force against the settlements upon the Muskingum and the Miamis.

About the time that General Harmar set out to bring the Indians to terms, or to chastise them, the attitude of the British was fully revealed. Governor St. Clair sent a letter to the governor of Detroit, informing him of the expedition that was to be made, and that the United States had no intention of molesting any of the British posts, and also requesting that no aid be furnished the hostile Indians in the way of furnishing them arms or ammunition. The letter was delivered by Return J. Meigs, jr. (afterwards governor of Ohio), who, accompanied by John, a son of Commodore Abraham Whipple, made the perilous journey to Detroit through the great wilderness, inhabited only by savages, and trackless save for the narrow trails worn by moccasined feet. A horse which these men took with them to carry their provisions was stolen by the Indians, and they made the greater part of the journey on foot. The British governor received Meigs with very distant manner, but, after considerable delay, consented to return a formal answer, which was exceedingly noncommittal in its character. Meigs was informed that it would be extremely hazardous to return to Marietta as he had come, even with a flag of truce, and he made therefore a long journey by water to Presque Isle, from thence over to the Allegheny and down that stream to the Ohio, and thence to his home by boat. Soon after this the Americans had positive proof that agents of the British were furnishing with military stores the very tribes which were most hostile.

General Harmar returned to the fort bearing his name in November, which, according to a good authority,* had been, during a portion at least of his absence, in charge of one of the sergeants of militia, Colonel Joseph Barker. Captain Zeigler was, however, the officer in command most of the time during the Indian war.†

Before the expedition of Harmar was entered upon the Ohio company had taken some precautions intended to strengthen the settlements within the purchase against Indian attack. The disastrous outcome of the campaign caused these measures for protection to be redoubled. Campus Martius was put in a good state of repair, and by authority of the Secretary of War an additional corps of men was raised to serve as guards for the several settlements. In November Colonel Sproat, commandant of the militia, was authorized to enlist scouts or rangers, and this number was subsequently increased to ten. They were sent out daily to scout the woods for signs of the enemy.

Hostilities had been continued upon the Ohio during the summer, and Governor St. Clair, writing to the Secretary of War upon the nineteenth of September, 1790, mentioned the fact that Captain McCurdy's boat had been fired upon between Marietta and Fort Washington, and that five or six men had been killed.

No events of serious nature, however, occurred within the limits of the Ohio company's lands. Indians hovered around the settlements, and the indications of their presence were oftentimes discovered by the spies, but they committed no depredations other than stealing a few horses.

*Horace Nye in Western Recorder, 1847.

†Testimony of the Ohio company's journal; Dr. S. P. Hildreth in American Pioneer and Pioneer History; Thomas Wallcut's journal, etc.

Indeed, so peaceful had been the lives of the pioneers during the season and so promising did the future appear, that the regular occupations of the inhabitants were not only carried on, but new enterprises engaged their attention, and new institutions were brought into being in the western world. For the convenience of the members the Belpre association had divided into three settlements, which were called the "upper," "lower," and "middle" stations. A new association, alluded to in the preceding chapter, had been formed, and in the fall of 1790 had made a settlement at Big Bottom,* upon the Muskingum, which had attracted attention from its great beauty and richness. The association was composed of thirty-six members, but only eighteen went originally to the station, and one of these, the leader of the little colony, Colonel William Stacey, it appears did not remain there. Isaac Meeks, a Virginian frontiersman, was employed as hunter in the settlement, and brought with him his wife and two children. A block-house of good size was erected on the left bank of the river, and upon the lower bottom. One cabin was erected a short distance from the block-house, and was occupied by Francis and Isaac Choate, while another which had been a part of the "tomahawk improvement" made several years before by some Virginia squatter, was fitted up and occupied by Asa and Eleazer Bullard, brothers. These cabins were each about twenty rods from the defence which the associates built, the first above and the latter below. The settlement was composed principally of young men, inexperienced, and poorly qualified to occupy the frontier part which they did.

"They had neglected," says Colonel Barker,* "to enclose their house with palisades, and ceasing to complete the work the general interest was lost in that of the convenience of each individual. Another error was the neglect of any regular system of defence, and the omission of setting sentries. Those most familiar with the Indians had little doubt of their hostility, and had strongly opposed the settlers going out that fall, and advised them to remain until spring, by which time the question of war or peace would probably be decided." They were impatient, however, and had gone out, to invite by their exposed situation an Indian attack. And so it came about that the war began in earnest in the Ohio company's purchase, at this settlement. The massacre which occurred here on the second of January, 1791, was the bloodiest event in the annals of the first settlement of Ohio, and it not only terrorized the inhabitants of Marietta, Waterford and Belpre, but sent a thrill of horror into all of the border settlements of Virginia and Pennsylvania which left their people, accustomed as they had long been to Indian atrocities, filled with foreboding for many a day.

The early part of the winter of 1790-91 was of unusual severity, and this fact undoubtedly made not only the young men at Big Bottom, but the settlers at all of the other stations less careful in guarding against Indian attack than they would otherwise have been, for the winter was very generally regarded as a season when there was immunity from depredations by the savages, and especially was this true when it was one of great cold.* The Indians, therefore, in making this attack in the winter, made an exception to their common custom and exceeded their usual shrewdness. It is supposed that they had originally designed falling upon and massacring the settlers at Waterford (whom they had doubtless learned were not as watchful as they had formerly been), but that coming first to the Big Bottom settlement and recognizing their opportunity there, they had after holding a hasty council, decided to attack it.

The Indians, as it was subsequently learned, crossed the river upon the ice a few rods above the upper cabin, and then the warriors were divided into two parties. A small number of the savages made their way to the cabin occupied by the Choates and another and much larger party simultaneously, by a short detour, arrived at the block-house. No eye had observed them, and their quick but cautious approach had not started the dogs to barking. The Choate brothers and two men, Thomas Shaw and James Patten, who were living with them, were eating their supper, and upon the entrance of the Indians it seems, supposed them to be friendly and invited them to partake. To avert suspicion until they could fully project their plan of action, the Indians did actually help themselves to food, but after a lapse of not more than two or three minutes, and after having disposed themselves about the apartment in such manner as to best meet any resistance that might be made, they indicated by signs that their hosts were prisoners and quickly bound them with some thongs which they discovered in the cabin. The four men, taken by surprise and confronted by more than their own number, offered no opposition, and made no remonstrance. Scarcely a word was spoken. While quiet capture was effected at the cabin a scene of carnage was being enacted at the block-house. The inmates had gathered around the large fireplace, some engaged in preparing the evening meal and others having come in from work warming themselves by the genial blaze, when the door was thrown suddenly open and a volley of musketry poured death into their midst. Several fell lifeless to the floor, and one, Zebulon

* Joseph Doddridge in his valuable and very reliable Notes on the Settlement and Indian Wars of the Western parts of Virginia and Pennsylvania (p. 262) has the following upon this topic:

"During the long continued Indian wars sustained by the first settlers of the western country they enjoyed no peace excepting in the winter season, when owing to the severity of the weather the Indians were unable to make their excursions into the settlements. The onset of winter was therefore hailed as a jubilee by the early inhabitants of the country, who throughout the spring and the early part of the fall had been cooped up in their little uncomfortable forts.

To our forefathers the gloomy months of winter were more pleasant than the zephyrs of spring and the flowers of May."

* Big Bottom was so named because the broadest portion of the valley between the mouth of the Muskingum and Duncan's Falls. Windsor township, of Morgan county (adjoining Washington upon the east and south), included this historic locality in its limits.

*Reminiscences of Colonel Joseph Barker—MSS.

Throop, who was bending over a frying pan in which he was cooking venison for supper, sank down upon the blazing logs. The shots were fired from without, while one of the Indians who had burst the door in held it open. No sooner had the guns been emptied than with a fiendish yell the savages leaped through the smoke to finish with their tomahawks the butchery began with powder and ball. So sudden and fierce was the onslaught that but little resistance could be made, and one after another the inmates of the block-house were dispatched. Only one Indian was wounded, and he by the wife of Isaac Meeks, the Virginia hunter. She had witnessed the brutal slaying of her two children, had seen their brains dashed out and their bodies cast upon the fire, and with the courage of madness she seized an axe and struck wildly at one of the murderers. The blow came very near proving fatal at the instant (and did inflict a wound from which it was afterward thought the Indian would die), but it was quickly avenged by a companion of the assaulted one, who, coming up behind her as the woman was again raising the heavy axe to strike, cleft her skull with his tomahawk. The air was filled with the wild yells of the Indians, the moans of the dying, the agonizing shrieks and the supplications of those on whom the cruel death blow had not yet descended. All were quickly dispatched except Phillip, a son of Colonel William Stacey, who, during the excitement of the massacre, had cowered down in a corner of the room and pulled some bed clothes over himself. He was discovered after the bloody work of killing and scalping the men had been completed, by an Indian who was assisting in gathering up the various articles of plunder to remove them. As soon as his hiding-place was revealed a tomahawk was raised to kill him, and the terrified boy who threw himself at the feet of his would-be murderer, would have been dispatched in spite of his piteous entreaties if another Indian had not interposed and saved him. His brother, John Stacey, was the last one of the party killed. He had managed, unperceived, to climb through a scuttle hole into the low upper story or loft of the house, and from there made his way onto the roof, when he was fired upon and killed by some of the party who had remained outside during the progress of the butchering. On seeing the Indians upon the ground and knowing that his last chance of escape was shut off, he had fallen down in despair and cried out: "I am the only one left, for God's sake spare my life," but the only answer was the ringing rifle shot and an exultant cry from the fierce warriors below him.

The Ballards—Asa and Eleazer—who had been drawn from their cabin by the noise of the muskets and the loud shouts of the savages—caught sight of young Stacey as he emerged upon the roof and heard his agonizing appeal to the merciless enemy, and quickly comprehending the situation sprang back into their cabin, secured their rifles and fled, keeping the building between them and the Indians. They closed the door as they hurriedly left the cabin, and had got only a few rods away when they heard it burst open and the still bloodthirsty savages uttering imprecations and exclamations of chagrin upon discovering their escape. Of the nineteen persons imperilled in this sudden and unsuspected attack, these two men were the only ones who escaped. Four were taken prisoners at the Choate cabin, and one, the boy—Philip Stacey—at the block-house, while twelve were killed. Their names were Ezra Putnam, Zebulon Throop, John Stacey, John Camp, Jonathan Farewell, James Couch, John Clark, William James, Isaac Meek, his wife and two children. Colonel William Stacey, William Smith, and some of the other associates were not present at the time of the attack. Had the first named been at the block-house the massacre would very likely have been prevented, and even had his advice been acted upon the great calamity might have been averted. Only a few days before the massacre he had urged the young men to put their block-house in better order to resist an attack, should one be made, to discontinue work at sundown, have doors and windows securely closed, palisades erected around the building, and sentries posted at good points of observation to warn the little garrison of the approach of an enemy. Had these precautions been observed it would have been impossible for the Indians to have made a successful attack, or at least to commit a wholesale murder as they did. The men had good arms and a sufficient number of them, but they were standing in the corner of the block-house when the Indians, without any warning, entered, and overwhelmed the surprised and terror-stricken group gathered about the fire.*

The escape of the Ballards was very fortunate. Had the Indians succeeded in capturing or killing them they doubtless would have come down on the Waterford and Wolf Creek Mills settlements and repeated the horrors of the Big Bottom massacre, but as the two men had fled they surmised that they would carry warning to those stations, and the party returned, with the exception of a few forming a scouting band who, it was subsequently discovered, penetrated the forest to the southeast and hovered threateningly around Wolf Creek Mills.

The Ballards in their flight came upon a hunting camp about four miles from the scene of the massacre, and there found Captain Joseph Rodgers, an experienced woodsman (who was afterwards a ranger or spy for the Marietta settlement) and a friendly Mohican Indian. They were wrapped in their blankets and asleep by the fire. Awakened and told the probable fate of the Big Bottom settlers, they seized their guns and leaving everything else behind them that they might make greater haste, started out in the darkness for the settlement at the mills. On arriving there they found that many of the heads of families were in Marietta attending the court of quarter sessions, and the news that they brought caused the utmost agitation among the women and children. Captain Rodgers immediately assumed direction of the preparations for defence, and his presence did much toward allaying the feeling of consternation which filled the minds of the people. The situation was a desperate one. There had been no block-house erected here as the Ohio company directors had suggested there should be, and the absence of a number of the men materially increased the danger to which the remainder would be subjected in case of an attack, which was momentarily expected. Captain Rodgers' word was law, and he hastily notified all of the inhabitants to assemble in Colonel Robert Oliver's cabin, which was the largest and strongest. Water was carried from the creek until all the tubs, casks, buckets, and other available articles were filled and others prepared to quench the flames should the Indians set fire to their cattle fort, and the windows and door strongly barricaded, the company passed the long night, fearing, hoping, praying, peering into the darkness through the loop holes which had been made between the logs, listening for any sound that should bring intelligence of the stealthy enemy, waiting with tense nerves for whatever might come, and resolved, should it be the worst, to defend themselves as best they could, and sell their lives as dearly as possible. There were about thirty persons, men, women and children, crowded in the little cabin, and of this number only seven were men. Outside under cover of some palings was posted a sentry. Just before dawn he saw some Indians approach, and it was feared that they would make an attack, but as they undoubtedly saw that the people were on their guard they retreated in a short time. Daylight brought a very blessed relief to the feelings of the women and children, and even the men, for they had had every reason to apprehend an attack.

*The story of the massacre is taken principally from Hildreth's Pioneer History, as are many of the local incidents of the Indian war. Other authorities on the same subjects have been consulted, viz: The recollections of Colonel Barker (MSS), and a series of valuable papers by Horace Wye, published in the Western Recorder in 1847.

The people of Waterford had been made acquainted with the news of the attack on the Big Bottom settlement in the night by Samuel Mitchell from the mills. The settlement extended nearly two miles along the river, but every cabin was visited, either by Mitchell or by James and Daniel Convers, whom he had aroused first to help him spread the alarm. As the news was carried from door to door, terrified people aroused from their sleep, came hurrying to the block-house, carrying little else than such arms as they could command. Seventy persons passed the night in a room about fifteen feet square. There were more men here in proportion to the total number of inhabitants than at the mills, and the block-house was considered a very good defence and while the situation was not as harrowing as at the last named settlement, the people nevertheless passed a night which was full of apprehension and suspense.

Two days after the massacre Captain Rodgers led a company of men to Big Bottom. They met a company from Marietta headed by Anselem Tupper and together they found that the Indians after taking the lives of the twelve persons and carrying a quantity of provisions out of the house had pulled up the flooring, piled it over the bodies of their victims and set fire to the whole. The block-house had not long been built, was constructed of beech logs, and had been only partly consumed. Most of the bodies, however, were so disfigured by the tomahawk and by fire as to be unrecognizable. William James' remains were identified by his great size; he had measured six feet four inches in stature and was of massive build otherwise. The ground being frozen very hard a grave was dug within the walls of the big cabin, where it had been prevented from freezing by the fire, and there these victims of a savage war were buried, side by side as they had fallen and the charred charnel-house, remained in the now solitary and soundless forest as a grim shelter from the rain, and snow, a desolate monument to the memory of the brave, unfortunate pioneers who slept beneath it, and a landmark which, to the hunter or scout passing it afar off, had a horrible suggestiveness of the fate which might be his. No attempt was made to again form a settlement here until after the Greenville treaty had been made in 1795. This beautiful locality in the valley of the Muskingum is now pointed out to the traveller as the scene of a terrible Indian massacre in early times but there remains no relic there of the bloody event, which made it classic ground in border annals. The landscape is one of gentle, pastoral loveliness, which seems to hold in sympathy as its appropriate settings human habitations—the abodes of simple but satisfying happiness—and the beholder may feel arise within him as he reflects upon the past and contemplates the present, the reverent phantasy that in recompense for the dark deed which once outraged Nature here, the Creator has breathed upon her bosom the benison of eternal peace.

Of the five men taken prisoners at Big Bottom, one, young Philip Stacey, died of sickness, the other four were ultimately returned to their friends.

The party of Indians, which numbered twenty-five to thirty, it was discovered were Delawares and Wyandots—tribes which had heretofore been at peace with the whites. But they had now been drawn into the alliance of hostile tribes, and a war club was found upon the ground of the massacre, left as a formal declaration of war.

We have already seen the immediate effect of the Big Bottom horror in the Wolf Creek Mills and Waterford settlements, and now let us turn our glance to contemporaneous affairs at Belpre and Marietta, the latter the centre of activity and government in the Ohio company's purchase. Let the reader imagine, if he can, the consternation which the report of the massacre caused at the settlements. The news was brought to Marietta in the forenoon of the day succeeding the disaster. The messengers who had been sent out by Captain Rodgers, at the same time as Samuel Mitchell was despatched to Waterford, had gone aside from the trail in the darkness of the night, and hence were delayed.

When they arrived the court of quarter sessions had just been opened, and the alarm caused its speedy adjournment. There were many in attendance in various capacities, from the settlements of Waterford and Belpre. Filled with the most terrible apprehensions of what might have befallen their families and friends in the weakened settlements, which had at the best inadequate defences, they lost no time in striking out through the woods for their homes, some going afoot and some upon horses, but all pushing ahead with the greatest repidity possible to learn the worst, if it must be so, and hardly daring to hope that they should find their dear ones unmolested. Messengers had been sent to Belpre and the same scenes of agitated, impatient endeavor to strengthen their situation had occurred as at Waterford and Wolf creek. The best preparations possible to resist attack had been hurriedly made; but the little community, weakened by the absence of some of its best men, was not in condition to have resisted successfully if the Indians had made a determined onslaught. The people passed a night of terror, and were much relieved when the absent ones returned on the following day.

The residents of Marietta had not the same grounds for fear that existed at Belpre and the other outlying settlements. They had the strength of greater numbers. Among them there were several characters of great resoluteness and wide experience in warfare, and nearly all of them had led the lives of soldiers. They had, too, the protection of Fort Harmar and of Campus Martius, which was of a very superior order of defence.

But with all of these advantages the inhabitants were nevertheless filled with terror for the blow which had completely annihilated one settlement, struck as it was by Indians who had formerly been at peace, and coming just after the disastrous ending of General Harmar's campaign, seemed to them at first only the precursor of a series of atrocities which must inevitably overwhelm them. To add to the embarrassment of their situation the garrison at the fort had been reduced, and Governor St. Clair, who alone had authority to call on the adjoining States for troops was absent. The Ohio company was in this crisis thrown entirely upon its own resources, and it took prompt and efficient action.

The company was called together as soon as the news of the massacre was brought in (January 3rd) and the deliberations of the body were carried on, from day to day, until the tenth. Upon the fifth the following resolutions* were adopted:

Whereas, There is reason to believe that the campaign made against the Shawnees and other Indian nations the last year is so far from humbling the Indians and inducing them to sue for peace, that on the contrary a general war will ensue, which has already broke out against the people settled in the Ohio company's purchase by the surprise of the block-house and breaking up the settlement at Big Bottom on the evening of the second instant, in which disaster fourteen people were killed and three others are missing. The governor and secretary being out of the territory, the militia of Virginia and Pennsylvania cannot be called upon to our aid, no relief, in the nature of things, can be expected from the general Government in time to give us immediate relief and protection, and from the present state of Fort Harmar very little can be expected for defending our out-settlements.

Under these circumstances we conceive all our settlements to be in the utmost danger of being swallowed up, before any foreign aid can be obtained, unless prevented by immediately drawing in some of our settlements, erecting better defences at Marietta and those outposts that shall be agreed upon to remain, by having all our military strength drawn to certain points and a particular system of defence established; therefore,

Resolved, That the inhabitants of all the out-settlements be and they are hereby advised to remove all their women and children to the town of Marietta as soon as possible, where houses must be provided for their reception, and as far as reasonable the expenses paid by the directors out of the company's funds.

Resolved, That such additional works as are necessary for the defence of the town of Marietta and the fort at Wolf Creek Mills, and one at Belpre, ought to be made as soon as possible, and the directors are requested to take measures accordingly.

Resolved, That application be made to the commanding officer at Fort Harmar, requesting him to give us such protection as the state of his command will permit, and also that he will please to represent our defenceless condition to the Minister at War, and use such measures as he can with propriety, to procure us the defence necessary for protecting our settlements.

Resolved, That the directors wait on Captain Zeigler, the commanding officer at Fort Harmar, with this resolve.

Resolved, That Lieutenant Colonel Commandant Sproat be and he is hereby requested to detach three subaltern officers, or one captain and two subaltern (at his discretion), three sergeants, three corporals, one drummer, and sixty privates, for the purpose of garrisoning the town of Marietta, Belpre and Wolf Creek settlements, to serve until sufficient aid is granted for our protection in some other way, unless discharged, and in order to encourage a sufficient number to engage voluntarily in such detachment and submit themselves to military discipline and such labor in erecting defences as Continental troops are liable to.

Resolved, That their pay shall be as follows, viz: The commissioned officers, the same as in the Federal troops; the sergeants ten, the corporals nine, the drummer nine, and the privates eight dollars per month; and the subsistence of the officers and men shall be the same as allowed to the troops in the pay of the United States; and the directors are requested to make arrangements accordingly; and it being found by experience that the greatest art of Indian war consists in surprising their enemy, to prevent which, as far as lies in our power.

Resolved, That six of the best woodsmen be employed as scouts or spies about the settlements, to be engaged at such price as Lieutenant Colonel Commandant Sproat shall be able to procure them.

And, whereas, we place the highest confidence in the General Government of the United States, that upon a proper representation of the present situation of these settlements, they will reimburse the necessary expense we shall be at in defending ourselves against the common enemy.

These resolutions were transmitted to the judges of the court of quarter sessions with a stirring appeal to them to use their influence with the General Government to secure its aid. One clause of the communication contained the following:

"We cannot now be silent when we find ourselves after an ineffectual campaign exposed, unprotected to the fury of an irritated enemy. It is with pain we have heard the cruel insinuation of those who have been disaffected to the settlement of this country. It is not possible that those men who have pursued into these woods that path to an humble competence, which was pointed out to us by the commander-in-chief of the American armies, should be doomed the victims of a jealous policy to see the mangled bodies exposed, a spectacle to prevent emigration.

"We are fully assured of the parental tenderness of the Government of the United States. It is this assurance which has induced us through your honors' interposition to ask their speedy assistance.

We will remark here that the Ohio company during the war expended over eleven thousand dollars for the protection of its settlers, and that no part of that sum was ever refunded by the General Government. An account was kept of all moneys paid out to soldiers and scouts or for military stores, or the erection of works of defence, under the supposition that it would be repaid by Congress. The loss was a considerable one to the otherwise impoverished people.

On the eighth of January General Rufus Putnam wrote to General Knox, Secretary of War, and to George Washington, President of the United States. The communication to the latter contains a good and, so far as the writer is aware, the best contemporary account of the situation.

On the evening of the second of January, 1791, the Indians surprised a new settlement of out people at a place on the Muskingum called the Big Bottom, nearly forty miles up the river, in which disaster eleven men, one woman, and two children were killed; three men are missing and four others made their escape. Thus, sir, the war which was partial before the campaign of last year is, in all probability, become general. I think there is no reason to suppose that we are the only people on whom the savages will wreak their vengeance, or that the number of hostile Indians has not increased since the late expedition.

* From the journal of the Ohio company.

Our situation is truly critical; the governor and secretary both being absent, no assistance from Virginia or Pennsylvania can be had. The garrison at Fort Harmar, consisting at this time of little more than twenty men, can afford no protection to our settlements, and the whole number of men in our settlement capable of bearing arms, including all civil and military officers, do not exceed two hundred and eighty-seven, many of them badly armed.

We are in the utmost danger of being swallowed up, should the enemy push the war with rigor during the winter; this, I believe will fully appear by taking a short view of our several settlements, and I hope justify the extraordinary measures we have adopted for want of legal authority to apply for aid in the business. The situation of our people is nearly as follows:

At Marietta are about eighty houses in the distance of one mile, with scattering houses about three miles up the Ohio. A set of mills at Duck creek, four miles distant, and another mill two miles up the Muskingum. Twenty-two miles up this river is a settlement, consisting of about twenty families (this alludes to Waterford); about two miles from them on Wolf creek are five families and a set of mills.

Down the Ohio, and opposite the Little Kanawha, commences the settlement called Belle Prairie, which extends down the river with little interruption about twelve miles and contains between thirty and forty houses. Before the late disaster we had several other settlements, which are already broken up. I have taken the liberty to enclose the proceedings of the Ohio company and justices of the sessions on this occasion, and beg leave, with the greatest deference, to observe that unless Government speedily sends a body of troops for our protection, we are a ruined people.

The removal of the women and children, etc., will reduce many of the poorer sort to the greatest straits; but if we add to this the destruction of their corn, forage, and cattle by the enemy, which is very probable to ensue, I know of no way they can be supported; but if this should not happen, where these people are to raise bread for another year is not easy to conjecture, and most of them have nothing left to buy with.

But my fears do not stop here; we are a people so far detached from all others in point of situation that we can hope for no timely relief in case of an emergency from any of our neighbors; and among the number that compose our military strength, almost one-half are young men, hired into the country, intending to settle by and by; these, under present circumstances, will probably leave us soon, unless prospects should brighten; and as to new settlers, we can expect none in our present situation; so that instead of increasing in strength, we are likely to diminish daily; and if we do not fall a prey to savages, we shall be so reduced and discouraged as to give up the settlement, unless Government shall give us timely protection. It has been a mystery with some why the troops have been withdrawn from this quarter and collected at the Miami; that settlement is, I believe, within three or four days' march of a very populous part of Kentucky, from whence, in a few days, they might be reinforced with several thousand men, whereas we are not within two hundred miles of any settlement that can probably more than protect themselves.*

At Marietta during the months following the outbreak of the war, all was activity. Improvements were made at Campus Martius, and a company of men were busily employed under the direction of Colonel William Stacey in building defences at the "Point." About twenty houses and cabins, on an area of four acres of ground, were surrounded with palisades. Four block-houses were built, two of which stood respectively on the Ohio and Muskingum fronts, at the terminations of the lines of palings; the third on the innermost or northern corner of the enclosure, and the fourth on the eastern line, about midway between the one last mentioned and the Ohio river bank. Colonel Ebenezer Sproat was placed in command. As the war progressed small cannon were placed in two of the block-houses, loaded with pieces of iron and leaden balls about the size of cannister shot. Sentries were kept at night upon the box turrets of the block-houses, and a watch was on duty also during the day. The cannon were used a few times to warn the garrison of danger and to call in those who might be in the fields at work, when the rangers reported Indians in the vicinity.

At Belpre Colonel Battelle and Colonel Cushing had already built at the middle settlement two block-houses for their families, and it was decided to construct additional defences at this locality, which was very nearly opposite the centre of Backus' island. Eleven more houses were built, making thirteen in all. They were arranged in two rows parallel with the river front, and the first row immediately upon it. A wide space was left between the two lines of houses, and palisades were erected around the whole group. Like the block-houses built elsewhere in the Ohio company's purchase and in common use upon the frontier, these were two stories in height and the upper floor projected over the lower, and was pierced with loop-holes through which, should the Indians attempt to effect an entrance at the lower doors or windows they could be fired upon. The houses were about twenty-two feet square, laid up with round logs, about a foot in diameter, and were provided with bullet-proof doors and window shutters, made of oak puncheons or planks. Small gateways opened upon the river, from which the water for the garrison was brought, and there were larger ones at the ends and rear, through which teams of oxen could be driven to haul wood or supplies, and which were also to be used for the admission of the cattle in case Indians appeared in the vicinity. Upon the corner block-house, farthest from the river, watch-towers were built, and in these sentries were kept at night during the greater part of the period of Indian war. A flag-staff was raised which bore aloft the flag of the United States, and near it was placed a small cannon or blunderbus, which turned upon a swivel and could be so pointed as to discharge a fire into any part of the garrison, should it be invaded. It was fired regularly every morning during the seasons of spring and summer when Indians were supposed to be in the neighborhood of the settlement, and its loud report answered by the reverberations from the hills may have had the effect of producing a wholesome awe among them when they heard it. In every house a large hogshead was placed and kept filled with water to be used in case the Indians should fire the buildings, or a conflagration be caused through accident. It was one of the duties of the officer of the day to see that these casks were kept constantly filled, and that the defences were in the best of order. Major Nathan Goodale was the officer in command during the earliest part of the war, and retained the place until he removed from the garrison in 1793, when he was superseded by Colonel Cushing. As soon as the fortification was ready for occupancy the families of the upper and lower settlements moved in, and the garrison was appropriately named Farmer's Castle. The strength of the garrison was about seventy able-bodied men, and altogether the inmates of the castle numbered about two hundred and twenty persons. The Ohio company paid for the building of several of the block-houses at Farmers' Castle, and employed rangers for that settlement as they did for the Marietta garrison.

*American State Papers, Volume V; also Albach's Annals of the West.

At Waterford the settlers, who, after the massacre of the Big Bottom pioneers, had considered themselves in imminent peril, made preparations with great haste to render their condition safe. They were joined in a council by the men from the mills, the day after the deadly attack which had terrorized the whole group of Ohio company settlements, and after a brief conference it was decided to concentrate their strength. Wolf Creek Mills, being the smaller station of the two, was abandoned. The families moved over to Waterford, and Fort Frye was built in a bend on the east side of the Muskingum, about half a mile below the site of Beverly. Palisades were set in the ground, enclosing an area of about three-quarters of an acre of ground, in the form of an irregular triangle. At each corner were block-houses, twenty feet square, with projecting upper stories, and the two longer sides were occupied by dwelling-houses. A well was dug in the centre of the enclosure to afford water in case of an Indian siege; and a blacksmith shop was also erected, that the inmates would not be obliged to make the dangerous journey to Marietta to obtain repairs on their arms or agricultural implements. The fort was finished in about six weeks, the settlers working with the utmost diligence and being afforded assistance by the Ohio company, which sent to them a dozen good laborers. The gates were hung early in March, and the fort was then in excellent condition to resist any onslaught which the Indians were liable to make, though a determined attack by a very superior force could have overwhelmed it at any time. The garrison contained about forty men capable of bearing arms, and was under the command of Captain William Gray. Dr. Thomas Farley practiced medicine; Dr. Nathan McIntosh was surgeon's mate; Neal McGuffey, Andrew McClure, William McCulloch, and William Neal were the rangers.

The inhabitants of the Ohio company's lands were now under pressure of the sternest necessity assembled at three points—Marietta, Belpre, and Waterford. The small, outlying settlements had been abandoned, and for the present all thought of returning to them was futile. The settlers saw before them a prospect of great inconvenience, arising from their confinement and crowded condition in the garrisons, and they were apprehensive that they would come to absolute want, if unable to visit the lands on which they had begun farming, and make a subsistence from the soil. They were able to congratulate themselves, however, that their lives were thus spared, and that their present mode of living, at least, assured them of comparative safety.

CHAPTER X.

THE INDIAN WAR—CONTINUED.

St. Clair's Invasion of the Indian Country—The Inhabitants of Fort Frye Warned of Danger—The Friendship and Heroism of an Indian of King Phillip's Tribe—Attack upon the Inmates of the Garrison—Stratagems of the Savages—Narrow Escape of Waldo Putnam and Nathaniel Little at Belpre—The Warning Dream of Joe Rodgers, the Ranger—His Death at the Hands of Indians Within Sight of Campus Martius—Henderson's Race for Life—Matthew Kerr Killed—Henderson's and Hamilton Kerr's Engagement With Indians on Duck Creek—One Indian Killed—A Ghastly Sight at Campus Martius—Hazard of Carrying on Labor in the Fields—Killing of Joseph Kelley at Belleville (Virginia), and Captivity of His Son—Sunday Service Interrupted by Indian Alarm—A Fight Upon the Little Muskingum—Benoni Hurlburt, of the Belpre Settlement, Killed on the Little Hocking—Deadly Attack on Nicholas Carpenter and Five Others at "Carpenter's Run"—Capture of Daniel Converse at Waterford—Reception of the News of St. Clair's Overwhelming Defeat—The Entire Frontier Open to Attack—Condition of the Garrisons in the Ohio Company's Territory—Preparations Made by the General Government for Subduing the Indians—"Mad Anthony" Wayne's Army—The Attention of the Indians in a Measure Diverted From the Settlements—Mrs. Brown, Her Children, and Persis Dunham, Killed at Newbury—Attack on Return J. Meigs Near Fort Harmar—A Colored Boy Slain—General Putnam Treats With the Wabash Tribes—Visit of Friendly Indians to Marietta—Dinner at Campus Martius—Belpre Settlers Leave "Farmer's Castle"—Major Nathan Goodale Taken Prisoner—Uncertainty as to His Fate—Belpre Settlers Send a Petition to Washington—"A Total Breaking Up of the Settlements" Apprehended—The Colonists Obtain Money by Selling Corn to the Army Contractors—Bird Lochart's Adventure—The Rangers or Spies—Joshua Fleehart's Winter in Solitude Upon the Scioto—Attack Upon the Armstrong Cabin—Mrs. Armstrong and Two Children Killed—Three Others Taken Prisoners—Their Ultimate Restoration to Freedom—Settlement at Olive Green—Abel Sherman Killed—His Death Avenged After the Close of the War—The Story of the Indian Silverheels—Robert Worth Slain Near Fort Harmar—Wayne's Victory—The Feeling of Security in the Ohio Company's Garrisons Leads to Loss of Life—Jonas Davis Killed near Belpre—Daring Pursuit of the Murderers—The Closing Tragedy of the War in Washington County—Sherman Waterman Shot on Wolf Creek, May 21, 1795—Bravery of William Hart—Wayne's Treaty—Famine, Fever and Pestilence Added to the Horrors of War—Humanity of the Virginia Pioneer, Isaac Williams.

WHILE preparations had been making locally to resist the Indians, Governor St. Clair and the General Government were maturing measures for securing a settled peace. The plan proposed was threefold: to send a messenger to the western Indians with offers of a peaceable adjustment of difficulties, at the same time to prepare expedition parties which should make expeditions into the enemy's country if the peace proposition was not entertained, and to organize an overwhelming army to take possession, build forts in and hold the territory northwest of the Ohio.

Buckongahelas, the war chief of the Delawares; Blue Jacket, of the Shawnees, and Little Turtle, of the Miamis, were engaged in forming a confederacy of all the tribes northwest of the Ohio to drive the whites from the country. The people of western Virginia had been greatly alarmed by the recent outrages of the savages near their border, and had memorialized their governor upon the defenseless condition of the border, and in response to their solicitations authority had been given for raising troops to penetrate the Indian country. St. Clair was in Pittsburgh in April, receiving volunteers and detachments of the regular army, horses, provisions, arms and equipments. On the fifteenth of May he reached Fort Washington, and his army was gradually concentrated there. In the fall with an army twenty-three hundred strong, exclusive of militia, peace negotiations having proved futile, he marched northward toward the seat of the greatest Indian population (most of the tribes were then gathered upon the Maumee and the Wabash in the country adjacent) building forts at the sites of the present villages of Hamilton and Eaton, in the westernmost tier of Ohio counties, and Fort Jefferson in the present county of Darke. Continuing his march he met the allied tribes and suffered the most disastrous defeat (not even excepting Braddock's) in the history of American arms in the west. But of that later.

If the glance that has swiftly swept over the far away region on the historiographic map, which represents the theatre of St. Clair's invasion and battle, be returned to southeastern Ohio, it will be seen that although the main line of Indian operations was after the early summer of 1791 along what is now the western boundary of our State, there has still been through all of the season from snow to snow Indian alarm, Indian depredation, Indian murder, upon the Muskingum.

Early in March the Indians attacked Fort Frye, committed hostilities at Belpre and killed Captain Joseph Rodgers, the brave ranger at Marietta.

The notice given by the Ballards had saved the people of Waterford in January, but in February another war party composed of some of the Wyandots and Delawares in the Sandusky country was preparing to proceed against this settlement. Early in March the hostile band had reached Duncan's Falls, about forty miles above Waterford, and encamped there preparatory to striking the intended blow. It so happened that the agent through whom their plans for a repetition of the horrors of Big Bottom were to be defeated was with them, a friendly Indian of King Philip's tribe, named John Miller, who had been at Marietta and Waterford and knew nearly all of the Ohio company settlers. He had come from Rhode Island, where he had been among white men nearly all his life, within 1788 with General Varnum, and in the fall of 1790 had gone with George, the college educated son of Captain White Eyes (Koquethogechton) the Delaware chief, from the Muskingum to Sandusky, in the capacity of guide and hunter. Wishing to return he had joined the war party, although it seems permission to do so had been reluctantly obtained, the Indians being distrustful of him on account of his known association with the whites. Their suspicions had increased during the march toward the Muskingum, and some of the party had proposed killing him for fear he should prove treacherous. Arriving at Duncan's Falls, the pleasant memories he had of kind friends at Waterford, made him even more anxious than he had been before to save them from the terrible fate that seemed impending. If he could escape he would be able to carry them warning of their danger, but to effect an escape from a party of alert warriors, who were jealously watching his every movement, was not an easy matter. To avoid at least being compelled to join in the attack on his old associates he purposely wounded his foot with a hatchet while cutting wood. When the Indians set out from the camp upon the ninth of March to take up quarters nearer the settlement they intended to strike, Miller was left behind, as he had hoped to be, for he had planned an escape, but some of the more suspicious of the band took a precaution which he had not looked for, and which for a time filled his mind with consternation. They had not thought his wound alone sufficient to keep him a prisoner at the camp, and so tied his hands tightly together. He lay perfectly still for a long time after the departure of the braves, fearing that they might have left some of their number to secretly observe his movements, but when he felt sure that if such was the case the watchers' patience would have become exhausted, he began the tedious task of freeing himself. For hours he painfully worked the thongs back and forth, and finally got them so stretched that he could slip them from his hands. Then he collected some logs and drift wood, and with his hatchet cut grape vines with which he bound several pieces together in the form of a rude raft, and he also fashioned a paddle. Supplying himself liberally from the stock of powder and balls, which the Indians had left at the camp, and throwing into the water all that he could not carry, he was ready for departure.

Just as daylight was fading away in the wild valley, he pushed his frail craft out into the stream. The river was high and the strong current carried him along with little effort on his part, at a good rate of speed. All night he floated silently down stream, sometimes fast and sometimes slowly, but never coming to a full stop, even to prepare a meal, for he had with him a small quantity of dried venison, with which he satisfied his hunger. The long night had passed and the sky was just beginning to show the light of dawn, when Miller found himself opposite the mouth of Bald Eagle creek, and knew that he was not many miles from the people whom he was endeavoring, at the risk of his own life, to give warning of the danger that was threatening them. Suddenly he caught sight of a blazing camp fire on the river bank, which he well knew to be that of the Delawares and Wyandots. It was too late for him to abandon his raft and make a detour through the woods, and his only hope was in the chance of passing down stream unnoticed by the keen visioned savages above him. He threw himself prostrate upon the little raft and remained perfectly motionless, hoping that if seen at all the craft would be mistaken for one of those clumps of floating debris which abound in streams when at flood tide. He heard rifle shots, and supposed that he had been discovered, but no rifle bullets whistled near him, and he surmised that the Indians had been shooting at turkeys in the tree tops or some other game. He was soon out of danger, borne onward by the kindly current, in the uncertain light of dawn, and with a thankful heart he plied his paddle and shot rapidly along, taking not a moment's rest until, sweeping around a bend in the river, he saw Fort Frye just ahead upon the left bank.

The structure was new to him, but he was aware from other objects and the familiar appearance of the landscape that he had arrived at the Waterford settlement.

He landed above the stockade, and making his way cautiously toward it lest he should be mistaken for a hostile Indian and shot, he called out to the sentry, giving his name, and stating that he wanted to come into the garrison. After a few minutes' delay, he was admitted. Captain Gray and a number of the older men in the garrison gathered about Miller and listened to what he had to say. There were many who suspected the faithful Indian who had done them this invaluable service, of being a spy sent in by the hostile savages to learn the strength of the garrison, the place of the defences, and daily routine of life. He had been some time away from the settlement, and although he possessed when with them a good character, they knew not how association with the people of his own race might have operated in estranging his friendship and reviving savage instincts. It was thought best, however, to proceed as if there was no doubt of the truth of the assertions which he made, and preparations were immediately begun to strengthen the condition of the garrison.

The outer works were not yet all completed, and the gates had not yet been hung. This was accomplished in two days' time. The watch was doubled. No attack had been made up to this time, and no signs of Indians discovered by the rangers who were now on the alert, and scouring the woods in every direction several miles from the fort. The suspicion that Miller had not acted in good faith, was now more strongly and generally entertained than before, and many regretted that he had been allowed to go from the fort. He had said that if he was captured he would be put to death with great torture, requested the loan of a canoe to go to Marietta, and had signified his intention of going from there directly to his old home in Rhode Island. He had been given a letter to the directors of the Ohio company at Marietta, and had left the garrison, and it was subsequently ascertained had, after receiving a reward for his unselfish act, indeed gone east. But this the settlers at Waterford did not know at the time, and opinions were expressed that he had returned to the Indians in the northwest, who it was suspected had sent him out to gain full knowledge of the condition of the settlements prior to fitting out a war party.

It transpired that the reason the band which Miller had outwitted did not immediately fall upon Waterford, was to be explained by the fact that they had changed their plan after leaving the camp at Duncan's Falls, and resolved to strike their first blow at the little settlement at the forks of Duck creek, which they were unaware had been abandoned after the Big Bottom massacre. Finding that they had no opportunity to murder upon Duck creek they returned to the Muskingum on the evening of the second day after the alarm had been given. On the following morning, March 11th, they made the attack. The inhabitants of Fort Frye had by this time laid aside their extreme cautiousness, and a number of them had gone out before daylight to feed their cattle and perform various duties. The Indians, anticipating this had ambushed themselves in various localities commanding the cabins where the cattle were sheltered, or the approaches to them.

Wilbur Sprague, a young man, had gone to the cabin formerly occupied by the Sprague family to milk a cow, and emerging, milk pail in hand, was fired upon by several Indians in concealment. One of the balls struck his hip and almost disabled him. He ran eighty or a hundred rods to the fort, however, a number of the enemy being in close pursuit, and did not sink down until near the gate, when he took advantage of the protection afforded by a large stump, until his brothers ran out and carried him in. A volley was fired at the brave young men as they lifted their burden, and another as they halted to open the gate. The balls pierced the heavy oak puncheons by their side, but they escaped without the slightest injury. Two of the spies, McGuffey and McCulloch, hurried out when they heard the shooting to learn the cause. McCulloch was deceived by an Indian stratagem and came very near being lured to his death. Some of the Indians were dressed in match coats and hats similar to those of the soldiers in the garrison, and he went readily toward them until warned by Wanton Devol, who cried out at the top of his voice: "They are going to shoot you!" McCulloch sprang back just in time to save his life, a shot fired at him killing his dog, which had followed him from the block-house. He ran in a zig-zag course toward the gate, and although made a target for several shots was untouched. Another narrow escape was that of Samuel and William Sprague, who were among those who had paid little regard to the report brought in by the Indian, John Miller, and thinking that there were no savages about, started down the river for Marietta in a canoe. They had gone about a quarter of a mile when they heard the firing at the garrison, and after considering for a moment the safest plan to pursue—for John's warning then instantly flashed into their minds—they rowed back to the fort, passing very close to one party of Indians, though out of sight, close to the bank of the river. They entered at the water gate and were safe. A constant fire was kept up from the garrison, and the attacking party, seeing that there was small chance of winning the battle, retreated out of range of the guns and confined their hostility to the killing of the cattle, destroying about twenty-five fine animals, and driving nearly a dozen away, among them being two yokes of oxen, which were afterwards identified by a prisoner at Sandusky.

The only Indian who received any harm in the brief skirmish was one who was shot a very long distance off by Judge Devol, who fired through one of the loop-holes of the fort with an old ducking gun of very great length of barrel. The Indian was one of a party who, supposing themselves beyond the reach of a musket ball, were making very offensive and tantalizing gestures. He was evidently wounded in the leg or hip, for he went away with a marked limp. After nightfall an eccentric old bachelor, Jabez Barlow, who had been living at his cabin a mile below the fort, in spite of the remonstrances of his associates, came into the garrison exhibiting every symptom of having undergone a severe ordeal. He had gone toward the fort when he heard the first guns fired in the morning, but turned back, having made up his mind that it was only some of the men firing at a mark, when he saw in the door of his cabin an Indian. Barlow dropped flat on the ground among the underbrush and leaves, and had remained there all day, scarcely daring to move a muscle for fear that he would be seen by some of the savages and killed. After this experience he was glad to remain an inmate of the garrison.

Although the Indians retreated after this ineffectual attempt to destroy the Waterford garrison, they did not return to Sandusky, but, dividing into small parties, went immediately into the vicinities of Belpre and Marietta, where they lay in wait for such persons as might venture outside of the stockades.

Upon the twelfth of March, the day after the attack at Fort Frye, Waldo Putnam, a grandson of the famous Revolutionary general, and son of Colonel Israel Putnam, with Nathaniel Little, were fired upon at Belpre, and narrowly escaped death. They had gone out from "Farmers Castle" to milk and feed the cows, half a mile below, and while young Putnam was milking, Little, who was on lookout, caught sight of an Indian a few rods away, with his gun levelled to fire. The gun rang out and the ball tore up the earth where Putnam had been sitting, he having sprung aside when his companion gave the alarm by calling out "Indians! Indians!" The men ran toward the garrison, three Indians who sprang from concealment in the edge of the woods pursuing and firing at them until they were driven off by a party of men who came out with arms, having heard the gun shot. Disappointed by their failure to take human life, the Indians sought to vent their ire by killing cattle, as they had done at Waterford. They killed several and wounded others, among them two large and very valuable oxen, which were afterwards brought into the fort. One of them was butchered, being so badly hurt that it could not live, and the other recovered. This was the first actual hostility at Belpre after the building of "Farmers Castle."

Two days after the hostilities at Waterford, and the day after the fortunate-escape of Putnam and Little at Belpre—upon the thirteenth of March, which was Sunday—Captain Joseph Rodgers and Edward Henderson, the two rangers employed at Campus Martius, started out on a scout up the Muskingum. As Rodgers passed the guard at the gate he had remarked: "Well, boys, to-day we take a scalp or lose one." It seems that Rodgers had had an ominous dream in the night, and when morning came was in a very sombre frame of mind. Questioned about his dejection and refusal to partake of breakfast he had related his dream, and the officers of the day, impressed with his earnestness and foreboding spirit, urged him to remain in the garrison and let another ranger go out on the tour of observation. He said "No, I shall never shrink from duty because of a dream." These remarks and the manner of brave Captain Joseph Rodgers were brought vividly to mind when Henderson arrived breathless at Marietta, after night had fallen, and told of the fate of his comrade—how he had been shot down by Indians lurking in ambush. The ominous dream, but little thought of in the morning, was then the topic of awed conversation in little groups at Campus Martius, the garrison at the Point and Fort Harmar.

The two rangers had made their usual circuit, and, in the whole day's tramp through the woods, had discovered no Indians or signs of their having been in the vicinity. At night, when returning, and within a mile of home, two Indians rose up suddenly from behind a log directly ahead and fired upon them. Rodgers fell, shot through the breast, into Henderson's arms. "I am a dead man," said he, "you must save yourself." Henderson fled down the hill with the fleetness of a deer, and as he ran two more Indians rose from their hiding-place and fired their rifles at him. The silk handkerchief bound about his head, after the manner in which they were commonly worn by the scouts, was cut by one of the balls, which also grazed his scalp, and the other passed through the collar of his hunting shirt. After running a few rods directly away from Campus Martius he discovered that his pursuers had got ahead of him, and so he turned to the right, ran up a ravine and crossed over the hills to Duck creek, in his flight passing the Indian camp, where one of the party was so intently engaged in cooking supper that he did not notice him. Henderson had now eluded the two Indians who had followed him, and though aching to revenge the death of his comrade, did not dare to fire upon the Indian in camp, as the shot would have revealed his whereabouts. When Henderson arrived at the Point and hurriedly told his experience, the alarm gun was fired and answered from Fort Harmar and Campus Martius. The inhabitants were filled with alarm, and expecting an immediate attack, the ordinary dwelling-houses were quickly deserted by their occupants, who sought refuge in the block-houses.

In the morning the confusion subsided, and about ten o'clock a number of men went out from Campus Martius and the Point garrison to bring in the body of the murdered ranger. It was found stripped of clothing, but undisfigured except by the removal of the scalp. The men bore it into Marietta upon a litter made of poles and the burial took place upon the east side of Second street. Captain Rodgers' death was severely felt at Marietta and in the other settlements, as he had been much liked as a man, and the settlers had a great respect for his bravery and sagacity. It will be remembered that he assumed command at Wolf Creek Mills on the occasion of the Big Bottom massacre and exhibited great efficiency in making preparations for defence and in notifying the people of Waterford, Marietta and Belpre of the danger that threatened them. He had been a ranger from the fall of 1790, and one of the bravest who ever served in that capacity. He was a native of Pennsylvania, a man of large and powerful build and had served in the Revolutionary war. Hamilton Kerr was engaged to fill his place as spy. He was thoroughly familiar with the woods, having been for two years a hunter at Fort Harmar. Matthew Kerr, the father of Hamilton, was killed in the summer of this year. He had settled, as has been related in a former chapter upon Kerr's island, prior to the arrival of the Ohio company colony, and soldiers had been detailed from Fort Harmar to assist him in building his cabin. After the war had commenced in earnest Kerr had removed to the garrison at the forest but had left his cattle at the little island clearing, and made daily trips there in his canoe to feed them. One day he found a horse tied in an empty barn, which he took with him to the garrison conjecturing, and correctly, that it had been left there by Indians who had been on a plundering expedition in Virginia, and who were still lurking in the vicinity to commit further depredations. The next day June 17th, he went up again to attend to his stock though advised not to by his sons, who feared that the Indians who had lost the horse would be lying in wait to murder, if possible, the person, who had taken it. Kerr went, however, and just as he was about to land from the canoe, four Indians fired upon him. He fell back pierced by three rifle balls, and one of the assailants springing into the water, made his way to the canoe, scalped the old man and pushed the boat out into the stream. It was picked up, when it reached the mouth of the Muskingum, and a party was immediately sent out to pursue the murderers, but they were not to be found.

In July, William Smith, who was acting as one of the sentries for a party of men who were cutting timber on the ridge back of the garrison, was alarmed by a great commotion among the cattle, which came rushing by him showing every indication of fear of which the brute is capable. Smith thinking Indians were near fled to the spot where the men had been working, and as they had gone to the garrison, time for quitting work having arrived, he quickly followed them. He told his story, and it was more than corroborated when on examination an arrow was found still sticking in the flesh of one of the cows. It being thus made evident that Indians were again in the neighborhood of the garrison, and that they knew where the cattle ranged, it was thought best to make a demonstration which should intimidate the Indians and make them at least remain at a respectful distance from the garrison. A company of forty men was accordingly made up consisting about equally of soldiers from Fort Harmar and volunteers from the Point garrison and Campus Martius. One party led by a lieutenant went up the Muskingum valley and the other, which was the stronger, starting directly toward the abandoned mills that had been built by Shepherd and Sproat, on Duck creek, two miles above the Ohio. This division was led by Henderson and Hamilton Kerr, the former of whom was thirsting to avenge the death of his old comrade, Captain Rodgers, and the latter that of his father. Hitherto these men had been unable to come upon the Indians, but to-day they met with a small band. The two parties had reunited and fallen upon a trail which they followed to the crest of the hill looking down upon the mills. While they were anxiously surveying the valley beneath them for an appearance of the savages they saw six of them cross the stream at a riffle from the east and go toward a small deserted cabin, where the men formerly engaged at the mill had lived. Henderson led a small party in a detour by which he hoped to gain a position commanding the other side of the house, which the Indians had now entered, while Kerr remained with the rest of the men at the spot from which they had first caught sight of their skulking enemy.

Before the moving party could make the intended circuit an Indian came out of the house and around upon the side toward Kerr. According to the plan agreed upon no shots were to be fired until Henderson and his companion had reached a proper station from which to open fire, but upon seeing this Indian, Kerr, unable to restrain himself as he thought of the murder of his father, brought his rifle to his shoulder and fired. The Indian fell, not dead, but wounded, and Kerr, rushing forward, dispatched him, plunging his hunting knife again and again into his body. George Kerr shot at and wounded another Indian, but so slightly that he was able to escape with the rest. In the blanket of the dead Indian was found a halter, all in one piece, ingeniously cut from a buffalo skin, and several other articles. It is a fact of history illustrating the savagery of which some of the whites were capable, that the head of this Indian was cut off, impaled upon a pole and carried aloft at the front of the company of hunters as they returned to Campus Martius.* The next day the body was brought in for a Dr. McIntosh, who boiled it to get the bones for a skeleton, which, it appears, he was too ignorant to put together after the work of nature had been undone. The Indians who learned of the disposition that had been made of the dead body, were filled with disgust and superstitious horror.

Proofs of the presence of Indians were discovered almost every day, although weeks sometimes elapsed, and even months, when no serious depredations were committed. Indications of an attempt at the surprisal and murder of some of the men, were discovered one day in July, near what is now Mound cemetery. A large number of men had been working in a field of flax and oats, owned by General Putnam, and situated just east of the mound square, and had so nearly finished the task of harvesting that it was thought unnecessary for the whole force to go out the last day. A careful watch during the progress of the work had failed to discover any signs of Indians, and consequently sentries were disposed of, and General Putnam's sons, William, Rufus, and Edwin, his son-in-law, William Browning, and Augustus Stone, a boy ten or twelve years of age, were selected to finish the job. When the others were ready to start early in the morning they found that Browning had gone to the Point garrison on some errand, and unwilling to go to their work without him, waited until about ten o'clock, when he returned. They then went to the field, and before going to work deeming it advisable to reconnoitre the ground, Augustus Stone ascended the mound while the others tramped through the standing corn surrounding it. Very soon they discovered numerous fresh tracks of moccasined feet around the margin of the field and in the vicinity of the mound, and hastily retreated to Campus Martius. The tracks had doubtless been made early that morning by Indians who intended to shoot down the workmen when they came into the field, but who had doubtless become impatient and left when the usual hour for beginning work had passed, the sun risen high in the heavens and no man appeared. The delay caused by Browning's absence from Campus Martius, in the morning, had saved all their lives. The necessity of working in the fields, planting, and harvesting, was important even during the most threatening periods of the war. A famine would soon have ensued if the crops had not been carefully cared for. The settlers to gain a mere subsistence were forced to expose themselves to attack. If they could have remained steadily in their garrisons there would be fewer deeds of violence to record in these pages, but they had two enemies to contend with, and in seeking to provide against starvation many fell victims to the savages.

* Hildreth does not mention this circumstance though he does that which we relate subsequently. This barbarity, committed in the exultation of revenge, is vouched for by Horace Nye in the Western Recorder of April 8, 1847. He says, after relating the incident: "I remember going with my mother to our garden, when hearing the yell of some of the men we discovered the procession they had formed. Horrible sight."

Sometime during the summer of 1791—the exact date is not known—James Kelley was killed on the Virginia shore about twenty miles below Marietta, at the Belleville garrison. He had settled in Marietta in 1788 with his wife and three children, James, John, and Joseph. Their fourth child, Arthur St. Clair Kelley, was the first child born in Marietta. Kelley and his family removed from Marietta to Waterford, and from there to Belleville. The father and two sons were one day working in a small field of corn quite near the block-house, when they were surprised by a party of Indians. Mr. Kelley had no gun or other arms to defend himself with, and was instantly killed. John succeeded in reaching the block-house, Joseph, then about seven or eight years of age, was captured and carried away. The widowed mother fearing to remain at Belleville after the killing of her husband, made her way with her three children to Marietta, where she remained through the period of the war as an inmate of Campus Martius. She received no tidings from her little son Joseph, and mourned him as dead, but when the war was over, and Wayne held his great treaty at Greenville in 1795, the boy was brought in among many other captives and surrendered to the commissioners. Return Jonathan Meigs, sr., who was present, took charge of the little fellow and returned him to his mother.

It occasionally happened that the simple, but solemn Sunday services at the garrisons were rudely interrupted by Indian alarms. The troops were mustered every Sunday morning for inspection, agreeably to a militia law, and afterward "headed by Colonel Sproat with his drawn sword, the civil officers and the clergyman, with the fife and drum, marched to the hall for divine service." Almost all of the people were congregated on such occasions and most of them kept their arms by their sides or conveniently near. Once, as the Rev. Daniel Story was preaching in the northwest block-house of Campus Martius, and the people closely listening to his sermon, Peter Niswonger, one of the rangers, burst into the garrison with the startling information that Indians were in the neighborhood. Instantly the preacher ceased his discourse, the congregation was thrown into confusion, and the alarming "long roll" of the drum resounded through the stockade as the signal for every man to hasten to his post. A party was soon made up, consisting of six rangers, ten or twelve citizen volunteers, and as many soldiers, to apprehend if possible the Indians whose presence had been discovered by Niswonger. They embarked in canoes and went up the Ohio to the mouth of Duck creek. Landing there the shrewd woodsmen were not long in discovering a fresh trail, which led them over to the waters of the Little Muskingum. In a hollow between the hills and about half a mile east of the stream, the smoke of a camp fire was seen curling up through the trees. Dividing the company into two parties the rangers attempted to flank the Indians, but before they could do so the Indians had become alarmed by some movement made by the incautious soldiers, and the fight was precipitated by their flight. The Indians ran up the small creek on which they had encamped, but two of the band leaving the rest ascended the spur of a hill. The spies who had pushed ahead to intercept the fugitives fired on these two, and one of them fell, wounded through the hips, just as he had gained the foot of a low rocky ledge, up which his companion had clambered. The second Indian could have made his escape, but bravely stood by to protect the wounded one. He fired at Peter Anderson who saved himself by jumping behind a tree, and in another moment the Indian fell dead, shot through by several balls from the guns of the rangers. They had completely surrounded him, so that the tree to which he had taken offered him no protection. The wounded Indian escaped while the attention of the whites was upon his protector. There had been seven Indians in the party.

The five who had escaped the rangers, finding themselves safe, made a detour through the woods and came up in the rear of the camp from which they had been driven, where the soldiers were now regaling themselves with the contents of the kettle which had been left boiling upon the fire. The first intimation of danger that the soldiers, satisfying their hunger, had, was the report of five rifles and the whistling of as many balls close to their heads. One man fell into the creek exclaiming "I am killed," and the others ran to the rangers for protection. When the whole party returned to the camp they found the soldier whom they had supposed to be killed or fatally wounded, still lying in the bed of the creek, but on pulling him out and making an examination only a mere surface scratch was found on his person. The Indians had again retreated after scaring the soldiers, and though the rangers went some distance in the direction they had taken, they saw nothing of them. A scalp was taken from the dead Indian and carried into the garrison. Had it not been for the indiscretion of the soldiers, green in Indian fighting, it was thought the whole party could have been destroyed, but as it was the rangers felt as if some good had been accomplished, for it was by such retaliations as this that the Indians were prevented from becoming even bolder in their depredations and murders than they had been, and to approach the settlements less frequently and with more caution. Ordinarily, after such a movement against them, they refrained for a considerable time from harassing the people.

During the same month—September—the little community at Belpre was again horrified by the murder of one of its members. Although there had been several hostile visits of the savages to this settlement the killing of Benoni Hurlburt upon the twenty-eighth of September was the first that had taken place since the actual beginning of the war. Hurlburt had been brought up in the frontier country, and had come to Marietta in 1788 from Pennsylvania. For some time he had been with the Belpre associates, and had followed the calling of a hunter and trapper, and with the assistance of his sons and Joshua Fleehart had kept the garrison pretty well supplied with meat. He had a natural instinct for the chase, and was never happier than when in the woods. He always dressed in deerskin and had adopted many of the customs of the Indians. Feeling very confident of his ability to elude the savages he had often ventured long distances down the river and back through the forest, either alone or with a trusty companion, and but little fear of his safety was felt at the garrison. On the day that he met his death he had gone down the Ohio to the mouth of the Little Hocking, a distance of about three miles, in company with Fleehart, another experienced woodman. Their object was to visit traps which they had set for fur-bearing animals, and to secure any game that they could as the garrison larder was very low. On the way down they heard a sound as of turkeys gobbling, on the north shore, but, as Fleehart, after listening closely for some time found that the noise proceeded from Indians hidden in the underbrush, who were endeavoring to lure them to the bank, they only paddled their canoe faster down stream.

They neither saw nor heard anything to further alarm them, and soon after they had reached the mouth of the Little Hocking, Hurlburt went ashore and travelled through the woods near the creek, while Fleehart paddled the canoe slowly up stream. Not many minutes elapsed before the report of a rifle reached the man in the canoe. His practiced ear telling him that it did not come from his companion's gun, he instantly thought of Indians, and supposing that if Hurlburt was shot they would run to the bank to see what had become of the canoe, he ran it aground on the opposite bank and concealed himself in a place from which he could fire upon them to the best advantage. Presently he heard the loud barking of two dogs which had followed Hurlburt, but after a few seconds the noise ceased, and listening intently he could faintly hear the groans of a man in great pain, and the peculiar guttural voices of Indians as they carried on in low tones a hurried conversation. They were probably discussing whether or no they should search for the companion of the man they had made their victim, but they did not approach the creek, and after the elapse of about an hour Fleehart entered his canoe and went up to the garrison. On the following morning a party of men went down to secure the body of the murdered hunter. They found it without difficulty. By the side of the corpse lay the lifeless dog, whose barking as it faithfully tried to guard the body of its master had been heard by Fleehart until it was silenced by a tomahawk stroke. Hurlburt had been scalped, as all the victims of the Indians were, but was otherwise un mutilated.

The death of Hurlburt was a severe shock to the people at Farmer's Castle. Besides being the loss of a good man, and one whom all had liked, the killing was a fresh illustration of the dangers to which all were exposed, and of the boldness of the enemy. Other hostile demonstrations had been made, but as human life had not been taken the impression created had been less deep than that which was now experienced. Waldo Putnam and Nathaniel Little had been a second time surprised by the Indians at the exact spot at which they were fired upon, as hitherto related, and had with great difficulty made their retreat to the fort. The Indians had also killed or driven away many cattle, and the associates had organized a mutual insurance society, to make good from a common fund each others' losses in this line. Horses were not kept at all. They were regarded as certain to be stolen, and offered too strong a temptation to the Indians to visit the settlement.

In October the Marietta settlement suffered a loss which exceeded any previous ones. This time the hostile blow was struck by a party of Shawnees, led by the famous Tecumseh. He and his warriors had been on a marauding expedition on the Little Kanawha and Hughes rivers in Virginia, and in making a circuit to return, fell upon the trail of Nicholas Carpenter and five men in his employ, who were driving some cattle to Marietta from Clarksburgh. Carpenter had several times made ventures of a similar character to the one in which he was now engaged, and had brought many cattle over from the older and securer settlements, for the garrison at Fort Harmar and the people of Marietta. On this occasion he had reached a small stream falling into the Ohio six miles above Marietta, and encamped upon it for the night. As they had seen no signs of Indians while upon their return, and the men being all very tired, no sentries were set, and all fell into a sound sleep, after they had partaken of their evening meal, the cattle being allowed to roam at large and feed upon the wild pea vines. The horses were hobbled, the bells upon them unmuffled, and they, too, were turned loose to forage for themselves during the night. The little camp included Carpenter, a little son ten years of age, and five men: Jesse Hughes, — Ellis, George Leggitt, — Barnes, and John Paul. Early in the morning the men were astir, refreshed with their long, unbroken slumber, and Carpenter, as was his custom, prepared for devotional exercises. The men took seats around the fire and were silent, while Carpenter opened his hymn-book and began to read from it a song of worship. Just as the first reverent and impressive words were uttered by the good old man, the hushed camp was startled by the loud cracking of rifle shots and the terrible war whoop of six or seven Indians who arose from behind a large fallen tree. Ellis fell dead upon the ground, and John Paul was shot through the hand. All but poor Ellis sprang toward their guns, which were leaning against a large sycamore, but before they could all reach them the savages were in their midst.

Some fled, and some, unable to do so, made a strong fight, but resistance was useless. Burns was killed by the tomahawks and knives of the Indians, after what must have been a hotly contested encounter. When the place was visited afterwards, by a company of men from Marietta, his body was found, bearing many wounds, while in his cold and rigid hand his knife was still closely grasped, and the grass and weeds for several yards around were tramped down and the underbrush broken. Carpenter and his little boy were not immediately killed, but being taken prisoners, were dispatched not long after the attack, at a little distance from the camp in which they had gone to sleep the night before with the fullest sense of security. The body of Carpenter was found wrapped in a blanket, and his scalp had not been taken. This fact was thought to be traceable to the intercession of one of the captors, whose gun had been repaired without charge by Carpenter, who was a gunsmith by trade, at Marietta, the year before. Carpenter was left without arms with which to defend himself, as Hughes, when he had leaped to his feet after the first fire, had seized, in his excitement, both Carpenter's rifle and his own, and fled with them. He was a very strong and swift runner, but as he was only partly dressed at the time of the attack, was at a disadvantage. His leggings, being unlaced, fell down, and tripped him at almost every step, until he finally stopped and tore them completely off. As he did so his pursuers gained upon him, and one of them threw a tomahawk, which grazed his head, and would have cleft the skull had it struck fairly. Freed from his entanglement, Hughes easily distanced the Indians, and so made his escape. John Paul, the man wounded by the first fire, also saved his life by his fleetness of foot. Leggett was chased nearly two miles, overtaken, and tomahawked, making the last of five, out of the seven persons, who were killed. Hughes and Paul arrived at the garrison at the Point, and gave the sad intelligence of the affair to the friends of Carpenter and the other men slain. More definite information, however, than they were able to give, was brought in by a negro boy, who arrived about sundown at Isaac Williams', on the Virginia side of the river, opposite the mouth of the Muskingum. He had been taken prisoner by Tecumseh and his little band of Shawnees, at Neil's station, near the mouth of the Little Kanawha, and had been with them several days. When the Indians had come upon the camp of the whites they had left him, with his hands bound, and tied to a tree, some distance in the rear. He had managed to escape, and, lying concealed in a hazel thicket, had witnessed several incidents of the massacre, for such it was. The Indians, after finishing their bloody work and finding the black boy gone, had probably come to the conclusion that he had got a considerable distance toward Marietta, and so immediately retreated down the Ohio, fearing pursuit as soon as the alarm had been given.

After the killing of Carpenter and his men, those who returned on expeditions beyond the immediate vicinity of the garrisons used the utmost caution. There were several alarms during the fall and once or twice Indians were seen in the vicinity of Belpre, Marietta and Waterford, but there were no further hostilities of serious nature during the season. At Waterford there had been no trouble since the profitless attack on the fort in March, except the capture of Daniel Converse, which occurred in the month following. Converse, a young man who has heretofore been alluded to, was at work with some companions in the woods a short distance from Fort Frye, when a party of nine Ottawa and Chippewa Indians rose up from behind a brush fence and fired upon them. His companions fled to the garrison and Converse, left alone was taken prisoner and carried away to Sandusky, and from there to Detroit. The period of his captivity was only about six weeks. He passed through varied experiences, was treated for the most part very kindly, and finally made his escape and worked his way slowly eastward from one British post to another until he reached the American settlements, and then journeyed through to his home at Killingly, Connecticut, where he remained until 1794, when he again ventured to the west and located at Marietta.

Upon the fifth of December of this year Major Denny stopped at Marietta on his way from Fort Washington (Cincinnati) to Philadelphia, and brought the unexpected and alarming news of the terrible disaster that had overtaken St. Clair's army. The battle had been fought November 4th, at a point which can now be best located as in the northern part of Darke county, near the western boundary of the State, less than two hundred miles in a direct line from Marietta, and less than one hundred from Fort Washington, between which place and the upper Ohio, keel-boats and canoes were almost daily passing, and yet, in the year 1791 it took more than a month for the report of the most important event which had ever occurred in the west to reach Marietta.

St. Clair's army, which we left sometime ago marching into the Indiana country, twenty-three hundred strong, reduced by sickness and desertion to between fourteen and fifteen hundred, had been overwhelmed in a single engagement with the forces of the powerful Indian confederacy, and upwards of six hundred men were killed, including many officers, while two hundred more were wounded. Fifty-six women were also butchered of the hundred or more who had followed the army. The Indians fought with terrible fury and showed no quarters. The vast slaughter they had made did not glut their vengeance or satisfy the hatred of the savages, and the grossest indecencies and acts of extremest cruelty were perpetrated in hundreds of cases upon the dying. Wounded men were pinned to the earth with great stakes driven through their bodies, and as the Indians were incensed by the understanding that this was a war for land, they crammed the throats of those who had fallen—the disabled and the dead—with the sand and clay of the battlefield.

Great was the alarm at Marietta and the other settlements in the Ohio company's purchase, in common with those of the entire frontier of a thousand miles, extending from the Allegheny to the Mississippi, when the news of St. Clair's defeat was received. They had felt confident that the result of the campaign would be permanent peace, and now they feared that the Indians would be more daring and bold than ever before, and would come upon them with overpowering numbers. When the greatest fear existed at Pittsburgh, throughout western Pennsylvania and Virginia, and along the Kentucky border, the state of feeling among the Ohio company settlers, it may be easily imagined, did not fall far short of absolute panic. Indeed, many, fearing that the Indians would now carry out their threat of extinguishing every white man's fire north of the Ohio, were upon the point of fleeing from the country. The situation was truly a serious one, for there was every reason to believe that instead of being assailed by small predatory bands of Indians, who had not joined the confederacy, the settlements would now be attacked by large forces and that the garrisons would either be taken through the onslaught of superior numbers or besieged and starved out. The alarm was at its height during the first few days after the reception of the news of St. Clair's defeat and then gradually subsided as those to whom the people looked as leaders evinced a determination to retain their land and began promptly to make preparations for strengthening their position. Several of the old defences were improved, and a new block-house was built upon the bank of the Muskingum, near Fort Harmar by Judge Joseph Gilman and his son, Benjamin Ives Gilman.

A company of soldiers were sent to Fort Harmar about the beginning of the year 1792, and the people felt much safer than they had during the last month of 1791. Confidence was slowly renewed by the enactment of wise measures by the Ohio company, and by the presence of an increased number of soldiers at the several garrisons, Fort Frye and Farmer's Castle, as well as at Marietta. Small detachments were sent out and changed at frequent intervals. Arms were received occasionally by individuals, but the Government did not fully supply the garrisons until the summer of 1792, when Colonel Sproat received a quantity of muskets, with bayonets affixed, fresh from the factory. The winter passed away without the occurrence of any hostilities, and the people generally followed the various industries which they chose and made considerable progress in the improvement of their homes and preparations for the spring planting.

As pleasant weather came on the settlers were again filled with apprehensions of attack, and it is probable that their worst fears would have been realized had it not been that the General Government was already making preparations for another campaign, which should be prosecuted with all possible vigor, and that the Indians, aware of the assembling of General Wayne's army at Pittsburgh, were holding councils and gathering strength for resistance. Thus their attention was in a measure diverted from the Ohio company's settlements, and from those in the Miami country, and along the Virginia and Kentucky border.

The first demonstration of Indian hostility in the spring of 1792 was at one of the Belpre group of settlements, six miles below "Farmers Castle," known as Newbury. Several families had located here at the time Belpre proper was settled and had, on the breaking out of the war, January 2, 1791, abandoned their cabins and moved to the central stockade. Early in the spring, or late in the winter of 1792, forced to gain a subsistence from the soil, they again repaired to the lands to till them. Two block-houses were built and surrounded with heavy palings. The original settlement had been made by fourteen associates. Thirteen men were now at the little stockade, and four of them had families with them. Upon the thirteenth of March a man named Brown, from the upper Ohio region, arrived at the settlement bringing his wife and four children and all his worldly goods. He had bought a small tract of land about half a mile above the block-houses, and on the day after his arrival went up to it, accompanied by one of his sons and a man to plant some young trees he had brought with him, carefully wrapped up, from his former home. It was his intention to set them out around the little cabin (built by one of the settlers in 1789), which he fondly hoped to see the happy, peaceful home of his family. Towards night Brown's wife went out to meet her husband and walk back with him to the stockade and to see (if she had time to reach him before he stopped work) the results of the day's labor. She took with her a babe and her two little girls, and was also joined by Persis Dunham, aged about fourteen years, daughter of Widow Dunham, and a great favorite among the settlers. The latter led one of the children by the hand and followed a little behind Mrs. Brown. A Mr. Leaveus was at work near the stockade, and they stopped for a few minutes to converse with him and then passed on. Presently Leaveus heard the woman scream, and looking up from his work saw two Indians rush toward her, and after two or three blows with their tomahawks retreat toward the high bank, waving a bleeding scalp in their hand. The outcry made by Mrs. Brown and Persis Dunham had also been heard by a number of men near the stockade, and they rushed toward the spot from which the sound came. Brown, too, had heard the dying shrieks of his wife, and came running toward her, directly in the path of the retreating Indians. They pursued him away from the stockade, and as he had no arms it was supposed by those who witnessed his flight that he was soon overtaken and killed. The men from the fort found the bodies of Mrs. Brown, one of her children and Persis Dunham and carried them to the block-house, from whence they were taken to the grave upon the following day. One child, they thought, had escaped the tomahawk by lagging a considerable distance in the rear after the party had left Leaveus. The babe at Mrs. Brown's breast had a great gash across its forehead, from which the blood had flowed over the murdered mother's bosom. Very singularly and unexpectedly, after removal to the block-house, the babe exhibited signs of life, and by careful treatment was fully revived and eventually restored to health. The little girl who was supposed to be uninjured was discovered, upon undressing, to bear a knife wound, which she had been too much excited to feel, and she died shortly afterward from its effects. The Indians had not been pursued, as the men, from the boldness of the attack, judged that they must be present in large force to attack the fort, and had, consequently, hastened to take possession of and defend it.

Late in the evening the guards were accosted by a voice which came outside of the palings and which they recognized as that of Mr. Brown. He and his son and man companion had managed to conceal themselves under the bank of the river and had lain there keeping perfectly quiet until they felt reasonably sure the Indians had left, when they had ventured out under cover of the darkness, with some fear that they might still be captured or killed, and made their way to the fort. They were not admitted until the men in the garrison had become thoroughly convinced that their words were not forced from them under terrible threats by the Indians whom they supposed all along to have captured them, and now suspected were compelling them to lure their fellows to open the gate of the stockade that they might rush in and massacre its occupants. After close questioning in regard to the particulars of their escape they were made to walk several times around the enclosure to show that there were no Indians present and then allowed to enter, the whole garrison standing on guard as they did so. This precaution, which is reliably vouched for, may be thought excessive by some reader who does not take into account all of the circumstances under which it was exercised, but to those who will give the subject a little thought it will not seem unnatural. The inhabitants had before them the dead bodies of three fellows who had but a few hours before been murdered by the Indians; they were filled with awe at the sudden taking away of three bright, happy lives; they had every reason to suppose that a large band of savages were in their neighborhood, and they knew their enemy to be capable of just such shrewd stratagem as this which they feared was being attempted upon them. The incident serves well to illustrate the intensity of terror caused by an Indian attack, and the extreme to which the wariness of these early settlers was occasionally developed. The Newbury settlement was abandoned shortly after this demonstration of hostility, and the occupants of the stockade again took refuge at "Farmers' Castle," where they had the strength of greater numbers and systematic regulation of garrison life.

Late in the afternoon of a beautiful June day, in 1792, R. J. Meigs, jr. (afterwards governor of Ohio), was, with some others, attacked between Fort Harmar and Campus Martius. They had been down the Muskingum in a canoe, to work upon a lot which Mr. Meigs owned, and when returning to their boat, after the close of working hours, were suddenly confronted in a narrow pathway by two Indians. One of them fired at Meigs, who chanced to move aside just in time to dodge the shot, and it took effect in the shoulder of Joseph Symonds, who accompanied him. Symonds, although wounded quite severely, plunged into the Muskingum and soon swam to a safe distance. A negro boy, who was the third person in the party, fled along the path toward the tree at the roots of which the canoe was tied, closely followed by the same Indian who had pursued Symonds. The boy made his way into the water, but, being unable to swim, was quickly overtaken. His captor tried to drag him ashore, evidently intending to make him a prisoner; but, as the terrified boy resisted, he struck him with his tomahawk, tore a scalp lock from his head and left him. With blood streaming from his head, the poor black boy sank down in the water, and, when reached a minute or two later, by Edward W. Tupper and the Frenchman, J. P. R. Bureau, was dead. Meigs, upon the flight of his companions, faced the remaining Indian, who was the one who had fired upon him, and endeavored to intimidate him by presenting his gun and threatening to fire. It happened that the gun had been discharged a few minutes before meeting the Indians, and they were doubtless aware of it, for the Indian who now confronted Meigs only laughed at the weapon which was intended to awe him, and advanced still closer toward it. Meigs recognized the savage as one who had, in 1790, accompanied him through the wilderness to Detroit, and exclaimed, with some astonishment, "Why! Charley, is that you?" but at the same instant, seeing that his foe was not to be mollified by the recollection of former friendship, clubbed his gun and rushed upon him, striking a powerful blow which the Indian caught upon his musket. As Meigs fled, his old time friendly guide dropped his gun and pursued him, tomahawk in hand. A short, swift race brought them to a small run which Meigs cleared at a single bound, while his pursuer, seeing that he was gaining no ground, and probably fearing that he might be taken by the soldiers who had now come out from the garrison, stopped and threw his hatchet at his intended victim. It missed its mark, and, with a loud yell, expressing his rage, the Indian retreated. The other Indian, who had killed the black boy, had been several times fired upon, but he, too, got away, and apparently uninjured. Mr. Bureau and Horace Nye, then a young boy, had passed up the same pathway that Meigs was ambushed on, only half an hour before. Mr. Nye, in after years, used to relate that Bureau had several times attempted to fire his gun at a pigeon, but that it had only "flashed in the pan," and thought that to this fact they were saved from attack and probably death, as he had no doubt the Indians were aware of their presence, and ready to fall upon them had the gun been discharged. Mrs. Nye, knowing that her son was absent from Campus Martius, was much alarmed when she heard the firing, and rushed out of the river gate just in time to meet him as he was returning.

The year 1792 was one of less disaster and alarm in the Ohio company's settlements than any other during the period of the Indian war. The events we have already narrated were the only serious exhibitions of hostility made during the year.

General Putnam was absent nearly all of the autumn, having been appointed by General Washington as commissioner to negotiate a treaty with the Indian tribes living on the Wabash—the Pottawatomies, Eel River Indians, Kaskaskias, Onatainons, Pinkashaws, Kickapoos, Peorias, and others, accompanied by the Rev. John Heckewelder, Moravian missionary, who was at the general's request appointed as interpreter; he finally induced the tribes to assemble their chief men at Vincennes in September, and upon the twenty-seventh of that month concluded a treaty with them. General Putnam was taken sick soon after the completion of the treaty and did not reach home for several weeks. By the terms of the treaty he had made the Indians were to remain at peace with, and recognize the authority of, the United States, and they were also to send a number of their chiefs on to Philadelphia to have a talk with the Great Father. Fourteen of them, conducted by an officer of the army, arrived at Marietta on the seventeenth of November, on their way to the capital, and were served with a dinner and handsomely entertained, both at the Point garrison and Campus Martius. Colonel Barker says in his manuscript reminiscences that after receiving attention from the citizens at the Point, where they landed from their boats, "Colonel Oliver went down with some of the men from Campus Martius and led them back through the mud. On their entering, the drum struck a salute, the guards presented arms, the cannon was fired in the north-east bastion whereat the Indians dodged and looked surprised. General Putnam and Dr. Stacey received them and they marched to the general's to dine." Colonel Ichabod Nye says "under all the circumstances the entertainment was very novel and the scene peculiarly striking. Shut up in garrison and at war with the other tribes of the forest, shaking hands with our red guests and the appellation of brother passing from one to the other, seemed to renew the scenes of the first year's settlement and make us all forget that war was on our borders." Anselem Tupper wrote some clever doggerel upon the dinner of the chiefs, in which he refers, among other pleasantries, to the fact that "old Hetuck" (Colonel Sproat) was not invited to the gathering, as the Campus Martius people had not been asked to meet the chiefs when they were entertained at the Point, and speaks of the appreciation of Mrs. Putnam's culinary productions which the wild men of the woods exhibited. The visit of the chiefs was altogether a very pleasant occasion and one which was ever remembered by those who were present.

At Belpre the immunity from attack during the season of 1792, after the murder of Mrs. Brown, her children, and Persis Dunham, had been the cause of great thanksgiving, and the settlers had become more hopeful than at any other time since the breaking out of the war. The feeling of comparative safety, the overcrowded condition of Farmers' Castle, and the desire of the settlers to be nearer the lands which they owned, and must look to for their subsistence, led them to construct additional block-houses at the upper and lower settlements, which they had abandoned after the Big Bottom massacre. The re-investment of the settlements took place in the winter of 1792-93. One garrison was built three miles above, nearly opposite the mouth of the Little Kanawha, on Captain Stone's land, and the other a mile and a half below, on Major Nathan Goodale's farm. They were called respectively Stone's and Goodale's garrisons.

The buildings for the accommodation and protection of the families were ready for occupation in February, 1793, and most of the associates had moved into them by the close of the month. At Goodale's garrison the inmates had scarcely become settled in their new quarters when their leader, the man upon whom they principally relied through the war, was taken from them. Upon the first day of March, one week after moving to the new garrison, Major Goodale had gone out to work upon his land, not more than forty rods from the little stockade, and within plain view of it.

There was but little apprehension of an Indian attack at this time, for the river was full bank, and that condition of the water was generally regarded as in the nature of a protection, the Indians at such times not being apt to stem the tide in their canoes, and usually avoided expeditions over land because of the difficulty of crossing the swollen streams. Then, too, General Wayne's army, which had been assembling at Pittsburgh, was now moving toward Cincinnati, and boats full of armed men were daily to be seen going down the Ohio—a sight which was suggestive of security.

Somebody at the garrison after Major Goodale had been at work for some time, noticed that his oxen were standing still, and that neither their owner nor his assistant, an Irishman, named John Magee, were near them. An hour passed and the same eye which had noticed this again fell upon the oxen, which had not changed their location in the field. Then for the first time there was an apprehension of something wrong. Two or three men went out to discover whether there was any ground for their fears or not. They felt relieved upon finding Magee unconcernedly at work. Surely he would be aware of it had any violence been committed. But as the men saw nothing yet of Major Goodale, they went on to the place where his oxen had been standing idle, and as they still found no sign of the owner's presence, they began a search for him. Their fears were not very strong; they would not have been surprised to have heard Goodale's voice at any moment, or to have seen him emerge from the woods. But suddenly the searchers came upon marks which told the whole story—fresh moccasin tracks in the snow which still remained on the ground in the shade of the forest which surrounded the clearing. The truth dawned upon them then that Major Goodale had been taken prisoner. There were no blood marks upon the ground, no indications of a struggle, and the capture had certainly been conducted without noise or otherwise Magee's attention would have been attracted and he would have given the alarm. Immediately a small party of men set out upon the trail the Indians had left, but they soon lost it, and on the following day a number of skilled woodsmen and rangers were alike unsuccessful in the pursuit and gave it up. Major Goodale had been taken as a captive instead of suffering death, but he was one of those prisoners who never returned. His family was most deeply distressed by the news of his capture and the whole garrison, indeed, all of the Belpre settlements, were filled with gloom. This was the most serious loss that had been experienced by the people of the beautiful prairie. Hopes were entertained by the grief-stricken family and by his old associates that Major Goodale would some day return, but these hopes were given over as month after month passed away, the remaining years of the war dragged their slow length along and no tidings came to cheer them. Even after peace was established in 1795 by the treaty of Greenville, many captives returned to their friends, and news received of others, there was still no word to dispel the uncertainty with which this case was clothed. Not until 1799 was anything heard which threw light on the fate of this good, brave man. The story of the capture of a man on the Ohio was then related by some Indians at Detroit, and the particulars were such as to leave little doubt that the prisoner they spoke of was Major Goodale. According to their narrative he was taken by eight Indians who were concealed behind the trees on the bank awaiting an opportunity to fall upon some unwary white man, and they were quite positive that the captive had become a prey to disease and died somewhere on the Maumee or Sandusky rivers. There were some people who gave but little credence to this story, and believe the unfortunate pioneer to have been killed near the Hocking river, where Joshua Fleehart some years later found a skeleton, which, from the absence of a tooth, they thought to be that of Goodale.

The people of the Belpre settlements, robbed of the man whose mere presence had in a measure always inspired them with a feeling of safety, became more keenly sensitive to their exposed condition. The war had become harder upon them than upon the settlers of either Marietta or Waterford.

Two weeks after the event which we have related they drew up and forwarded a petition to General Washington, whom many of them well knew, setting forth their exposed condition and losses by the Indians. It stated that six of their number had been killed, beside the recent loss of Major Goodale; that one-third of their cattle and produce had been destroyed, and that they were fearful of a total breaking up of the settlement unless the Government should afford them the protection of a larger number of men. It was represented that there were two hundred and one persons in the three settlements, fifty-two of whom were men, and that their usual guard consisted only of a corporal and four soldiers sent out from the post at Marietta.*

During the remainder of the year, however, the settlement, contrary to the apprehension of its people, was left in peace, and although the memory of former events cast a gloom over the inmates of Farmer's Castle and of Stone's and Goodale's garrisons they had no additional horrors to disturb them, and gave their attention to the raising of crops more fully than they had been able to do during the two years previous. A good yield rewarded them, and they were able, as were also the Waterford settlers, to sell considerable quantities of corn and some other provisions to the contractors who were engaged in supplying Wayne's army, which was concentrating at Cincinnati and preparing to enter the Indian country. The preparations under Mad Anthony Wayne had also diverted the Indians to such a measure that their plundering expeditions were made much less frequently than before. Their condition improved by the money they had secured from the army contractors, and which they sorely needed—free, comparatively, from depredations by the Indians, and looking forward to a speedy establishment of peace, the settlers at the several little forts in the Ohio company's purchase were less heavy-hearted than they had been since the beginning of the war. They were eager for the arrival of that time which they believed to be not far off, when, relieved from the fear of a wily, relentless and cruel foe, they could practice the arts of peace and devote themselves to the building up of their fortunes and the securing of happy homes. The day when they could do this was not so near as they fondly imagined. Although enjoying a lull in hostilities there was still before them a dreary period of Indian war, nearly two years in extent, in which these frontier colonies were destined to receive many a sudden and savage blow, to the bereavement of families and communities.

Bird Lockhart, a celebrated hunter living in the little garrison which Isaac Williams had established on the Virginia side of the Ohio, had an exciting adventure with Indians early in the winter of 1793-1794. He had gone to the headwaters of a small run now known as Worthington's run, to shoot some deer for Mr. Williams who was convalescing from a severe sickness, and felt a strong desire for venison. Lockhart's rifle soon brought down two fine deer which, after dressing, he threw across his old horse, and started for home, which, he judged, was eight miles distant. As he was making his way, by the side of his horse, slowly along an old trail or trace, he came suddenly upon two Indians. Lockhart sprang behind a tree, and the Indians followed his example. One of them, however, chose so small a tree in his haste that he was only partially protected, and Lockhart instantly noticing the circumstance, fired upon him. He fell, wounded through the hips, and entirely helpless. As soon as his rifle rang out upon the still air, the other Indian came forward, thinking that he could shoot the white hunter down, but Lockhart had apprehended this, and reloaded with such expedition that as his adversary came forward, he was almost ready to use his gun again. The Indian seeing that he could not take him at a disadvantage, quickly sought shelter behind another tree without firing. In this situation the two remained for several hours, each listening to detect any cautious movement, and furtively endeavoring to catch sight of the other. As night approached, Lockhart began to feel uneasy, fearing that the Indian under cover of darkness would make his escape, and consequently he availed himself of his knowledge of a stratagem to draw the enemy's fire. It was one so old and well known that it must be practiced very adroitly in order to deceive. Placing his large slouch hat upon the ramrod of his gun, he slowly pushed it into view of the Indian in such a manner as to make him believe that the hat was in its proper place, and the wearer cautiously attempting to gain a view of the enemy. If he pushed it forward an inch too far, or allowed it to swing upon the end of the ramrod, the trick would be exposed. Lockhart hardly dared to hope for success, but at length he heard a rifle shot, and his hand detected a slight jarring of the ramrod as the ball pierced the hat, and sped onward on the harmless journey. He allowed the hat to fall to the ground, and so completely was the marksman deceived that he soon came forward, no doubt expecting to take the scalp of the white man whom he supposed he had killed. Lockhart allowed him to come very close, and then stepping from behind the tree with gun ready cocked, shot him through the heart. The next day a party of men went out, led by Lockhart expecting to find the bodies of two Indians, but could discover only the last one shot. The wounded Indian who, before Lockhart's departure, had crawled away a considerable distance, had not ventured to approach as he still had a loaded gun in his hands. It was supposed that he had caught Lockhart's old horse, and rode him until he had fallen in with some other Indians. The animal was found on Carpenter's creek, about six miles above Marietta, a distance to which he would not have strayed alone.

*Biography of Mathew Goodale, by Dr. S. P. Hildreth.

The hunters and rangers took great risks during the Indian war, but their coolness and courage usually saved them, and when their peculiar occupation was gone, most of them were still residents of southeastern Ohio, having become settlers in the land they had been chiefly instrumental in protecting from the ravages of the Indians. Of the same class as Bird Lockhart was the Belpre ranger, Joshua Fleehart. He, it is said traditionally, was in fact a leader among these brave men employed to roam the forest to discover indications of the approach of the Indians. No man among the rangers, either at Farmer's Castle, Marietta, or Waterford, was more skilful in following a hidden trail, or more daring in meeting the enemy. He was thoroughly conversant with the habits, not alone of the Indians, but of the wild beasts of the forest, and his shrewdness seemed never to fail him. He was admirably endowed by nature for the wild life which he led, being not only very active, but of the most powerful build, tough and sinewy, and over six feet in height. Before the war he lived upon the island afterwards famous as Blannerhassett's, and when Farmer's Castle was built, after the alarm of the settlers, he was employed as hunter and ranger for the garrison. An incursion made by this man into the heart of the Indian country well illustrates his hardihood and that of his class.

In the winter of 1793-94 he penetrated the forest alone within fifteen or twenty miles of the large Shawnees village of Chillicothe (which was on the north fork of Paint creek, a few miles west of the site of the present city of the same name, settled over two years later), and there took up his residence, and remained for nearly three months. It being winter, there was little need of his services at Farmer's Castle, and he yearned for more activity and excitement than garrison life afforded. He spent the season trapping beaver and hunting bears, the former along the small tributaries of the Scioto, and the latter among the hills, and led a happy, free life, at the same time accumulating a goodly store of valuable furs. He had built a little bark hut not far from the bank of the Scioto, and in some willows, several miles below, he secreted the canoe in which he had made his journey. When warm weather came, which that year was in the latter part of February, he began preparations for his return to Belpre, tying up his furs in bundles and storing them in his canoe. He was aware that, as the snow had almost disappeared danger from Indian attack was largely increased, and he had one day been admonished of the peril of his situation by hearing a rifle shot, though far away in the direction of the Indian town. On the day he had set for his departure he ate his last meal in the little hut which had given him shelter all the winter, and had started to walk down the river to his canoe, when his eye fell upon a solitary Indian slowly approaching with eyes intent upon the ground, examining, he surmised, the tracts which he had made the day before as he came to his lodging place. Fleehart secreted himself behind a tree, and when the Indian had come near enough, took deliberate aim and sent a heavy rifle ball upon a sure death errand. He rushed immediately upon the fallen redskin to secure his scalp, but being diverted by a number of glistening brooches and other ornaments upon the dead warrior's breast and arms, began to tear them off and place them in the bosom of his hunting shirt. As he was thus engaged a rifle ball passed through his clothing, and looking in the direction whence the report had come he saw three Indians rapidly approaching. He took to flight and the Indians followed him as closely as they could, firing as they ran. Several times he stopped behind trees hoping to get a shot at his foes, but as they, on each occasion, immediately tried to flank him he was obliged again and again to run. The chase continued several miles on the level bottom, and finally, Fleehart, resolving to end the chase, shaped his course toward the high, steep hill which walled the valley. The Indians were encouraged now, for they believed they could at least come near enough, as the runner toiled up the ascent, to bring him to earth with their rifles, but they were chagrined after pressing ahead with all of the rapidity they could to see Fleehart spring up the rugged side of the hill with speed scarcely abated, and before they could fire upon him he had gained such a height that their shots were harmless, though one of them cut the handle of his hunting knife. The pursuers now gave up the chase, and Fleehart, making a long circuit among the hills, reached the place where his canoe was hidden just as darkness came on. He pushed out into the middle of the Scioto, paddled his canoe with vigor for several hours and went rapidly down stream. Being very tired he lay down toward the middle of the night, and quietly sleeping, the current swept him onward until he awoke at dawn and found himself floating out upon the broad bosom of the Ohio. From the mouth of the Scioto he pushed his canoe up stream, keeping close to the south shore, and in a few days reached Belpre. On numerous other occasions Fleehart was absent on long excursions into the forest, alone or with companions and he was usually the first to sally from the garrison when Indians were seen in the vicinity.

The winter of 1793-94 passed quietly and peacefully at the several settlements. The spring, which in time of peace, the husbandman everywhere hails with joy, brought gloomy feelings to the settlers. Predatory incursions were again made by the Indians when the snow had disappeared, and again was Belpre the scene of horrible murder.

John Armstrong, an emigrant from Pennsylvania, had arrived in the fall of 1793, and during the succeeding winter resided at the upper settlement, occupying with his wife and large family of children, a portion of Isaac Barker's block-house, which formed a part of the defence known as Stone's garrison. In the spring, Armstrong and Peter Mixner, who together owned a floating mill moored in the rapid current near the Virginia shore, moved to that side of the river in order to more conveniently manage their useful property and avoid the trouble of frequently crossing the stream. There were already two cabins there, of which Armstrong took the lower and his friend the upper, but after residing in his for a few weeks, Mixner built another, a few rods farther up stream, and beyond the limit of the little clearing. As soon as it was ready for occupation the family was transferred to it. Mrs. Armstrong had taken up her residence on the Virginia shore very unwillingly. Her parents had both been killed by Indians only a short time before in Mifflin county, Pennsylvania, and the remembrance of that event with all of its sickening details was constantly in her mind. Perhaps too she had a presentiment that the same fate was to overtake her and her children. Her husband relying upon the close proximity of the garrison and the block-house upon the island, was not apprehensive of danger, neither did Mixner and his wife seem to be troubled at all by fears of attack. The fate of which Mrs. Armstrong had a horrible foreboding came upon her in the night of the twenty-fourth of April. Her husband was awakened in the night by the loud barking of his watch-dog, and grabbing his rifle he went out without dressing himself, elated with the idea of getting a shot at a bear, for one had been in the vicinity of his hog-pen the night before, and he supposed that a second visit was the cause of the present disturbance. He had gone but a few steps from his cabin when he saw indistinctly through the darkness several forms which he knew to be Indians. Hastily firing his gun at them and hallowing for help, he retreated into the cabin, barred the door and ascended to the loft, where three of his children were sleeping. Mrs. Armstrong was aroused, and just as the Indians broke down the door, was endeavoring, with an infant in her arms, to climb out of the chimney, which was unfinished and quite low. She was instantly tomahawked, as were also two young children, and all three were quickly scalped. The murderers then turned their attention to the loft, from which they heard sounds, and two or three of them going up the ladder, found Elizabeth Armstrong, a girl fourteen years of age, and two boys younger, whom they brought down and compelled to gaze upon their lifeless mother and infant brother and sister lying upon the blood-drenched puncheon floor. Armstrong had forced an opening through the roof and made his escape to the mill, where his two oldest sons were. Mixner and his wife were aroused by the shot which Armstrong had fired and the crashing in of the cabin door, listened for any further sounds that might indicate the cause of the disturbance, and overheard the Indians talking. Mrs. Mixner had been a prisoner among the Wyandots and she recognized the language as that of this nation. She could not catch every word, but enough was understood to indicate that the Indians were speculating upon the whereabouts of the people who had lived in the upper cabin which was now empty. Mixner hurriedly got his family into his canoe and paddled out into the river. When opposite the Armstrong cabin they could distinctly hear the sobs of the girl and crying of the boys, who, taken prisoners, were perhaps apprehending the fate to come momentarily upon them which had already overtaken three of the family. Mixner arrived at the garrison about the same time that Armstrong did, and the story which they told created much alarm. No attack was made, however, and at day dawn a party of men from Stone's, joined by others from the island block-house, went over to the Armstrong cabin and found the frightful scene which they had been led to expect awaited them. The bodies of Mrs. Armstrong and her children were brought to the Ohio side and buried. Armstrong and Mixner had supposed that all of the inmates of the cabin had been slaughtered, and the truth was not known until the visit was made in the morning. The Wyandots were pursued that day by a strong party headed by the rangers. Their trail was easily followed for some distance up the Ohio to a place where the Indians had raised their sunken canoes, and later in the day was again discovered some distance up the Hocking river where the boats had been abandoned. The footprints of the children were distinctly preserved in the soft earth of the bank. Fearing that the little captives would be tomahawked should the party be overtaken and engaged in a fight, the pursuit was given up and the men returned to the garrison. They learned that there had been about twenty Wyandots in the band and that when they attacked the Armstrong cabin they were returning from the vicinity of Clarksburgh, where they had also committed some murders. The three children were all ultimately restored to freedom, though not until after the close of the war. Jeremiah, aged eight years at the time of the capture, was adopted by the celebrated chief Tahre (the Crane), and a portion of the period of his captivity was passed at Wyandot town, on the site of Columbus, in which city he afterwards lived for many years.

At Waterford there had been no hostilities for so long a period that the settlers, whose number had been increased by the arrival of several families and single men, resolved this spring—1794—to send out a colony. A block-house was accordingly erected at the confluence of Olive Green creek and the Muskingum, four miles above Waterford; several ordinary cabins were clustered around it, and all were enclosed within a stockade. The settlers here were Able Sherman and wife, their son Ezra and his wife, and two unmarried sons of the former, but grown men; Ezekiel Hoit, wife and children; Aaron Delong, wife, son and two daughters; Mathew Gallant, wife, and children, and George Ewing, wife and children. [The last named became the pioneer settler of Ames township, Athens county. Among his children at Olive Green was one in his fifth year destined to be eminent in the counsels of the Nation—Thomas Ewing.] Altogether the station contained about thirty persons. This little settlement, as will be seen presently, was not exempt from Indian atrocities. One of its leading men, the head of a family, fell a victim to the savages a few weeks after removal to his new home. But for the present we leave the people of the infant settlement of Olive Green, pursuing the usual avocations of the pioneer, and looking forward hopefully to the time when they would be entirely free from danger and from the restraint of life within a stockade.

On the tenth of May Robert Warth was killed almost within a stone throw of Fort Harmar. He was at work for, and only a few rods from, Benjamin Ives Gilman, when two Indians who had hidden behind a brush pile rose up and fired upon him. Had they seen Gilman he would doubtless have been shot also, but after they had both emptied their rifles they were unable to cut off his retreat to the fort. John Warth, one of the rangers, ran out when he heard the report of the guns, and catching sight of the Indians running up the steep hillside, one of them waving the bloody scalp of his brother, fired upon them, and probably with effect, as their exultant yells were instantly hushed and the one with the scalp was noticed to start as if wounded and with difficulty scaled the hill. Several years later the bones of an Indian were found walled up in a little cave near the path by which the murderers of Robert Warth retreated. So it is possible that this, the last hostility of Marietta, was avenged.

Early in June another atrocity was perpetrated within the limits of the Ohio company's purchase. Abel Sherman, of Olive Green, taking his rifle, went out to search for the cows which had been missing for several days, and which his fellow inmates of the new garrison feared had been detained by the Indians to draw them out. Thinking that possibly they might have joined the cattle belonging at Fort Frye, or that the rangers there might have seen them in the woods, he directed his steps down the Muskingum to that garrison. He did not arrive there until towards sundown, and some of the more prudent settlers tried to persuade him to remain with them until morning, suggesting that the absence of the cows was a sure indication that Indians were in the vicinity; but the old man, regardless of danger, started upon his return. An hour later the inmates of the Olive Green block-house heard the report of two guns, and Ezra Sherman, sure that one of them was his father's, and that he had been attacked by the dreaded enemy, took down his rifle from the wall and ran as fast as possible in the direction from which the sound of the firing had come. He soon reached the spot—only a quarter of a mile away—upon which the encounter had taken place, and found his father dead and scalped. The body lay in a little patch of May apples or mandrakes, and it was evident that the kind and thoughtful old man had been surprised while gathering some of them to take to the children at the garrison which he was nearing, for the bosom of his hunting shirt was filled with them. The next morning a party of men went up from Fort Frye and buried him near the mouth of the run by which he had fallen, and which to this day is known as "Dead Man's run." The utmost consternation and grief were caused at Olive Green when young Sherman came in with the news of his father's death. The settlers had all seen much of the horrors of Indian warfare, but this sudden taking off of one of their own small circle, produced a deeper impression than any prior event, and made them more keenly alive to the danger. During the few subsequent months they lived in constant fear of attack or the waylaying of some of their members.

There is a sequel to the story of the murder of Abel Sherman. In the summer of 1798, when the prosperity of peace was beginning to bless the country, and industrial pursuits had replaced the savage employment of hunting men and beasts, a company of salt makers at work on Salt creek, in Muskingum county, was visited by an Indian known as Silverheels, who lived in the vicinity and was generally regarded as a well-disposed, good-natured child of the forest, and half-pitied as a lingering, lone, and melancholy individual of the vanquished race. He had been drinking when he came to the salt-makers' camp, and was there given more of the crazing firewater, under the influence of which, emerging from his habitual sombre taciturnity, he became loquacious and boastful. His tongue ran on fast and excitedly in narration of achievements in the chase, and presently of deeds of prowess and adventure in the war with the whites. The men for the most part listened with idle interest to what they considered the vaporings of vanity, but there was one among them who was strangely thrilled by the narration of an encounter which took place on the Muskingum in the summer of 1794. The narrative fitted in nearly all of its details the killing of Abel Sherman, and the man who was so deeply moved was his son, Josiah. As one circumstance after another was mentioned, which the young man knew to be true of the murder of his father, his fury arose almost to the pitch of frenzy. He could with difficulty restrain himself from springing upon the drunken Indian, exultingly dwelling upon his father's death, and slaying him upon the spot, but he reflected that possibly the savage had only known of the circumstance he so graphically detailed from hearing them told by others, and he controlled his passion, not even making the slightest remark upon the story which had aroused it. But he was filled with a determination to satisfy his doubts in the matter. He did not relax his stern intention to be executioner should he become sure of Silverheel's guilt, but he resolved first to investigate. The Indian, with tongue loosed by liquor, had told how the old man had been shot down while gathering May apples, that his hunting shirt bosom was filled with them; remarked upon the peculiar formation of his head (a kind of a double crown), which had enabled his slayer to secure a very large scalp, which he said he had divided in two, and obtained fifty dollars for at the British post at Detroit, and in conclusion said that the gun of the murdered man had been placed in a hollow log near the scene of the tragedy. Young Sherman anxious to gain the corroborating testimony which the firing of the gun would afford, soon after went to the spot where his father had fallen. There, sure enough, in a hollow log where the murderer had placed it four years previously, was the large, peculiar musket his father had owned. The iron barrel and the lock which still contained the carefully prepared flint, were thickly encrusted with red rust, and the stock was so rotten that it broke as it was lifted from its hiding-place. The finding of the gun had a strong effect upon Josiah Sherman. He regarded it as proof positive of the truth of the drunken Indian's words, and no longer doubted that the savage had indeed committed the act of which he boasted. Not many days later two hunters traversing the woods came upon the dead body of Silverheels, bearing the mark of a rifle ball over the heart.

The narrative of the incident forms a digression from the account of the war, but we give it in this connection as it was a direct outgrowth of an event of 1794. Another digression is now in order. Turning from the recital of local occurrences we see that while they have been the exciting topics of the settlers' conversation in Washington county, General Wayne had been carrying terror into the Indian country along the Miamis, the Whitewater, the Wabash, the Auglaize and Maumee.

In the autumn of 1793 and the following winter and spring, peace negotiations having proved unavailing, he had built Fort Recovery, near the field on which St. Clair's army had been defeated in November, 1791; Fort Wayne, where the Indiana town of that name now stands, and Fort Defiance, at the confluence of the Auglaize and Maumee; and now preparatory to striking a blow which should compel peace, he was awaiting an answer to his last amicable offer, "actuated by the purest principles of humanity and urged by pity for the errors in which bad and designing men" had led the confederated tribes. But the Indians were for war. Little Turtle (Michikinaqua), of the Miamis, alone in the council, was for peace. "We have beaten the enemy," said he, "twice, under separate commanders. We cannot expect the same good fortune always to attend us. The Americans are now led by a chief who never sleeps. The night and the day are alike to him; and during all the time that he has been marching upon our villages, notwithstanding the watchfulness of our young men, we have never been able to surprise him. Think well of it. There is something whispers to me, it would be prudent to listen to his offers of peace."

The decisive "battle of Fallen Timbers," or as it is sometimes called the battle of the rapids of the Miami (Maumee), occurred upon the twentieth of August, 1794.

It was followed by a vigorous campaign, which secured the results already gained by Wayne's great victory, and practically terminated the Indian war, and tranquilized the whole border country. Still some Indian depredations were committed until nearly a year later, or August 3, 1795, when peace was formally declared, and the old treaties of purchase ratified by the treaty of Greenville.

An attempt was made to keep up strict discipline in the Ohio company's garrisons during the period intervening between Wayne's victory and his treaty, but the settlers generally felt so secure after the former event that they could not be restrained and often took great risks. Belpre, which all through the war seemed a fated post, had yet to suffer one more loss. Jonas Davis, a young man, resident at Stone's garrison (the upper settlement), one day in February, 1795, while on his way back from Marietta, where he had gone on some errand, discovered an old skiff among some driftwood by the Ohio river, and on the following morning went up a distance of three miles to break it up and get the nails out of it. Nails were very scarce and hard to get at that time, and Davis had especial need for some as he was preparing a little cabin which he intended to occupy with his bride expectant, a daughter of Isaac Barker, as soon as their marriage should take place, and the time set for that ceremony was so near that both of the young people had provided themselves with their wedding garments. The young man on reaching the boat had begun to pull it to pieces, and it was supposed was so intently engaged that he did not hear the approach of an enemy, and was shot down without a moment's warning. He was missed from the garrison at evening and his betrothed was thrown into great distress as the night passed away and he did not return. In the morning a party of men who went out to look for him, led by the rangers, discovered his body lying by the wrecked boat, a small axe which he had been using, still in the tight grip of his dead hand. He had been scalped and stripped of his clothing. The death of Davis made a deep impression upon the Belpre settlers, and four young men from Stone's garrison, who had been among his warmest friends, determined to avenge him if possible. As soon as they heard the particulars of the murder they started in pursuit of the Indians, led by John James, one of the bravest and most alert of the men at their settlement. At Gallipolis they were joined by four volunteers and from that point they scouted up Raccoon creek. One of their men was taken sick the first day out, and as another was obliged to return with him, but six were left in the party. They pushed on, however, and on the following day reached the headwaters of Symmes' creek, where the Gallipolis rangers had said a party of Indians were engaged in hunting. A beaver skin cap was found which had been left by an Indian to mark the place where he had set a trap. This discovery corroborating the rangers' assertion, the men knew they were in the immediate vicinity of an Indian camp and supposed it to be that of a band to which the murderers of Davis belonged. They accordingly concealed themselves and holding a whispered council decided to fall upon the Indians under cover of night. Fortunately they were baffled in their design. An Indian returning from a hunt found their trail and was following it toward their hiding-place, when he was seen by Joseph Miller, one of the party, who quickly raised his rifle and fired at him. The Indian fell, evidently badly hurt, and John James rushed toward him tomahawk in hand, intending to dispatch him. As he did so the wounded Indian partly raised himself from the ground and uttered a ringing war-whoop, which was quickly answered from the camp only two or three hundred yards away, and by so many voices that the party of whites were much alarmed. They had supposed the camp to contain not more than their own strength, but fully a score of voices had been raised in response to the call of the wounded Indian, and almost immediately as many Indians came into view, rushing through the tangled undergrowth of the forest. James and his party seeing that the odds were so largely against them took to flight, and, assisted by the friendly darkness which had settled about them, soon put a considerable distance between them and their pursuers. The Indians, unable to follow their trail set their dogs on the retreating party, and followed on, guided by the sound of their barking. Two or three of the animals were silenced either with musket balls or tomahawk, and thus deprived of their lead the Indians lost ground rapidly. Arriving at the east fork of Symmes' creek, a difficulty arose which threatened to so long delay the fugitives as to allow their foes to overtake them.

There had been heavy rains, and the stream, ordinarily small, was now swollen so that it covered the entire bottom in the little valley. A raft was quickly made (a common expedient among the borderers and Indians, but when they attempted to cross upon it it became entangled in the submerged bushes and no effort that could be made would dislodge it. Abandoning the raft the six men, now so wet and cold that they were seriously hampered in their movements, made their way along the bank until they came to a place where it was possible to ford the stream. Taking their position upon a high bank which commanded this fording-place, they halted for rest and a chance to take advantage of their pursuers. They expected the Indians soon to make their appearance and intended to fire down upon them while they were in the water. After waiting an hour or more and hearing nothing of the Indians they pushed on to Racoon creek, which they crossed upon a raft, and travelling rapidly all day reached Gallipolis just at evening, having been on foot twenty four hours with the exception of two or three very brief intervals of rest, and travelled about fifty miles. The Gallipolis rangers the next day discovered that the Indians had followed the young men until they were within two or three miles of the settlement. The young men returned more leisurely to Belpre. Their expedition had taken them one hundred miles from home into the midst of the forest. During their absence they were the subject of a great deal of solicitude at the garrison, and all felt much relieved when they returned.

The closing tragedy of the war in Washington county took place in the summer of this year—1795—and the scene of its enactment was the vicinity of Waterford which since the futile attack upon the garrison in 1791 had not only suffered less annoyance from petty depredations than the Marietta and Belpre settlements, but by some kind fate or dispensation of Providence, had—although several of its people were taken captives—lost not a single man by death. [Abel Sherman, it must be remembered, was when killed a resident at Olive Green.] Indians had frequently been in the vicinity of Fort Frye during the continuance of the war, but they did not seem to cherish any such malice against the settlers as they did against the Virginians, "the Long Knives," and they were known several times to have peacefully passed by the Waterford people only to fall on the settlements south of the Ohio with relentless fury. They had been longer at war with the Virginians and hating them most thoroughly, never letting an opportunity go by for inflicting injury upon them, and often made long expeditions for the express purpose of assailing their little stations. While they had a bitter and long continued feud with the latter and many old hostilities to avenge, they were actuated in the war upon the Ohio settlers by less intense hostility—a feeling which arose principally from their dislike of seeing what they considered an encroachment upon their lands. The frequency of murderous attacks at Belpre was probably owing very largely to the situation of the settlement, upon the Ohio directly in the way of war parties returning from Virginia, who often chagrined by lack of success there sought to satisfy their desire for murder or plunder at the newer settlement. It is probable that had there been during the latter part of the war period any general desire on the part of the Indians to destroy the Ohio company's settlements, Waterford would have been the first assailed, and by a large war party. As it was the few small depredations committed there were the work of bands numbering three or four or a half dozen Indians, and those probably renegades wandering through the forest, and in obedience to their savage instincts committing murder when they could but seeking principally for plunder, or prisoners from whom they could exact labor or money for ransom. Judge Gilbert Devol and his son, Wanton, had a narrow escape from a company of Indians encamped on the banks of the Muskingum one summer day in 1793; and it had most of the time during the war been taken for granted that there were Indians in the vicinity, and precautions accordingly adopted. Since Wayne's victory, however, the settlers had lived more carelessly, and the rangers been less vigilant than of old.

This was the condition of affairs in the summer of 1795, and still as the treaty had not yet been made the members of the colony retained in some degree their prudent method of conducting their affairs. A number of young men—William Ford, Jacob Proctor, William Hart, John and Sherman Waterman, who had drawn adjoining donation lots on the south branch of Wolf creek, about four miles distant from Fort Frye—agreed to assist each other in clearing the timber, and both because it was pleasant and also prudential adopted the plan of working together in rotation a day at a time upon the five lots. On the twenty-first of May they were engaged in clearing on John Waterman's land. A house, or cabin rather, had already been built here, and as the day was showery they remained near it that they might take refuge under its roof when driven from their work. An unusually hard rain having set in they resorted to the cabin, and Sherman Waterman, when the rain had partially abated, remembering that he needed some fresh hemlock boughs for his sleeping berth, went out to cut them. He had not been gone long when the four men remaining in the cabin were startled by the report of a rifle. Silence and sombre gravity replaced the merriment of a moment before, and each man seizing his rifle sprang to a loop-hole to be ready in case of an attack. Presently Waterman came running toward the door pursued by several Indians. It was evident from his gait that he had been hurt, but he came onward at a fast run until near the door when he sank down groaning with pain. Terrified with fear that the Indians would now come up on him with their tomahawks he cried out to those within for assistance. To rush out and bring him into the cabin was to run a fearful risk of death, but among the pioneers when an emergency arose requiring self-sacrificing courage or prompt action there was always some man who could be relied upon to furnish these essentials. In this case it was William Hart. He was quickly at Waterman's side, lifted him from the ground, and amid a shower of bullets sprang back into the cabin door unharmed, though some of the rifle balls had narrowly missed him. A vigorous fire was kept up from the loop-holes and the Indians soon retreated. Waterman was in a dying condition. William Hart volunteered to carry the news of the attack down to Waterford garrison. A number of men, led by the ranger McDuffey, came back with him, and took the wounded man in a canoe to a block-house below, owned by Dean Tyler, and there, after great agony endured with really heroic fortitude, Sherman Waterman passed away that night—the last victim of Indian war in Washington county.

Wayne's treaty, otherwise known as the treaty of Greenville, was concluded at Greenville, Darke county, Ohio, upon the tenth of August, 1795, and a permanent peace was secured in the northwest. The basis of the treaty was the one made at Fort Harmar in January, 1789.

The whole number of white persons killed during the period of hostility in the Ohio company's lands, or on the Virginia shore opposite, was thirty-eight. Ten were taken captive, and of these, two died of sickness or were killed. Only four Indians were known to have been killed, though twice as many were supposed to have fallen victims to the white man's rifle.

During the period represented in the foregoing pages, there were other terrors than those of Indian stealth and Indian attack to be endured by the settlers, and they were terrors before which bravery and strength were impotent. Disease and famine, the attendant evils of war, made their dread appearance in the little garrisons. The winter of 1788–89 was one of want to many of the settlers, but scarcely a foretaste of what they were to experience. While bread was not to be had, there was still a sufficient quantity of corn to sustain life—and there was little besides in the way of food until the river opened in the spring, when those who had money could buy flour. There was no meat to be had except that which could be secured by the hunters, and they fared poorly, as the Indians had killed off all the larger game, the bears and deer, while waiting about Marietta to attend the treaty. The year 1790 brought a worse condition of things. The corn crop of the preceding fall had been so badly damaged by an early frost that it was unfit to be eaten, and produced sickness and vomiting similar to that caused by the "sick wheat" which appeared occasionally when the country was new. During the winter of 1789–90 corn fit for consumption rose to the enormous price, for those times, of one dollar per bushel, and by the last of spring following it brought two dollars. With the scarcity of game, the failure of the corn crop, and the fact that there were no domestic animals which the owners could afford to kill, the fish, with which the rivers abounded, became the principal article of food, and the one which saved many people from absolute starvation. It was only with the practice of the most rigid economy that the people were able to hold out this year until a new crop could be raised. There was little money in the possession of the settlers, and they could only make small purchases in the spring, when the boats began running. The Ohio company made small loans to those who were most needy, and the few individuals who had more than enough food for their own use were very liberal with those who were worse off, sharing with them, perhaps to their own early disadvantage. Many articles were made use of as edibles which were not generally considered of any economic value, as potatoe tops, nettles, the tender buds and shoots of various shrubs and trees, and numerous roots. Sassafras and spice bush bark were brought into common use as a substitute for tea. Their scarcity made all staple articles very dear. Salt brought eight dollars per bushel and in smaller quantities much higher prices, as, for instance, fifty cents per quart. The settlers could therefore ill afford to salt down their fish or meat. In the spring the sap of the maples was secured in as large quantities as possible, and boiled down into syrup or sugar, and those articles, now esteemed as luxuries, were served as substantial food.

So nearly famished were the inhabitants at Belpre and Marietta when the new crop began to grow, that they could not wait for them to attain maturity, but plucked small and green vegetables, such as beans, peas, corn, and summer squashes, and boiling them with sparse handfuls of coarse corn meal from the last of their hoarded store, made a kind of vegetable soup which to their half-starved lips was an hundred-fold more grateful than is the most luxurious dish to the epicure in the midst of plenty. During the terrible season of famine, Isaac Williams, the Virginia frontiersman who had settled opposite the mouth of the Muskingum, exhibited the nobleness of his nature in many acts of generosity.

He had raised a very large quantity of corn, which, planted much earlier than that of the Belpre and Marietta settlers, who had first to clear and fence their lands, was so matured when frost came as to be uninjured. He was beset by speculators, who wished to buy his entire crop at the large price of one dollar and a quarter per bushel, but uniformly refused to have anything to do with them, and sold his corn to those who needed it for food, at the usual price in years of plenty, fifty cents per bushel. Nor would he sell to any man more than was necessary for the subsistence of his family. It was his usual custom to inquire of an applicant the number of persons in his household, and sell him a proportionate number of bushels. To those who had not money to buy even at his moderate price, he readily gave credit, and in not a few cases made actual donations. The settlers very generally availed themselves of his benevolence, and the good old man, denying himself riches, had the nobler satisfaction of having relieved distress, and perhaps warding off absolute starvation.

Pestilence made its appearance before famine. The small-pox was introduced among the Point settlers at Marietta in January, 1790—and it must be borne in mind that Jenner's discovery of vaccination had not then been given as a boon to mankind, and the loathsome disease was much more dreaded than now. A sick man named Welch was put on shore by a Kentucky boat. He was taken to the house of James Owen and soon discovered to have the small-pox. Great consternation and excitement followed. A meeting of the inhabitants was called and it was decided to build a house for the sick man. This was accordingly done and he was taken to it and there died. Mrs. Owen contracted the disease but recovered. The pestilence spread fast and inoculation was resorted to as a preventive of the worst form of the disease. Houses were put up for the reception of the sick at a considerable distance from the other dwellings. Eight persons died; two of them of the number who had been inoculated.

Again in August, 1793, the settlers at the Point were alarmed by the appearance in epidemic form of the scarlet fever. It broke out among Captain Haskell's soldiers, and was probably caused by the malaria from the low ground around, and the streets within the Point garrison, which had been overflowed in March by a flood of the Ohio. The court of quarter sessions had the infected persons removed to Devol's island, but the disease had already spread, and a number of deaths occurred. The small-pox broke out again, and so the people were assailed at once by two insidious foes within the defence they had raised to protect themselves from their enemies, the Indians.

Belpre had its share in the evils of pestilence as it did of the horrors of warfare. Scarlet fever broke out at Farmer's Castle in the summer of 1792, attended by putrid sore throat. The cause was unknown, though it was doubtless the unhealthy condition of life unavoidable in a crowded garrison. It was confined principally to the children, and about fifteen of them were its victims. After the scarlet fever had subsided, and during the summer and autumn bilious and intermittent fevers prevailed, though happily in mild forms.

That more dreaded scourge—small-pox—again made its appearance in the over-crowded garrison in September, 1793, being introduced by Benjamin Patterson, one of the rangers, who had been inoculated at Marietta. It was not strange that the people who were huddled together in close quarters, guarding themselves from the Indians, who had already surprised and killed several of their number;—who had suffered from famine, and who had just seen their loved little ones carried off by fever, should feel that they were doomed to destruction. They knew that the terrible pest must sweep through their cramped quarters, and so, after holding a council, resolved upon heroic measures, and sent for Dr. True, of Marietta, to inoculate them all in their own houses. Farmer's Castle was one great hospital. Under every roof there was some person suffering from the mild form which they had taken voluntarily to themselves from the more virulent. The fatality of the disease was confined by inoculation, so that of one hundred persons affected only five died. At Goodale's garrison there were two or three more deaths. But the terrible scourge had been prevented from doing its worst. Though sorely tried, the little settlement was destined neither to succumb to the Indian, to famine, to fever, nor to pestilence.

CHAPTER XI.

LATER HISTORY OF THE OHIO COMPANY.

A Review of Some Important Matters.—The Price of Public Lands Reduced.—An Injustice to the Ohio Company.—The Rise of Securities.—Forfeited Shares in the Ohio Company's Stock Sold to the Trustees of the Scioto Company.—Plans for a Final Settlement with Congress.—Trouble Caused by Speculative Stockholders.—They Desire that the Contract of Purchase be Forfeited.—The Directors at Philadelphia in 1792.—Their Petition to Congress.—Critical Condition of the Company's Affairs.—Effect of the Indian War.—Failure of and Loss by the Treasurer, Richard Platt.—The Scioto Company Fails to Meet Its Obligation.—Impossibility of Carrying Out the Original Contract.—The Only Hope of the Company and Its Settlement, a Release.—Favorable Action of Congress.—Three Patents Issued to Rufus Putnam, Manasseh Cutler, Robert Oliver and Griffin Greene, as Trustees of the Ohio Company.—Boundaries of the Purchase.—The Donation Tract.—Beneficent Policy of the Company.—Division of the Lands.—Eleven Hundred and Seventy-three to Each of Eight Hundred and Seventeen Shares.—Names of the Members of the Ohio Company.—Number of Shares Owned by Each Person.—A Pendant to the History of the Company, Reaching Down to Recent Years.

MUCH of the later history of the Ohio company which would have been chronologically in order in the preceding pages, has been intentionally reserved for consideration connectedly in a single chapter. The most interesting topic is that which includes the release of the Ohio company from its original contract and its final settlement with Congress in 1792; but, to convey an adequate idea of the necessities of this release, and the difficulties and the perils which the company passed through, it will be necessary to review some events of prior years.

In May, 1789, at a meeting of the company held at Marietta, General Putnam and Dr. Cutler (the latter then at his house in Massachusetts), were empowered to ascertain from the different agents the number of unpaid shares, which were represented by them, to declare them forfeited, sell them if possible, and effect a final settlement with the Government. The affairs of the company were in a very unsatisfactory condition. They had paid to the Government on account of their purchase which required a million. They had no title to any part of their lands, although under their right of entry they had made a settlement and considerable improvement, and had set off to each shareholder one city lot, one three-acre lot and one one hundred and sixty-acre lot. Until the company was able to complete the division of the lands as contemplated in the articles of association, the shares were useless to the holders and almost worthless. The securities in which they were payable, had appreciated in value more than one hundred per cent. There appeared therefore, but a faint prospect of selling the forfeited shares, and unless they were sold, the final payment to the Government could not be made as provided in the original contract.

In January, 1790, the Secretary of the Treasury, Alexander Hamilton, in a report to Congress on methods of funding the public debt, recommended that the price of the public lands be fixed at twenty cents per acre, payable in coin or Government securities. With the intention of applying to Congress for a reduction in the price of the lands, General Putnam went to New York in January, 1790. He arrived upon the thirtieth, and was joined by Dr. Cutler late in February. Pending the action of Congress on the recommendation of Secretary Hamilton, they did not present their petition. Early in April it became evident that nothing could be done during that session to secure a reduction of the price of the Ohio company's lands. The friends of the company in Congress, however, were sanguine that at the next session they would be able to secure a reduction in price at least equivalent to the rise in the value of securities. William Duer, Royal Flint and Andrew Craigie, as trustees of the Scioto company, held an option from the board of treasury to purchase all the lands west of the Ohio company's territory to the Scioto river, and as far north as the tenth township. They desired to purchase of the Ohio company a tract of land near the mouth of the Big Kanawha, upon which they could locate a number of French emigrants who had already sailed. General Putnam proposed to them that they should buy the forfeited shares of the Ohio company (the number of which was concluded, from the best attainable information, to be one hundred and forty-eight), take the three acre lots, the eight acre lots, the city lots and one hundred and sixty acre lots already set apart for those shares in the portion of the Ohio company's tract which had been surveyed, and locate the remainder, one hundred and ninety-six thousand five hundred and forty-four acres, in a compact body fronting on the Ohio river, below the Big Kanawha.

They accepted, and on the twenty-third of April, 1790, Putnam and Cutler, for the Ohio company, made a contract for sale to Duer, Flint and Craigie of the tract described. The consideration was one thousand four hundred and eighty-eight dollars in specie, to be paid in sixty and ninety days; eight thousand eight hundred and eighty dollars in indents of interest, to be paid in six months, and the remainder to be paid when the Ohio company made its final settlement with Congress, at the same price per acre which that company should secure, and in the same public securities which they should pay for lands.

Duer, Flint and Craigie surrendered also to the Ohio company their right of preemption or option of purchase of all the lands north of the Ohio company's purchase to the tenth township. They were to have the same right to enter upon and occupy the lands comprised in the forfeited shares as was given the Ohio company by their contract with Congress, but no deed of conveyance was to be executed or demanded until the payments were fully completed. This contract was rightly deemed of great value to the Ohio company.* In case they should ultimately obtain a reduction in the price of their lands to twenty or twenty-five cents per acre, the amount already paid to the United States would entitle them to a larger amount of better lands in the territory comprised in the right of preemption released to them. To obtain this reduction and its application to the Ohio company's contract, they had secured a powerful ally in Colonel William Duer, formerly secretary of the board of treasury, an intimate and confidential friend of Washington and Hamilton, a man of high social standing and of reputed great wealth. If their effort in obtaining a reduction of prices failed, the original contract was at least secure.

The Indian war which broke out in September, 1790—for that was the time at which General Harmar started upon his expedition—prevented the directors from going on to New York, as they had expected to do, to continue negotiations for a settlement. The failure of the Government to take prompt and adequate measures for the protection of the settlements stopped immigration. With great difficulty many who had already settled in various parts of the purchase were prevented from returning to the east, and some did return.

A portion of the shareholders who had bought shares for speculation and had no other interest than a pecuniary one in the success of the settlement, demanded that the securities in the hands of the treasurer of the company (about twenty-five thousand dollars), applicable to the final payment, be at once divided among the shareholders, and if necessary, the contract be forfeited. Nothing but the

*At a meeting of the Ohio company's agents, June 11, 1790, at which six hundred and fifty shares were represented, the following resolution was adopted, by 621 yeas to 29 nays:

Resolved, That the sale of certain tracts of lands made by the Honorable Rufus Putnam and Rev. M. Cutler to the trustees of the Scioto company be approbated, and it is hereby approbated, and that the thanks of the agents and proprietors be given to Rufus Putnam and Mr. Cutler for their attention to the business of a settlement with Congress.—The Ohio company's journal.

firmness and good sense of Rufus Putnam and Manasseh Cutler prevented the destruction of the colony.

In February, 1792, General Putnam, Dr. Cutler, and Colonel Robert Oliver—a majority of the directors—met in Philadelphia, where Congress was then in session. The special agents and proprietors were notified by a circular letter to assemble at Philadelphia at once, bringing with them all documents necessary to make a final settlement with the treasurer of the company, Colonel Richard Platt. The directors presented a petition asking Congress that the whole amount of lands included in the company's contract (one million, five hundred thousand acres) might be deeded to them for the payment of five hundred thousand dollars, already made, and that a grant of one hundred thousand acres additional be made to the company to compensate them for lands they had donated to actual settlers and to those performing military duty, and for the expenses they were incurring in maintaining troops which properly belonged to the Government. The petition, after setting forth the facts heretofore represented, and appealing to Congress "to retrieve this unfortunate company from inevitable ruin," concluded with an earnest and touching expression of the worst fears felt by the subscribers and by the people in the settlements:

A very considerable part of the military strength of the settlement depends upon the non-proprietors to whom lands have been promised on condition of performance of military duty to the end of the present war and should the closing of this present contract be postponed until future session of Congress the company cannot fulfil their engagements to them, and if not done the directors are confidently assured that these people will desert the settlement, the inevitable consequence of which must be that a great part if not the whole of the settlements will be abandoned. Nor does the hazard of a total desertion depend only on those people. The resident proprietors sensibly feel the great loss of men and property which they have sustained, as well as the extreme distress and suffering they endured the last year. There is every reason to believe that unless they are retrieved from that State of suspense and uncertainty respecting their title, with which their minds have been so long exercised, they will make no further exertions to defend a settlement from which they are at any time liable to be driven; that if the scalping-knife and the tomahawk do not prevent an escape they will immediately retreat to some place of greater security. We will only add that the most of your petitioners have with much anxiety left their families exposed every moment to an attack from the Indians to repair to this place for the purpose of closing their contract, and should they be obliged to return without effecting this object we fear the evils we have suggested and many more will unavoidably take place.

The situation was bad enough, but it was to be worse. The agents did not assemble in Philadelphia until the eleventh of April, and before a settlement could be effected with Colonel Platt, there occurred a panic in New York and Platt failed, owing the Ohio company nearly fifty thousand dollars. Duer also failed and was thrown into prison. Flint and Craigie were carried down by Duer's failure. No payments had been made by these men, as the directors of the Scioto company on account of their contract for purchase of the forfeited shares, and it was therefore surrendered and cancelled. The committee of Congress to whom were referred the directors' petition, reported favorably to its passage, but for some reason which does not clearly appear there was much opposition to it. The probable reason was the fact which had become widely known through meetings of the dissatisfied shareholders that the company had in its treasury a large amount of securities which could be paid on account of the balance due on the contract.

A critical juncture in the affairs of the Ohio company and the settlers had been reached. Besides the combination of adverse circumstances which threatened to overwhelm the company, "the second payment, five hundred thousand dollars was now due," says General Putnam,* according to the terms of the original contract, and "non-payment it was feared would forfeit lands which had already been paid for." It was impossible to make the payment, and the company's only hope was in securing a release from the obligations incurred and more liberal terms, as contemplated in the petition. "In this mount of difficulties," adds Putnam, "Divine Providence so overruled the minds of men that Congress passed an act authorizing the President" to take those measures which practically answered the prayers of the company, and retrieved it from ruin. The bill authorizing a settlement as it finally passed April 21, 1792, directed that a deed be made to the Ohio company for seven hundred and fifty thousand acres, by fixed boundaries, for the five hundred thousand dollars in securities which had already been paid into the treasury of the United States; another for two hundred thousand two hundred and eighty-five acres additional, or about one-seventh of the amount of the original contract, to be paid for in land warrants (a large amount of which had been turned over by Colonel Platt), and a third for one hundred thousand acres in trust to be given in tracts of one hundred acres each to actual settlers. The donation tract was saved only by the vote of Vice President Adams.

Colonel Benjamin Tallmadge was chosen treasurer of the Ohio company, vice Platt, and was directed to sell all the securities on hand, reserve ten thousand dollars to pay for further work on the survey, and to divide the remainder, pro rata, among the shareholders, through their respective agencies.

Upon the tenth of May the President, in pursuance of the act of April 21st, issued three patents† to Rufus Putnam, Manasseh Cutler, Robert Oliver, and Griffin Greene, in trust for the Ohio company of associates. The patents were signed by George Washington, President, and Thomas Jefferson, Secretary of State. With the exception of one to the State of Pennsylvania, March 3, 1792, these are the first land patents issued by the Government.‡

The lands which came into the possession of the company through these patents amounted to a total of nine hundred and sixty-four thousand two hundred and eighty-five acres, or including the donation tract, one million sixty-four thousand two hundred and eighty-five—instead of the amount originally contracted for—one million five hundred thousand acres. The bill for the relief of the company at first contained a clause providing that the company might secure a conveyance for the remainder of the one million five hundred thousand acres on the payment for the same within six years at the rate of twenty-five cents per acre, but this provision was lost in the senate.

* In autobiography.

† The original patents and the contract of October 27, 1787, are in the library of Marietta college.

‡ Centennial address by Israel Ward Andrews, LL. D., president of Marietta college.

The boundaries of the Ohio company's purchase as finally fixed by survey are as follows: Beginning on the Ohio river upon the western boundary line of the fifteenth range of townships (opposite the mouth Guyandotte); thence running northerly to a point about one mile north of the south line of township number seven; thence westerly to the western boundary of the sixteenth range; thence northerly to the north line of township number thirteen; thence easterly to a point about one mile east of the west boundary of range eleven; thence north four miles; thence east to the western boundary of the senenth range; thence south along that line to the Ohio; thence along the Ohio to the place of beginning. This tract includes the whole of the present counties of Athens and Meigs, and portions of Washington, Morgan, Gallia, Vinton, Jackson and Hocking.

The donation tract lies in the northeast part of the territory above described, and is about twenty-one miles long by eight in width. The boundaries are described as follows:* Beginning on the western boundary line on the seventh range of townships at the northeast corner of the seven hundred and fifty thousand acre tract; thence running north to Ludlow's line (surveyed by Israel Ludlow at the northern boundary of the original purchase of one million five hundred thousand acres); thence along that line westwardly to the tract containing two hundred and fourteen thousand two hundred and eighty-five acres; thence south to the boundary of the seven hundred and fifty thousand acre tract; thence along that boundary, easterly to the place of beginning.

The directors of the Ohio company were the trustees of the donation tract. They had the land surveyed and boundaries established in May, 1793, and prescribed rules for their own government in donating the lands. It was decided that the settlers then in the tract should be provided with lots first.

General Putnam was appointed as the surveyor of the lands and superintendent of the donation tract business. The deeds were nearly all made out by him.

By the middle of July, 1793, seventeen thousand acres had been divided into one hundred and seventy lots. These were included in nine allotments, located in the vicinity of the Muskingum and Wolf creek. The total number of lots drawn during the year was one hundred and eighty-six. The lots which had been donated as lying outside of the tract, were covered by a new division, known as the fifth division, by which one-hundred acre lots were drawn in the company's lands as a part of each share.

There remains not much to be said of the Ohio company. When the final settlement was made with Congress its mission was practically closed. The influence, however, of the organization under whose auspices the State of Ohio and the great Northwest was opened, remained an active and potent force in the life and progress of the west.

Owing to the continuance of the Indian war, which was not ended until the treaty of Greenville, heretofore alluded to, in the summer of 1795, the surveys were not completed as soon as would otherwise have been the case. The college lands, two townships (Nos. 8 and 9 in the fourteenth range, now known as Ames and Alexander, in Athens county), were selected and surveyed in the winter of 1795-96, and so was carried out one of the wisest and most beneficent measures of the company, one which had engaged the attention of its leading men from the time the organization was effected, in 1787.

Another act of the company about this time exhibited the broad and kindly policy which had ever been one of its characteristics. The land on which the poor French settlers had located, at Gallipolis, sold to the Scioto company by the Ohio company, had reverted to the latter through the inability of the other party to pay for it. In November the lands were sold to the settlers at the low price of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre.

The last meeting of the Ohio company west of the mountains, was called at Marietta November 23, 1795, and the directors and agents continued in session until January 29, 1796. The final partition or division of lands was made at this time, and on the first of February sworn to before Josiah Monroe, justice of the peace. By this division there were set off to each share in the stock of the company the following lands: First division, one eight-acre lot; second division, one three-acre lot; third division, one city lot; Fourth division, one one-hundred-and-sixty-acre lot; fifth division, one one-hundred-acre lot; sixth division, one six-hundred-and-forty-acre lot, and one two-hundred-and-sixty-two-acre lot; total, one thousand one hundred and seventy-three acres.

Following is a list of the members of the Ohio company, among whom the lands were divided. There were eight hundred and nineteen shares classified in sixteen agencies; this order has been followed in making the list, the names being alphabetically arranged under each agency. Where an individual owned more than one share the number is given. Where two or more names appear in the same line there was a partnership in the share or shares. The list includes the names of many eminent characters and a very large number which are familiar to residents of Washington county. There are others which will appear strange, even to those persons best acquainted with the settlement of the Ohio company's purchase. A large proportion of this class belong to individuals who bought shares from purely speculative motives, and never settled in the territory of which they owned a part.

JOEL BARLOW'S AGENCY—NINETEEN SHARES.

Joel Barlow and associates, 3 shares; Abijah Colton; Joseph Day and associates; Abiel Griswold; Sylvanus Griswold; Peleg Heath and associates; Ebenezer Hinckley and associates, Thomas Lord, assignee; Timothy Hosmer; Elizabeth Judd; Daniel Jones; Abel Mathews and associates; Thomas Stanley and associates; Nathaniel Terry; John Watson, 2 shares; Samuel Wyllis; Nathan Williams.

WILLIAM CORLISS' AGENCY—ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHT SHARES.

Samuel Aborn, 3 shares; Welcome Arnold, 4 shares; Nathan Angel, 3 shares; Moses Brown, jr., to Nicholas Brown, 3 shares; Nicholas * Land Laws of Ohio.

Brown, 5 shares; John Brown, 5 shares; James Brown, 5 shares; Alice Brown, 2 shares; Sally Brown, 2 shares; Sarah Brown, 4 shares; Abigail Brown, alias Francis, 2 shares; Obediah Bowen; Shubael Burr; Samuel Burr; Jabez Bowen, 2 shares; William Bowen; William Bradford; William Barton; Nicholas Brown, jr.; Nicholas Brown, 3 shares; Asahel Carpenter; William Corliss, John Corliss; Benjamin Cumstock; John Carter; George Corliss, William Bowen; George Corliss, William Sessions; George Corliss, Joseph Nightengale; John Child; Thomas Carpenter; Charles De Wolf; Marquis De Chapedelaine, Thomas L. Halsey, 3 shares; Mary Demount, Rebecca Demount; Jedediah Ensforth; Josiah Green, Boon Vaughn; James Grammon, Christopher Winsor; Nathan Grosvenor; Thomas L. Halsey; Enos Hitchcock; William Humphrey; Amos Horton; William Holroyd; John Jenks, Joseph Jenks, 2 shares; John Mumford; James Munroe; David W. Marsh; James Manning, William Holroyd, Nightingale and Clark, 5 shares; Jeremiah Olney, 2 shares; Christopher Olney; Nicholas Power; Saunders Pitman; Joseph and William Russell, 2 shares; John Spurr; Cyprion Sterry; Archibald Stewart, 2 shares; Stephen Smith; Henry Smith; Thomas Sabin; Simeon Thayer; John Walker; Joseph Winsor; John Woldron; Samuel Wyatt; Nathan Waterman; Nathaniel Wheaton; Samuel Wardwell.

A. GRAY'S AGENCY—SEVENTY-ONE SHARES.

Stephen Arnold; Thomas Arnold; William Arnold, 8 shares; Israel Bowen; James Brown, son of Nathaniel; Joseph Briggs; John L. Boss; John Breeze, 2 shares; William S. Brown; Abijah Babcock; Peleg Clark; Archibald Crary, Samuel King; Archibald Crary, Simeon Martin; Wanton Casey, 2 shares; James Corydon; Isaac Senter; Ethan Clark; Jonathan Devol; Nicholas Easton, 2 shares; John Fulham, Major Fairchild; George Gibbs; William Greene, governor, 2 shares; Charles Greene; Elihu Greene & Co., Elihu and Christopher Greene; William Greene, son of Nathaniel, Griffin Greene; Catharine Greene, Griffin Greene; Caleb Gardiner, 2 shares; Job Greene; William Hammond; Alexander Hamilton, Robert Stephens; Thomas Howland; Thomas Hughes; Henry Hunter; Zebulon King, his heirs; Daniel Lyman; David Olyphant, 2 shares; Anne Olyphant; Peter Phillips, Northrop Daniel; Abraham Redwood, 3d, Christopher Champlin; Thomas Rice; Henry Rice; Adam Richmond, Abraham R. Rivera; Jacob R. Rivera; Thomas Rumrill; Hannah Sheffield; Benjamin Slocum; Robert Stephens; Nicholas P. Tillinghast, 2 shares; Waterman Tibbets; Peter Turner, 3 shares; John Topham; Pardon Tillinghast (West Greenwich); Pardon Tillinghast (Exeter); William Tew; William Vernon; James M. Varnum, Samuel Fowler; Elizabeth Whitman.

M. CUTLER'S AND DODGE'S AGENCY—EIGHTY-SIX SHARES.

John Atchinson, 3 shares; Samuel Adams; William Burnham; John Burnham, 3 shares; Joseph Barrel, 5 shares; Augustus Blanchard; Nathaniel Brown; William Bartlett; Manasseh Cutler, 5 shares; William Cleveland; Ephraim Cutler to Joseph Multon; Ephraim Cutler; Lot Cheever; Ezekiel Cooper and Jethro Putnam; Richard Dodge, Nathan Woodbury; Isaac Dodge, Oliver Dodge; Jonathan Deane, 2 shares; John Dodge, of Beverly, 2 shares; Nathaniel Deane, jr.; Moses Everett; John Friend; Daniel Fuller; Ezekiel Goldthwait, Nathaniel and Stephen Porter; Jesse Gay; Hugh Henderson; Samuel Hildreth, 2 shares; Thomas Hartshorn; John J. Herd, 2 shares; Samuel Hitchburn, Daniel Story; Stephen Jewett, Benjamin I. Gilman; Porter Lummis; Peter Oliver; David Pearce, jr., 5 shares; Obediah Parsons; Allen Putnam, Amos Porter; David Pearce, 4 shares; William Pearce, 2 shares; Matthew Park, Elijah Thorp; John Safford; Winthrop Sargent, of Boston, 2 shares; Peter Shaw; Winthrop Sargent, of Gloucester; William Story, Daniel Story; George Stephens; John Treadwell, 2 shares; Israel Thornkike, 2 shares; Robert Williams, jr., 4 shares; Benjamin Wadsworth, 3 shares; Elisha Whitney, William Burleigh; Jonathan Williams, 2 shares; Haffield White, 2 shares; Joseph Willard.

EPHRAIM CUTLER'S AGENCY—THIRTEEN SHARES.

Ebenezer Atwood; Alpheus Converse, 2 shares; Benjamin Converse, his heirs; Aaron Clough; 'Squire Cady; John Douglass; Daniel Davis; Isaac Knight; Joseph Leaveus; Jonathan Russell; Jesse Whipple; George Wilson, George Wilson and heirs.

E. DOWNER'S AGENCY—EIGHTEEN SHARES.

Henry Bowers, jr., 2 shares; John Bowers; Eleazer Baker; Stephen Cook; Eliphalet Downer, 2 shares; Nathaniel H. Furnass; Charles Knowles; Baker & Lamb; John Lamb; William Marshall; Nathaniel Ruggles; William Rhodes; John Stratton; Elisha Whitney, 2 shares; John Waldo.

FREEMAN'S AGENCY—NINE SHARES.

Joseph Bates; Barakiah Bassett; Joseph Nye, of Norwich, 5 shares; Joseph Thomas; Abraham Williams.

E. HARRIS' AGENCY—THIRTY-ONE SHARES.

Jacob Brown; John Bond, Samuel Webster; Jonathan Call, Jabez B. True; Jonathan Cass; Samuel Currier; Timothy Dexter, 5 shares; Samuel L. Dexter; Jeremiah Fogg; Benjamin Ives Gilman; Edward Harris, 3 shares; Ezra Lunt, 4 shares; William Moulton; Josiah Munroe, Haffield White; Thomas Odiorne; Dudley Odlin, Benjamin Ives Gilman; Stephen Swasey; Joseph Swasey, jr.; Jabez True; Samuel Tenney; Nathaniel Whitmore, 2 shares; Amos Whitmore.

JACKSON'S AGENCY—THIRTEEN SHARES.

John Hurd; George Ingersoll; John Coffin Jones, 5 shares; Henry Jackson and associates; John Lucas; Rufus Putnam, 2 shares; Job Sumner, Jesse Sumner; William Torrey.

MAY'S AGENCY—THIRTY-FIVE SHARES.

James Bowdoin, 5 shares; Thomas Blake; William Breck; Benjamin Cobb, 2 shares; William Dall; Ebenezer Dorr; Elbridge Gerry; William Hoskins; John Lucas; John May, jr.; Joseph May; Henry K. May; William R. May; Frederick May; John May, William Marshall; Samuel H. Perkins; James Patterson, 2 shares; Thomas Russell, 5 shares; John Sprague; Winthrop Sargent, John May and James Smith; Russell Sturgis; Elisha Ticknor; Robert Williams, jr.; Ebenezer Wales.

PARSONS' AGENCY—NINETY-ONE SHARES.

David Adams, 2 shares; Caleb Atwater; Samuel Broome, 5 shares; Jeremiah Butler; Isaac Burnham; Nathan Beers; David Bull; James Backus; John H. Buell; Moses Cleveland, 2 shares; Wheeler Coit; Levi Chapman; Levi Chapman, Samuel Shipman; Elnathan Camp; Eliphalet Dyer; Samuel Dorrance; Richard Douglass; James Davenport, John Deshon; Jonathan Deming, John Deshon; Andrew Fitch; Samuel Frothingham; Ebenezer Frothingham; Thomas Grosvenor; Peter Heyleger, 5 shares; Jedediah Huntington, Azariah Lathrop; Nehemiah Hubbard, 2 shares; Elijah Hubbard; Jonathan Heart, Abigail Heart; David Humphreys; Elisha Lord; Christopher Leffingwell; Humphrey Lyon; William Lord; Joshua Miles, 2 shares; John Morgan; John Meigs; John Newton, jr., Abner Lord; Samuel H. Parsons, William Parsons, etc., 5 shares; Jeremiah Platt, 5 shares; Samuel H. Parsons, 2 shares; Humphrey Pratt, Israel Putnam, 4 shares; William Parsons; Enoch Parsons; Jonas Prentiss; Joshua Parsons, Edward Miller; Mehetable Parsons, John Nisewonger; John Pierpont; David F. Sill, Elias Stillwell; Abraham Scranton; Abigail Savage; George Starr; Jonathan Trumbull; Daniel Tyler, jr.; Gad Tallcott; Benjamin Throop; Robert Walker; Joseph Walker; John R. Watrous; Daniel Watrous; Andrew Buckus, John P. Jones, his heir; John Davenport, John P. Jones, his heir; Andrew Huntington, John P. Jones, his heir; Timothy Larrabel, John P. Jones, his heir; Elijah Lathrop, jr., John P. Jones, his heir.

PUTNAM'S AGENCY—FIFTY-NINE SHARES.

Samuel Brazier, Francis Choat; Timothy Bigelow, Silas Bent; Silas Bent; William Browning, jr.; John Burnham; William Caldwell, Nathan Goodale, 2 shares; Caleb Clapp, 2 shares; Jonathan Choat, Benjamin Miles; Nathaniel Cushing and associates; Asa Coburn and associates, 3 shares; Joshua and Daniel Clapp; Daniel Clapp; Elijah Dix, 2 shares; Frederick Frye; Isaac Farewell; Peregrine Foster; Samuel Frost; Dwight Foster; Paul Fearing; Samuel Flagg; Nathan Goodale, 2 shares; Benjamin Haywood; Elias Hall and associates, 2 shares; Daniel Loring; John Lyon; John Mathews and associates; Joel Marble; Thomas Nixon; William R. Putnam; Edwin Putnam; Ezra Putnam; William Rice; Henry Reidle, 2 shares; John Reed, John Miles; Oliver Rice, 2 shares; John Stanton, of Boston; John Stanton, of Worcester; Joseph Stephens; Jonathan Stone, 2 shares; Caleb Strong; Daniel Strong, 2 shares; John Sprague, 2 shares; Benjamin Stone and associates; Winthrop Sargent, 2 shares; Isaiah Thomas, Nicholas Pike; Benjamin Tupper, his heirs.

SARGENT'S AGENCY—ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-EIGHT SHARES.

Joseph Ashton; Ercurius Beatty, 3 shares; Daniel Britt; Philander Brazier; Elizabeth Bowdoin, 4 shares; Anne Brown; James Bradford, his heirs; Leonard V. Borland; Sebastian Beaman; William Constable, 5 shares; Henrietta Colden, 5 shares; David Cobb; Edward Carrington, 4 shares; John H. Chevallie, 2 shares; Caleb Champney; Florence Crowley; Thomas H. Condy; Ebenezer Crosby; John Delafield; De Neufville, 2 shares; Ebenezer Denny; John Doughty, Hamilton Kerr; John Doughty; Israel Evans, 2 shares; William Edgar, 5 shares; Andrew Francis; John Green, William Gridley; Alexander Hamilton, 3 shares; Joseph Hardy; Michael Hillegas; Josiah Harmar, 2 shares; Ebenezer Hazzard; Abijah Hammond, 5 shares; Jonathan Haskell; Elnathan Haskell; John Jeffers; Henry Jackson; Henry Kuhl; Charles Knowles, 2 shares; Henry Knox; John Lawrence, 3 shares; Walter Livingstone, 3 shares; Arthur Lee, 2 shares; Isaac Ledyard, 2 shares; Brockholst Livingstone, 5 shares; Christopher Marshall; John May, Winthrop Sargent; William M. Morris; William McComb, 5 shares; John Mercer; Alexander McComb, 5 shares; William McCurdy; Elizabeth McComb; John Murray; Joseph May; Joseph Nourse; James Nicholson, 3 shares; Rufus Putnam; John Pratt, 2 shares; John Rose; Platt Rogers; Thomas Seward, John Dyer, 2 shares; Paschal N. Smith, 5 shares; Caleb Swan; Melancthon Smith; Derrick Schuyler; David Strong; Annanias R. Sacket; Arthur St. Clair; Evert W. Swart; John M. Scott; Sarah Sears; Robert Underwood, 2 shares; William Wickham; Matthew Witzell; Joseph Williams, 2 shares; Jeremiah Williams; Frederick Wizenfeldt, James O'Hara; Thomas Wallcutt; David Zeigler, 2 shares; William M. Morris.

SPROAT'S AGENCY—FORTY-THREE SHARES.

Israel Angel; Israel Angel, Christopher Windsor; Israel Angel, Jeffrey Matthewson; Samuel Aborn; Thomas Coles; John L. Dexter, 4 shares; Solomon Drown; Caleb Fisk, 2 shares; Theodore Foster; Oliver Fuller; Peleg Fisk; Libbens Loomis, 2 shares; Christopher Lippet; John Mawney; Elisha Mowry, jr.; Matthew Manchester, 3 shares; Ebenezer Macomber; Cogshall Olney, 3 shares; William Peck; Ebenezer Sproat, 2 shares; Ebenezer Sproat (drawn in name of Joseph Coit in E. Cutler's agency); David Sayles; Earl Sproat; Thomas Smart; Daniel Tillinghast, 3 shares; Samuel Thewber, jr.; Edward Thewber; William Wheaton; Abraham Whipple, 2 shares; Joseph Wilkinson.

TUPPER'S AGENCY—THIRTY SHARES.

Moses Ashley, Asa Hill; John Alden; Samuel Buffington; Daniel Dunham (his heirs); Asa Graves, Joseph Spencer; Noah Goodman, Aaron Howe; Samuel Kenshaw; Aaron Howe; Elijah Hunt; Perez Morton; Huldah Tupper; Ichabod Nye; Robert Oliver and associates, 2 shares; Alexander Oliver and associates; Rufus Putnam; Andrew Peters and associate, 2 shares; Asahel Pomeroy; John Quigley and associates; William Stacey, 4 shares; Calvin Smith and associate; Enoch Shephard; Benjamin Tupper, 2 shares; Benjamin Tupper, jr.; Anselem Tupper; Edward W. Tupper.

TALLMADGE'S AGENCY—FORTY-THREE SHARES.

Seth Bird; Alexander Catlin; Reuben Fox; Joseph Guthrie, 2 shares; Abel Hine; Benjamin Hunting and associates; Benjamin Hunting, etc., James Post; Benjamin Hunting, etc., David Hedges; Benjamin Hunting, etc., David Pierson; Benjamin Hunting, Augustus F. Tallmadge; David Hedges and Thomas Wickham; David Hedges and David Gardiner, 2 shares; David Hedges and Puah Davis; David Hedges and John Beardsley; David Judson, 2 shares; Ephraim Kirby; David Leavitt, jr., & Co.; James Morris, 3 shares; Samuel Southmayd; Timothy Skinner; Heman Swift, B. Tallmadge & Co.; Heman Swift, Ebenezer Nye; Josiah Starr, 2 shares; Reuben Smith; Nathaniel Taylor; Benjamin Tallmadge, 5 shares; Henry F. Tallmadge; Uriah Tracey; William S. Tallmadge; John Tallmadge for Benjamin Tallmadge & Co.; Elijah Wadsworth.

There is an interesting pendant to the history of the Ohio company, which reaches down to recent years. In the treasury of the company there were a number of Revolutionary certificates of the State of Georgia, which, owing to an irregularity in their endorsement, had been refused by the treasurer of the United States. Being non-negotiable, these certificates were practically valueless, and hence were undivided by the company. When the final partition was made, and the lands of the company set off to the shareholders, the certificates formed the only remaining property of the company (if property they could be called), except a small amount of personalty. The only value left in the shares was that which was contingent upon the negotiability of the Georgia certificates. There were few members of the company who believed that they would be recognized by the Government, and hence it was altogether a natural thing that the owners should part with their shares for trivial considerations.

Nahum Ward, a New England man, (grandson of Major General Artemas Ward, the first major general of the army), came to Marietta in 1810, and began a career as land speculator, in which capacity he eventually became the owner of colossal interests and wielded most powerful influences. He saw in the Georgia certificates the possibility of a fortune, and in order to become their possessor began to buy up the shares of the Ohio company, securing most of them for merely nominal sums. During all of the time he was prosecuting his affairs as land dealer and absorbing the shares of the company, he was making a study of the history of the Georgia certificates, and as he progressed in his investigations he became each day and year more thoroughly convinced of his ability to realize not only their face value, but the amount of interest on them, compounded at six per cent, from the year of their issuance (1777) down to the time at which payment should be secured. At a meeting of the surviving shareholders of the Ohio company, held at Providence, Rhode Island, in 1836, Mr. Ward was elected treasurer. In this capacity, representing the company as well as himself, after a long and careful preparation, he brought suit, in 1857, before the United States circuit court by an eminent attorney—John A. Rockwell, of Connecticut—for the payment of the certificates in his possession. It was represented that Mr. Ward was the legal holder of forty-three loan office certificates for the sum of four hundred dollars each, issued by authority of Congress, granted on the twenty-third of February, 1777, and to be payable in 1781; that these certificates were countersigned "by order of J. A. Treutlen, governor of Georgia," by E. Davis, jr.; that said Davis was duly authorized and appointed to countersign the certificates on behalf of the State of Georgia, by the governor of the State; that the United States had in repeated instances recognized their liability to pay, and had actually paid other certificates of the same issue, and had paid four years' interest upon those in the possession of Mr. Ward; that no objection was made that the paper was invalid until many years after the endorsement of interests upon the certificates, and then not from any want of genuineness, but upon the technical ground that the countersigning (by E. Davis, jr.,) was irregular; that there was evidence amounting to demonstration that the United States received a valuable consideration for the certificates, and that they came regularly into the possession of the Ohio company and that of the petitioner.

The counsel for the United States argued that there was no proof that the claimant was the treasurer of the Ohio company; that the company was not an incorporation, and the joint effects of the individuals composing it, if any, would pass to the survivor and his executors; that the certificates in question were not legally issued, E. Davis, jr., not being properly authorized as a commissioner to countersign them; that Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury, refused in 1790 and 1791, to fund the certificates; that the payment of interest on the certificates was no proof of their validity; and that there was no positive proof that the United States had received any consideration for the certificates.

The judgment of the court was for the claimant. It was stated as the opinion of the court that the United States was indebted in the amount due on the forty-three certificates with interest upon them and a bill was reported (based upon an estimation of each certificate at two hundred and eighty-two dollars and forty-four cents) for the relief of Nahum Ward in the sum of sixty thousand eight hundred and seventy-six dollars and ninety-nine cents. The judgment upon being reported back to Congress was, however, reversed, and an appeal was then taken to the Supreme court.

Mr. Ward was thoroughly convinced of the perfect equity of his claim. The preparation for presenting it had cost him years of his life and large sums of money. The ablest counsel working with the incentive of large contingent fees had made exhaustive efforts to win the suit. The amount for which judgment was secured in the Court of Claims did not represent the full measure of the claimant's expectation, but was within the limit prescribed by Congress, governing the amount to be sued for. The claim, with compound interest constantly increasing, amounted before litigation was finally suspended, to several millions of dollars. Mr. Ward constantly pursued his object until his death in 1861, and he was so thoroughly satisfied of the justness of the claim and so determined that the labors of years should not be lost that in his will he enjoined his heirs to carry on the suit. In accordance with his desire in 1870, William S. Ward appeared as the plaintiff in the case before the Supreme court of the United States, his counsel being ex-Attorney General Stanbery, Thomas Ewing, jr., and Judge Charles R. Rhodes. A judgment was affirmed adverse to the claimants, from which, however, Justice Field dissented, saying that he was of opinion that the demand of the plaintiff was a just obligation of the United States, as binding as any part of the public debt of the country.

And so was closed probably forever, the long continued litigation of Ward vs. the United States, growing out of the old Georgia Revolutionary certificates, which had formed a portion of the moneys of the Ohio company.

CHAPTER XII.

THE ERA OF PEACE.

Joy Occasioned by the Close of the Indian War—The Avocations of Peace Resumed—Improvements—Scarcity of Money—Dress of the Early Settlers—Spinning and Weaving—Cotton Grown Upon the Bottoms—The High Price of Salt—A Company Formed to Manufacture it—A Capital of Seventy-five Dollars—Great Numbers of Emigrants Upon the Ohio in 1796—Bad Impression of the Ohio Company's Lands Still Operates Against Development—Slow Increase in Population—Settlement of the College townships—The Streams the Main Thoroughfares for Travel—Most of the Settlers Situated Upon Them—Location of Different Classes of Inhabitants—Aspect of the Country in the Year 1800—Large Tracts Still Wild—Abundance of Game—Indians Visit the Lands Yearly to Hunt Until the Winter of 1817—Annoyance Caused by the Small Animals—Vast Pigeon Roosts—Introduction of Fruit—Fine Cattle—Belpre as a Dairy Region—Merino Sheep Brought Into the Country by Israel Putnam and Paul Fearing—Sixteen Hundred Acres of Land for a Ram—Depredation by Wolves—The Western Reserve Opened to Settlement by Connecticut—Effect Upon the Marietta Group of Settlements—Unevenness in the Distribution of Population—The Hill Lands Generally Refused by the First Settlers—The Second Period of Emigration—Various Elements of Population—Scotch Pioneers—Quakers in Barlow and Adjoining Townships—Effect of Their Arrival Upon the Value of Lands—German Settlers—Good Results of Their Industry and Frugality—Irish Population—Settlements of Colored People—Emigration From Washington County to the West.

PEACE came to the pioneer settlements after the war as the springtime comes to nature after long weary winter. Peace was the sunshine under which the land blossomed with prosperity.

The close of the war brought joy almost unspeakable to the long imprisoned and sorely harassed settlers in the Ohio company's purchase, and to all the people of the far-reaching frontier—not alone to those in the territory northwest of the beautiful river, but to all along the border of Pennsylvania, of Virginia, and of Kentucky. One old time writer says: "Never since the golden age of the poets did the 'siren song of peace and farming' reach so many ears and gladden so many hearts as after Wayne's treaty in 1795."

The Marietta, Belpre, and Waterford settlers relieved from the restraint of garrison life—and relieved from the necessity of it—went fearlessly forth to pursue those avocations from which they had been in a great measure debarred ever since their arrival in the country. Each man took possession of his own land,* and if a cabin had not before been erected upon it, proceeded to build one. The work of clearing land and sowing seed was carried on as it had never been before. The virgin soil which had been for ages shaded by the heavy forest was bared to the sunlight, and plenteous yields of grain and corn appeared to attest its richness. Men labored cheerily and with a will now that they were assured of the safety of their homes and families. Every endeavor possible was made to secure the advantages which had so long been denied these distressed and well-nigh helpless people. There seemed a general desire to make present industry atone for the enforced idleness of the past. As fast as was possible in the sparsely peopled district, roads were opened and bridges built, though for many years the rivers and the lesser streams were the highways and byways of communication and commerce. Mills were erected to accommodate the increased needs of the people, and new commodities—articles usually thought necessities, but which were luxuries to the pioneers who had long been without them—were brought into the country. Not many articles, however, were brought, for there was but little money in the settlements. So far as was possible the pioneer men and women confined themselves to the use of those materials for clothing and those food staples which they could produce by their own labor. The skins of animals were very commonly made into clothing. There were many men in the country who had complete outfits of deerskin, and a few families in which little else was used.

* A few individuals had seen fit to venture beyond the protecting walls of the garrison before the Indian war was at an end. The family of Levi Chapman, it is said, was the first that left any of the stockades to settle on a farm in Washington county. Chapman, with a family of eight boys and four girls, arrived in Marietta in 1794, and in the same year located on Duck creek, where the village of Whipple now stands, a detachment of soldiers going out with him as a guard, and assisting him to erect a block-house. Harvery Chapman, the youngest son of Levi is still living (at Kenton, Hardin county, Ohio), at the age of ninety-three years, and is the only one of the family left. He was about seven years of age when the family came to Marietta. Some of the descendants of Levi Chapman are now living upon Duck creek, some in Marietta, and others in Zanesville.

For several years buckskin was retained in use by those following agricultural occupations, and was almost universally employed for trousers for men and boys. The men wore what were commonly called hunting shirts—garments resembling coats, made to fit the form quite loosely, and worn belted or tied about the waist with a sash or deerskin thongs. These hunting shirts were ordinarily made of "linsey woolsey," woven by the women of the wearer's household. Hemp and flax were raised in abundance, and there were few women who were not adepts in weaving it into cloth. Spinning and weaving were with them almost constant occupations. In nearly every cabin there was a wheel and a loom. The patient toil of deft fingers kept the family clothed and saved the outlay of money from the scanty store, for finer, but not more serviceable cloth. Only a small proportion of the residents in the Ohio company's territory wore any other than homespun clothes, though there were, of course, some who maintained the old custom of dressing in finer fabrics, and in a style of stately elegance. Cotton was grown in small quantities for a few years, and upon the rich bottom lands a very fair yield was obtained, but it was soon demonstrated that the climate was not sufficiently warm for the profitable growing of this crop and its culture was given up. There were many, however, who wore cloth made from cotton grown by themselves along the Ohio and Muskingum. Captain Jonathan Devol constructed an ingenious machine by which the seed was separated from the fibre. Cotton was not the only product of the semi-tropical regions which the pioneers raised within the present limits of Washington county. Rice of a very good quality was grown at an early day. Neither of the southern staples, however, was found to be so practically successful as to warrant the continuance of their culture after money became so plentiful that they could be purchased when needed.

There was one article which, perhaps, more than any other, the early settlers felt the need of, and which was very scarce and very dear. It was salt. The price in cash for one bushel of coarse salt was eight dollars. Those who had money could ill afford to pay such a price, and there were many who could not if they would. Some persons experienced considerable inconvenience from being deprived of a sufficiency of this important food condiment. So great was the need that a company was formed for the operation of the salt springs in the upper Muskingum county. It was known to the settlers that the Indians had made salt somewhere in the vicinity of Salt creek (a small stream that flows into the Muskingum at Taylorsville, Muskingum county, which locality was known before the slack water improvements were made at Duncan's Falls). An attempt made to discover these springs, however, during the Indian war, was unsuccessful. In 1796, an exploring party sent out for the purpose, found the valued saline springs. When they returned with the good news a company was immediately organized by the inhabitants for prosecuting the manufacture of salt. Some idea of the dearth of money at this time may be suggested by the statement of the fact that the number of shares was set at fifty and the shares were worth one dollar and fifty cents each. A capital of seventy-five dollars, however, was sufficient for the accomplishment of the company's purposes. A party of men were sent to the locality of the springs. They sunk a well fifteen feet deep and three feet in diameter, near the edge of the creek. A section of a hollow sycamore tree was put down to exclude the fresh water and a common sweep and fall was rigged for drawing the precious salt water to the surface.

In the meantime men had been sent to Pittsburgh, and with a portion of the company's modest capital had bought twenty-four iron kettles. These were boated down the Ohio to the Muskingum, and up the latter stream to Duncan's Falls, from whence they were "packed" on horses seven miles to the well. A furnace was built in which the kettles were set, and a shelter being provided the work of making salt was begun. The fires were kept up night and day, the fifty associates of the company being divided into ten squads of five men each, who worked for two weeks at a time, and divided the watches to suit themselves. An enormous quantity of wood was burned, a yoke of oxen being kept constantly employed in hauling and a man in cutting it. At the best only about one hundred pounds of salt could be made each day and night, and it was of a poor quality, being dark colored and strongly tinctured with a bitter substance—probably muriate of lime. It was probably worth when manufactured about three dollars per bushel, but even had it cost as much as the salt brought over the mountains the manufacture would have been advantageous as the outlay was principally that of labor instead of money. The work of salt boiling was carried on for several years, the men often enduring great hardship, and on one occasion, at least, during the first winter, in intensely cold weather, narrowly escaping death, from being lost in the woods while attempting to make their way to Marietta for the purpose of securing provisions.

During the year 1796 great numbers of emigrants, many of whom had been anxiously awaiting the close of the Indian war, came down the Ohio. It is estimated that upwards of a thousand Kentucky boats or "broad-horns" floated down the river. Each boat had on board from one to two families or men. Kentucky, which before the settlement of Marietta had a population of more than thirty thousand, received large accessions from this emigration, and the group of settlements in the Symmes purchase were considerably increased in strength. A few of these pioneers, mostly from Virginia, were destined for Chillicothe, which was founded this year by Nathaniel Massie, and others located at Manchester on the Ohio (in the present limits of Adams county), which, under the name of Massie's station, had been established in the spring of 1791. Nearly all of the Virginia emigrants located in the military district reserved by the Old Dominion between the Scioto and Little Miami. The Symmes Purchase settlers were almost to a man from New Jersey. The settlement of the Ohio company's purchase depended now, as originally, almost entirely upon New England. The impression that the lands owned by this company were very sterile, had gained wide credence, and many who would doubtless have settled within the limits of the tract had they depended upon personal examination for their knowledge, being prejudiced, passed by. The increase in population was very slow, but most of the newcomers, like the original settlers, were men of far better character than the majority of those in other pioneer communities. If the progress of settlement and improvement in the Ohio company's territory was less in degree than in the richer regions farther west, it was better in kind. The undesirable elements of frontier society were in a very small minority. The majority of the emigrants were men of small fortune, liberal education, good morals, and indomitable energy. They were men who were satisfied to make the slow but sure advancement in condition which a capital of industry insures.

All of the emigrants who owned or desired to own lands in the Ohio company's purchase stopped at Marietta prior to making permanent locations. In the spring of 1797 a number of men, among whom were Alvan Bingham, Silas Bingham, Isaac Barker, William Harper, John Wilkins, Robert Linzee, Edmund, William and Barak Dorr, John Chandler and Jonathan Watkins,* urged by General Putnam, settled in the college townships, now known as Ames and Alexander, in Athens county. They loaded their effects in canoes, floated down the Ohio to the Hockhocking, and rowed up that stream to the place of their destination. Upon the bottoms along the river and upon the site of Athens was thus begun the settlement of the interior of the purchase.

One of the prominent pioneer interior settlements within the county of Washington was in Barlow township. It was the most remote from the settlements on the Ohio and Muskingum, being about the same distance from each. The nearest settlement upon the westward was on Federal creek, sixteen miles distant. The settlement was made by James Lawton and Nathan Proctor with their families in 1800, and the spot was probably chosen chiefly for the reason that it was near the intersection of the trails or traces which led from Belpre to Waterford and from Marietta to Athens.

Other settlements were formed about the same time in various localities remote from the Ohio and Muskingum but the majority of the early residents were located along the principal streams, and in the vicinity of the old and, by this time, well established communities of Marietta, Belpre and Waterford, and there were several of the back townships which were without any inhabitants at the beginning of the present century; and were very thinly settled a score of years later. The lands adjoining the streams were the first to be improved, for two reasons. First, they were richer and offered a better return for the husbandman's labor in clearing and tilling; and secondly, their location upon the streams made them more readily accessible. The streams were the thoroughfares on which nearly all traffic and communication was carried on. The best road within the boundaries of Washington county was probably that from Marietta to Zanesville, opened in 1798, but even this was, during the greater part of the year, practically impassable for laden wagons. The interior of the county was a wilderness penetrable only with great difficulty, and the few settlers who had taken up lands remote from the streams were almost completely isolated from fellowship with men. In the eastern end of the county the same order of things prevailed as in the western. The lands first bought from the Government and earliest settled were along the Ohio. The only practical difference between the development of the territory included in the seven ranges and that in the Ohio company's purchase was that in the former the population was made up almost entirely of Virginians and Pennsylvanians, and that the settlement was later than in the Ohio company's lands. Through all of these lands the slow, laborious task of clearing away the forest and rearing homes went on continuously, and lives were wrought out in patient, honorable heroism, which has been in a measure lost sight of in the glare of more startling, but not more valuable achievement.

While that portion of Washington county west of the Muskingum and along its eastern shore was the especial field of the New England settlers, they also pushed their way into some of the lands farther eastward which were not included in the Ohio company's purchase. The country around Marietta was of course settled by them and at an early day. Later, but still in the closing years of the past century, many of the immigrants from Massachusetts and her neighboring States made themselves homes within the present boundaries of Newport township, also in Fearing and in the southwestern corner of Lawrence. At a later period the country north of Fearing was thinly settled by the same class.

By the year 1800 the aspect of the country was very materially changed. Many of the log cabins on the farms had by this time been replaced by more commodious and comfortable frame houses, and the little barns hastily erected for the shelter of a single yoke of oxen, perhaps, or the storage of a small crop had given way to larger ones which still were not two ample for the harvests of corn and grain from the broad, newly cleared acres. More thorough methods of tilling the soil were adopted, as the practice became possible and improved implements could be either manufactured or procured from the east. But even the best of these were very primitive and ill adapted to the purposes designed and had to be made up by the increase of energy in their use.

* Charles M. Walker's History of Athens County.

Notwithstanding the advancement that had been made, very large portions of the country at present embraced in the limits of Washington county were in almost as wild a state as they were prior to the original settlement. There were large tracts of unbroken forest in which the game was still so plentiful that the Indians regarded them as good hunting grounds. They came into the country in large bands annually until the last grand hunt in the winter of 1810-11, and until that time bear continued in considerable abundance. Deer were also very plenty until this hunt was held. It was evidently the purpose of the Indians to destroy or drive the game from the country, as they had done in 1788 and 1789. After the hunt the carcasses of many deer were found in the woods bordering the settlements in Washington and Athens counties, which appeared to have been wantonly killed by the savages.* The buffalo and the elk were not exterminated until 1800.

The smaller kinds of animals were to be found in vast numbers. The woods were alive with wolves, foxes, opossums, rabbits, raccoons, ground hogs, squirrels and birds, and they proved a serious pest to the farmers. The wolves and squirrels were especially troublesome, the former prowling in the vicinity of the sheep pens and often committing depredations, and the latter overrunning the cornfields and completely ruining the crops, unless a constant watch was kept over the fields. Immense flocks of pigeons darkened the air in the fall by their flight, and broke down the branches of the forest trees where they alighted in countless number. A good idea of the vastness of these flocks is given by an observant and perfectly credible tourist of 1803:

The vast flight of pigeons in this country seem incredible. But there is a large forest in Waterford, containing several hundred acres, which has been killed in consequence of their lighting upon it during the autumn of 1801. Such numbers lodged upon the trees that they broke off large limbs; and the ground below is covered, and in some places a foot thick, with their dung, which has not only killed all the undergrowth, but all the trees are as dead as if they had been girdled.†

A letter received in 1803 by the writer of the above, from a friend in Marietta, says:

I have visited two pigeon roosts and have heard of a third. Those I have seen are astonishing. One is supposed to cover a thousand acres; the other is still larger. The destruction of timber and brush on such large tracts of land by these small animals is almost incredible. How many millions of them must have assembled to effect it, especially as it was done in the course of a few weeks.‡

Orchards of thrifty trees gave a home-like appearance

*Reminiscences of Judge Ephraim Cutler in Charles M. Walker's History of Athens County.

† "Journal of a Tour into the Territory Northwest of the Alleghany Mountains," by Thaddeus Mason Harris.

‡ Letter from the Rev. Daniel Story to Thaddeus Mason Harris, dated Marietta, June 3, 1803.

to many of the farms, and early in the present century were so well advanced as to be of very great value. The earliest introduction of fruit was in the year 1794. Israel Putnam, the son of Colonel Israel and grandson of General Israel, the wolf-slayer, when he arrived at Belpre on the second of May, in the year mentioned, unloaded among his other effects a few apple scions, which were set in his brother's garden. In 1796 he sent from the east a larger lot of scions, which were distributed among the settlers by William Rufus Putnam, to whom they were consigned. They were carried across the mountains in saddle-bags, and being well packed in beeswax, arrived in good condition, and nearly all of them were successfully engrafted. The list, by which it appears there were twenty-three varieties, has been preserved, and we here give it a place. It included Putnam sweets, Seek-no-farthens, Early Chandlers, Late Chandlers, Gillyflowers, Pound Royals, Naturalings, Rhode Island Greenings, Yellow Greenings, Golden Pippins, Long Island Pippins, Tollman Sweetings, Streaked Sweetings, Honey Greenings, Kent Pippins, the Cooper apple, Streaked Gillyflowers, Black Gillyflowers, Beauties, Queenings, Englis Pearmain, Green Pippins, and Spitzenbergs. Thus early were the best varieties of apples known in New England introduced in the pioneer western settlement.

Over twenty years later, in 1818, the same Israel Putnam who had made this beginning in fruit culture, established a nursery at his home upon the Muskingum, in old Union township, from which came nearly all of the apple trees in Washington county until comparatively recent years. The scions from this nursery were also brought out from New England, and included almost exactly the same variety as that given in the foregoing list, showing that the selections made in 1796 were satisfactory ones. Among the several new varieties were the Calvert Sweetings, Newton Pippins, and one which was given the name of the Muskingum apple.

Fine cattle were brought into the country by Colonel Israel Putnam, father of the Israel Putnam to whom the people were indebted for the introduction of fruit. He brought oxen of a superior breed to Marietta in 1788, and, in 1795, procured cows from which he raised some of the best stock in the settlements. It was largely through the good beginning made by him, and his practical, intelligent devotion to agriculture and stock raising, that Belpre became a famous farming locality at an early day, and especially noted for its dairy products. Large quantities of superior cheese were made and shipped down the river, and Belpre was as much noted for the quantity and quality of the cheese manufactured by her farmers as are now some of the grazing counties in the Western Reserve.

Sheep raising was also begun at an early day, and the Hon. Paul Fearing was one of the first who paid any attention to this department of husbandry. The earliest mention of Merino sheep, however, occurs in the journal of the younger Israel Putnam, under date of September, 1809. It describes his journey to Wakatomica, and his return with two full bred Merino rams and fifteen half bred rams, which he put with his ewes at his farm upon the Muskingum. It appears from the record that he continued improving his flock until the year 1812. Paul Fearing was similarly engaged at about the same period, and paid very close attention to the care of his flocks, raising several hundred choice sheep from a few which he purchased at enormous expense. Benjamin Ives Gilman, it appears, was associated with him for some time. Merinos had then only recently been imported by the leading farmers in the eastern States, and these men, in what was at that time the far west, showed a very remarkable progressiveness and enterprise in thus early availing themselves of the costly means of improvement. It appears from an old letter (February 14, 1811,) that Messrs. Fearing and Gilman bought of Colonel Humphrey, the noted importer, one full-blooded Merino ram, for which they gave sixteen hundred acres of land. Sheep raising was during the early years of the settlement, and as late as 1825, attended with some difficulties which the farmers of the present day do not experience. The chief danger to the flocks was from wolves, which were still numerous. Israel Putnam lost ninety-seven sheep in eight months, from wolves or dogs—chiefly the former. Benjamin Dana, who owned a large farm twenty miles up the Muskingum, and kept about a thousand head of Saxons, in order to preserve them from the wolves drove them into small yards every night. These yards or pens were surrounded with high fences, sloping inward. Wolves could readily get in but could not get out, and never harmed the sheep, it is said, after finding they were entrapped. They were frequently found among the sheep in the morning and killed.

It had been confidently expected that after the close of the Indian war the Ohio company's settlements would quickly receive large accessions of population, and yet such was not the case. The student of history who seeks the cause will find it in the opening of the Connecticut Western Reserve. The Ohio company's leading spirits, and the friends of the organization had not feared the result of Virginia's action in reserving in 1784 a large tract of land for her Revolutionary soldiers. It could have little effect upon the weal or woe of the Muskingum settlements. The Ohio company did not look to Virginia for settlers. A considerable amount of emigration was diverted from the pioneer colony of the northwest by the well advertised attractions of the Symmes' purchase, but had no other divergence in the stream occurred the company's lands would have been quite thickly settled, in all probability, by the close of the first decade of the present century. Connecticut, it will be remembered, did not make her deed of cession until 1786. Definite action tending toward the colonization of her immense reservation (three million three hundred and sixty-six thousand nine hundred and twenty-one acres by actual survey) was not taken until 1795. In that year the State sold her lands for one million two hundred thousand dollars to the Connecticut Land company composed of forty-eight shareholders. The survey of the Western Reserve quickly followed, and the draft, or division, followed that. Thus there was thrown upon the market a large body of fine lands, to which the people of Connecticut who entertained ideas of emigrating westward naturally looked for their future homes. The prospective opening of the Reserve had deterred many from locating elsewhere, and the mother State had done all in her power to direct the minds of her people to the New Connecticut. Now that it was open and ready for settlement, a current of emigration immediately set toward it, flowing feebly and slowly at first, but with strength and volume constantly increasing until the waves of population had covered all northeastern Ohio. The pioneers of the Reserve were nearly all from Connecticut, a State in which the Ohio company's influence had been extensively exerted, and which was commonly supposed would prove as rich a source of emigration to the company's territory as Massachusetts. As the Connecticut Reserve was less remote from the mother State by which its interests were sedulously fostered, it was not strange that it received nearly all of the emigrants who went westward from Connecticut and many from the contiguous commonwealths, and that the development of the Ohio company's purchase was retarded proportionately.

Another cause of the slow increase in the population of the Ohio company's purchase and of Washington county was the almost universal belief that the hill lands were entirely valueless. The fact that the bottom lands were the first settled has been heretofore alluded to. A map of the county in 1810, indicating habitations and improvements would show very few settlers except along the streams. The country immediately surrounding some of the oldest settlements would appear unbroken by civilization. For many years those who sought lands on finding that the rich alluvions had been taken up, journeyed on to find what they desired farther westward in Ohio or in Indiana or Illinois. It was only when these more desirable lands farther westward had increased considerably in price that the hill land came into general demand. Another era of settlement and development then began in Washington county. The emigrants of this period—say from 1820 to 1835 or 1840—coming in from the middle as well as the New England States, and even from foreign shores, changed and improved in a marked degree the condition of the country. In 1805 Watertown was probably the only township in Washington county of which the whole territory had been dotted with improvements and which exhibited anything like evenness in the distribution of its inhabitants. It was the first township generally improved although its settlement did not begin until after that of several other localities, and did not progress so fast. The cause of its evenness of development probably lay in the fact that its surface was, as compared with other portions of the county, not roughly broken or hilly. What we may call the second period of settlement resulted in giving other townships something of the advantages already possessed by Watertown. The new settlers taking up lands which the original pioneers had refused had a hard task before them, and saw smaller prospective rewards for their labor; but they were generally men of smaller expectations and humbler hopes than their predecessors, and they were more easily satisfied. Most of them were men of small means, but sturdy ability to labor, and possessed those well grounded habits of industry and economy which are always productive of thrift, whatever may be the nature of the surrounding circumstances. To their energy and frugality the people of the county are indebted for a vast increase in the value of its lands. From the comparative sterile hills, which the New Englanders as a rule despised and avoided, they have wrung, by patient toil, a livelihood, and in very recent years their gains have been largely increased by scientific, sensible application of those fertilizing elements which the hill soil has lacked.

The elements making up the population of the second period of emigration are varied and several of them possess features of especial interest, which are much more fully treated elsewhere in this volume, than in the present chapter.* Beside the population derived from the eastern and middle States the county has a considerable number of Scotch, Quakers and Germans. Each of these elements has a strong showing in the neighborhood, and one of them—the German—is to be found in all parts of the county.

The pioneers of the Scotch nationality located in Barlow township. The first family of this people in the county was probably that of John Harvey who arrived in 1817, and the second, William Andrews. John Fleming came in about 1820, and the settlement was farther increased by the addition of the Breckenridge family. These pioneers from Scotland were followed by other settlers, and in a few years so many had arrived that their population spread into the adjoining townships of Dunham and Warren, and even in Belpre. The immigration began as has been stated in 1817, was encouraged in 1828, and for a considerable period later, by Nahum Ward, esq., of Marietta, a large landholder, who went to Scotland, and there published "A Brief Sketch of the State of Ohio, one of the United States of North America, with a map delineating the same into counties." Both through Mr. Ward's endeavors and independent of them, the Scotch immigration increased until the neighborhood, of which the Barlow settlement was the beginning, became thickly populated with the people of the canny race, who prospering themselves, enriched the country in which they had made their homes.

The Quaker element in Washington county is principally confined to the western part, though a few reside in the east end. Wesley was the township first settled by these people, and they came in from the north in 1840. A movement had been made toward the Ohio, from Jefferson and Belmont counties, and many Quakers had located in Morgan county, where the names of Penn and Pennsville have been left as indications of the nature of the population which filled that portion of the county. From the township of Penn a slow but steady stream of immigration flowed into the extreme western tier of townships in Washington county. Wesley in which the first settlement was made, has now the largest number of this class, but Decatur, Fairfield and Palmer have a considerable element. The whole western end of the county has been materially benefitted by the Quaker settlers. Wherever they have gone, land has increased in value, and the moral well being of the people has been enhanced.

By far the largest foreign element in the county is the German. The settlement by people of this nationality may be said to have commenced early in the thirties—1832-'33-'34—being the years when the pioneer families arrived. Fearing township was the locality in which the earliest settlers made their homes, and they soon spread into Marietta township, Adams, Salem, Liberty, Lawrence, and Newport, and now there is no township in the county which has not at least a liberal sprinkling of German population. The largest immigration was from 1840 to 1850 and was nearly equalled in the decade following. One feature in the German settlement was the establishment of the village of Bonn, in Salem township, by Nahum Ward, esq., who induced many Germans to come to this country, and endeavored to build up for them and by them a little manufacturing centre. Spinning and silk manufacturing were the principal industries entered upon. They did not, however, meet with remarkable success, and the village of Bonn, of which very sanguine hopes were one time entertained, amounted to little more than a convenient trading place for the German settlers in Salem and the north part of Fearing. While the Germans generally in Washington county and especially those of them who were early settlers, were of Protestant faith, a Catholic element of considerable strength has slowly gathered in Muskingum, Watertown, Adams, and Warren. The latter township has a large German population, amounting probably to a third of the entire number of inhabitants and in the country back from the river fifty per cent. while a large portion of the original German settlers west of the Muskingum and east of it but in its immediate vicinity were of foreign birth. The majority of those in the eastern end are native born.

There is a considerable element of Irish population in the territory included in the old township of Union (now divided between Muskingum, Watertown, and Adams). Probably fifty per cent. of the inhabitants of this part of the county are Irish born, or of Irish descent. The work on the Muskingum improvements brought many laborers into the county, a large proportion of whom were Irish. When the Government work was completed, many of these men found themselves in possession of sufficient amounts of money to make the first payments upon, or buy outright, small farms. They naturally located in as compact a body as possible, and took up all the purchasable farming lands in the territory described.

There remains one other class of population to be spoken of. In addition to their scattered population, the colored people have in Washington county several distinct settlements. The first colored man who owned land in the county was undoubtedly Richard Fisher, a mulatto, who prior to 1800 dwelt in Salem township, on the west fork of Duck creek. It does not appear that more than a score of individuals of the colored race lived in the county at any one time until about 1835, when a little community came into being in Barlow township, which increased both numerically and in property until its people were able to have their own church and school, and live in almost every sense independent of outsiders. Many of these colored people have accumulated modest properties, and some own large farms and live surrounded by every comfort possessed by their white neighbors. There is another and much smaller colony of colored people in Warren township, and a third in the south part of Adams. This is made up of families from Virginia, who, during and after the war of the Rebellion, became residents of Belmont county, and in 1875 made themselves homes at their present location. Their advancement in condition has been equal in result to that of the Barlow colored settlers, and attained much more quickly. They have a church of their own, and are in a generally prosperous state.

*In the several township histories many facts in regard to nationality and characteristics of population are given as well as statements in regard to dates of settlement and names of pioneers. Hence the whole subject is in this chapter merely treated in a general way.

HERMAN BLENNERHASSETT.

Another movement remains to be mentioned. While Washington county was receiving a slow but steady flow of emigration, a stream had set forth to the ever receding great west. From the land first settled by the sterling men of Massachusetts and her sister States of the Atlantic seaboard, the sons of those pioneers were going out as pioneers to the regions beyond the Mississippi. This was not an emigration effected through any colonization scheme, but by individual choice and independent action. It was, therefore, slow and its result not conspicuous. It was a powerful agency, however, in modifying the relative proportions of the two great elements in the population. Nearly all of the newcomers—the settlers who belong to what we have called the second period of emigration—were of foreign birth, and almost to a man those who removed were native born Americans. This being the fact, it follows as a matter of course that the western part of the county suffered most by the emigration. Upon the other hand the eastern end gained quite largely through an emigration from Belmont and Monroe counties. These causes combined soon became of sufficient force to be of some importance as affecting the relative political strength of the east and west sides of the county.

In the west, too, there has been some effect, however small, resultant from Washington county emigration. Marietta has borne no slight share in the great duty of social transmission, and so when the centennial anniversary of the settlement of Ohio shall have come her citizens can claim some degree of proprietorship in the advancement which has been made in Kansas and Iowa, and Minnesota, and all the younger States in the newer west.

An eloquent and renowned orator on the occasion of the two hundredth anniversary of the settlement of a Massachusetts town, which has a namesake in Washington county, used these words: "While our thoughts today are carried back to the tombs of our fathers beyond the sea, there are millions of kindred Americans beyond the rivers and mountains whose hearts are fixed on the Atlantic coast, as the cradle of their political existence.

. . . A mighty wilderness has been colonized almost within our day."*

And now a mightier wilderness has been added to the realm of civilization, and while our thoughts, as the first century of western life draws to a close, are carried back to the tombs of our fathers—not in old England, but in New England—there are others beyond farther rivers and more distant mountains, whose hearts are fixed upon the shores of the Ohio, the Muskingum, and Lake Erie, as the land of their nativity or of ancestral recollection.

CHAPTER XIII.

POLITICAL MEASURES AND EVENTS FROM 1788 TO 1803.

Washington County as the Northwest Territory—The First Grade of Territorial Government—Peculiarities of the Early Laws—Formed upon British Statutes—Severity of Punishments—The Whipping Post, Pillory and Stocks—Second Grade of Territorial Government Organized—A Petition for the Allowance of Slavery—Carrying out the Policy of the Marietta Colony—"Support, Religion and Learning"—Corporation Organized for Leasing the Ministerial and School Lands—Form of Lease—Party Feeling Increasing—Dissatisfaction with Governor St. Clair—A State Government Suggested—Opposition on the Part of Putnam and Cutler—The Feeling in Washington County—Reasons Advanced against the Organization of a State—Bitterness of Feeling—Congress Passes an "Enabling Act"—Constitutional Convention Called—The Question of Slavery—Determination to Introduce it in a Modified Form—Judge Ephraim Cutler's Stand Against it—The Poetry of History—The State of Ohio Recognized by Congress, and Government Organized—Some Later Measures Exhibiting the Influence of Washington County.

We have intentionally omitted from the preceding chapters a detailed statement of the organization and enactments of the Territorial Government that the subject might be presented in connection with those subsequent measures the first constitutional convention and the establishment of the State government. In each of these measures Washington county had an important agency. In 1788 Marietta was practically coextensive with the Northwest Territory. In 1789 the Marietta and Cincinnati groups of settlements were the only English colonies in the territory. Marietta was at first the more influential, but her political prestige waned as the settlement of the territory, and then of the State, increased, and as Federalism was supplanted as a national power by the Jeffersonian Democracy.

The first act of Congress for the purpose of carrying into action the Ordinance of 1787 was the election of Governor St. Clair, which has been heretofore alluded to. He was chosen upon the fifth of October, 1787. Winthrop Sargent was elected secretary the same day, and upon the sixteenth of the same month Samuel Holden Parsons, James Mitchell Varnum, and John Armstrong judges of the territory. John Armstrong subsequently declined the appointment and Congress elected John Cleves Symmes to fill the vacancy. †

* Edward Everett, at Salem, Massachusetts, September 18, 1828.

† For the successors of these officers, and also for those who acted in other capacities, see the following chapter containing a complete roster.

Upon the ninth of July, 1788, Governor St. Clair arrived at Marietta (where Judges Varnum and Parsons, and Secretary Winthrop Sargent had preceded him) and upon the eighteenth the government of the Northwest Territory was formally organized, in the presence of all the citizens of Marietta—and in fact all of the English-speaking people of the territory. The Ordinance of 1787 was read, the commissions of the governor, the judges present, and of the secretary. Governor St. Clair made a dignified and elegant address, and was responded to by General Rufus Putnam.

The government thus established was the first territorial government ever organized by Federal authority. It was in many respects peculiar, but as a whole exceedingly admirable, and it is doubtful if the ingenuity of man could have formulated a wiser and more beneficial system of authority, the time and conditions being considered. The fundamental law was the Ordinance of 1787, on which were based the constitutions of the five great States carved from the territory. Of the formation of this compact—which affirmed the principles of political and religious liberty, and which forever perpetuated them in the northwest—much has been said in an earlier chapter of this work. The ordinance vested the executive power in the governor, the judicial in a general court, and the legislative power in the governor and the judges, acting as a legislative council. Provision was also made for the election of a secretary, who, in case of the governor's resignation or removal, should be clothed with all of the powers of the governor.

The peculiarity of the government was that the people had no voice in it. This peculiarity was in a measure necessary, and of course for a purpose which can be easily understood, but if it was for the most part advantageous, it was also liable to abuse. In the exercise of authority the officers were responsible only to the General Government—they received their appointments from Congress until after the adoption of the constitution in 1789, and then from the President—and where there was a disposition for arbitrary action there was every opportunity for it. Such a disposition did exist, and toward the close of the period of territorial government caused much bitterness and produced some effects which curiously enough are still existent in the State government.

The first law enacted was formed July 26, 1788, published in Philadelphia in 1792, and was entitled for regulating and establishing the militia of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, published at the city of Marietta upon the twenty-fifth day of July, in the thirteenth year of the independence of the United States and of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight, by his excellency, Arthur St. Clair, esquire, governor and commander-in-chief, and the honorable and James Mitchell Varnum, esquire, judges."

"A LAW

The ordinance of 1787 authorized the governor and judges to adopt and publish in the territory from time to time such laws of the old States, civil and criminal, as they saw fit, and report them to Congress. This provision, however, was not strictly obeyed. The officers made new laws almost as frequently as they adopted old ones, being often compelled to this course by the needs of the time. During the first year of settlement the governor, Judge Varnum and Judge Parsons assembled at Marietta in their legislative capacity, enacted a number of laws which were submitted to Congress, but were not approved on the ground that the governor and judges were empowered only to adopt existing laws, from the codes of the original States,* but notwithstanding the fact that these laws failed to secure the ratification of Congress they continued in force for various lengths of time—some of them until the second grade of territorial government was established—though most of them were superseded in 1795 by a code adopted in compliance with the terms of the ordinance at a legislative session held at Cincinnati. These laws were known as the Maxwell code, from the name of the printer, William Maxwell. The pamphlet containing them was the first piece of job printing done in the Northwest Territory. The only other legislative session under the first code of territorial government was held in 1798, and then only a few additional laws were adopted.†

There was much that was peculiar in the old territorial laws. They were formed largely upon English statutes, and the punishments inflicted under them were often very severe. The pillory and stocks were made accessories of the court house. The first law for whipping was passed at Marietta September 6, 1788, under the title of "A law respecting crimes and punishments." Section 1 provided that when three or more persons, constituting a mob, should commit unlawful acts, and fail to disperse when told to do so, each offender, on conviction, "shall be fined in a sum not exceeding three hundred dollars, and be whipped not exceeding thirty-nine stripes, and find security for good behavior for a term not exceeding one year." For a second offence the whipping would be repeated, as well as the fine and security, and the offender committed to jail until the sentence be satisfied. For breaking into a house, store or shop in the night, for the purpose of stealing, the punishment was thirty-nine stripes, security for good behavior, or in default, imprisonment for a term of not more than three years. If in the perpetration of the crime the person should commit any violence, or be so armed as to indicate intention of violence, he should forfeit all estate, real or personal, to the territory, out of which the party injured should be compensated, and the criminal should be committed to jail for a period not exceeding forty years.

For perjury, or refusing to be sworn to a fact, the penalty prescribed was a fine of sixty dollars, or the laying on of not more than thirty-nine lashes, and the criminal moreover was to be set in the pillory for a space of time not exceeding two hours. For arson, or aiding in the commission of the crime, the punishment was whipping to the extent of thirty-nine lashes, two hours in the pillory, three years or less in jail, and the forfeiture of all property to the territory. It was further provided by this law respecting crimes and punishments that a child or servant refusing to obey lawful commands of the parent or master, on complaint to a justice of the peace, could be sent to the jail or the house of correction; or for striking his parent or master be whipped not exceeding ten stripes. A person convicted of drunkenness it was provided should be fined five dimes for the first offence, and one dollar for every subsequent offence. Failure to pay the fine subjected the person convicted to the stocks for the space of one hour. The person who committed larceny was compelled to pay two-fold retribution for the first offence, or if the money or property taken be not recovered, be whipped not exceeding thirty-nine lashes. In case the offender had not property, it was decreed that the sheriff, by direction of the court, should bind such person to labor for a term not exceeding seven years. The law from which the foregoing provisions have been taken concluded with the following clauses, which serve to convey a further idea of the severity of opinion transplanted from Old England and New England to the primal settlement of the western wilderness:

* Jacob Burnet's Notes on the Northwestern Territory.

† Charles B. Flood, esq., in Ohio secretary of State's report, 1879.

SEC. 21. Whereas, idle, vain, and obscene conversation, profane cursing and swearing, and more especially the irreverently mentioning, calling upon, or invoking the Sacred and Supreme Being by any of the divine characters in which he hath graciously condescended to reveal his infinitely beneficent purposes to mankind, are repugnant to every moral sentiment, subversive of every civil obligation, inconsistent with the ornaments of polished life, and abhorrent to the principles of the most benevolent religion. It is expected, therefore, if crimes of this kind should exist, their will not find encouragement, countenance, or approbation in this territory. It is strictly enjoined upon all officers and ministers of justice, upon parents, and others, heads of families, and upon others of every description, that they abstain from practices so vile and irrational, and that by example and precept, to the utmost of their power, they prevent the necessity of adopting and publishing laws with penalties on this head; and it is hereby declared that government will consider as unworthy of its confidence all those who may obstinately violate these injunctions.

SEC. 22. Whereas, mankind, in every stage of informed society, have consecrated certain portions of time to the particular cultivation of the social virtues, and the public adoration and worship of the common Parent of the universe; and,

Whereas, a practice so rational in itself, and conformable to the divine precepts, is greatly conducive to civilization, as well as morality and piety; and,

Whereas, for the advancement of such important and interesting purpose most of the Christian world have set apart the first day of the week as a day of rest from common labor and pursuits, it is therefore enjoined that all service labor, works of necessity, and charity only excepted, be wholly abstained from on said day.*

The later laws adopted or enacted under the territorial government bore a close resemblance to those of which we have already spoken.

In 1792 provision was made for the establishment of a court house, county jail, pillory, whipping-post and stocks in every county of the territory (there were then but four counties in existence—Washington, Hamilton, St. Clair and Knox). In 1795 a law was adopted from the Pennsylvania statutes, entitled "A law limiting imprisonment for debt, and subjecting certain delinquents and debtors to servitude," providing that no person should be kept in prison for debt or fines longer than the second day of the session next of his commitment, unless the plaintiff should make it appear that the person imprisoned had some estate that he would not disclose and in such case the court should examine all persons suspected to be privy to the concealment of such estate, and if no sufficient estate was found the debtor should make satisfaction by personal and reasonable servitude according to the judgment of the court (but only if the plaintiff requires it), not exceeding seven years. If the plaintiff refused to receive the debtor as his slave for the term named (according to the age of the debtor and whether married or single), the debt was discharged. A law selling men into servitude for fines and costs, for maiming and disfiguring a person was adopted from the Kentucky criminal code in 1798, but this law was afterwards held to be unconstitutional, as Kentucky was not in existence as a State when the ordinance of 1787 was passed.

The governor and judges of the territory adopted, among other Virginia laws, one entitled "A law declaring what laws shall be in force," which declared that the common law of England, and all statutes or acts in aid of it, made prior to the reign of King James I, should be in full force in the territory until repealed by legislative authority, or disapproved by Congress. This proceeding was questioned by some authorities at the time, but no change was made until the organization of the State government.

Altogether there were enacted or adopted, during the period of the first grade of territorial government, nearly one hundred laws (beside the one which included the British laws), and, although open to some criticism, it has been said of them by one of Ohio's greatest jurists, "that it may be doubted whether any colony, at so early a period after its first establishment, ever had so good a code of laws."*

The second grade of the territorial government was organized in 1799, in pursuance of a provision of the ordinance of 1787, giving authority for such a step when the territory shall contain "five thousand free male inhabitants of full age." The governor having discovered this qualification to exist, upon October 29, 1798, issued his proclamation directing the voters to hold elections for territorial representatives on the third Monday of December following. The result was the election of: Return Jonathan Meigs, Washington county; Paul Fearing, Washington county; William Goforth, Hamilton county; William McMillan, Hamilton county; John Smith, Hamilton county; John Ludlow, Hamilton county; Robert Benham, Hamilton county; Aaron Caldwell, Hamilton county; Isaac Martin, Hamilton county; Shadrack Bond, St. Clair county; John Small, Knox county; John Edgar, Randolph county; Solomon Sibley, Wayne county; Jacob Visgar, Wayne county; Charles F. Chabert de Joncaire, Wayne county; Joseph Darlington, Adams county; Nathaniel Massie, Adams county; James Pritchard, Jefferson county; Thomas Worthington, Ross county; Elias Langham, Ross county; Samuel Findlay, Ross county; Edward Tiffin, Ross county.

The legislature assembled at Cincinnati, January 22, 1799, and nominated ten men from whom the National Government, chose the following five to constitute the legislative council of the territory and continue in office five years: Jacob Burnet, of Cincinnati, Hamilton county; Henry Vandenburg, of Vincennes, Knox county; Robert Oliver, of Marietta, Washington county; James Findlay, of Cincinnati, Hamilton county; David Vance, of Vanceville, Jefferson county.

*Ohio Secretary of State's Report, 1890.

*Chief Justice Chase—Statutes of Ohio.

The council and house of representatives met at Cincinnati on the sixteenth of September, 1798, and organized for the discharge of their duties. Of the council, Henry Vandenburg was elected president and William C. Schenck, secretary. Of the house, Edward Tiffin was chosen speaker and John Riley, clerk.

The territory now had a legislature of which one branch was elective, but Governor St. Clair, by his use of the unqualified veto power with which he was invested, practically annulled the will of the peoples' branch of the legislature. Of thirty bills passed, eleven were vetoed.

There was, however, much business of public importance transacted at this, the first session of the territorial legislature. William Henry Harrison was elected to Congress by a majority of one vote over the governor's son, Arthur St. Clair, jr. The earnest attention of the legislators was given to the subject of education and to the preparation of laws supplementary to or supplanting those formerly enacted. The legislature adopted a joint remonstrance addressed to Congress against the power given to the governor to veto all acts which he pleased and against his exclusive exercise of authority in erecting counties.

By far the most interesting and significant subject before the body at this session was that of introducing slavery into the territory. It came up in the form of a petition from a number of the Virginia officers praying for permission to move with their slaves into the Virginia military districts (the lands lying between the Scioto and Little Miami rivers). There were some members of the legislature who were friendly to the prayer of the Virginians, but their favor was of no consequence. The Ordinance of 1787 rose up now in its majesty as the safeguard of liberty and the legislature had really no more discretion in the case than had that of Virginia or Kentucky. There would have been but few votes though in favor of the petition had the matter rested with the legislature. It would doubtless have been opposed both as a matter of right and policy.*

The first session of the legislature was prorogued by the governor December 19, 1799, until the first Monday of November, 1800, at which time the body reassembled at Chillicothe, which place had been made the capital by act of Congress of May 7, 1800.

Congress having passed (on May 7, 1800) an act establishing the Indiana territory (including the present States of Indiana and Illinois) and William Henry Harrison having been appointed governor, it was necessary to elect a delegate to Congress to fill his place as well as to elect one for the succeeding term. William McMillen, of Cincinnati, was chosen to serve out the unexpired term, and Paul Fearing, esq., of Marietta, to serve from 1801 to 1803. The second session of the territorial legislature was brief, closing December 9, 1800.

There was one act passed at this session of 1800 which was of especial importance to Washington county, and is interesting as an exhibition of the continuance of the wise and beneficent policy of the Ohio company, and of those measures which through the labor and influence of Dr. Manasseh Cutler had been inserted in the Ordinance of 1787. We allude to an "Act authorizing the leasing of the lands granted for the support of schools and religious purposes in the county of Washington,"—bearing date of November 27, 1800.*

This law created and established a corporation by the name of "The trustees for managing lands granted for religious purposes, and for the support of schools, in the county of Washington, within the Ohio company's purchase," which corporation consisted of seven persons, "capable of suing and being sued," etc., viz: Griffin Greene, Robert Oliver, Benjamin Ives Gilman, Isaac Pierce, Jonathan Stone, Ephraim Cutler, and William Rufus Putnam. It was provided that this corporation should meet annually on the first Monday of April, at which meeting the trustees should elect officers, and until the first meeting should be held the legislature appointed that Griffin Greene should serve as chairman, Benjamin Ives Gilman as clerk, and William Rufus Putnam as treasurer. The law was a very long one, explicit and exhaustive in its specifications. The trustees were originally empowered with the leasing of section twenty-nine, in the second township of the eighth range (that on which Marietta is built), but a few years later this business was relegated to another board of trustees appointed especially for the purpose. The corporation, however, attended to the leasing of all the other ministerial as well as school sections, in the Ohio company's purchase.

There is, perhaps, no better means of conveying to the reader an idea of the painstaking care with which the public lands were granted, and the original purpose for which they were granted, carried out, than the presentation in these pages of a copy of one of the leases. It will be noticed that the lease is specific in its character, compels the making of improvements upon the property, and speaks very plainly in almost every line of the New England spirit of good order, progress and thrift, which in many ways was made to flourish upon western soil. The corporation trustees impressed upon the original indentures their seal, bearing as its devise an altar with the old-time horns at either side, and surrounded by the legend, "Support Religion and Learning." Here flourished the fruit of the good seed sown in the ordinance of 1787.

The following is a literal copy of one of the corporation's leases for one of the school sections, located as will be noticed in the extreme western part of the Ohio company's purchase:

THIS INDENTURE made the first day of April in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and one, between the "trustees for managing lands granted for religious purposes, and for the support of schools in the county of Washington, within the Ohio company's purchase," of the one part: and Hugh Boyle, esq., of Ames in the county of Washington, Northwest Territory, of the other part, witnesseth, that the said trustees, in pursuance of the seventeenth section of a law of the territory aforesaid, passed the twenty-seventh day of November one thousand eight hundred, intituled, "An act authorizing the leasing of land granted for the support of Schools, and for religious purposes in the county of Washington," have granted, leased, and to farm let unto the said Hugh Boyle, his heirs, and assigns, a certain tract or parcel of land situate in the township of Ames aforesaid, butted and bounded as follows, viz: Mile lot No. 16 in the Twelfth township in the Fifteenth range granted for the support of schools for the term of seven years, commencing from and after the first day of April, instant, on condition that the following improvements shall be made which the said Hugh Boyle covenants and agrees to make, do and perform on penalty of one hundred dollars in which sum he binds himself, his heirs and assigns to pay to the trustees aforesaid if the following conditions are not complied with on his part, viz: not to make unnecessary waste of timber nor to injure sugar trees, and within seven years from the commencement of his term to clear twelve acres of all the trees, brush and wood, two acres of which shall be suitable orchard ground, and set out or planted with two hundred apple trees, thrifty and of a proper size to set in an orchard; which orchard shall be enclosed by itself with a good and lawful fence and kept in constant repair, and no animals of any kind suffered to feed or graze therein; the remainder of the aforesaid twelve acres to be of the most suitable land for meadow, and seeded in a proper manner with herdsgrass and clover seeds, and the said meadow shall be fenced and improved in a good husbandlike manner. Furthermore, the said Hugh Boyle covenants; that within the term of his lease he will clear six acres in a suitable manner for pasturing and seed the same with a proper quantity of clover and herdsgrass seed; and also, that he will clear in a proper manner and have under improvement and cultivation at the end of his term twenty acres of tillage land; and that at the end of his term, the several lots of land covenanted and agreed to be cleared as aforesaid shall be separately enclosed with a good and sufficient fence agreeably to the law of the territory, when the said Hugh Boyle is to yield peaceable and quiet possession.

* Burnet's Notes on the Northwestern Territory.

* Land Laws of Ohio.

IN WITNESS whereof the said trustees have caused William Rufus Putnam, their clerk, to subscribe his name and affix the seal of the corporation, and the said Hugh Boyle hath also interchangeably set his hand and seal the day and year first above written.

Signed, sealed and delivered } in presence of

BENJAMIN BEADLE.
JAMES CAMERON.

HUGH BOYLE.
WM. RUFUS PUTNAM.

Returning to our brief outline of territorial history we will note that the third session of the legislature was held at Chillicothe, beginning upon November 23, 1801, in accordance with the conditions of adjournment. There were several new members in the legislature and the following was the roll: Ephraim Cutler, of Washington county; William Rufus Putnam, of Washington county; Moses Miller, of Hamilton county; Francis Dunlavy, of Hamilton county; Jeremiah Morrow, of Hamilton county; John Ludlow, of Hamilton county; John Smith, of Hamilton county; Jacob White, of Hamilton county; Daniel Reeder, of Hamilton county; Joseph Darlington, of Adams county; Nathaniel Massie, of Adams county; Zenas Kimberley, of Jefferson county; John Milligan, of Jefferson county; Thomas McCune, of Jefferson county; Edward Tiffin, of Ross county; Elias Langham, of Ross county; Thomas Worthington, of Ross county; Francois Joncaire Chabert, of Wayne county; George McDougal, of Wayne county; Jonathan Schieffelin, of Wayne county; Edward Paine, of Trumbull county.

Edward Tiffin was speaker. Robert Oliver, of Marietta, was chosen president of the legislative council. The session closed upon the twenty-third of January, 1802, to meet in Cincinnati in November of the same year, but it was not destined to assemble again. The territorial government was very soon to be superseded by State government. The removal of the seat of government from Chillicothe, says Jacob Burnet, was in consequence of the assembling of a mob on two evenings to insult Governor St. Clair and several members of the legislature, a proceeding which passed unrebuked by the village authorities.*

Party feeling had not until about the time of this session of the legislature, ran high, but Jefferson was now President, and his adherents were increasing in force in the west. On the other hand the territorial governor (Federalist) was losing strength, partly because of his use of the veto power, and from various other reasons. There was a growing uneasiness on the part of many under the territorial government, and in this session of the legislature the question of the formation of a State government came up for consideration. Judge Ephraim Cutler and William Rufus Putnam, the members from Washington county, were the leaders of the small minority opposing the formation of the State government, and it was chiefly against them that the demonstration of the mob above spoken of was directed. William Rufus Putnam had made a speech at a supper, in which he expressed the sentiment: "The Scioto—may its waters lave the borders of two great States;" and his words were thought to have been the chief agency in inflaming the spirit of the more violent element of the Chillicothe people. They expected the State to be formed as it now exists, or at least that the Miami would be the western boundary, and hoped that Chillicothe would be the capital. The people of Washington county were opposed to the formation of a State government at that time, and, indeed, were commonly imbued with the desire that their representative had expressed. This idea was advocated later, in fact, by the legislative council, which body petitioned Congress to make the boundary of the eastern division of the territory the Scioto river—a measure which, had it been granted, would have postponed for a considerable time its admission as a State, because of the lack of the requisite population (sixty thousand) specified by the ordinance of 1787 as the number which entitles any division to admittance to the Union.

Messrs. Cutler and Putnam were in perfect accord in this matter of the formation of a State government, with their constituency. If we turn back to look at the history of Washington county at a period a few months anterior to the occurrences we have narrated we shall see that there was a great activity of public opinion upon the subject. Various township meetings were held at which the proposition to form a State government was fully discussed and strongly opposed. On the seventeenth of June, 1801, an anti-State meeting was held at Marietta, made up of delegates from the several townships as follows: For Marietta, the Hon. Paul Fearing and Elijah Backus; Belpre, Isaac Pierce and Silas Bent; Waterford, Robert Oliver and Gilbert Devol; Adams, Joseph Barker; Newport, Philip Witten and Samuel Williamson; Middletown (later Athens, now Athens county), Alvin Bingham; Gallipolis, Robert Safford. The meeting was organized by the election of Gilbert Devol as chairman and Joseph Barker as secretary. A very able and strong address was delivered by Colonel Joseph Barker, summing up the objections to organizing a State government. The convention, after listening to the speech of Colonel Barker, and remarks of several other delegates, adopted the following resolution, which was afterwards sent to their representatives:

* Burnet's Notes on the Northwestern Territory.

Resolved, That in our opinion it would be highly impolitic and very injurious to the inhabitants of this territory to enter into a State government at this time. Therefore we, in behalf of our constituents, do request that you would use your best endeavors to prevent and steadily oppose the adoption of any measures that may be taken for the purpose.*

The reasons advanced against entering into a State government, in Washington county, were many and cogent. It was argued that the benefits to be obtained over those already possessed would be insignificant; that the expenses of a State government would be very heavy, whereas the chief support of the territorial government was derived from the National exchequer, and that the large expense necessitated would fall chiefly, or, at least, in undue proportion, upon the settlers in the Ohio company's purchase, while the Congress lands, constantly improving in value, would be exempt from taxation. There was much force in this argument. It meant that the first settlers of the country—those who had borne the brunt of the struggle not only against the wilderness but against a savage foe—would be obliged to pay a heavy revenue from their well-nigh depleted pockets for what would do them no good, while the newer settlers coming into the country after peace was fully established, and many of whom could reap some advantage from the founding of a State government, would be comparatively small supporters of it. The Washington county people, too, were now upon the weaker side in politics, and their leading men could expect no offices under the State. This was undoubtedly an element which entered into the consideration of some men, but there was another reason of greater weight of which little or nothing was said. The hope existed that two States might sometime be carved from the territory now included in Ohio, and that of the easternmost one of these, bounded upon the west by the Scioto river, Marietta might be the capital.

Paul Fearing, then a member of Congress, opposed the State government movement with great strength, and made a speech against it in March, 1802, when the question as to whether Congress should or should not pass an act enabling the people of the eastern division of the territory to hold a constitutional convention and organize a State government, was before the House.

As the time for the decision of the question drew nigh, there was developed much bitterness among the partisans upon each side, and many hot words were said or written by public men. On the one side there were charges that the advocates of the change were actuated chiefly by their desire to gain offices which a State organization must create, and by a desire to favor the National administration. On the other hand those who favored admission to the Union criticised, in violent terms, the policy of Governor St. Clair, and freely spoke of him as a tyrant, and his friends (by whom they meant all who clung to the old form of government), as "aristocrats and Tories."

The friends of the State government idea were nowhere else stronger than in Chillicothe. All of the men of influence in that place belonged to the State government party, and several of them lent their whole strength to the furtherance of the cause at Washington. Thomas Worthington (afterward governor of Ohio) went on to Washington at the suggestion of a committee, appeared before Congress, and strongly urged the passage of the "enabling act" at the season when that measure was taken up for consideration.

The act was passed April 30, 1802. It authorized the holding of a convention and the organization of a State government, and prescribed the limits of the State. Delegates were elected in the various counties upon the twelfth of October, 1802, in conformance to published notice, and the convention assembled at Chillicothe upon the first of November. The delegates were as follows:

From the county of Washington—Ephraim Cutler, Rufus Putnam, Benjamin Ives Gilman, and John McIntire.

From the county of Adams—Joseph Darlington, Thomas Kirker, and Israel Donalson.

From the county of Belmont—James Caldwell.

From the county of Hamilton—Francis Dunlady, John Paul, Jeremiah Morrow, John Wilson, Charles Willing Byrd, William Goforth, John Smith, and John Reily.

From the county of Jefferson—Rudolph Bair, John Milligan, and George Humphrey.

From the county of Ross—Edward Tiffin, Nathaniel Massie, Thomas Worthington, Michael Baldwin, and James Grubb.

From the county of Trumbull—Samuel Huntington.

The convention organized by the election of Edward Tiffin, of Chillicothe, as president, and Thomas Scott as secretary.

On the third day of the session the question was put "whether or no it was expedient at this time to form a constitution and a State government." The journal shows that Ephraim Cutler, of Washington county, cast the only vote in the negative.*

The other three members from Washington, like him, were opposed to the measure, but seeing that their re-

* Judge Cutler, in a conversation several years later, gave the following reminiscence: "I never gave a vote of which I was more proud. The settlements were remote from each other, and still laboring under the difficulties incident to pioneer communities. They were poor; the expense of a State government was much greater than that of the territorial; and, above all, I felt that by waiting a few years we might be admitted on much more favorable terms than at that time. It was desirable that the vote should be unanimous. There was no debate on the question. General Putnam and Mr. Gilman wished me to vote with them. I told them I could not. The old general told me I was as stubborn as a bull—to go my own way."

* Biography of Captain Joseph Barker, by S. P. Hildreth.

monstrance must prove ineffectual, voted with the majority. The convention adjourned upon November 19th, having completed its labors and formed a constitution which was from that time the law of the State of Ohio, although it was never submitted to the people, "which," says a writer, "was the more remarkable as the convention itself was called by Congress, without any request on the part of the legislature, and without the opinion of the inhabitants being taken."* There were but seven votes in favor of submitting the constitution for approval or disapproval, viz.: those of the four members from Washington county—Messrs. Putnam, Cutler, Gilman, McIntire, Bazaleel Wells and Nathan Updegraff, of Jefferson county; and John Reily, of Hamilton.

The constitution was a very admirable one, as broadly democratic as such an instrument could be and exhibiting an extreme in that respect which was perhaps attributable to the arbitrariness of the government of St. Clair, from which a majority of the members of the Constitutional convention had been impatient to escape.

Although the Washington county members of the convention of 1802 had been opposed to the forming of a constitution "at that time," they had a large influence in creating the instrument and some of its best measures were inserted by them.

There was one topic before the convention of absorbing interest. Few people of this day know how narrowly the State of Ohio escaped being made slave territory in the year 1802. The monster knocked for admittance at the door which had been closed to it by the Ordinance of 1787, and the door was even set ajar for the entrance of the colossal evil. But there were men to meet and thrust it back and close that door again and forever. Foremost among these was Ephraim Cutler of Washington county, son of Manasseh Cutler who had fifteen years before placed in that fundamental law of the northwest, the Ordinance of Freedom, the words "There shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the territory." Here was the poetry of his story.

It was claimed by some members of the convention that the Ordinance of 1787 was not binding upon the State as it had not been assented to by the State, and hence there was an attempt to introduce slavery in a modified form in spite of the prohibition. Had it so been introduced there is reason to believe that it could not have been crushed out, the ordinance to the contrary notwithstanding.

John W. Brown of Hamilton county, chairman of a committee appointed to prepare a bill of rights, reported a clause which provided that no person should be held in slavery if a male after he was thirty-five years of age; and if a female, after twenty-five years of age. Judge Cutler was a member of the committee. He moved to have the clause laid upon the table until the next meeting, when, he suggested, each member should present a clause expressive of his own views. The committee met the next morning, and Judge Cutler presented the clause which was ultimately made a part of the constitution. After considerable discussion a vote was had in the committee, by which the Brown clause was rejected and the Cutler clause adopted, the vote standing five to four. The measure, however, had several perils to pass through. While it was before the committee of the whole another endeavor was made to change the clause in such manner as to sanction slavery. And now we quote Judge Cutler's graphic words from a recorded conversation:

"I well remember the excited feeling of General Putnam on the occasion. I had been for a day or two confined to my room by sickness. He came to see me, accompanied by Benjamin Ives Gilman, his large white eyes almost starting from their sockets, his form more erect than usual. "Cutler" said he, in a voice of thunder, "get up, get well and be in your place to-morrow." Gilman too, was greatly agitated. He was rubbing his hands as he was wont, when anything troubled him, and exclaimed, "We must prevent this. I cannot, will not live in a community where such injustice is sanctioned by law." I went to General McIntire and prevailed on him to stay away and not vote; there would be a tie, unless we could bring over one more. Milligan, of Jefferson county, had often in the Territorial legislature spoken against slavery, but in the convention he had voted with the Virginia party. In the course of my speech I happened to catch his eye and the very language he had used in debating that question occurred to me. I put it home to him, and he seemed to shrink under it. When the vote was taken, Milligan sang out his aye but with so weak and trembling a sound that the whole house was convulsed with laughter. For my own part I never before felt so fearful a responsibility and never made so great an effort."

Elsewhere Judge Cutler says:

"Thus an overruling Providence by His wisdom makes use of the weak often to defeat the purposes of the great and wise, and to His name be the glory and praise."

The influence of Jefferson was undoubtedly exerted to plant slavery upon Ohio soil. He argued that the extension of slavery would weaken it. It was commonly thought that the exclusion of slavery would operate against immigration to Ohio from the slave States, and that such a clause as that which Mr. Brown sought to introduce would encourage such emigration. This consideration was the chief cause of the pertinacity with which some of those members of the convention, whose districts principally depended upon the south for population, labored for the pro-slavery clause. It may be added that Judge Cutler, the principal agent in the defeat of this measure for the introduction of the modified slavery wedge, was the author also of those measures in the constitution which related to religion and education. Herein was another coincidence. The Washington county man was supplementing again the action of the Massachusetts man—his father; was perpetuating in the constitution of Ohio what the latter had first given expression and force in the ordinance for the Northwest.

The State of Ohio for the organization of which an enabling act was passed April 30, 1802, by Congress, was first recognized as a State by that body upon the nineteenth of February, 1803, which seems the proper date to ascribe as that of the birth of the State.* Quite a number of different dates are given as those which Ohio became a State among them November 29, 1802, * President Israel Ward Andrews, of Marietta college, in Centennial Historical Address.

* When was Ohio admitted into the Union—by President Israel Ward Andrews, of Marietta college. In Secretary of States' Report for 1879.

the day on which the constitutional convention adjourned, and March 1st and 3d, 1803, respectively the dates of the meeting of the first legislature and of the formal organization of the government.

It is not our purpose to follow the history of Ohio, for the briefest outline would be beyond the province of this work, and there was not that close and intimate connection between Washington county and the affairs of the State which existed between the county and the territorial government, and which justified the bestowal of so much attention (for a merely local history), upon the latter.

Washington county has contributed to the civil service of the State men of eminence and worth—men who have been identified with the greatest measures enacted for the public good, and who have left their mark as legislators and as public servants in various capacities. Their names, with the dates of service, appear in the following chapter.

In conclusion, it is fitting that we should refer to two important measures of the period of early State government, both brought about by a Washington county man, and one of them having its principal effect in southeastern Ohio—Washington and other counties. The reform in method of taxation, and the establishment of a general school system were two topics which engaged Judge Ephraim Cutler at about the same time. Prior to 1825 the unimproved lands in the State were taxed by the acre without regard to valuation, "a system than which," said Samuel F. Vinton, "ingenuity could not devise one more unequal, unjust, and oppressive." Judge Cutler, while representative for the county in 1819-20, introduced a resolution proposing that all lands should be taxed at their real or relative values. The resolution passed the house, but it was not until 1825 that its author secured its passage by the senate, of which body he was then a member, having been elected in 1823. He then secured its adoption through the convincing argument that to firmly establish the State credit (as the friends of public improvements were then very anxious to do in order to build the Ohio canal) it was absolutely necessary to have a broad, equitable, judicious system of raising the revenue. The ad valorem plan of taxation which was brought into vogue, was not only a great boon to the long distressed and burdened people of Washington and other thinly-settled counties, but an invaluable aid to the State, as it materially assisted the canal commissioners to procure the loan which they needed, in New York.

In 1822 Judge Cutler was appointed one of the seven commissioners to report a system of education, to be uniform throughout the State, and well supported by general taxation and by judicious management of the school lands or the funds from them. The report of Mr. Kilbourn said that Judge Cutler was the father of this admirable system adopted in 1825, which remained in vogue for many years.

Judge Cutler was elected to the legislature and the senate upon the very issues which he fought through to the end, and won. And the people of Washington county, as his constituency, thus exhibited an adherence to those principles planted in the colony by the pioneer fathers, which have ever been at work leavening the body politic and building up the fabric of the splendid edifice—the State of Ohio.

CHAPTER XIV.

CIVIL HISTORY OF WASHINGTON COUNTY.

The Proclamation of Governor St. Clair Establishing the County—Its Vast Boundaries—Other Counties Established—Division of Washington into Townships—The First Court House and Jail—Excitement in Regard to Location of the Present Court House—The Donors of the County Lots—Infirmary—The Children's Home—Roster of Washington County—The Territorial Officers—Representatives in Congress—Members of the General Assembly—Members of Constitutional Conventions—Judges of the Courts—The County Officers from 1788 to 1880.

WASHINGTON COUNTY, originally embracing about half the territory now included in the State of Ohio, was established by proclamation of Governor Arthur St. Clair on the twenty-sixth of July, 1788.* Following is the law, which contains a full description of boundaries:

"By his Excellency, Arthur St. Clair, esq., governor and commander-in-chief of the Territory of all the United States northwest of the river Ohio,

A PROCLAMATION

To all persons to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

WHEREAS, by the ordinance of Congress of the thirteenth of July, 1787, for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, it is directed that for the due execution of process, civil and criminal, the governor shall make proper divisions of the said territory, and proceed from time to time, as circumstances may require, to lay out the part of the same where the Indian title has been extinguished, into counties and townships, subject to future alterations as therein specified. Now, know ye, that it appearing to me to be necessary, for the purposes above mentioned, that a county should be immediately laid out, I have ordained and ordered, and by these presents do ordain and order, that all and singular the lands lying and being within the following boundaries, viz: Beginning on the bank of the Ohio river where the western boundary line of Pennsylvania crosses it, and running with that line to Lake Erie; thence along the southern shore of said lake to the mouth of the Cuyahoga; thence up said river to the portage between that and the Tuscarawas branch of the Muskingum; thence down the branch to the forks, at the crossing place above Fort Laurens; thence with a line to be drawn westerly to the portage of that branch of the Big Miami on which the fort stood that was taken by the French in 1742, until it meets the road from the lower Shawneestown to the Sandusky; thence south to the Scioto river: thence with that river to its mouth, and thence up the Ohio to the place of beginning; shall be a county, and the same is hereby erected into a county named and to be called hereafter the county of Washington; and the said county of Washington shall have and enjoy all and singular the jurisdiction, rights, liberties, privileges and immunities whatever, to a county belonging and appertaining, and which any other county that may hereafter be erected and laid out, shall or ought to enjoy, conformably to the ordinance of Congress before mentioned. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the Territory to be affixed this twenty-sixth day of July, in the thirteenth year of Independence of the United States, and in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight.

(Signed) A. ST. CLAIR."

* The date as given above was discovered by President Audrews, of Marietta college, in an examination of the State papers at Washington to be the correct one. It has usually been stated that the county was erected on the twenty-seventh; Atwater's History of Ohio says the twenty-sixth.

JUDGE EPHRAIM CUTLER.

OHIO VALLEY HISTORICAL SERIES

Robert Clarke & Co Publishers Cincinnati, O

The next county proclaimed was Hamilton, January 2, 1790. Then followed the erection from 1790 to 1795 of the counties of St. Clair, Knox, Randolph, and Wayne, lying in the Northwest Territory, and outside of the present limits of Ohio. Adams was next erected July 10, 1797. Jefferson followed in order, being erected July 29, 1797, as the eighth in the Territory and fourth in the boundaries of Ohio. The establishment of the last named materially lessened the size of Washington, as did also the creation of Ross in 1798. Trumbull, the county of the Western Reserve, was not erected until 1800. Belmont was proclaimed in 1801. After the organization of the State government counties were created quite fast, and the old territorial counties were reduced in size correspondingly. Muskingum was formed in 1804; Gallia in 1803; Athens in 1805; Monroe in 1815; Morgan and Meigs in 1819.

The division of Washington county into townships was not effected until December, 1790, and was done by the court of quarter sessions. Marietta, Belpre, and Waterford, including respectively the three settlements, were established and contained immense tracts of country. Marietta extended from the seventh range to the western boundary of the ninth range (twelve miles), and extended south so as to include township No. 2 in the ninth range. Belpre and Waterford were of similar size. Gallipolis was bounded upon the north by a line drawn westward from the north line of township No. 3, in the eleventh range, upon the west by the Scioto and on the south by the Ohio river. In the northern end of the county extending to the lake were two townships—Warren, adjoining Pennsylvania, and Middletown, further west. These townships were taken off by the establishment of Jefferson county in 1797. In December, 1797, the townships of Adams and Salem were established, the latter extending from the donation tract to the north line of the county, and being five miles in width. A new Middletown, embracing nearly all of what is now Athens county, was established in December, 1798. Newtown, formed from the north part of Waterford, and extending to the north line of the county, was formed the same year as the above, also Newport. There were nine townships in the county in 1800, of which six—Marietta, Belpre, Waterford, Salem, Adams, and Newport, were within its present limits, and three—Gallipolis, Middletown, and Newport, outside. To conclude: The dates of the establishment of the townships have been as follows: *

Marietta, Belpre and Waterford, 1790; Adams and Salem, 1792; Newport, 1798; Grandview, 1802; Water-town and Roxbury, 1806; Fearing, 1808; Wesley and Warren, 1810; Union, 1812; Lawrence, 1815; Aurelius and Barlow, 1818; Ludlow, 1819; Decatur, 1820; Liberty, 1832; Jolly and Independence, 1840; Fairfield and Palmer, 1851; Dunham, 1856; Muskingum, 1861. Of the foregoing twenty-five townships three have ceased to exist, viz: Roxbury, Jolly and Union.

The first court house in Washington county was built in 1798, and the following year, under the superintendence of Dudley Woodbridge, esq., and Griffin Greene—the latter being the architect—contracts were made with Joshua Wells to frame and raise the building; with Joshua Shipman to weatherboard and shingle it; with James Lawton to do the mason work, and with Gilbert Devol, jr., to furnish the iron—grating, spikes, bolts, etc.—in all three thousand weight, for which he was to have sixteen cents per pound. The main building was forty-five feet in length and thirty-nine in breadth, two stories high. The walls were three feet thick and made of double tiers of yellow poplar logs, eighteen inches square, neatly hewed and dovetailed at the corners of the building. The logs were so laid as to break joints like masonry, and were held together by heavy iron bolts. The front room in the upper story was the court room. It was forty by thirty feet in dimensions, lighted by seven windows and heated by two large fireplaces. "Here," says Hildreth, "Paul Fearing, R. J. Meigs, and Jacob Burnet, the earliest attorneys northwest of the river Ohio, displayed their youthful powers and unfolded talents that few at this day can excel. Here Charles Hammond and Philemon Beecher for many years attended as barristers, specially the latter. Here also Thomas Ewing, esq. (the elder), first essayed his mighty powers and began that bright career of popular fame which elevated him to some of the first stations of the government. A host of others have also here commenced their careers in the labyrinths of the law."* The two lower rooms were occupied by the jailer and his family. A passage between them led to the jail in the rear part of the structure, which like the court house proper was very strongly built. No imprisoned malfactor ever broke from this jail. The jury rooms were in the rear of the court room, over the jail. The roof over the old court-house corresponded with the rest of the building, being constructed of very heavy timbers, and covered with thick shingles, nearly or perhaps quite three feet in length. A cupola surmounted the roof in which was hung the same bell which is in the present court house. For many years this bell was rung regularly at nine o'clock morning and evening and at noon, and was tolled upon the occasion of the death of any inhabitant. It bears the inscription, "1802—Barazilia Davidson, Norwich, Connecticut"—the name being that of the man who cast it.

The oldest portion of the present court house was finished in 1823. As early as 1819 the need of a new building became apparent, and after the subject had been agitated for some time a committee was appointed by a citizens' meeting to report upon the matter. The committee consisted of Governor Return J. Meigs, Hon. Levi Barber, and D. H. Buell, esq. These gentlemen reported in favor of the present location upon the thirteenth of April, and on the following day the county commissioners endorsed their opinion. For two years little or no action was taken, but in 1821 the commissioners advertised for a plan, and employed Joseph Holden to collect the materials for building. It was decided that the building should contain four principal offices, each to be sixteen feet square and, that the dimensions of the whole structure should be forty-eight feet each way. Much opposition to the location arose, and there was considerable discussion as to the relative merits of various sites. The commissioners were annoyed with scores of petitions and personal appeals for location in a dozen different places. Some wished the building to be erected upon the elevated square on Washington street, some upon the lot, where Judge Ewart has latterly lived, then known as the Thierry property, and others on Fifth street, south of the cemetery. In the spring of 1822 it was decided to locate it on Fifth street, but a few weeks later a majority of the citizens assembled at a meeting, and voted in favor of the Thierry property as the location. The commissioners changed their plan in conformance to the general desire, but a few weeks later decided on the corner of Putnam and Second streets, and the work was begun so soon that opponents to that location had no time to effect another change. Governor Meigs' influence secured the building of the edifice at a little distance back from Putnam street. This was done that the view (then a very fine one) from the house of his friend, Dr. S. P. Hildreth, might not be obscured.

* For fuller particulars upon this subject the reader is referred to the township histories.

* American Pioneer, Vol. I.

The addition upon the north which looks older than the front building, was erected in 1854. The main building was again improved in 1876. The lot occupied by the court house was donated by Colonel Ebenezer Sproat.

The jail was built in 1848. It occupies the site of the old court house and jail which we have described. This lot was given to the county by Judge Dudley Woodbridge. While the old jail and court house occupied the site of the present jail, the lot on which the court house now stands was in use as the place of punishment for criminals. The pillory, stocks and whipping post stood there, and curious throngs of people assembled around them when either one was in use. The lot was also a pound. It was selected in 1800 for the double purpose by Messrs. Robert Oliver, Griffin Greene and Robert Safford.

The poor were provided for by the township authorities until 1840. Although a law was passed as early as 1816, authorizing county poor houses, no movement was made under it in Washington county until 1835. In that year land was bought of Dr. Jonas Moore for one thousand two hundred dollars, and a contract was made with Messrs. Daniels, Westgate and Alcock to erect a building for the sum of two thousand and forty dollars. Samson Cole, Eben Gates and Wyllys Hall were appointed directors in 1835. In 1838 many petitions were received for changing the location of the poor house, and in conformance to them the present farm was bought—one hundred and ninety-eight acres of land—for two thousand five hundred and thirty-six dollars and fifty-eight cents. In 1850 the name "poor house" was changed by act of the legislature to county infirmary.

The Children's Home of Washington county is an institution which has a peculiar interest, both because of the nature of its beginning and growth, and because the first institution of the kind in the State. Miss C. A. Fay (now Mrs. Ewing) has the honor of being the founder of the Children's Home, and of having given the initial impetus to this branch of charity in the State. Various scenes of distress led Miss Fay to concern herself for the welfare of children, and in 1858, upon the first of April, her plans had been so far realized that she opened a small home or asylum for children upon Moss run, in Lawrence township, about twenty miles from Marietta, where, with her savings as a school-teacher, she had bought twelve acres of land and built a small house. Her plan was to care for orphan children, with some assistance from the county, (her allowance for each child per week never exceeding one dollar and twenty cents,) and from individuals benevolently disposed. She took nine children from the infirmary to begin with, and a few years later had at one time more than thirty, and in the ten years of her service in this charity which she had conceived, she had one hundred and one under her charge, for most of whom she secured homes. Miss Fay's labors were of the heroic kind, were arduous, perplexing, and involved the sacrifice of almost every enjoyment of life, save that of doing good. She was employed almost constantly, but found time while attending to her family of little ones, at the humble home she had provided for them, to exert an influence upon the public mind in favor of legislation for having Children's Homes established and supported by taxation. Finally a bill introduced in the State legislature by Hon. W. F. Curtis, of this county, and given the earnest support of Hon. S. S. Knowles, senator from this district, was passed, authorizing the establishment, support, and regulation of children's homes in the several counties of the State. This act passed in March, 1866, and as amended, April 7, 1867. Very shortly after the former date a purchase was made of the farm of one hundred acres, one mile above Marietta, on the east bank of the Muskingum, on which the fine buildings of the Home now stand. The price paid was eighteen thousand dollars. The property is now valued at upwards of thirty thousand dollars, the increase being largely in the value of the buildings erected. March 1, 1867, Mrs. A. G. Brown, having been appointed matron of the Home, entered upon the discharge of the duties of the office by assisting in preparing and arranging the several apartments of the institution for the reception and care of such children as were ready to be admitted; and on the first of April, 1867, the children from Mrs. Ewing's were brought in, and from that date the Home has been in full operation. Mrs. Brown continued to serve as matron until April 1, 1868, and was succeeded by Rev. Ira M. Preston and wife as superintendent and matron, who served one year, whose successors were Dr. Simeon D. Hart and wife, who have served as superintendent and matron since the first of April, 1869.

Since its organization upwards of five hundred children have been admitted to the institution. The institution, a direct outgrowth of Mrs. Ewing's Home, was the first organized in the State, under the law. It has received the benefit of careful attention from the friends of the poor in Washington county, has most of the time had about a hundred inmates, and has been productive of an immense amount of good.

CIVIL ROSTER.*

MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

After the adoption of the second grade of territorial government, in 1799, the whole Northwest Territory was represented in Congress by a single delegate. William Henry Harrison, of Hamilton county, was the first, and was succeeded, in 1800, by William McMillen, of the same county. Paul Fearing, of Washington county, was elected in 1801 and served until 1803. State government was then organized, and Jeremiah Morrow, of Warren county, was the sole delegate until 1813. From that time until 1823 Washington county was an integral part of the Third Congressional district, of which the following gentlemen were the representatives for the terms indicated:

William Creighton, jr., of Ross, 1813-17; Levi Barber, of Washington, 1817-19; Henry Brush, of Ross, 1819-21; Levi Barber, of Washington, 1821-23.

Until 1833 Washington county was a portion of the Seventh district, and was represented:

Samuel T. Vinton, of Gallia, 1823-33.

From 1833 to 1843 the county was in the Sixth district, and represented as follows:

Samuel F. Vinton, of Gallia, 1833-37; Calvary Morris, of Athens, 1837-43.

From 1843 to 1853 the county was a portion of the Thirteenth district, which was represented as follows:

Perley B. Johnson, of Morgan, 1843-45; Isaac Parish, of Morgan, 1845-47; Thomas Ritchie, of Perry, 1847-49; William A. Whittlesey, of Washington, 1849-51; James M. Gaylord, of Morgan, 1851-53.

From 1853 to 1863 the district was the Sixteenth:

Edward Ball, of Muskingum, 1853-57; Cydnor B. Tompkins, of Morgan, 1857-61; William P. Cutler, of Washington, 1861-63.

From 1863 to the present the district has been the Fifteenth, and represented as follows:

James R. Morris, of Monroe, 1863-65; Tobias A. Plants, of Meigs, 1865-69; Eliakim H. Moore, of Athens, 1869-71; William P. Sprague, of Morgan, 1871-75; Nelson H. Van Vorhes, of Athens, 1875-79; Adoniram J. Warner, of Washington, 1879-81; Rufus R. Dawes of Washington, 1881.

MEMBERS OF STATE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS.

Ephraim Cutler, Benjamin Ives Gilman, John McIntire, Rufus Putnam, 1802; Thomas W. Ewart, William P. Cutler, 1850-51; Harlow Chapin, 1873-74.

MEMBERS OF TERRITORIAL LEGISLATURE.

(Senators.)

Robert Oliver (president), 1799-1803.

(Representatives.)

Paul Fearing, Return J. Meigs, 1799-1801; Ephraim Cutler, William R. Putnam, 1801-1803.

MEMBERS OF STATE LEGISLATURE.*

(Senators.)

Joseph Buell, 1803, First; Joseph Buell, Elijah Backus, 1803, Second; Joseph Buell, 1804, Third; Joseph Buell, Hallam Hempstead, 1805, Fourth; Hallam Hempstead, 1806, Fifth; John Sharp, 1807-1808, Sixth and Seventh; William Woodbridge, 1811-12-13, Tenth, Eleventh, and Twelfth; William R. Putnam, 1814, Thirteenth; John Sharp, 1815-16, Fourteenth and Fifteenth; Sardine Stone, e, 1817-22, Sixteenth to Twenty-first; Ephraim Cutler, 1823-24, Twenty-second and Twenty-third; William R. Putnam, 1827-28, Twenty-sixth and Twenty-seventh; Arius Nye, 1831-32, Thirtieth and Thirty-first; Isaac Humphrey, 1839-40, Thirty-eighth and Thirty-ninth; Rufus E. Harte, 1845-46, Forty-fourth and Forty-fifth; George W. Baker, 1849-50, Forty-eighth and Forty-ninth; Harley Laffin, 1854, Fifty-first; Davis Green, 1858, Fifty-third; William F. Curtis, 1864, Fifty-sixth; Samuel S. Knowles, 1866, Fifty-seventh; Rodney M. Stimson, 1870-72, Fifty-ninth and Sixtieth; Perez B. Buell, 1874, Sixty-first; John Irvine, 1878,

(Representatives.)

William Jackson, 1803, First and Second assembly; Seth Carhart, 1804, Third; Levi Barber, 1806, Fifth; Joseph Palmer, 1807, Sixth; William Woodbridge, 1808, Seventh; William R. Putnam, 1809, Eighth; S. P. Hildreth, William R. Putnam, 1810, Ninth; S. P. Hildreth, 1811, Tenth; Sardine Stone, 1812-13, Eleventh and Twelfth; John Sharp, 1814, Thirteenth; Henry Jolly, 1815, Fourteenth; Sardine Stone, 1816, Fifteenth; Nathaniel Hamilton, 1817, Sixteenth; Joseph Barker, 1818, Seventeenth; Ephraim Cutler, 1819, Eighteenth; Timothy Buell, 1820-21, Nineteenth and Twentieth; Ephraim Cutler, 1822, Twenty-first; William Skinner, 1823, Twenty-second; John Cotton, 1824, Twenty-third; William R. Putnam, 1825-26, Twenty-fourth and Twenty-fifth; Arius Nye, 1827-28, Twenty-sixth and Twenty-seventh; Joseph Barker, jr., 1829-30, Twenty-eighth and Twenty-ninth; James M. Booth, 1831-32, Thirtieth and Thirty-first; Silas Cook, 1833, Thirty-second; Joseph Barker, jr., 1842, Thirty-third; Isaac Humphrey, 1835-36, Thirty-fourth and Thirty-fifth; Walter Curtis, 1837-38, Thirty-sixth and Thirty-seventh; William A. Whittlesey, 1839, Thirty-eighth; Arius Nye, 1840, Thirty-ninth; Truxton Lyon, 1841, Fortieth; George M. Woodbridge, 1842, Forty-first; William Glines, 1843, Forty-second; William P. Cutler, 1844-45-46 (Speaker in 1846), Forty-third, Forty-fourth and Forty-fifth; George W. Barker, 1847, Forty-sixth; Seth Woodford, 1848-49, Forty-seventh and Forty-eighth; Ebenezer Battelle, jr., 1850, Forty-ninth; Levi Bartlett, 1852, Fiftieth; Thomas Ross, 1854, Fifty-first; Samuel Hutchinson, James Lawton, 1856, Fifty-second; A. S. Bailey, O. Lewis Clark, 1858, Fifty-third; John Haddon, 1860, Fifty-fourth; O. Lewis Clark, 1862, Fifty-fifth; Mark Green, 1864, Fifty-sixth; A. L. Curtis, A. L. Haskin, James B. Green (to fill vacancy caused by death of Mr. Haskin), 1866, Fifty-seventh; Samuel M.

* From appendix to Centennial Historical address, by President Israel Ward Andrews—with additions to date.

* Washington county has at times been associated with others both in the election of senators and representatives. We give only the names of those who were residents of the county.

Richardson, Perez B. Buell, 1868, Fifty-eighth; John A. Brown, 1870, Fifty-ninth; William G. Way, 1872, Sixtieth; John Varley, 1874, Sixty-first; Henry Bohl, Gilbert Smith, 1876-78, Sixty-second and Sixty-third; Thomas W. Moore, 1880.

JUDGES OF THE GENERAL COURT.

Samuel H. Parsons, October 16, 1787, died November 17, 1789; James M. Varnum, October 16, 1787, died January 10, 1789; John C. Symmes, February 19, 1788, to 1803 (State formed); Greene Turner, September 12, 1789, resigned in 1798; Rufus Putnam, March 31, 1790, resigned December 22, 1796; Joseph Gilman, December 22, 1796 to 1803 (State formed); R. J. Meigs, jr., February 12, 1798 to 1803 (State formed).

JUDGES OF THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Rufus Putnam, Benjamin Tupper, Archibald Crary, Joseph Gilman, Dudley Woodbridge, Robert Oliver, Daniel Loring, John G. Petit, Isaac Pierce, Griffin Greene, Ephraim Cutler, Peregrine Foster.

JUDGES OF THE COURT OF QUARTER SESSIONS OF THE PEACE.

Joseph Gilman, Isaac Pierce, Robert Oliver, Dudley Woodbridge, Josiah Munroe, John G. Petit, Griffin Greene, William R. Putnam, Samuel Williamson, Joseph Barker, Ephraim Cutler, Henry Smith, Philip Whitten, Alvin Bingham, Thos. Stanley, Seth Cathcart, Robert Safford, William Harper, William Burnham, Joseph Buell.

JUDGES OF PROBATE COURT.

Rufus Putnam, October, 1788, resigned December, 1789; Joseph Gilman, December, 1789, resigned December, 1796; Paul Fearing, March, 1797, to March, 1803; T. W. Ewart, February, 1852, to October, 1852; Davis Green, October, 1852, to February, 1855; William Devol, February, 1855, to February, 1858; C. R. Rhodes, February, 1858, to February, 1866; C. F. Buell, February, 1861, to February, 1864; L. W. Chamberlain, February, 1864, to February, 1870; A. W. McCormick, February, 1870, to February, 1876; C. T. Frazier, February, 1876, to February, 1882.

PRESIDENT JUDGES OF THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS IN THE CIRCUIT INCLUDING WASHINGTON COUNTY.

(Under the State Constitution of 1802.)

Calvin Pease, 1803-08; William Wilson, 1808-19; Ezra Osborne, 1819-26; Thomas Irwin, 1826-40; John E. Hanna, 1840-47; Arius Nye, 1847-50; A. G. Brown, 1850-52.

ASSOCIATE JUDGES OF THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Griffin Greene, 1803-08; Joseph Buell, 1803-10; Joseph Wood, 1803-08; Esekial Deming, 1808-24; William Hempstead, 1808-10; Paul Fearing, 1810-17; Thomas Lord, 1810-17; Henry Jolly, 1817-24; John Sharp, 1817-23; J. M. Chamberlain, 1823-24; Walter Curtis, 1824-37; Henry P. Wilcox, 1824-25; Alexander Warner, 1824-30; John Cotton, 1825-47; Joseph Barker, 1830-43; Oliver Loring, 1837-47; Isaac Humphreys, 1843-43; Ebezener Gates, 1843-44; Joseph Barker, jr., 1844-52; Bial Stedman, 1847-52; William R. Putnam, jr., 1847-52.

Judges of the Court of Common Pleas in the subdistrict composed of Washington, Athens, Meigs, and Gallia counties:

Simeon Nash, 1852-62; John Welch, 1862-65; E. A. Guthrie, 1865-74; William B. Loomis, 1868-73; T. A. Plants, 1873-75; L. B. Hibbard, January, 1875, to October, 1875; J. T. Cartwright, February, 1875, to October, 1875; J. P. Bradbury, October, 1875, to February, 1882; S. S. Knowles, October, 1875, to February, 1882.

PROSECUTING ATTORNEYS.

This officer was appointed by the courts under the territory. The State law of 1803 gave the appointment to the supreme court, and that of 1805 to the court of common pleas. From 1833 the people have elected. The term is two years.

Paul Fearing, September 9, 1788 to 1794; Return Jonathan Meigs, jr., 1794 to 1798; Matthew Backus, 1798 to 1808; William Woodbridge, 1808 to February 6, 1815; Caleb Emerson, February 6, 1815, to April 10, 1821; John P. Mayberry, April 10, 1821, to October 30, 1829; Arius Nye, October 30, 1829, to August 17, 1840; David Barber, October 26, 1840, to April 3, 1845; Arius Nye, April 3, 1845, to March 8, 1847; William D. Emerson, March 8, 1847 to March, 13, 1848; William S. Nye, March 13, 1848, to March, 1850; Davis Green, March, 1850, to April 5, 1852; Rufus E. Harte, April 5, 1852, to October 4, 1852; Samuel B. Robinson, October 4, 1852, to January, 1855; Charles R. Rhodes, January, 1855, to January, 1857; Samuel B. Robinson, January, 1857, to January, 1859; Charles R. Barclay, January, 1859, to January, 1861; Frank Buell, January, 1861, to April, 1861; Melvin Clarke, April, 1861, to October 11, 1861; William S. Nye, October 11, 1861, to January, 1862; David Alban, January, 1862, to January, 1868; Walter Brabham, January, 1868, to January, 1870; Reuben L. Nye, January, 1870, to January, 1872; Walter Brabham, January, 1872, to January, 1874; Samuel B. Robinson, January, 1874, to January, 1876; Frank F. Oldham, January, 1876, to January, 1880; David Alban, January, 1880.

CLERKS OF THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Under the territory the title for clerk of the court of common pleas was prothonotary. This officer and the clerk of the court of quarter sessions were appointed by the governor. Under the State constitution of 1802 the court appointed its own clerk for seven years. Under that of 1851 the people elect, for three years.

Return Jonathan Meigs, September 9, 1788-June 9, 1795; Benjamin Ives Gilman, June 9, 1795-July, 1803; Edward W. Tupper, July, 1803-October 31, 1808; Giles Hemstead, October 31, 1808-January 1, 1809; Levi Barber, January 1, 1809-March 1, 1817; George Dunlevy, March 1, 1817-October 31, 1836; Thomas W. Ewart, October 31, 1836-October 21, 1851; William C. Taylor, October 21, 1851-February, 1852; George S. Gilliland, February, 1852-July, 1852; William C. Taylor, July, 1852-February, 1854; O. Lewis Clarke, February, 1854-February, 1857; Jasper S. Sprague, February, 1857-February, 1863; Willis H. Johnson, February, 1863-February, 1866; Jewett Palmer, February, 1866-February, 1872; Daniel P. Torpy, February, 1872-February, 1878; Christian H. Etz, February, 1878-February, 1881.

SHERIFFS.

Under the territory the governor appointed. Under the State the people elect, for two years. Sheriffs are eligible only four years in six.

Ebenezer Sproat, September 2, 1788-1802; William Skinner, 1802-3; John Clark, 1803-10; William Skinner, 1810-12; Timothy Buell, 1812-14; Alexander Hill, 1814-16; Timothy Buell, 1816-October, 1820; Silas Cook, October, 1820-October, 1824; Jesse Loring, October, 1824-October, 1828; Robert R. Green, October, 1828-October, 1832; Jesse Loring, October, 1832-October, 1834; Benjamin M. Brown, October, 1834-October, 1838; John Test, October, 1838-October, 1842; George W. Barker, October, 1842-October, 1846; Junia Jennings, October, 1846-October, 1850; Jesse Hildebrand, October, 1850-January, 1853; Marcellus J. Morse, January, 1853-January, 1857; Mark Green, January, 1857-January, 1861; Augustus Winsor, January, 1861-January, 1865; Jackson A. Hicks, January, 1865-January, 1869; Samuel L. Grosvenor, January, 1869-January, 1873; George Davenport, January, 1873-January, 1877; William T. Stedman, January, 1877, January, 1879; Daniel B. Torpy, 1879.

COUNTY COMMISSIONERS.

Provision was made for three such officers by a law adopted from the Pennsylvania code by the governor and judges in 1795, and confirmed by the territorial legislature in 1799. They were to be appointed by the court of quarter sessions. The State law of 1804 provided for their election by the people, one each year, the term of office being three years.

The following were appointed under the law of the territory: William R. Putnam, Paul Fearing, Oliver Rice, Gilbert Devol, Jonathan Haskell, Simeon Deming, Isaac Pierce. Of these, Isaac Pierce served until 1804, W. R. Putnam until 1805, and Simeon Deming until 1806. The list of those elected in successive years is as follows:

Nathaniel Hamilton, 1804; John Sharp, 1805; Paul Fearing, 1806; Nathaniel Hamilton, 1807; Joseph Barker, 1808; Paul Fearing (resigned), 1809; John Sharp (for two years), 1809; Nathaniel Hamilton, 1810; Daniel Goodno, 1811; Henry Jolly, 1812; Nathaniel Hamilton, 1813; Daniel Goodno, 1814; William Skinner, 1815; Titan Kemble, 1816; John B. Regnier, 1817; Daniel Goodno, 1818; Titan Kemble (resigned), 1819; John B. Regnier (died), 1820; Samuel Beach (two years), 1821; Amzi Stanley (one year), 1821; Daniel Goodno, 1821; Joseph Barker, 1822; William R. Putnam, 1823; Daniel H. Buell (resigned), 1824; Joseph Barker, 1825; Thomas White (one year), 1825; William Pitt Putnam, 1826; Silas Cook (one year), 1826; Anselm T. Nye, 1827; Seth Baker (one year), 1828; Joel Tuttle, 1829; Jabish F. Palmer (two years), 1829; Anselm T. Nye, 1830; Jabish F. Palmer, 1831; Ebenezer Battelle, 1832; William Pitt Putnam, 1833; John D. Chamberlain, 1834; Robert K. Ewart, 1835; Daniel H. Buell, 1836; John D. Chamberlain, 1837; William Dana, 1838; Daniel H.

Buell, 1839; John D. Chamberlain, 1840; James Dutton, 1841; Douglas Putnam, 1842; Hiram Gard, 1843; William West, 1844; Douglas Putnam, 1845; Boylston Shaw, 1846; Lewis H. Greene, 1847; Douglas Putnam, 1848; John Breckenridge, 1849; George Stanley, 1850; Douglas Putnam, 1851; Walter Curtis, 1852; Benjamin Rightmire, 1853; William Mason, 1854; Walter Curtis, 1855; Charles Dana, 1856; William R. Putnam, 1857; Joseph Penrose, 1858; Zachariah Cochrane, 1859; James McWilliams, 1860; J. J. Hollister, 1861; William Thomas, 1862; Anthony Sheets (resigned), 1863; J. J. Hollister, 1864; George Benedict, 1865; James Little, (one year), 1865; James Little, 1866; Seymour Clough, 1867; George Benedict, 1868; Thomas Caywood, 1869; Mark Green (resigned), 1870; Joseph Penrose, 1871; Cyrenius Buchanan (two years), 1871; John Hall, 1872; Pemberton Palmer, 1873; John Pool, 1874; John Potter, 1875; Moses A. Malster, 1876; John Hoppel, 1877; Philip Mattern, 1878; Robert Mullenix, 1879; William Thompson, 1880.

COUNTY AUDITORS.

The office was created in 1820. The general assembly appointed the first auditor. In 1821 the auditor was required to be elected by the people each year. In 1824 the law made the term two years.

The successive auditors have been: Royal Prentiss, 1820-5; William A. Whittlesey, 1825-38; James M. Booth, 1838-40; Joseph P. Wightman, 1840-2; James M. Booth, 1842-6; Sala Bosworth, 1846-54; Horatio Booth, 1854-6; Frederick A. Wheeler, 1856-64; Zadok G. Bundy, 1864-8; John V. Ramsey, 1868-70; John T. Matthews, 1870-6; Benjamin J. McKinney, 1876-81.

COUNTY RECORDERS.

Under the territory the recorder—styled register till 1795—was appointed by the governor. By the law of 1803 the associate judges appointed, for seven years. By the law of 1829 the people elect, for three years.

Enoch Parsons, 1788-90; Dudley Woodbridge, April, 1790-June, 1807; Giles Hempstead, June, 1807-June, 1814; George Dunlevy, June, 1814-June, 1817; Daniel H. Buell, June, 1817-October, 1834; James M. Booth, October 1834-November, 1837; Daniel P. Bosworth, November, 1837-October, 1843; Stephen Newton, October, 1843-November, 1855; William B. Mason, November, 1855-January, 1862; Manly Warren, January, 186-May, 1864; William Warren (appointed), May, 1864-January, 1865; George J. Bartmess, January, 1865-August, 1866; A. T. Ward (appointed), August, 1866-January, 1867; James Nixon, January, 1867-81.

COUNTY TREASURERS.

The governor appointed till the formation of the State. By the law of 1803, the associate judges appointed. By the law of 1804, the commissioners appointed annually. Since 1827 the people have elected, for two years. By the constitution of 1851 the treasurer is eligible only four years in six.

Jonathan Stone, 1792-1801; Jabez True, 1801-17; Joseph Holden, 1817-28; Weston Thomas, 1828-30; Royal Prentiss, 1830-2; Michael Deterly, 1832-6; Ebenezer Gates, 1836-8; Robert Crawford, 1838-50; Abner L. Guitteau, 1850-6; Stephen Newton, 1856-8; Ebenezer B. Leget, 1858-60; William B. Thomas, 1860-2; Rufus E. Harte, 1862-6; William B. Mason, 1866-8; Lewis Anderson, 1868-70; Ernest Lindner, 1870-74; William S. Waugh, 1874-8; William R. Goddard, 1878-80; John Molst, 1880.

COUNTY COLLECTORS.

For some years prior to 1804 there were township collectors, and they performed some service in 1805. The office of county collector was abolished in 1827.

Nathanael Cushing, 1804-6; William Burnham, 1806-7; Obadiah Lincoln, 1807-8; Timothy Buell, 1808-20; Jesse Loring, 1820-2; Timothy Buell, 1822-3; Jesse Loring, 1823-7.

CORONERS.

Provision was made in 1788 for a coroner in each county, to be appointed by the governor. The first State constitution also provided for one to be elected every two years by the people, and a law of 1854 continued the provision. The list appended is believed to be correct from 1812 to the present time; there is some uncertainty as to the previous periods.

Charles Green (territory); Joel Bowen, 1803; Joseph Holden, 1806; Alexander Hill, 1812; Silas Cook, 1814; Samson Cole, 1816; Silas Cook, 1818; John Merrill, 1820; Griffin Greene, 1824; Francis Devol, 1834; Warden Willis, 1836; Lawrence Chamberlain, 1838; John T. Clogston, 1844; Lawrence Chamberlain, 1846; Chauncey T. Judd, 1850; Finley Wilson, 1852; James H. Jones, 1853; Chauncey T. Judd, 1855; Benjamin F. Stone, 1857; Louis Soyez, 1859; Allen M. Creighbaum, 1860; Lemuel Grimes, 1864; Simeon D. Hart, 1866; Herman Michaelis, 1868; Philip Emrich, 1870; Marcellus J. Morse, 1872; T. C. Kiger, 1874; Conrad Krighbaum, 1876; J. Fullman, 1880.

COUNTY SURVEYORS.

From 1803 to 1831 the surveyor was appointed by the court of common pleas, and commissioned by the governor. Since 1831 the election has been by the people, for three years.

Levi Barber, November, 1805-July, 1816; William R. Putnam, July, 1816-October, 1826; William R. Brown- ing, February, 1827-May, 1832; Benjamin F. Stone, May, 1832-November, 1841; Levi Bartlett, November, 1841-October, 1851; L. W. Chamberlain, October, 1851-December, 1861; R. W. St. John, December, 1861-December, 1864; Charles E. Gard* (appointed) January, 1865-December, 1865; John A. Plumer, February, 1866-January, 1875; J. P. Hulbert, January, 1875-1881; D. F. Dufer, January, 1881.

INFIRMARY DIRECTORS.

These officers were appointed by the commissioners from 1836 until 1842, when they were required to be elected by the people, one each year, to serve three years.

Samson Cole, 1836-42; Eben Gates, 1836-42; Wyl-lys Hall, 1836-42; James Dunn, 1842-9; Thomas F. Stanley, 1842-44; William R. Putnam, jr., 1842-5; Samuel Shipman, 1844-7; Brooks Blizzard, 1845-51; John Collins, 1847-59; James M. Booth, 1849-50; James Dunn, 1850-61; James Dutton, 1850-3; James S. Cady, 1853-6; Robert T. Miller, 1854-60; Levi L. Fay, 1856-62; Robert B. Cheatham, 1860-3; Junia Jennings, 1861-70; John Dowling, 1862-5; William West, 1863-6; James Dunn, 1865-8; F. A. Wheeler, 1866-75; Samuel E. Fay, 1868-71; H. W. Corner, 1870-3; Charles Athey, 1871-4; George W. Richards, 1873-6; William Caywood, 3d, 1874-80; John Dowling, 1875-8; Charles A. Cook, 1876-9; John Dowling, 1878-81; John Strocker, 1879-82; Charles Athey, 1880-3.

TRUSTEES OF THE CHILDREN'S HOME.

By the act of March 20, 1866, five trustees were to be appointed by the county commissioners, to serve one year each. By the act of April 10, 1867, the number of trustees was reduced to three, and the term of service extended to three years.

Douglas Putnam, June, 1866, to March, 1868; William R. Putnam, June, 1866, to March, 1877; Frederick A. Wheeler June, 1866, incumbent; William S. Ward, June, 1866, to May, 1871; Augustin Dyar, June, 1866, to March, 1868; Wylie H. Oldham, June, 1871, to June, 1875; W. Dudley Devol, September, 1875, incumbent; George Benedict, March, 1877, incumbent.

CHAPTER XV.

THE BENCH AND THE BAR OF WASHINGTON COUNTY.*

Early Courts of the Territory and of Washington County—Their Constitution and Jurisdiction—Judges Varnum and Parsons—Paul Fearing the First Attorney in the Northwest—Sketches of Other Attorneys—Joseph Gilman—Return Jonathan Meigs, Jr.—Elijah Backus—Lewis Cass—Benjamin Ruggles—M. Backus—William Woodbridge—Gustavus Swan—Caleb Emerson—John P. Mayberry—Arius Nye—William A. Whittlesey—Charles R. Rhodes—Thomas W. Ewart—S. S. Knowles—Other Lawyers who have practiced in Washington County early and late.

The ordinance for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, passed by the last Congress of the Confederation, provided for successive forms of territorial government; and the first temporary form provided for, was organized by the appointment of a governor and three judges.

The judges constituted a supreme court of common law jurisdiction, styled the general court.

In addition to their purely judicial functions, the judges, conjointly with the governor, were vested with the legislative power of the temporary government.

The first settlement of the territory made at the mouth of the Muskingum, was in April, 1788, and the first municipal code of the pioneers consisted merely of regulations, drawn up by Colonel Meigs, and published by posting on a tree on the banks of the river.

*Samuel N. Hobson was elected October, 1864, but resigned.

* By Hon. R. E. Harte.

In about three months after the landing of the pioneers, Governor St. Clair and the judges arrived in the territory, and on the eighteenth of July the governor was formally received by the inhabitants at Marietta, the Ordinance of 1787 and the commissions of the governor and judges were read, an inaugural address was made by the governor, and a response made thereto by General Putnam in the name of all the people, and the first form of government provided by the ordinance was formally established within the territory.

The county of Washington, including within its limits about one-half of the present State of Ohio, was established by proclamation of the governor July 26, 1788.

Laws were enacted by the governor and judges, fixing the terms of the general court, establishing county courts of common pleas, courts of general quarter sessions of the peace, courts of probate, and of single justices of the peace.

The county court of common pleas consisted of a number of judges, not less than three, nor more than seven appointed in each county and commissioned by the governor.

The general court of quarter sessions of the peace consisted of three or more justices of the peace of the county, appointed by the governor, had a limited criminal jurisdiction, and held four sessions a year. Single judges of the common pleas and single justices of the peace were also clothed with certain civil and criminal powers. The court of probate had the ordinary jurisdiction of probate court.

This judicial system continued during the eleven years of the government of the governor and judges, and the three years of the territorial legislature of the Northwest Territory.

Under the State constitution of 1802 the judiciary consisted of judges of the supreme court, president and associate judges of common pleas courts, appointed by joint ballot of both houses of the general assembly for the term of seven years, and justices of the peace elected by the electors of township for three years.

Under the constitution of 1851 the present system of supreme, district, common pleas, probate and justice courts was organized.

The first court of common pleas of the county was opened in the hall in the northwest block-house of Campus Martius, at Marietta, September 2, 1788—Gen. Rufus Putnam, Gen. Benjamin Tupper and Col. A. Crary, judges.

The first court of general sessions of the peace was held on the ninth of the same month in the southeast block-house; General Putnam and General Tupper justices of the quorum; Isaac Pearce, Thomas Lord, and R. J. Meigs, jr., assistant justices. The grand jurors were William Stacy, foreman, Nathaniel Cushing, Nathan Goodale, Charles Knowles, Anselme Tupper, Jonathan Stone, Oliver Rice, Ezra Lunt, John Matthews, George Ingersoll, Jonathan Devol, Samuel Stebbins, Jethro Putnam and Jabez True.

The following account relating to the opening of the first Washington county court is taken from Dr. Andrews' Centennial address:

The first court held in the Territory was that of the court of common pleas at Campus Martius, September 2, 1788. A procession was formed at the Point, where most of the settlers resided, in the following order: The high sheriff with his drawn sword; the citizens; the officers of the garrison at Fort Harmar; the members of the bar; the supreme judges; the governor and clergymen; the newly-appointed judges of the court, Generals Rufus Putnam and Benjamin Tupper. Rev. Dr. Manasseh Cutler, one of the directors of the Ohio company, then here on a visit, opened the court with prayer; and Colonel Ebenezer Sproat, the sheriff, made official proclamation that "a court is opened for the administration of even-handed justice, to the poor and the rich, to the guilty and the innocent, without respect of persons." General Putnam, alluding to this first court, says: "Happily for the credit of the people, there was no suit, either civil or criminal, brought before the court."

PERSONAL SKETCHES.

MAJOR GENERAL SAMUEL HOLDEN PARSONS was born at Lyme, Connecticut, in 1737. He graduated at Harvard college in 1756; studied law in the office of his uncle, George Matthew Griswold, and was admitted to the bar in 1759, and settled at Lyme in the practice of his profession. In 1761 he married the daughter of Richard Mathew, of Lyme, and in 1762 was elected member of the general assembly of the colony of Connecticut, and by successive reelections held that position until 1774, when he removed from Lyme to New London.

In the stirring times preceding the Declaration of Independence by the colonies, Mr. Parsons was an ardent patriot, and to him has been attributed the first suggestion of a meeting of commissioners from the colonies to consult as to their general welfare. Mr. Parsons was one of the bold men of Connecticut, who, after the battle of Lexington, conceived the project, and by whose exertions in raising money and troops, the project was by Colonel Allen gallantly carried into effect, to-wit: The surprisal and seizure of Forts Ticonderoga and Crown Point, whereby command of Lake Champlain and the main route to Canada was obtained. This was the first offensive blow struck by the colonies in the war for independence.

In 1775 Mr. Parsons was commissioned by the colony of Connecticut as colonel of a regiment raised for defence of the colony, and was actively engaged in the battle of Long Island.

In 1776 he was appointed by Congress brigadier general and was with the army at the battle of White Plains. The most important operation of the campaign of 1777, to-wit, the capture of prisoners and the destruction of the enemy's ships and supplies at Sag Harbor, was designed by General Parsons and executed under his directions, and received from Congress a complimentary notice. During most of the years 1778 and 1779 he was stationed at West Point and the Highlands and rendered valuable service. In 1780 he was commissioned by Congress as major general. For his bold and successful enterprise for the relief and protection of the inhabitants between New York and Greenwich he received the thanks of Congress. At the close of the war he resumed the practice of law at Middletown, Connecticut.

In 1786 General Parsons, with General Butler, of Pittsburgh, and George Rogers Clark, by appointment of Congress, held an important treaty with the Indians at the mouth of the Great Miami.

In 1789 he was appointed by Congress one of the judges of the supreme court for the territory northwest of the river Ohio, and in May, 1788, removed to Marietta and entered upon the discharge of his duties.

In 1789 he was appointed by the State of Connecticut a commissioner to hold a treaty with the Wyandot Indians of the Western Reserve, and visited that country to make preparations for holding the treaty. In descending the rapids of the Big Beaver river on his return he was drowned, November 17, 1789, aged fifty-two years.

GENERAL JAMES MITCHELL VARNUM was a descendent of Samuel Varnum who emigrated from Wales to this country in 1649, and settled at Dracut, Massachusetts. He was born at Dracut in 1749, graduated at Providence college, now Brown university, in the first class in 1769, studied law in the office of Oliver Arnold, Providence, Rhode Island, was admitted to the bar in 1771, and settled at East Greenwich in the practice of his profession. He took an active part in the controversy between the colonies and Great Britain, had a taste for military life, and shortly after the battle of Lexington was appointed colonel of one of the three regiments raised by Rhode Island in 1775. During 1776 he served as colonel in the colonial army, and in 1777 was promoted by Congress to the rank of brigadier general. During 1777 and 1778 he was with the army and commanded at Red Bank and Mud Island. In 1780 he was elected a delegate to Congress from Rhode Island, and was an active and influential member of that body. After the war he resumed the practice of law at East Greenwich, and was engaged in most of the important cases in the State. As an advocate and orator he was considered the equal of Patrick Henry. In 1786 General Varnum was again elected representative to Congress and noted for his brilliant eloquence. In 1787, upon the organization of the Ohio Land company at Boston, he was elected a director of the company, and soon after the passage of the ordinance of that year establishing the Northwest Territory, he was elected by Congress one of the judges of the territory, and in the spring of 1788 he left his home in Rhode Island for Marietta and arrived there in June, and entered upon the discharge of the duties of his office. He was the orator of the day at the celebration of American Independence held at the Point in Marietta July 4, 1788, and his address was noted for its many beauties of sentiment and language. He was in poor health, when he arrived at Marietta but was able to attend the meetings of the directors of the Ohio company, and assisted the governor and the other judges in forming a code of laws for the government of the Northwest Territory. He died at Marietta January 10, 1789, at the early age of forty, and his funeral was attended with great ceremony.

RUFUS PUTNAM was appointed by the President, in 1790, one of the judges of the supreme court for the territory northwest of the Ohio river, and served until 1796. A full biographical sketch of General Putnam will be found in another part of this volume.

JOSEPH GILMAN was born in Exeter, New Hampshire, in 1736. In the struggles of the colonists for liberty and independence, he took a decided part for the Whigs, and had their entire confidence. He was chairman of the committee of safety for New Hampshire, and, as such, made large advances from his own personal resources for the purchase of supplies for the State troops. Upon the formation of the Ohio company he became an associate, and, with his wife, Rebecca Ives Gilman, and his son, Benjamin Ives Gilman, removed to Marietta in 1789.

By Governor St. Clair, he was appointed to and held the offices of probate judge, judge of the court of quarter sessions, and judge of the court of common pleas.

In 1796 he was appointed by the President of the United States one of the judges of the general court for the Northwest Territory, and attended the sittings of that court at Marietta, Cincinnati, Detroit and other places at which that court was held.

Judge Gilman was highly respected and esteemed for his learning and abilities as a jurist and scientist, and for his pleasing social qualities. He died in 1806, aged seventy years.

RETURN JONATHAN MEIGS, JR., served, by appointment of the President of the United States, as one of the judges of the supreme court of Northwest Territory from 1798 until 1803.

A sketch of the life of Governor Meigs is given in another part of this volume.

PAUL FEARING.—As more fully set forth in Dr. Hildreth's Biographical Memoirs, Mr. Fearing was born in Wareham, Plymouth county, Massachusetts, February 28, 1762, and was the son of Noah and Mary Fearing. Of his early childhood but little is known; but as the boy is said to be the father of the man, he was doubtless an upright, open-hearted youth. The minister of the parish prepared him for college, as was common in that day, and he was graduated at Harvard in 1785. Having decided on law for a profession, he studied in the office of Esquire Swift, of Windham, Connecticut, and was admitted as an attorney in the courts of law of that State in September, 1787. During this year the Ohio company was matured, for establishing a colony in the Northwest Territory, and was a general topic of conversation in New England. The glowing descriptions of the country and climate in the valley of the Ohio caught the fancy of many young men, as well as older persons, and he decided on visiting that distant region. On the first of May, 1788, he embarked at Boston for Baltimore, where he arrived on the sixteenth of that month. Here he put his trunk into a wagon, and commenced the journey across the mountains on foot. He reached Pittsburgh on the tenth of June, and embarked the same day in a boat for Marietta, where he arrived on the sixteenth. On the fourth of July he participated in the first proceedings had on the bank of the Muskingum in honor of the day, and on the twentieth listened to the first sermon ever preached in the English tongue northwest of the Ohio river. On the second of September, 1788, he attended the first county common pleas court held in the county, and was admitted an attorney at law of the courts of the Territory. On the ninth of this month the county court of quarter sessions of the peace sat for the first time, and he was appointed counsel in behalf of the United States for Washington county.

RETURN J. MEIGS.

The last of January, 1789, he set out on a journey to New England, in company with several persons, among whom was General Parsons. They went up the Ohio in a boat, but when about half way to Wheeling the floating ice became so troublesome that they left the river and went up by land. The travel over the mountains was accomplished on horseback in twenty six days, from Wheeling to Middleborough, in Massachusetts. He returned in August, by way of Alexandria, and being a fine pedestrian, again crossed the mountains on foot. He reached Red Stone, a famous port for boats on the Monongahela, on the fourteenth of the month. While waiting here for a rise in the river, Commodore Whipple came on with his family and that of his son-in-law, Colonel Sproat. With them he embarked in a small boat on the twenty-sixth of November, and reached Marietta on the thirtieth.

The following year was passed in attending to his law business, which began to increase some, as the emigration this season was very great. In November, 1790, he was appointed a deputy contractor for supplying the troops at Fort Harmar with fresh meat at the low rate of thirteen dollars and thirty-three cents a month and rations. Labor of all kinds was at a depressed state, a common hand on a farm getting only four dollars, and a private soldier three dollars.

Mr. Fearing's first attempt as an advocate before the court of quarter sessions was rather discouraging; but the embarrassment he first experienced vanished in his next trial, and he was able to deliver himself fluently and with fine effect. His frank, manly civility and sound, discriminating mind made him a favorite with the people, as well as the courts; and he had at his command much of the law business of the country. The Hon. R. J. Meigs was his first competitor at the bar, and for the favor of the public. Mr. Meigs was the more prompt and witty, with a ready flow of language, and Mr. Fearing was the more industrious and patient in investigation, so that, in final results they were very well matched.

When the troops left Fort Harmar, Mr. Fearing's intimate friend, Major Doughty, made him a present of his dwelling house, a well finished log building, standing in the southwest angle of the fort. During the war Mr. Fearing and his father occupied this house, which afforded a safe retreat from the attacks of Indians.

In the month of November, 1795, Mr. Fearing was married to Miss Cynthia Rowe, at his own home at Fort Harmar.

In 1797 he was appointed judge of probate for Washington county.

After the close of the war the county filled up rapidly, and in 1799 the first legislature held its session in Cincinnati. In 1800 the second session was held, and in this he was a member. During this period he was chosen a delegate to represent the Territory in Congress, which post he filled for 1801 and 1802, with credit to himself and to the entire satisfaction of the people.

After his return to private life he resumed the practice of law with increased reputation. On his farm a little below the mouth of the Muskingum he erected a neat dwelling-house, and planted an extensive orchard of the choicest fruits, of which he was an intelligent and successful cultivator. He was one of the first in Ohio who paid attention to the raising of merino sheep. His flocks embraced several hundreds of these valuable animals, propagated from a few individuals bought at enormous prices.

In 1810 he was appointed associate judge of the court of common pleas. In this office he served seven years with much credit as a sound, just, and impartial judge.

In 1814 he was appointed master commissioner in chancery.

From the first entering of the lands of the Ohio company for taxation by the State, he acted very extensively as an agent for the shareholders in the eastern States. In this way a large portion of his time was occupied.

In his disposition, Mr. Fearing was remarkably cheerful and pleasant, much attached to children, and never happier than when in their company. He had great sympathy for the poor and the oppressed, and was ever ready to stretch forth his hand and open his purse for their relief.

He died the twenty-first day of August, 1822, after a few days' illness, a victim to the fatal epidemic fever which ravished the country for two or three years, aged sixty years. His wife died the same day, a few hours after, in the forty-sixth year of her age.

ELIJAH BACKUS was born at Norwich, Connecticut; was a graduate of Yale college, and was admitted to the bar in Connecticut in the year 1800. Shortly thereafter he came to Marietta and engaged in the practice of law. Wyllis Silliman, of Zanesville, was associated with him as a partner.

Mr. Backus held the office of receiver of public moneys of the United States. In 1801 he established the Gazette newspaper, of which he was editor. In 1803 he was a member of the Ohio senate. He was owner of the island in the Ohio river, now called Blennerhasset island, and sold it to Mr. Blennerhasset.

In 1808 Mr. Backus removed to Ruskin, Illinois, and died there in 1812.

LEWIS CASS was born at Exeter, New Hampshire, October 9, 1782. In 1799 he was employed as teacher at Wilmington, Delaware, where his father, Major Jonathan Cass, of the army, was stationed. In 1800 he removed with his father's family to Marietta, studied law there, and in 1802 was admitted to the bar and removed to Zanesville and commenced practice.

In 1806 he married Elizabeth Spencer, of Wood county, Virginia, and the same year was elected a member of the Ohio legislature. From 1807 to 1813 he was State marshal. In the War of 1812 he was colonel of a regiment of Ohio volunteers, under General Hull, and soon promoted to the rank of brigadier general.

In 1813 he was appointed governor of the territory of Michigan, and held that office for eighteen years. In 1831 he was appointed by President Jackson, Secretary of War, and was at the head of the war department at the commencement of the Florida war. In 1836 he was appointed minister to France, and served in that capacity until 1842, when he resigned. In 1845 he was elected United States Senator from the State of Michigan. In 1848 he was the Democratic candidate for President of the United States, but failed of election on account of a division of his party in the State of New York. In 1849 he was reelected to the Senate for the remainder of his original term. As Senator he opposed the Wilmot Proviso, although instructed by the legislature of his State to vote for it. He did not vote for the fugitive slave bill. In 1851 he was again elected Senator from Michigan. In 1852 he was a candidate before the Democratic convention at Baltimore for the nomination for the Presidency, but was not successful. In 1857 he was appointed Secretary of State by President Buchanan. In December, 1860, disapproving of the action of the President in refusing to reinforce Major Anderson and provision Fort Sumter, he promptly resigned his office as member of the cabinet. Through the war of the Rebellion his sympathies were with the National cause.

General Cass died at Detroit June 17, 1866.

He was a man of integrity, of great ability as scholar, jurist, and statesman, and his public career of more than half a century was honorable to himself and the Nation.

BENJAMIN RUGGLES was born at Woodstock, Connecticut, February 21, 1783. He attended the Brooklyn academy, and graduated from that institution. He studied law with Judge Peters, at Hartford, and was there admitted to the bar.

In 1807 he moved to Marietta, Ohio, and there pursued with success the practice of his profession. His profound learning, skill and care as a counsellor won for him public commendation.

In 1810 he was elected by the legislature of the State to succeed Calvin Pease as president judge of the third circuit. Shortly after his election to the judgeship he moved from Marietta to St. Clairsville.

In 1815 he was elected by the legislature to the United States Senate, and resigned the office of judge after having ably filled it for five years.

In 1821, and again in 1827, he was reelected to the Senate of the United States, and during his career of eighteen years in Congress as Senator from Ohio, he rendered valuable services to his State and the Nation. For many years he was chairman of the Senate committee on claims.

He was president of the caucus, held at Washington in 1824, which nominated William H. Crawford, of Georgia, for the Presidency.

In 1833, at the expiration of his third term as senator, he retired from public life and gave his attention to Agricultural pursuits, especially the cultivation of fruits and the introduction of choice varieties.

In 1840 he was favorably spoken of, in various parts of the country, for the office of Vice-President of the United States.

He died at his residence in St. Clairsville, September 2, 1857. As a statesman Judge Ruggles had the confidence of the senate and of the people. As a jurist his great ability was not as conspicuous in open court as in chambers. Though lacking, in some measure, the gifts of an orator, as a consulting attorney he had few superiors. As a private citizen he was highly respected. He was generous in his impulses, liberal in his views, and exerted an excellent moral influence wherever he was known.

THOMAS BACKUS was born at Norwich, Connecticut, in 1785; graduated at Yale college; studied law in the office of his father Elijah Backus, at Marietta, and was there admitted to the bar in 1808. He was married to Temperance Lord in 1810, and in 1811 removed to Franklinton, Franklin county, Ohio, and engaged in the practice of law, and in 1820 was appointed prosecuting attorney.

In 1823 he removed to Union county, Ohio, and was there appointed prosecuting attorney, and during his term of office died October 25, 1825.

WILLIAM WOODBRIDGE was born in Norwich, Connecticut, August 30, 1780. He received his early education in his native State, studied law in Litchfield, Connecticut, and, with his father, emigrated to the Northwest Territory in 1791, settling in Marietta.

In 1806 he was admitted to the bar in Ohio, and in the following year was elected to the assembly of that State.

From 1808 until 1814 he was prosecuting attorney for his county, and also a member of the Ohio State Senate.

During the latter year, without solicitation, he received the appointment of secretary of the territory of Michigan, from President Madison, and removed to Detroit and entered upon the performance of the duties of his new office.

He was elected the first delegate to Congress from Michigan, in 1819, and forwarded the interests of his constituents in a manner to elicit the warmest approbation.

He was appointed judge of the supreme court of the territory in 1828, and performed the duties of that office four years.

He was one of the members of the convention which framed the State Constitution, in 1835, and was elected a State senator under it in 1837.

He was chosen to succeed Stevens T. Mason as governor of the State, in 1839, and served during one term. At the expiration of his term of office as governor, he was elected a United States Senator, and served in that capacity from 1841 until 1847.

While in the Senate, he took a leading part in much of the important legislation of that body, both as a member of a number of the principal committees and also as a debater upon the floor of the Senate.

His last days were spent in retirement in Detroit, where he died October 20, 1861.

Governor Woodbridge was an eminent jurist and constitutional lawyer, and at the time of his death was the oldest and most distinguished member of the Detroit bar. He was a man of true principle and honor, who had served the public for many years with fidelity and integrity, and who died leaving to his children an unblemished name.

DAVID PUTNAN, became a member of the Washington county bar about 1808. A sketch of his life will be found in this volume elsewhere.

GUSTAVUS SWAN was born at Peterborough, New Hampshire, in 1787. By his own exertions he obtained a good clerical and scientific education. He studied law at Concord, New Hampshire, and was admitted to the bar of that State. In 1810 he came to Marietta, and was admitted to the bar of Ohio. From Marietta he moved to Franklin county, and engaged in the practice of law. In 1812 and again in 1817 he was representative in the Ohio legislature. In 1823 he was elected judge of the common pleas court, and at the expiration of his term of office, resumed the practice of law in Columbus, and continued there until 1843.

Judge Swan was an eloquent and able advocate, and his practice in Franklin and neighboring counties was large. After 1843 he devoted himself more exclusively to his duties as president of the State bank of Ohio. He died at Columbus, February 6, 1860.

CALEB EMERSON was born August 21, 1779, at Ashby, Massachusetts. It appears from some fragmentary memoranda among the papers he left, written in the last years of his life, that he lost both his parents early; that his mother died when he was six weeks old; that his father lost his health in the Revolutionary war, and his property by Continental money; that he was brought up by persons who were not of his kin; and that he was a student at law and assistant editor for some time before he left New England for Ohio, in the fall of 1808.

There remain to his descendants very few of the letters he received previous to 1820. Of the documents connected with his New England life, the most important is a file of letters from James Elliott, esq., a lawyer of Brattleborough, Vermont. Mr. Elliott appears to have been his early friend and counsellor, and showed much interest in his future advancement. In the earliest of these letters, dated January 3, 1801, he speaks of the young man's correct and friendly letter (addressed to him from Mason, postmarked Amherst, New Hampshire) and says it bears the marks of an honest mind, and the promise of future excellence. He desires to know his age, profession and prospects, his place of residence, amusements of infancy and course of study, and wishes to correspond with him occasionally.

In a subsequent letter Mr. Elliott speaks approvingly of his purpose to go west, but advises him first to spend a year or two in a law office, as in a new country the farmer, merchant and lawyer might all be combined in one person. He recommends that he cultivate his literary tastes, and promises to aid him.

In February, 1806, then at Washington city, Mr. Elliott addresses him as a student at law at Amherst, New Hampshire, having ascertained his then residence from the publisher of the Farmers' Cabinet at that place, whom he was probably assisting in the editorship of that journal.

Mr. Elliott frequently posted him up in the proceedings of Congress for the subsequent two years, and was one of several well known persons in that part of New England to give him recommendations as to general good character and proficiency in law studies, when he left for Marietta, Ohio.

Governor Tiffin, of Ohio, had advised a friend of Mr. Emerson's, at Washington, that it was not necessary for an applicant for admission to the Ohio bar to appear before the judges in session, but he could apply to any judge separately, who, if satisfied of his competency, could give him his certificate, and then he would apply to another judge, and the several certificates he received would entitle him to admission.

One of his remaining letters is one of recommendation from Hon. Paul Fearing, then a judge, dated September 13, 1809 (to General Philemon Beecher, of Lancaster, Ohio) of Mr. Emerson, as a suitable candidate for admission to the Ohio bar, and doubtless he was admitted about that time. He opened a law office at Marietta, visiting some of the neighboring county courts.

He married, July 29, 1810, Miss Mary Dana, daughter of Captain William Dana, of Belpre, Ohio, one of the early emigrants from New England; by whom he had several children, all but the earliest now living.

In the same year began his connection with the Western Spectator, a weekly journal of Marietta, to which was annexed a small book-store. The first number seems to have been issued about the twenty-third of October, 1810. He gave it up July 31, 1813, but continued the practice of the law, and was appointed prosecuting attorney of Washington county in February, 1815, and was continued in that office till April, 1821. In October, 1820, while residing on Front, between Scammell and Worcester streets, the dwelling house he occupied was consumed by fire, and most of the furniture and clothing of the family, and nearly all his valuable papers were destroyed. He and his family experienced great kindness and hospitality from the citizens of Marietta. His law business was continued.

In 1822 a fever, supposed to result from the miasmatic influences of the Ohio shore, prevailed extensively in Marietta township and elsewhere. Mr. Emerson's family was down with it for a considerable time, usually leaving only one or two able to wait on the rest. He was afterwards prostrated with a sickness which brought him very near the gates of death. After his recovery he had an abiding conviction that close application to a law office was ruinous to his health; and though his connection with legal matters was more or less maintained to the last years of his life, his time was largely given to horticultural and other industrial pursuits, mingled with literary, political, and social activities, and efforts in behalf of religious, moral, and educational institutions in Marietta.

He and his wife joined the Marietta Baptist church, which then worshipped four miles above the village about the year 1822, and remained in its communion to the last.

Being one of the earliest trustees of Marietta college, and remaining such during his life, he displayed an abiding interest in its growth.

In the year 1836 he was editor of the Marietta Gazette, a firm advocate for the right of free discussion. Certain lecturers about that time, in behalf of negro emancipation, were in danger of being mobbed, but the energetic philanthropists of Washington county secured for them fair treatment. In December, 1837, the Marietta Gazette passed into the hands of Mr. Isaac Maxon.

Several years later an advantageous sale of Mr. Emerson's three acre lots near Marietta, gave him leisure for literary effort. He wrote much in favor of emancipation, for journals both at home and abroad.

During the last ten or twelve years of his life he took great interest in the early history of Ohio, and especially of Washington county, and made extensive collections of old newspapers and other documents calculated to preserve a knowledge of the past, and to some extent lectured on these subjects. His duties as master commissioner in chancery, and as administrator for several estates, gave him opportunities for travel, where he could gather up such material. Probably the most complete of his essays on these subjects was an article in the North American Review, which includes the details of Dr. Manasseh Cutler's mission to Congress in behalf of the Ohio company, for the purchase of the well known tract which bears its name.

In 1845 he took an active part in bringing the celebrated case of the captured Ohioans, which involved, in part, the question of boundary between Ohio and Virginia, to the notice of the State authorities. His sympathies were strongly enlisted for the oppressed and downtrodden.

He died March 14, 1853, at his homestead in Marietta, aged seventy-three and one half years.

JOHN PENNYBACKER MAYBERRY was born March 1, 1790, at Pine Forge near the village of New Market, Virginia. His home was located in the loveliest portion of the beautiful valley of the Shenandoah. This is now a historic location from the fact that during the late civil war this homestead was the scene of many of the severest struggles for the possession of the valley.

His father was an Irish gentleman, having emigrated to America in early life. His mother was descended from German ancestors. Her maiden name was Rebekah Pennybacker. She was one of the large family of Pennybackers so well known throughout Pennsylvania.

John P. Mayberry, while in the valley of the Shenandoah, studied law under the eminent Judge Allen, of New Market, Virginia. Before completing his studies, however, in the year 1810, his father determined to seek a new home in the rich lands beyond the mountains, and his son John accompanied him, purchasing plantations near Belleville, Wood county, Virginia. They there settled. After a brief sojourn upon the plantations he became deputy sheriff of Wood county. In 1812 he visited Richmond, and made application for admission to practice in the State courts, and was given a certificate.

After his return, however, wishing to pursue his studies and perfect himself in other branches of the law, he went to Ohio, attracted by the reputation of Judge Fearing, of Harmar, Ohio, who was the first lawyer admitted to the bar in that State, the attorney of the Ohio company and the leading legal mind in the Northwest Territory. Here he had the advantage of an extensive library, and finished his studies with Judge Fearing in 1815. On the fifteenth of August, 1816, he married the only daughter of his preceptor, Lucy Willis Fearing, with whom he lived over fifty years. In 1817 he removed with his family to Parkersburgh, Virginia, and soon after was elected as a representative of the Whig party to the house of delegates at Richmond and served during the term of 1817 and 1818. In 1818 he left Richmond to accept the position of receiver of public moneys tendered him by the United States Government. This necessitated his return to Marietta, Ohio, where he succeeded Colonel Levi Barber, who was elected to Congress. The business of this office was very extensive as the territory was fast filling up, and the Government lands selling rapidly. His experience while in office illustrates the purity and honesty of the pioneer settlers of the northwest. The law existing at that time required receiver to deposit all moneys received, in the United States repositories situated at Cincinnati and Chillicothe, and the payments were to be made in the same coin as was paid to the receiver. The gold and silver received during the quarter had to be transported from Marietta to the points above named. At that time the woods were unfrequented and obscure, and the country sparsely settled, making it a perilous journey to transport six or eight thousand dollars in gold and silver on horseback. Yet these trips were made at the expiration of each quarter by Mr. Mayberry, accompanied by his father, or Henry or Silas Fearing, and Colonel David Barker, and during his term of office of over ten years, neither he himself nor his messengers were disturbed in their journeys to and fro. Mr. Mayberry was receiver until the year 1829. During this period he was also elected prosecuting attorney of Washington county, faithfully performing his duties and giving entire satisfaction to the public.

Retiring from these two important offices, and after settling his affairs relative thereto, he left Ohio and returned to his old home at Parkersburgh, and engaged in mercantile business. As was the custom in those days he made frequent journeys over the mountains to Philadelphia on horseback for the purpose of purchasing his stock in trade. While still engaged in merchandising he was elected prosecuting attorney for the county of Wood. In 1832 he was again called from private life, being elected to the house of delegates. At the expiration of this term he was reelected by his well satisfied constituents, and although not seeking or having any desire of office, he was again returned in 1837 and 1838, to the house of delegates; his ripe experience and sound judgment making him a great power, giving him the foremost position among the legislators.

The first recognition of any material importance which Parkersburgh or Wood county received from the State legislature of old Virginia in the way of improvement and bringing them into public notice was the establishment of the Northwestern Virginia turnpike road leading from Winchester in the valley of Virginia over the Alleghanies to Parkersburgh, a distance of two hundred and fifty miles. This great work was completed while Mr. Mayberry was in the house of delegates, and to his exertion, no doubt is West Virginia indebted for this great benefit.

He acquired wealth by prudent investments in real estate, together with the inheritance which his wife received from her father's estate.

Mr. Mayberry, in his long public life at Marietta, Parkersburgh, and Richmond, made friends with all whom he came in contact, and such was his even temperament that even in sharp political contests his urbanity of manner and kindness for all humanity left his career destitute of enemies. He was a ripe scholar and a trained thinker, commanding in stature, with a pleasing address. He was a perfect type of a Virginia gentleman, of Washington's time. His manner and mien occasioning many of his friends to believe his resemblance to Washington very marked. Had his ambition led him to continue his public career his political associates were confident he would have taken a ranking position in national affairs among the great statesmen of that day, but turning aside from the allurements of public life, he returned to the quiet old home he loved so well in Parkersburgh. His house and grounds soon became shaded with the fine old trees he had planted. His office door under the shade of the catalpa was a charmed spot to all who came under the restful influence of the peaceful atmosphere. Happiness and contentment followed him like a shadow. The old men loved to linger with him, and the young men came to listen to the fine talk of the grand old gentleman. He devoted much of his time in later years to the rearing of blooded horses and to the improvement of the plantations he owned in the State. In his stables were some of the finest imported stock in the south and west, many of the descendants of the stables being favorite horses of the present time. He died while his favorite horse Lath was running; expired sitting in his carriage November 15, 1866, closing a life of nearly seventy-seven years, leaving his wife and son as the only immediate relatives to deplore his loss, as he was himself the last member of his father's family. And when the news came that the pure and noble John P. Mayberry was no more, a multitude mourned over the loss of a great and good man.

ARIUS NYE was the son of Colonel Ichabod Nye, and grandson of General Benjamin Tupper, two of the pioneers who with their families, made, at the mouth of the Muskingum in 1788, the first settlement in the territory northwest of the river Ohio. He was born in Campus Martius—"the stockade"—at Marietta, December 27, 1792. During his boyhood educational facilities at the new settlement were quite limited, yet mainly by his own exertions, he obtained what is now called a good common school education. In 1807 he went to Springfield, afterwards to Putnam in Muskingum county, and engaged in merchandizing.

In 1815 he married Miss Rowena, daughter of Dr. Joseph Spencer, of Vienna, Virginia, and sister of Mrs. General Cass. He was a director in the Bank of Zanesville before he was twenty-one years of age. During 1817-18 he studied law, was admitted to the bar, and began to make his mark in Muskingum county. In the autumn of 1822, or spring of 1823, he moved to Gallipolis, at the beginning of the sickly season, when he was taken sick with the prevailing epidemic, or malarial fever. In 1824-5 he removed to Marietta and there acquired a large and lucrative law practice. For several years after removing to Marietta he was elected and served as cashier of the Bank of Marietta. In 1827 he was elected representative in the State legislature, and re-elected in 1828. In 1831 he was elected State senator and served two years. At the time of the great flood in 1832 he removed his office from Putnam street to the old Ohio company's office on Washington street, where he kept his office until he was elected judge. He early acquired a large law library, and by 1837 probably had accumulated the largest law library of any lawyer in south-east Ohio. In 1840 he was again elected representative in the State legislature.

His son, A. Spencer Nye, became associate with him in practice as A. Nye & Son, continuing as a firm until 1846. In 1847 he was elected president judge of the district composed of the counties of Washington, Morgan, Athens, Meigs, Gallia, and Lawrence. The district was large and difficult of access during portions of the year, there being no railroads, and especially during the spring and autumn, county seats were difficult to reach. His health broke down under his labors on the bench, and he resigned in 1850. After his health improved he associated with him Mr. David Alban, and practiced as Nye & Alban until the commencement of the war, when Mr. Alban enlisted in the army. Thereafter as lawyer, generally associated in business with some younger member of the bar, he gave his attention to cases which were brought under his notice. His last illness was protracted and painful, but borne with fortitude. He died at his home in Marietta, July 27, 1865, in the seventy-third year of his age.

Judge Nye was an original, self-reliant, self-made man—a man of feeling, thought, and conviction. He will long survive in the memory of his friends; in the impressions which he made on the community where he lived, and in the legislation of his native State. At the time of his death he had obtained a wider celebrity than any other Marietta man. This was due to his strong character, to his industry, to his devotion to every accepted trust, to his public spirit, and above all to his inflexible integrity of mind and heart. As a jurist he ranked among the first chancery and criminal lawyers of the west. He was deeply read in the learning of the profession, and thoroughly imbued with the lofty spirit of its great masters.

WILLIAM A. WHITTLESEY was born at Danbury, Connecticut, in 1796. In 1816 he was graduated at Yale college, and for some time thereafter, was employed as teacher. In 1818 he came to Canfield, Ohio, entered the office of his uncle, the Hon. Elisha Whittlesey, as student at law, being fellow-student there with J. M. Giddings, and in 1820, was admitted to the bar. In 1821 he came to Marietta, and entered upon the practice of his profession. In 1825 he was elected auditor of the county, and for two successive years held that office, and received the public commendation for the faithfulness, care and ability, with which he discharged its duties.

In 1839 he was the candidate of the Democratic party for representative in the Ohio legislature, and was elected.

In 1841 and for several years following, he was associated with Gen. Charles B. Goddener, of Zanesville, in the practice of law in Washington county. In 1848 he was elected member of Congress from ——— district comprising the counties of Washington, Morgan and Perry. He declined being a candidate for reelection.

In 1856 and again in 1860, and again in 1862 he was elected mayor of the city of Marietta, and for six years discharged the duties of that office in an approved and satisfactory manner.

For some time previous to his death Mr. Whittlesey suffered from painful disease, but bore his affliction with fortitude and resignation. He died November 6, 1866, at Brooklyn, New York, where he had gone for medical treatment, leaving one surviving child, a daughter, now the wife of — Mitchell, of St. Cloud, Minnesota. His remains were brought back to Marietta, and buried in the Mound cemetery by the side of his deceased son, the lamented Captain W. B. Whittlesey, a brave and noble officer, who was killed at the battle of Mission Ridge in November, 1863.

The following is an extract from the report of a committee, appointed by the bar of Washington county to give expression of the sentiments of the profession, in relation to Mr. Whittlesey's death:

With feelings of the deepest sorrow and regret we, the members of the Washington county bar, have heard of the death of our late associate, the Hon. William A. Whittlesey. During the whole period of our connection with the profession in this county, we have been witnesses of the estimable qualities of the deceased.

As a lawyer, his discriminating mind, his legal acquirements, the friendliness and honesty of his counsels, his urbanity in the court-room, and his uniform courtesy and kindness toward the junior members of the profession have elicited our esteem, and endeared him in our recollections.

As a citizen and neighbor, the kindness of his disposition, his liberality, his cheerfulness and his remarkable freedom from all feelings of envy, resentment and ill-will won for him the respect and friendship of all who knew him.

DAVID BARBER, son of Hon. Levi Barber was born at Harmar, Washington county, Ohio, August 14, 1804. He was educated at Washington college, Pennsylvania, and graduated from that institute in 1825. He studied law with the Hon. John P. Mayberry, of Marietta; was admitted to the bar in 1829, and engaged in the practice of his profession at Harmar.

In 1840 he was elected prosecuting attorney of the county. In 1845 he was again elected prosecuting attorney.

About 1876 he moved to the State of Illinois, and is located near Quincy, extensively engaged in agricultural pursuits.

LEVI HART GODDARD, son of Hon. Calvin Goddard, was born at Norwich, Connecticut, in 1810. He studied law and was admitted to the bar in his native State. In 1835 he removed to Marietta, Ohio, and then engaged in the practice of his profession. After a short residence in Marietta he returned to Norwich and there resumed the practice of law and continued the same until the time of his death. He died of pneumonia, in 1862.

Mr. Goddard was a lawyer of learning and ability, as counsellor and consulting attorney, and his amiable and cheery social qualities made for him hosts of friends. He was married in 1835 to Miss Mary Woodbridge Perkins, of Norwich.

RUFUS E. HARTE, was born in Middlebury, now embraced in the corporation limits of Akron, Ohio. He attended the academy at Tallmadge and the preparatory department of the Western Reserve college at Hudson. In 1833 he was graduated at Yale college, Connecticut. He studied law with Hon. Gregory Powers, of Akron. In 1835, at the session of the supreme court at Medina, he was admitted to the bar. In 1837 he located at Marietta and engaged in the practice of his profession, associated with Mr. W. A. Whittlesey as Whittlesey & Harte.

In 1839 he was married to Julia Holden, daughter of Mr. Joseph Holden, of Marietta.

In 1845 he was elected senator in the Ohio legislature from the district composed of the counties of Washington, Morgan and Perry.

In 1851 he was elected prosecuting attorney for the county of Washington.

In 1852 he was elected, by the trustees of the benevolent institutions of Ohio, superintendent of the institution for the blind, and resided at Columbus four years, discharging the duties of that office.

In 1856 he returned to Marietta and resumed the practice of law, associated therein with Mr. Melvin Clarke.

In 1861 he was elected treasurer of Washington county, and held that office for a period of four years.

In 1880 he was elected mayor of the city of Marietta, and is now discharging the duties of that office.

CHARLES F. BUELL, son of Daniel H. Buell, of Marietta, was born in Washington county, Ohio, March 12, 1814. He was a student in Marietta college and Kenyon college; studied law with Hon. Samuel F. Vinton, of Gallipolis, and was admitted to the bar in 1837. He practiced law a short time at Gallipolis, and about a year at Georgetown, Brown county, Ohio. In 1839 he returned to Marietta and engaged in the practice of his profession.

In 1860 he was elected probate judge of Washington county. After serving three years in that office he resumed the practice of law at Marietta, where he now resides.

WILLIAM D. EMERSON, eldest son of Caleb and Mary (Dana) Emerson, was born at Marietta, July 9, 1813. He was prepared for college by Rev. Luther G. Bingham, then pastor of the Congregational church at Marietta. At the age of sixteen he entered the Ohio university at Athens, from which he graduated in 1833, with the highest honors of his class. He was one of the teachers in the high school which opened up in Library hall, on Front street, which afterwards unfolded into Marietta college. In 1836 he was assistant editor with his father on the Marietta Gazette. His health failing in this department, he went west and spent two years as a common school teacher. The scenery of the wide west seems to have inspired his poetic fancy, and some of his finest poems, which afterwards came into print, were produced at this time.

He returned to Marietta in 1839, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1841, and for several years kept a law office with his father. In 1845 he prepared and published the first map of Washington county. He was prosecuting attorney of that county for one year, ending March, 1848, filling the unexpired term of Arius Nye, esq., who was appointed presiding judge. He was assistant clerk in the commercial court of Cincinnati from 1848 to 1852, and for four years after made up records in the clerk's office of the Cincinnati and Hamilton county courts. He kept a law office in Cincinnati till 1860. Since that time he has devoted himself mainly to literary pursuits. The bent of his mind was more for literature than jurisprudence. In 1851 he issued Occasional Thoughts in Verse, for private distribution. In 1874 he issued a second volume of verse, and is now preparing a second edition of an agricultural work.

ARIUS SPENCER NYE, son of Arius Nye was admitted to the bar about 1840, and in company with his father practiced law at Marietta as Nye & Son.

In 1846 he was elected cashier of the Ross County bank, branch of the State bank of Ohio and removed to Chillicothe, where he now resides.

DARWIN E. GARDNER, son of William and Sarah B. (Earl) Gardner, was born at Norwalk, Ohio, January 25, 1820.

Pursuant to his father's wishes, and to some extent under his supervision, he pursued a thorough course of preparatory studies and about 1839 was graduated at the Western Reserve college. He studied law with Judge Crowell of Warren, Ohio, and was admitted to the bar at Newark in 1841.

The same year he located at Marietta and commenced the practice of his profession and successfully prosecuted the same at that place until 1851, when he removed to Cleveland, and soon thereafter to Toledo, where, until the time of his death he was extensively and prosperously engaged in the purchase and sale of real estate. He died at Toledo August 5, 1867, at the age of forty-seven. Mr. Gardner was an able lawyer, and an enterprising and successful man of business, and in the several places of his residence had the confidence and esteem of his fellow citizens. He was married in 1842, to Miss Elizabeth

P. Putnam, of Hudson, Ohio who died in 1846, and in 1859 he married Miss Sarah Williams of Norwalk.

WYLIE H. OLDHAM, son of Samuel and Rebecca Oldham, was born November 21, 1819, at the old homestead in Ohio county, Virginia, where his grandfather and father lived and died. When about one year old, he was taken to the State of New York, where his father was employed as a missionary, teaching the Seneca Indians, lived in Cornplanter's town, remembered well the wild scenes in which his early boyhood was spent. Leaving there at five and a half years of age, he acquired such an education as the primitive schools of Virginia then afforded. In 1832 he entered the private academy at West Alexander, Washington county, Pennsylvania, under the charge of Rev. John McCluskey, pastor of the Presbyterian church of that place and pursued his academic studies under his care until September, 1836, when he entered the junior class in Washington college. He was a member of the Washington Literary society, graduated in June, 1838, and took the first honor of his society and second of his class (the first honor of the class being by a rule of the faculty due that year to the Union society which alone prevented his obtaining the first honor of his class). In the fall of 1838 he went to Mount Vernon, Ohio, and spent one year in teaching. In the fall of 1839 he went to Lexington, Kentucky, and taught one year, near the home of Henry Clay, visiting him frequently in 1840. He studied law with Isaac Hoge at Moundsville, Virginia, and was admitted to the bar in 1842. Shortly after he was elected prosecuting attorney. He represented Marshall county in the Virginia legislature in 1846-7 and 8. He practiced law at Moundsville from the time he was admitted to the bar until May, 1865. May 23, 1844, he married Mary Curtis, daughter of R. C. Curtis of Moundsville.

In May, 1865 he moved to Marietta, Ohio, where he resided until the time of his death, engaged extensively and successfully in the practice of his profession. He died July 22, 1875. Mr. Oldham's memory will be cherished by his neighbors and acquaintances on account of his marked characteristics in social life. The cordiality of his greetings, the vivacity of his conversation, his wit-beaming repartee and entire freedom from censoriousness made him everybody's favorite and his company was eagerly sought and merrily enjoyed by his associates.

Mr. Oldham was an orator, and as statesman and lawyer his speeches and arguments were models of beauty and eloquence. He was a good citizen, a liberal contributor to benevolent enterprises, a man of principle honor and fidelity, whose death was deeply lamented by all who knew him.

JOHN T. GUITTEAU, son of Benjamin Guitteau, was born in Fearing township, Washington county, Ohio, in 1821.

He was educated at Marietta college; studied law with Hon. Arius Nye, of Marietta, and was admitted to the bar in 1842. He commenced practice at Urbana, Ohio, associated with Hon. Thomas Corwin, and about 1843 moved to Cincinnati. After a residence of three or four years at Cincinnati he removed to New York city, where he now resides, engaged in the practice of law.

CHARLES R. RHODES was born in Zanesville, November 5, 1819; the third child of Dr. Dudley Woodbridge Rhodes. He went to school in the preparatory department of Kenyon college in 1835, entered the freshman class in 1836, and graduated in course of 1840, taking the second honor of his class.

He entered his name as a student of law in the office of Messrs. Goddard & Converse, Zanesville, and was admitted to the bar at Newark, Ohio, in 1843. The same year he removed to St. Louis, Missouri, to establish himself as a lawyer, where he remained until the fall of 1836. The same year, having married Miss Mary E. Ward, the third child of Hon. Nahum Ward, of Marietta, he returned to Ohio, and made his residence in Marietta, where he still resides.

In January, 1855, he was elected prosecuting attorney, and continued in that office until January, 1857. In February, 1858, he was elected probate judge of Washington county, and continued in office until February, 1861.

During the War of the Rebellion the people living in the little township along the Ohio river, were kept in a constant state of alarm, apprehending incursions from the lawless bands of rebels roving through West Virginia. Mr. Rhodes organized a company of from forty to sixty men, which, through the friendly assistance of Colonel William Craig, quartermaster of the United States army stationed in Marietta, he was able to arm and equip, and which he, as captain, kept in thorough drill and discipline, prepared for the emergencies of the times.

He was appointed by the governor of the State (Hon. Rutherford B. Hayes) delegate to the National Commercial convention, which met at Cincinnati, and the following year he was again appointed by the governor delegate for southeastern Ohio to the same convention, which met at Baltimore.

Mr. Rhodes' whole life in Marietta has been closely identified with the manufacturing and commercial enterprises of the town, and especially with the history and prosperity of St. Luke's Protestant Episcopal church and Sunday-school, for more than thirty years a member and secretary of the vestry, many times their delegate to the diocesan convention, and for more than twenty years superintendent of the Sunday-school.

MELVIN CLARKE was born at Ashfield, Massachusetts, November 15, 1818, and was the oldest of a family of eight children. He was the son of Stephen and Roxy Alden Clarke, and of the seventh generation in a direct line from John Alden, of Mayflower fame. His early education was derived from the common schools of Whately, Franklin county, Massachusetts; a few terms spent in select school, and a few months at the academy at Conway, Massachusetts. He came west in the fall of 1838, and taught school in Kentucky, at Parkersburgh, in West Virginia, and in this county for a series of years. Meanwhile he was studying law, and was admitted to the bar in 1843, and settled in law practice at McConnells-ville, Morgan county, Ohio, and continued in the practice there for ten years.

In 1853 he removed to Marietta, and continued to practice his profession until the beginning of the war. He became a leading member of the bar, and an influential citizen.

Of his mind the distinguishing features were clearness and strength of comprehension. He had the ability to analyze, arrange, and present, in a forcible manner, the evidence in a case, and conducted, with marked talent, the important causes committed to him.

Impelled by motives of patriotism, he, with others, was actively instrumental, at the breaking out of the war, in raising and organizing the Thirty-sixth regiment, Ohio volunteer infantry, and was appointed its lieutenant colonel, and served in that capacity as a brave and gallant officer until killed by a shot from a ten-pound shell at the battle of Antietam, September 17, 1862.

He was buried with military honors in Mound cemetery, at Marietta, and a monument erected to his memory by his army comrades and associates of the bar.

He married Miss Dorcas Dana, daughter of William Dana, of Newport, Ohio, for his first wife, who died about 1850, and left one son, Joseph D. Clarke, who was killed in the war at City Point, Maryland, in 1864. He married, as his second wife, Miss Sophia Browning, of Belpre, Ohio. He was, at the time of his death, a member of the Congregational church, of Marietta.

SAMUEL JAMES ANDREWS, fourth son of Rev. William Andrews, was born at Danbury, Connecticut, July 30, 1817. He graduated at Williams college in 1839, and came to Marietta in May, 1844. He remained a member of the Marietta bar not quite a year, when he left the practice of law and began the study of theology. He was settled over the Congregational church at East Windsor, Connecticut, for some years, since which he has resided at Hartford, engaged in literary pursuits, and in giving instruction in Trinity college. The degree of Doctor of Divinity has been conferred upon him by Union college, Schenectady, New York.

SAMUEL B. ROBINSON was born at Washington, Pennsylvania, February 15, 1814, and was educated at Washington, now Washington and Jefferson, college, of that State. In 1835 he was editor of the Washington Reporter. In 1836, with his widowed mother and her family, he moved to Lake Chute and shortly thereafter to Beverly, Ohio. In 1837, at Beverly, in partnership with John Dodge, he engaged in mercantile business and continued therein for seven years. He studied law, Hon. Isaac Paine being his preceptor, and was admitted to the bar in 1844, and entered upon the practice of his profession in Beverly.

In 1846 he married Colina N., youngest daughter of John Dodge, of Beverly.

In 1846 he was elected prosecuting attorney of the county. In 1873 he was again elected prosecuting attorney, and the duties of this office he ably and faithfully discharged. Mr. Robinson was never of robust frame, and during the latter period of his life was in very poor health. On the night of January 2, 1878, while travelling by steamer from Beverly to Marietta, he fell overboard and was drowned. His body was recovered and buried by the side of his deceased wife in the Beverly cemetery. During his career in life as editor, merchant, and lawyer, Mr. Robinson deserved and received the confidence and esteem of his fellow citizens.

DAVIS GREEN, son of Rev. Allen Green, was born in Tyler county, Virginia, February 11, 1822. In 1823 his parents came to Ohio and settled on a farm in Belmont county.

Davis attended, in the winter season, the schools of his neighborhood and at the age of twenty-one years completed his education at Madison college, Guernsey county. In 1842 and the two following years he was partially engaged in teaching, and in the meantime studied law in the office of Judge Evans of Cambridge. For nearly a year after the fall of 1845 he was editor and part owner of the Guernsey Times.

In 1846 he was admitted to the bar at Mount Vernon and in the fall of the same year located at Marietta and commenced the practice of law. By close application and diligence he soon became prominent in his profession.

In 1849 he was elected prosecuting attorney of the county, and for two years ably discharged the duties of that office.

In 1854 he was elected probate judge, and served his three years' term to the entire satisfaction of the public.

In 1856 he was elected one of the electors for Ohio of President and Vice-President of the United States, and voted for Fremont and Dayton.

In 1858 he was elected senator in the Ohio legislature from the district composed of Washington and Morgan counties, and was an eloquent, influential and highly esteemed member from that body.

In 1861 at the breaking out of the Rebellion he took a decided and prominent part in defence of the Government, and labored unremittingly to encourage and promote the cause of the Union.

Judge Green was a man of great energy, industry and determination, and bid fair to become a jurist and statesman of high rank. In the prime of his life and the midst of his influence he died at Marietta, August 22, 1862. He was married in 1851 to Miss Columbia Ferguson, who is now the wife of Dr. D. Walter, of Marietta.

WILLIAM SPENCER NYE, son of Arius Nye, was graduated at Marietta college, in 1843. He studied law with his father, and was admitted to the bar in 1845.

He commenced practice in Marietta, associated with his brother, Dudley S. Nye, as D. S. & W. S. Nye.

He was elected and served as prosecuting attorney of the county from March, 1848, to March, 1850. About 1854 he was appointed attorney for the Marietta & Cincinnati railroad company. In 1861 he was again prosecuting attorney of the county. Shortly thereafter he removed to Chillicothe, Ohio, where he died of typhoid fever in 1862.

Mr. Nye was an accomplished gentleman, and a lawyer of fine abilities and attainments. A rather sensitive and retiring disposition inclined him to shrink somewhat from the more rugged conflict of the court room practice, and to thus take a less conspicuous position as a trial lawyer than his legal learning and acumen entitled him to occupy. It was for his breadth, soundness and candor of view, as a counsellor, that he was best known in the profession.

His disposition was peculiarly amiable, and in his domestic and social life he was a most genial companion, and warmly attached to himself all who knew him intimately.

SELDEN S. COOKE, son of Rev. Parden Cooke, was admitted to the bar in November, 1843, at the session of the supreme court in Morgan county, and commenced practice at Marietta. In 1849 and 1850 he was elected and served as recorder of the city of Marietta.

In 1851 he removed to Chillicothe, Ohio, where he now resides, engaged in the practice of law.

DUDLEY SELDEN NYE, son of Arius Nye, was admitted to the bar at the November term, 1843, of the supreme court, sitting in Morgan county. In 1847 he and his brother, William S. Nye, associated themselves in the practice of law at Marietta, succeeding to the business of Arius Nye & Son, as D. S. & W. S. Nye, and continued to practice until the autumn of 1852.

In 1852 he removed to Tennessee, and in the spring of 1855 removed to Council Bluffs, Iowa, and in 1857 was elected county judge of Pottawatomie county, in that State. In November, 1862, he returned to Marietta, where he now resides, engaged in the practice of law.

HENRY A. TOWNE was born January 5, 1826, at Litchfield, Herkimer county, State of New York. Upon the death of his father, Rev. Abner Towne, pastor of the Presbyterian church at Litchfield, his mother returned with her son, then five months old, to her parents at Amherst, Massachusetts; and coming afterwards to Gallipolis, Ohio, the residence of her brother, Hon. S. F. Vinton, married May 28, 1831, Dr. Robert Safford, of Putnam, Ohio, now the ninth ward of Zanesville, at which time the subject of this sketch became a resident of Ohio. He entered Marietta college when fifteen years of age, and graduated in 1845; was admitted to the bar at Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1849, and practiced law at Marietta, Ohio, in partnership with Hon. William A. Whittlesey from 1849 to 1854, and afterwards with David Green, esq., now deceased, until his removal to Portsmouth, Ohio, December 1, 1855, where he entered upon the practice of the law. He married, December 18, 1856, Harriet Nye, daughter of Judge Arius Nye, now deceased.

In 1858 he was elected one of the judges of the court of common pleas of the seventh judicial district of Ohio, and held that position until July, 1870, when he resigned and resumed the practice of law at Portsmouth.

He has been connected with several of the furnaces of the Hanging Rock iron region, and is now a stockholder and director in the Globe Iron company, of Jackson, Ohio; and is also a stockholder and director in the Scioto Star Fire-brick works at East Portsmouth, Ohio.

In April, 1879, he was elected mayor of the city of Portsmouth, and is now discharging the duties of that office. In 1880 he was appointed supervisor of census of the fourth district of Ohio, and superintended the taking of the census in the eleven counties comprising the district.

RODNEY M. STIMSON was born in Milford, New Hampshire, October 26, 1824. He attended Philips' Exter academy, New Hampshire, during three years preceding 1845, when he entered Marietta college and graduated from that institution in 1847. He studied law, and in 1849 was admitted to the bar at Marietta. Soon thereafter he removed to Ironton, Lawrence county, Ohio, and there established the Register, a newspaper which, as editor and proprietor, he successfully conducted for twelve years. In 1862 he removed to Marietta, and there edited and published the Marietta Register during the ten years following. In 1869 he was elected senator in the Ohio legislature and was reelected in 1871, serving four years. In 1877 he was appointed State librarian, and for two years acceptably discharged the duties of that office. His residence is at Marietta where he has a library of over two thousand carefully selected volumes, has charge of the Marietta College library, and is also treasurer of that institution. He devotes his time to literary pursuits. He has been twice married, first in 1851, and again in 1862.

SAMUEL S. KNOWLES son of Samuel and Clarissa (Curtis) Knowles, was born in Athens, Ohio, August 25, 1825. In 1846 and the three years following he was a student in the academy and the Ohio university at Athens. After finishing his course of studies at the university he read law with Lot L. Smith and L. Jewett at Athens, and was admitted to the bar in 1851. During the same year he was elected prosecuting attorney of Athens county, was reelected in 1853, and held that office for four years. In 1861 he removed from Athens to Marietta, engaging in the latter place in the practice of his profession. In 1864 he was commissioned captain of a company in the One Hundred and Forty-eight regiment, Ohio national guard, and served with his company, stationed at Bermuda Hundred, until September of that year, when the regiment was mustered out of service. In 1864 he was elected mayor of the city of Marietta, and reelected in 1866, serving four years. In 1865 he was elected senator in the Ohio legislature from the counties of Washington, Morgan, and Noble, serving two years. In 1875 he was elected judge of the court of common pleas, of the Third subdivision, of the Seventh judicial district of Ohio, to fill a vacancy caused by the resignation of Judge Plants, and in 1878 he was reelected for the full term of five years, and is now engaged in the discharge of the duties of his office. He was married January 23, 1852, to Henrietta, youngest daughter of Captain Charles Devo, of Hockingport, Athens county.

THOMAS W. EWART, LL. D., was born February 27, 1816, at Grandview, Washington county, Ohio. His mother, Mary Cochran, was a native of West Virginia, of Scotch descent; and his father, Robert K. Ewart, a Pennsylvanian, of Irish parentage. Thomas received such early education as he could obtain in the common schools of that date, in which he was a diligent and ambitious student.

September 30, 1831, he left school and farm, and entered as an assistant in the office of clerk of the court of Washington county, where he improved his time not demanded in the office in studies under private instructors. He was appointed clerk of the court of this county in December, 1836, and continued in office until October, 1851. While still clerk of the court he was elected to represent Washington and Morgan counties in the Constitutional convention of 1850, which formed the present constitution of Ohio, and was one of its youngest members. On the expiration of his term as clerk of the court he was elected probate judge of Washington county, the first under the new constitution.

In the meantime, while in the prosecution of official duties as clerk of the court, he had pursued a rigid course of legal study under Judge Nye, and when attending the Constitutional convention at Cincinnati in 1851, was admitted to practice in the courts of Ohio.

He held the office of probate judge one year, and resigned to practice his profession, in which he has had a good degree of success, and attained a prominent position as a lawyer of recognized ability. He has recently opened an office and is practicing law at Columbus, Ohio.

In politics he was a Whig, serving as chairman of the central committee of the county for many years. At the organization of the Republican party he identified himself with that party and so continues.

As a citizen he has been active, enterprising, seeking the welfare of the community; especially so in connection with the temperance and Sunday-school movements.

A member of, and liberal contributor to, the Baptist church, he has been superintendent of the Marietta Baptist Sunday-school forty years, and deacon of that church thirty years.

In 1838 he married Grace Dana, of Newport, who died in 1854; and in 1855 he married his present wife, Jerusha Gear, daughter of Rev. H. Gear, late of Marietta, deceased.

WILLIAM P. RICHARDSON was born in Washington county, Pennsylvania, May 25, 1824. In 1841 he entered Washington college and pursued there a three-years' course of study. In 1846 he enlisted as a volunteer in the "Steubenville Greys," a company raised for the Mexican war, and assigned to the Third Ohio regiment. After his return from Mexico he was engaged for several years teaching in Brooke county, Virginia, and Harrison county, Ohio, and in the meantime studied law with Allen C. Turner, of Cadiz, and was there admitted to the bar in 1852. In 1853 he moved from Harrison county to Woodsfield, in Monroe county, Ohio, and after a year's employment as principal of the Monroe academy, commenced there the practice of law in partnership with L. C. Wise, and afterwards with Edward Nechbold.

In 1855 he was elected prosecuting attorney for Monroe county, and was reelected in 1857 and again in 1859. In 1861, soon after the attack on Fort Sumter, he raised two companies of volunteers, which were assigned to the Twenty-fifth Ohio infantry, three years' service, of which regiment he was appointed major, and soon after lieutenant colonel, and with that rank proceeded to the field. In 1862 he was promoted to the colonelcy of his regiment. In 1863, at the battle of Chancellorsville he was wounded in the right shoulder, and on account of the severity of the wound was an invalid for eight months. In January, 1864, he was detailed as president of a general court-martial at Camp Chase, near Columbus, Ohio, and in February following was placed in command of that post. In October, 1864, he was elected attorney general of the State of Ohio, and it was his intention to retire from the army, but upon the urgent solicitation of Governor Brough, he resigned the attorney generalship and remained in the service. The same year he was brevetted brigadier general. In 1865 he was ordered to Charleston, from thence to Columbia, and finally to Darlington, in command of the district of East South Carolina. In June, 1866, he resigned his position in the army. In July, 1866, he was appointed collector of internal revenue for the Fifteenth district of Ohio, and in November moved from Woodsfield to Marietta. In May, 1869, he resigned his office of collector, and since then has been engaged at Marietta in the successful practice of his profession as lawyer. As a commanding officer General Richardson possessed the confidence and esteem of his men. His services in detached positions have been frequently commended. He has been connected professionally with various enterprises, and was a director of the Marietta & Cleveland railroad. He was married in 1848 to Sarah E. Smith, of Brooke county, West Virginia, who died at Marietta, May 11, 1879.

HARVEY HOLLAND was born in Oswego county, New York, June 19, 1815.

In 1818 he came with his father to Woodsfield, Monroe county, Ohio.

In 1839 he moved from Woodsfield to Ludlow township, Washington county, Ohio. He was elected and served two terms as justice of the peace, and in the meantime studied law, and in 1853 was admitted to the bar. He continues to reside in Ludlow engaged in the practice of law in Washington and adjoining counties.

DAVID ALBAN studied law in the office of Hon. Samuel F. Vinton, of Gallipolis, Ohio.

In the spring of 1855 he was admitted to the bar by the district court sitting in Gallia county.

In the summer of 1855 he removed to Marietta and commenced practice in partnership with Hon. Arius Nye.

In 1862 he volunteered as a private soldier in the United States service, and served with his regiment, the Eighty-seventh Ohio volunteer infantry, until he was taken prisoner at Harper's Ferry, September 13, 1862, and parolled.

In 1861 he was elected prosecuting attorney of the county, and was reelected in 1863 and in 1865, serving for six consecutive years.

For several years he has been associated with Hon. W. B. Loomis, in the law firm of Loomis & Alban, now engaged in the practice of law at Marietta.

In 1879 he was again elected prosecuting attorney of the county, and now holds that office.

RODNEY K. SHAW is a native of Copenhagen in the town of Denmark, county of Lewis, and State of New York, born December 13, 1829. His early opportunities for improvement were those of the district school, and as clerk in his father's store. At twenty he began an academic course at Union academy at Belleville, New York, which was continued at Lowville academy, Lowville, New York, until his admission to the bar. He pursued the study of the law in the offices of Hon. N. B. Sylvester, now of Saratoga, New York, and Hon. E. S. Merrell, of Lowville. He taught at intervals and during vacation, teaching one year each in Virginia and Mississippi. Previous to his admission to the bar he was awarded a life certificate by the department of public instruction of New York. He was admitted to the bar at the general term of the supreme court of New York at Utica, January 2, 1855, and practiced four years in his native county. In 1859 his father having become a helpless invalid, he came to West Virginia, and cared for him until his death.

In March, 1860, he entered the office of Thomas W. Ewart as a clerk, was admitted to the bar on motion, at the April term of the district court in 1860, and continued as clerk in Mr. Ewart's office until the summer of 1861, when he was given a lieutenant's commission to recruit for the Sixty-third Ohio volunteer infantry. At the organization of the regiment he was made captain of company G, one of the companies raised in Washington county, and served with that regiment in the Ohio brigade until the fall of 1862, when he was discharged on surgeon's certificate.

In the fall of 1863 he became a partner of Thomas W. Ewart, and continued in that relation until 1870, under the firm names of Ewart & Shaw, Ewart, Shaw & Sibley, and again as Ewart & Shaw, and since 1870 has been practicing alone. He is a member of the American Bar association.

CHARLES R. BARCLAY located at Beverly, Ohio, and commenced the practice of law about 1856. He was elected mayor of Beverly, and served one term. In 1858 he was elected prosecuting attorney of the county, and served two years. After a residence of a few years in Beverly, he removed to Missouli, and in that State is successfully engaged in the practice of his profession.

WILLIAM B. LOOMIS was born in New London, Connecticut, February 1, 1837. In the spring of 1840 he came with the family of his father, Christopher C. Loomis, to Marietta, Ohio, where his father engaged in the mercantile business. He attended the Marietta academy, and completed his early education at the Marietta high school, having in 1853 graduated with the first class of graduates from that school. After leaving school he was engaged for a few months as merchants' clerk, after which he was employed as deputy clerk of the court of common pleas and clerk of the probate court of Washington county, Ohio. During his clerkship in those courts he studied law with Messrs. Clarke & Ewart, and in April, 1857, was admitted to the bar by the district court in Washington county. He then engaged in the practice of his profession at Marietta, in partnership with Thomas W. Ewart, esq., which relation continued until the fall of 1859. In the spring of 1860 he became the law partner of Melvin Clarke, and so continued until Colonel Clarke was killed in the battle at Antietam in 1862. He was married October 1, 1860, to Harriet Frances Wheeler, daughter of F. J. Wheeler, esq., of Marietta. In 1862 he was elected city solicitor of the city of Marietta, which office he held for four years. From the spring of 1863 to May, 1865, he was associated with the late Judge Simeon Nash, of Gallipolis, as partner in the practice of law at Marietta, when he became the law partner of Samuel S. Knowles, and so remained until June, 1868, at which time he was elected judge of the court of common pleas of the third subdivision of the seventh judicial district of Ohio, and held that position for five years.

In March, 1879, his wife died, and in June, 1880, he was married to Mrs. N. C. Hodkinson, of Marietta.

After his retirement from the bench he resumed his position at the bar, and is now senior member of the law firm of Loomis & Alban, of Marietta, successfully engaged in the practice in the State and Federal courts.

WILLIAM M. RAMSEY was born in Washington county, Pennsylvania. In 1845 he came with the family of his father, Dr. Robert Ramsey, to Beverly, Washington county, Ohio, where his father commenced, and for two years acceptably and successfully continued, the practice of medicine.

In 1847, upon the decease of his father, he returned with the family from Beverly to Washington county, Pennsylvania, where his early education was obtained. He studied law with Hon. William Montgomery, of Washington, Pennsylvania.

In 1857 he was admitted to the bar; located in Marietta, Ohio, and commenced practice as an attorney at law. In 1858 he was a candidate for the office of prosecuting attorney, nominated by the Democratic party. In 1859 he removed from Marietta to Cincinnati, where he entered upon the practice of his profession, in which he has been eminently successful, and has attained a high position as a member of the Ohio bar. He was married in 1860 to Miss Mary Frances Hart, of Cincinnati.

HENRY MANASSEH DAWES was born at Malta, Morgan county, Ohio, March 11, 1832. He was the eldest son of the late Henry Dawes, a prominent and active citizen of that county, and a grandson of Manasseh Cutler, whose life is recorded in this volume. His boyhood was spent at Malta, from whence he came to Marietta about the year 1850, and pursued a regular course at Marietta college, graduating in 1855, after which he studied law in the office of the late Hon. Davis Green, and was admitted to the bar at the April term of the district court of Washington county, 1858. He at once became a partner of Judge Green, and continued in the practice at Marietta until his death, which occurred August 13, 1860.

Mr. Dawes was endowed with a mind of unusual strength, quick perception, and fine reasoning powers, and his talents and acquirements gave promise of great professional success and distinction.

Descended from a line of ancestors who participated in the stormy events of the Revolution, he seemed to have inherited the patriotic spirit of that period, and developed an early fondness for the study of the political history of the country, and for active participation in political discussion. When yet a student he delivered a course of lectures upon the life and times of Henry Clay, the "Great American Commoner," in which he gave evidence that he comprehended the spirit of our institutions. He was also a frequent contributor to the local press on these subjects.

A man of decision and firmness, unyielding where principle was involved, he was at the same time genial, generous, and courteous to all, and having a face full of tenderness and indicating a frank and kindly nature, he was one whom to know well was both to respect and love. His untimely death was the cause of general sorrow and regret, and deprived the bar of a member who would have honored the calling.

FRANK BUELL was born at Lowell, Washington county, Ohio, April 24, 1837. He studied law with Hon. W. A. Whittlesey, of Marietta, and in January, 1859, was admitted to the bar. In 1859 he was elected prosecuting attorney of the county. In 1861, at the breaking out of the war of the Rebellion, he resigned his office as prosecuting attorney and was commissioned as captain of company B, Eighteenth Ohio regiment, in the three months' service. Afterwards, in the fall of the same year, from recruits residing on the borders of Ohio and West Virginia, he raised an artillery company, the Pierpont battery, and by the governor of West Virginia was appointed and commissioned captain of the same. With his command he was in the campaigns in West Virginia, under Generals Fremont, Schenck, and Sigel, was engaged in several severe artillery duels, and in the battles of Cross Keys, Port Republic and Cedar Mountain.

On the twenty-second of August, 1862, at Freeman's Ford, in Fauquier county, Virginia, whilst engaged in an artillery skirmish, a shell from the enemy's battery struck the ground beneath his horse, and bursting, a piece passed through the horse and broke the captain's thigh. The horse fell dead across the captain's body, inflicting internal injuries from which he died in a few hours.

Captain Buell, during his short career as soldier, was the favorite with his command, and his services were highly commended by his superior officers. His speedy promotion to a colonelcy of artillery was contemplated by the Government.

WALTER BRABHAM was born in Loudoun county, Virginia, September 29, 1812. He obtained his early education at the common schools of that county, and commenced the study of law with William Benton, esq.

In 1835 he moved from Virginia to Ohio, and in Morgan county, and afterwards in Washington county, was engaged for several years in the business of teaching, merchandizing, and farming.

In 1859, having completed a course of law studies, under the preceptorship of Hon. Davis Green, of Marietta, he was admitted to the bar and commenced the practice of law.

In 1867 he was elected prosecuting attorney of Washington county, and was again elected to the same office in 1871, and acceptably discharged the duties thereof until 1873.

He continues to reside at Harmar, engaged in the practice of law.

M. D. FOLLETT was admitted to the bar in the fall of 1858. A sketch of Mr. Follett is given elsewhere in this work.

REUBEN L. NYE, son of Ichabod H. Nye and Miriam C. Linnel, of Granville, Ohio, was born at Marietta, October 28, 1836; attended Marietta high school and preparatory department, Marietta college; was for several years employed as a clerk in the hardware store of his uncle, A. T. Nye; studied with his uncle, Arius Nye, and was admitted to practice, 1860.

He volunteered as a private soldier, April 15, 1861, and served with his regiment, Seventeenth Ohio volunteers, in West Virginia, until July following, when he was commissioned second lieutenant Thirty-sixth Ohio volunteers; promoted to captain, April, 1862; served through the war and mustered out at Columbus, July 27, 1865. The last year of his service he was employed on staff and court-martial duty in departments of the Cumberland and West Virginia.

He commenced practice at Marietta, in the fall of 1865, with Colonel David Alban; afterwards associated with H. L. Sibley, as Sibley & Nye; and now with F. F. Oldham, as Nye & Oldham. Married Helen McLeod, of Topsfield, Massachusetts, May 21, 1867. He was elected prosecuting attorney of Washington county in 1869, and served as such from January, 1870, to January, 1872. He was elected solicitor of the city of Marietta in 1872 and 1874, and served as such for a period of four years. He held the office of register in bankruptcy under the act of 1867.

HIRAM L. GEAR, son of Rev. H. Gear, was born at Marietta, Ohio, December 1, 1842, prepared for college in the High school of Marietta, and entered Marietta college in 1858, and graduated therefrom in 1862.

After acting as tutor in Marietta college for one year, he read law with Thomas W. Ewart, and then removed to California, where he was admitted to practice by the supreme court of that State. He was an energetic young man, of a logical turn of mind, and entered heartily into the active business life of the community; and, while at Quincy, Plumas county, California, was elected prosecuting attorney. Subsequently he became editor of the Plumas County Herald, at Quincy, California, which position he held until his return to Marietta in the fall of 1870. Here he again engaged in the practice of the law, as partner in the firm of Ewart, Gear & Ewart, and continued in that business until the fall of 1872, when, impelled by the impression that he ought to preach the gospel as his father had done, he left the law and became a minister, preaching at Newport, Ohio, Norwalk, Ohio, and finally he was called to the position of superintendent of State missions of the Baptist denomination, which position he now holds, residing at Granville, Ohio.

THOMAS R. SHEPPARD, son of Charles J. Sheppard, was born in Washington county, Ohio, and was educated in the public schools of Marietta city.

In 1864 he volunteered as a private soldier in the One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, Ohio volunteer infantry, National Guard, and served until he was mustered out with the regiment. He studied law in the office of Messrs. Knowles & Loomis, of Marietta, and in 1867 was admitted to the bar. Soon afterwards he removed to Mississippi, where he remained until 1871, engaged in the practice of law.

Since 1871 he has been located and practicing in Marietta, Ohio.

HIRAM L. SIBLEY was admitted to the bar of Marietta in April, 1865. A sketch of him is given elsewhere in this work.

JOSHUA T. CREW, son of Thomas and Ann (Andrews) Crew, was born at Chesterfield, Morgan county, Ohio, October 5, 1844. He studied law with M. D. Follett, of Marietta, was admitted to the bar in 1868, and commenced practice at Marietta, in partnership with Mr. Follett.

In 1869 he removed from Marietta to McConnellsville.

In 1876 he located at Zanesville, where he now resides, engaged in the practice of law.

JAMES W. COLLETT, was born in Wood county, West Virginia, April 23, 1828, and was educated at Parkersburgh, Virginia. He was engaged for some years in mercantile business at Newport, Washington county, Ohio. He studied law with Hon. Davis Green, at Marietta, and in 1868, was admitted to the bar. He resides at Newport and is engaged in the practice of his profession.

WILLIAM G. WAY was born at Marietta, Ohio, July 22, 1842. He studied law with Hon. W. H. Oldham, of Marietta, and was admitted to the bar at a term of the district court for Washington county, April 8, 1869, and commenced practice in Marietta.

In 1869 he was a candidate for prosecuting attorney, but was defeated. In 1871 he was elected representative in the Ohio legislature, served one term, and refused a renomination. In 1876 he was elected solicitor of the city of Marietta, and reelected in 1878 and 1880. He continues to reside at Marietta, engaged in the practice of his profession.

THOMAS EWART was born October 4, 1847, at Marietta, Ohio. He attended the public schools of Marietta and Marietta college until 1866, and then attended Denison university, at Granville, Ohio, for three years, and graduated there in 1869. He read law with Ewart & Shaw, and was admitted to practice at the district court of Noble county, Ohio, in the fall of 1870. He then began the practice of law at Marietta, Ohio, with his father, Thomas W. Ewart and H. L. Gear, under the firm name of Ewart, Gear & Ewart, where he has continued in the practice to the present time, except a year and a half spent at Indianapolis in 1873 and 1874.

LUMAN W. CHAMBERLAIN, son of John D. and Thiora (Grow) Chamberlain, was born at Watertown, Ohio, December 1, 1828. He attended common schools and Western Liberal institute at Marietta, and taught school several terms.

In 1851 he was elected county surveyor, and by successive reelections held that office for ten years. In 1862 he was elected assistant sergeant-at-arms of the Ohio house of representatives, and served as such during the sessions of 1862 and 1863. In 1863 he was elected probate judge of Washington county, and reelected in 1866, serving six years.

In 1870, having completed a preparatory course of law studies with Hon. Thomas W. Ewart, he was admitted to the bar, and has since been engaged at Marietta in the practice of his profession, now associated with John A. Hamilton as Chamberlain & Hamilton.

MANLY W. MANN was admitted to the bar at Columbus, Ohio, about 1870. His residence is at Coal Run, Washington county, Ohio, where he is engaged in the practice of his profession.

SEYMOUR J. HATHAWAY, son of Luther, and Clarissa (Ripley) Hathaway was born in Macedon, Wayne county, New York, January 27, 1844. In 1853 he came with his father and family, who then moved from Macedon to Marietta, Ohio.

In 1861, at the breaking out of the war, he was a student in the freshman class of the Marietta high school, when he enlisted in Captain William B. Mason's company, Third regiment Ohio militia, called into service by Governor Dennison, and served three months.

In 1864-5 he was engaged with the law firm of Ewart & Shaw, and afterwards with that of Knowles & Loomis in examining records and making abstracts of title to lands in the oil regions of southeastern Ohio.

In 1865, having pursued the required preparatory course of studies, he entered the freshman class of Marietta college and graduated at that institution in 1869. The same year he began the study of law with M. D. Follett, esq., of Marietta, and was admitted to the bar in 1871, and commenced practice at Marietta.

In 1874 he was elected city solicitor of Marietta city, and by direction of the council immediately began the revision of the city ordinances, which work was completed early in 1875.

He continues his residence at Marietta engaged in the practice of law.

He was married in 1876 to Miss Mary C. Means, daughter of William C. Means, of Marietta.

JOHN A. HAMILTON, son of Dr. David and Ruth (Allen) Hamilton, was born at Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, August 2, 1847. In 1853 he came with his father's family to Marietta, Ohio, attended the public schools there for his preliminary education, and completed it at the high school in that city.

In 1863 he entered the army as volunteer in the Second Ohio artillery. In 1864 he was detailed as private secretary to General Hugh Ewing, then commanding the Second division, district of Kentucky, and filled that position until 1865, when he was mustered out of the service.

He then returned to Marietta where for two or three years he was engaged in mercantile business.

In 1871, having completed a course of law studies with Colonel Alban, he was admitted to the bar. Since then he has been engaged in the practice of his profession at Marietta; a partner from 1871 to 1874 in the firm of Knowles, Alban & Hamilton; from 1874 to 1875 in the firm of Knowles & Hamilton, and since 1875 in the firm of Chamberlain & Hamilton.

He was married in 1872 to Mary M. Martin, of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania.

CORNELIUS T. FRAZYER was born in New York city, June 15, 1836. He came to Washington county, Ohio, in the latter part of February, 1865; was deputy clerk of common pleas from June, 1872 to January, 1876; was admitted to the bar in this State in June, 1871; was elected probate judge in October, 1875, for three years from February 14, 1876, and reelected in the fall of 1878.

HARVEY HOLLAND, JR., son of Harvey Holland above mentioned, was born in Ludlow, Washington county, Ohio, July 6, 1845. In 1866 and for several years thereafter he was engaged in teaching, and in the meantime studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1872. In 1875 he located at Marietta and commenced the practice of law.

In 1878, on account of feeble and failing health he was obliged to abandon his law practice, and after traveling in the south seeking, unsuccessfully, restoration of strength he returned to Ludlow, where he now resides.

JOHN IRVINE, son of Dr. William Irvine, was born in Brownsville, Pennsylvania, October 17, 1835. He obtained his early education at the Brownsville academy.

In 1852 he removed with his widowed mother from Pennsylvania to Ohio, and settled in the western part of Washington county on a farm.

In 1866 he was appointed collector of tolls on the Muskingum improvement, and served in that capacity eleven years.

In 1872, having finished a course of law studies under the preceptorship of W. Brabham, esq., he was admitted to the bar and commenced practice in Harmar.

The same year he was elected mayor of Harmar, and was reelected in 1874.

In 1877 he was elected senator in Ohio legislature for the counties of Washington, Morgan and Noble, and served two years.

He continues to reside at Harmar engaged in the practice of law.

He was married in 1854 to Miss Fanny Irvine, of Decatur, Ohio.

FRANK F. OLDHAM, son of W. H. Oldham, above named was born at Moundsville, Virginia, March 3, 1849. He attended the Morgantown, West Virginia, academy during the four years preceding 1865, when he moved with his father to Marietta, Ohio, and in 1866 entered Marietta college, and graduated therefrom in 1870 with the highest honors of his class. He studied law with his father at Marietta, attended law lectures at Cincinnati, and was admitted to the bar in 1872. Immediately after his admission to the bar, he entered at Marietta, upon the practice of his profession, the first year in partnership with his father and W. G. Way, as Oldham, Way & Oldham; for the next four years in partnership with W. B. Loomis as Loomis & Oldham, and since 1876 in partnership with R. L. Nye, as Nye & Oldham.

In 1875 he was the nominee of the Democratic party for the office of prosecuting attorney of the county, and was elected, and reelected in 1877.

In January, 1876, he was married to Miss Betty W. Lovell, granddaughter of Mr. A. T. Nye, of Marietta.

JEWETT PALMER, son of Jewett Palmer who removed from New Hampshire to Washington county, Ohio, in 1818, was born at Fearing, Washington county, Ohio, May 7, 1840.

At the breaking out of the war he enlisted in Captain Frank Buell's company, B, Eighteenth regiment Ohio volunteer infantry, in the three months' service. At the close of this service he returned to Washington county, and with James Stanley, of Salem, recruited a company for the Thirty-sixth Ohio volunteer infantry, and was commissioned as captain of the same, and with that rank proceeded to the field and served with the regiment. In May, 1864, he was promoted to the rank of major. In November, 1864, after participating in the battle of Cedar Creek, the last battle in which his regiment was engaged, he resigned his commission and returned to Salem, Ohio.

In 1865 he was elected clerk of the court of Washington county, Ohio, and was reelected in 1868, and for the period of six years satisfactorily discharged the duties of that office.

In April, 1872, having pursued a course of legal studies with Everett, Green & Everett, of Marietta, he was admitted to the bar, opened an office at Marietta, and commenced practice as attorney and solicitor of patents.

In 1874 he was elected mayor of the city of Marietta, and was reelected in 1876.

In October, 1876, he resigned the mayoralty to accept the position of collector of internal revenue for the Fifteenth district of Ohio, tendered him by President Hayes, and since then has continued his residence at Marietta, engaged in the discharge of the duties of his office as collector.

In September, 1866, he was married to Miss Saida M. Scott, of Marietta.

ANDREW W. MCCORMICK was born in Greene county, Pennsylvania. He came to Marietta and published the Marietta Republican for some years preceding the fall of 1861, when he entered the military service, became captain in the Seventy-seventh Ohio volunteer infantry, was wounded, and twice taken prisoner during the war.

In 1867 he was admitted to the bar in Washington county. In 1869 he was elected probate judge of the county, and was reelected in 1872. He practiced law in Marietta from 1876 until 1878, when he removed to Cincinnati.

JASPER LISK was admitted to the bar about 1872. He resides at Matamoras, Washington county, Ohio, and is engaged in the practice of law.

FREDERICK J. CUTTER was born at Watertown, Washington county, Ohio, October 6, 1839. In 1859 he went to Cincinnati, and during the latter portion of his six years' residence in that city he attended Herron's seminary and Professor Clive's private school. In 1865 he entered the sophomore class of Marietta college and was graduated at that college in 1868. During the four years following he was engaged in teaching and in the care and management of his father's farm in Union township.

In 1872 he commenced reading law with Hon. T. W. Ewart, of Marietta, and in April, 1875, was admitted to the bar. In 1876 he opened an office in Marietta, where he is now engaged in the practice of his profession. He resides in Watertown township.

JAMES E. WAY, son of Joshua and Lucinda (Bishop) Way, was born in Union township, Washington county, Ohio, April 9, 1857. He received his early education at the common schools of Washington and Monroe counties, and attended the high schools at Woodsfield and Caldwell.

He studied law with Messrs. Oldham & Way, at Marietta, was admitted to the bar in 1875, and practiced for two years with Pearson & Doherty, of Woodsfield. In 1877 he returned to Marietta and formed a law partnership with his brother, William G. Way. In 1878 he removed to Beverly, Ohio, and engaged, and still continues, in the practice of his profession at that place.

In 1879 he was the nominee of the Democratic party for prosecuting attorney for Washington county, but was not elected.

In February, 1877, he was married to Miss Mary E. Hanson, of Stafford, Union county.

WILLIAM LOREY was born in Prussia about 1827. He emigrated to this country in 1849, came to Marietta in 1855, and established, and for about ten years, published the Marietta Democrat, the first German paper printed in the county.

In 1869 he was admitted to the bar in Washington county, and was engaged in the practice of law at Marietta until the time of his death in 1881.

CHARLES A. COOK, son of Silas Cook, esq., was born November 3, 1825. He studied law in the office of W. G. Way, of Marietta, and was admitted to the bar at a session of the district court for Washington county, April 3, 1877. He resides at Marietta, engaged in the practice of law.

DAVID R. ROOD, son of Richard H. and Mary A. (Williams) Rood, was born at McConnelsville, Ohio, February 23, 1847.

In 1849 he removed with his parents to Washington county, where he obtained his early education at the common schools.

In 1864 he entered the army as volunteer in company L, First Ohio volunteer cavalry, and served in the escort of Major General George H. Thomas until the close of the war.

In 1865 he was mustered out of service, and at Marietta entered upon a course of study preparatory to teaching. In 1868, and for several of the following years he was engaged in teaching, and in the meantime studied law with Hon. S. S. Knowles. In 1877 he was admitted to the bar at Athens, Ohio. In 1878 he opened a law office at Belpre, Ohio, where he is now engaged in the practice of his profession, associated with S. Ridgway, at Marietta, as Rood & Ridgway.

JOHN W. TRAUTMAN was born in Alleghany county, Pennsylvania, November 29, 1849, and obtained his early education in that county. In 1870 he came to Ohio and located in Harmar, Washington county. He studied law with Hon. John Irvin, and in 1877 was admitted to the bar, and commenced practice.

In 1878 he was elected by the house of representatives of Ohio, as first assistant sergeant-at-arms, and served in that capacity during two sessions of the legislature.

In 1879 he resumed the practice of law at Harmar, where he now resides.

JOHN W. MCCORMICK was born at Brownsville, Monroe county, Ohio, December 25, 1850. In 1869 he came with his parents to Washington county, and at Marietta pursued a course of preparatory studies. In 1875 he was graduated at Marietta college.

He commenced the study of law with Messrs. Loomis & Alban, and completed the same with Mr. M. D. Follett, and in 1878 was admitted to the bar.

In the spring of 1879 he commenced the practice of law at Marietta, and is now engaged therein at that place.

JAMES ROSS, was born in Belmont county, Ohio, in 1839. In October, 1861, he volunteered as a private soldier, and afterwards reenlisted as a veteran in the Seventy-third regiment, Ohio volunteer infantry. He was engaged in many hard fought battles; marched with Sherman to the sea; was commissioned as first lieutenant, and having served through the entire war, was mustered out of service with his regiment in 1865.

In 1878 he was admitted to the bar, and is now located in Wesley township, Washington county, engaged in the practice of law.

M. WILBER REA was born at Rea's Run, Washington county, Ohio. He attended the Gallia academy at Galipolis, Ohio, and the Normal School at Lebanon, Ohio. At the age of seventeen years he began teaching, and taught for a number of years. He was engaged for a time with his brother in store-keeping and tobacco-packing at Newport, Ohio. He studied law and graduated at Cincinnati Law school in 1878. In 1879 he commenced and is now engaged in the practice of law at Marietta.

F. R. MCCORMICK, son of A. W. McCormick, was graduated at Marietta college in 1874. He studied law with his father, and in 1876 was admitted to the bar. In 1878 he removed to Cincinnati, where, associated with his father he is now engaged in the practice of law.

ALFRED DEWEY FOLLETT, son of Martin D. Follett and Harriet L. Shipman, was born in Marietta, Ohio, March 30, 1858. In September, 1872, he entered Marietta college and graduated therefrom in July, 1876, with the highest honors of his class. In September, 1877, he entered Cornell university and took a post graduate course in history, philosophy, political economy, constitutional law and literature. On his return to Marietta he commenced the study of law and in February, 1880, was admitted to the practice of law by the supreme court of Ohio. Since then he has been engaged in the practice of law with his father at Marietta.

SIDNEY RIDGWAY, son of Thomas Ridgway, was born in Washington county, Ohio, May 20, 1850. In 1868 and 1869 he attended the academy at Marietta; in 1874 was graduated at Marietta college; in 1875 he was elected justice of the peace for Union township, Washington county; in 1877 was the nominee of the Republican party for representative in the Ohio legislature, but was not elected; in 1877 was engaged as teacher in the public schools of Lowell, Washington county, and in 1879 having completed a course of law studies under the preceptorship of Ewart, Sibley & Ewart, at Marietta, he was admitted to the bar. He is now engaged in the practice of his profession at Marietta, associated with D. R. Rood, of Belpre, as Rood & Ridgway.

CHARLES W. RICHARDS, son of George H. Richards, was born at Marietta, Ohio, May 11, 1856. He attended the public schools of his native city; studied law two years with Messrs. Loomis & Alban, and was admitted to the bar in Washington county in April, 1879.

In April, 1880, he was elected justice of the peace of Marietta township. He resides at Marietta, engaged in the practice of his profession, and in the discharge of his duties as justice of the peace.

CHARLES RICHARDSON, son of W. P. Richardson, was born at Woodsfield, Ohio, March 28, 1837. He studied law with his father, and was admitted to the bar in 1879. He is associated with his father in the practice of law at Marietta, Ohio.

JOHN C. PRESTON, son of Frederic and Joanna (Chapin) Preston, was born at Ludlow village near Beverly, Ohio, October 3, 1831. A part of his early life was spent at Columbus, Ohio, where he attended school at the seminary. About 1852 he became a resident of Beverly, where he has held the office of justice of the peace for a period of six years, of postmaster sixteen years, and of mayor six years.

In 1878 he was admitted to the bar, and at Beverly commenced and still continues in the practice of his profession. In 1855 he married Harriet Anderson, who died in 1871. In 1876 he married his present wife, Mrs. Kate Shoop, of McConnellsville.

LOWELL W. ELLENWOOD was born in Washington county, Ohio, August 7, 1855. He studied law with Messrs. Chamberlain & Hamilton, of Marietta, and in 1879 graduated at the law school in Cincinnati, and was admitted to the bar. In 1880 he located at Marietta, where he now resides, and engaged in the practice of his profession.

CHAPTER XVI.*

WAR OF 1812.

Cause of the War—Situation in Washington County—The Federalists—Reminiscences of John Stone, James Lawton, Joel Deming—Caleb Emerson's Statement as to why the Draft was Resorted to—Battle of Tippecanoe—Expedition of General Hull—Colonel Lewis Cass—Captain Sharp's Company—Surrender of Hull—Call for Troops—Expedition of General E. W. Tupper—General Harrison's Movements—Journal of Captain James Flagg—Companies of Captains Sharp, Flagg, Buell, Hill, Thorniley and Devol—Siege of Fort Erie—Perry's Victory—Proctor and Tecumseh Defeated by Harrison—Treaty of Peace—Battle of New Orleans—Rolls of Companies in War of 1812—Biographical Sketches of Officers, War of 1812—General E. W. Tupper—Captains Sharp, Flagg, Thorniley, Hill, Buell, Devol, Lieutenant Danielson and Major Horace Nye, Captain Jason R. Curtis, Captain Robert C. Barton.

OHIO had been settled twenty-four years when the war with Great Britain broke out. Some progress had been made in subduing the wilderness, numerous settlements had been formed, new counties organized, and the census of 1810 shows that, with an area of four thousand square miles, she had at that time but two hundred and thirty thousand seven hundred and sixty-nine inhabitants, and Washington county, by the same census, five thousand

* The military history of Washington county is from the pen of S. J. Hathaway, of Marietta.

* Among the many who were anxious to have the fine record of Washington county, in the War of the Rebellion, adequately represented in this history were Colonel William R. Putnam, E. S. McIntosh, M. P. Wells and Douglas Putnam; but Colonel Putnam, chairman of the military committee during the war, was the moving spirit in having the present military history prepared. He it was who invited the gentlemen named to support the undertaking.

I have attempted to develop Colonel Putnam's idea of what such a history should be in the following pages, which I began January 13, 1881, and completed in about four months. Meanwhile Colonel Putnam departed, and the hand that could have placed the seal of approval on the work was paralyzed in death. I have therefore submitted the Military History to President J. W. Andrews and General R. R. Dawes, who have endorsed the work.

I am under obligations to General B. D. Fearing, of the Ninety-second Regiment, General H. F. Devol, of the Thirty-sixth regiment, Colonels A. W. McCormick and W. B. Mason, of the Seventy-seventh regiment, Colonel Douglas Putnam, jr., of the Ninety-second regiment, Captain James G. Barker, of the Thirty-sixth regiment, Major Joseph B. Daniels, of the Ninth cavalry, Captain R. K. Shaw, and Captain R. S. Mason, of the Sixty-third regiment, Lieutenant J. S. McCowan, of the One Hundred and Seventy-fifth regiment, Alex. H. Birkey, of Buell's battery, John Caywood, of Seventh cavalry, Major George F. Rice, of the Thirty-ninth regiment, Lieutenant John Burke, of the Seventy-third regiment, Captain W. L. DeBeck, battery K, First artillery, Captain J. F. Huntington, battery H, First artillery, and others, for services in preparing the sketches of their respective organizations, and to A. T. Nye, sr., Rotheus Hayward, Hiram Hill and T. P. Flagg, of Clayton, Illinois, for information and documents relating to the War of 1812.

nine hundred and ninety-one. A large part of the State was still in its natural condition, and part of it held by tribes of Indians. The settled portion was all southeast of a line drawn from Cleveland in a southwesterly direction. It was through this wild country that the soldiers of 1812 marched to the falls of the Ohio, at Louisville; and the gratitude of the country is due to them not so much for the amount of fighting done as for the hardships endured in traversing these pathless forests and holding important posts on the far frontier. In those days the facilities for travel were limited, horses and wagons were scarce, while clothing and all the equipments of an army were difficult to provide so far from the centres of supply, and much of it, when obtained, was not suitable for the kind of service demanded—that of fighting Indians, marching through dense forests, tangled thickets and extended swamps.

The people of the Northwest Territory had always been accustomed to the maintenance of a warlike attitude. The young State of Ohio had a well organized militia, and the service of a militia man in those days meant something. They had, from 1790 to 1795, a fierce war with a powerful combination of Indians, including the Miamis, Wyandots, Delawares, Pottawatomies, Shawnees, Chippewas, Ottawas and other tribes of the Territory, all under the great Miami chief, Michikiquia, whose war-cry was "Drive the white man east of the Ohio." General Anthony Wayne, August 20, 1794, had totally defeated them on the Miami; and since the treaty with them at Greenville, August 3, 1795, the Indians had not molested the settlements until the beginning of the war we are now discussing.

From 1798 to 1800 the war with France occurred. From 1801 to 1805 the war with the pirates of Tripoli was waged. Thus had the new generation grown up, and the new settlements been formed almost under the shadow of the sword and scalping-knife; and the population, accustomed to rely on the fruits of the chase as well as agriculture and other pursuits, was largely made up of hardy hunters, good woodsmen, and men who had made a successful fight against the ruder forces of nature.

The War of 1812, as far as this country was concerned, was fully justified. The mother country had acknowledged our independence, but would not accord us the privileges of freedom. She had impressed our seamen, searched our ships on the high seas, and made almost innumerable aggressions on our commerce, and last, but not least, had incited the Indians on the frontier to renew their savage hostilities, and for these causes war was declared June 18, 1812. President Madison in his proclamation of war, dated June 19, 1812, urges all citizens of the Republic to sustain the administration in the impending struggle. One would suppose that such an appeal was superfluous, but it had a meaning at that time which we can the better understand by consulting the political history of the day. Thomas Jefferson had already founded the Democratic party by which Madison had been elected. It was the war party. The Federalists were opposed to the war, in this much at least, that they believed that the object sought could be accomplished by negotiation without a resort to arms. The war party, however, carried the day, and the verdict of history is that they were right. This feeling of opposition was well developed in Washington county. It was, however, more of a non-interest than opposition.

In the spring of 1878 A. T. Nye, sr., of Marietta, received several letters from old citizens of the county, written in response to inquiries made by Mr. Nye in regard to the War of 1812, which we give as the best statement readily obtainable of the situation in this county in those days, John Stone, esq., of Belpre, wrote as follows:

The patriotism of Belpre did not prompt her citizens to deeds of peril on the Canada lines. The people believed the Government could have made a treaty if it had taken the right course. The Berlin and Milan decrees of Napoleon were as obnoxious as the British orders in council, and to declare war against one government and not the other was to discriminate. If war was the remedy to maintain our rights, we were in every way unprepared for it.

The blundering management of the war in the northwest gave cause for the severest criticism, and perhaps gave rise to the idea of the necessity of a Silver Grey organization. Colonel Nathaniel Cushing had command of a company of Silver Greys, whose valor had been tried in their youth, who had seen Indians since, heard the war whoop and helped to bury the scalped dead, but the men who threw up their caps for the War of 1812 looked upon these old soldiers as Tories, and sometimes called them so. Perhaps I might mention some circumstances to show who they were, how well they bore the appellation, not accepted it, and how they stood when a Tory was an enemy to his country. There was some slipping away from the legal call of the militia officers, but enough were found to fill the drafts as they occurred. All who went into the service were given honorable discharges. There were a great many sick and ailing when an order for draft was announced, so much so that old Mr. Allen, who did the ferrying at the mouth of the Little Hocking, and who was commonly known as Old Charon, said: "Nearly all the drafted men profaned themselves sick."

Edmund B. Dana and Bial Stedman were captains in the regiment of Washington county militia as then organized. They were citizens of Belpre, and Belpre at that time contained double the territory it does now. The bounds of military companies were fixed by regimental boards of officers. Hence Captain Dana's company, though called a Belpre company, extended into Warren, while Captain Stedman's company was all in Belpre, and within the bounds of these two companies were formed the Silver Greys. I am not aware that either Captain E. B. Dana or Captain Bial Stedman performed any other service than to call out the requisition made on their companies and other duties connected with that service. I was a corporal in Captain Dana's company, and performed the duty of notifying the drafted men in the draft of 1813. It was the duty of commanders of companies when they received a requisition to draft the number of men called for and forward them to the place of rendezvous; they were not authorized to use compulsion. If the drafted man did not go or furnish a substitute he was subject to a fine. Officers were detailed in the order of the dates of their commissions, and took with them their non-commissioned officers, governed by a rule fixed by law. A suit grew out of the drafting of an apprentice who never returned to service, in which case the aggrieved master, a strong advocate of the war, sought his remedy in court against the captain, and paid the costs in Goodno vs. Bial Stedman, on appeal from William Browning's docket; whether he cursed the war I don't know, but have no doubt he cursed his luck and the captain, too.

Omitting all dates, quartermaster or Contractor Craig purchased a large number of ox teams in Belpre and vicinity, and forwarded them to headquarters under his nephew W. A. Putnam, wagonmaster, Absalom Misner, Major Reed, and Cummings Porter, teamsters, which duties they performed in a satisfactory manner and were honorably discharged.

The drafted men who served were Elam Frost, Nehemiah Morse, Lemuel Cooper, Samuel Barkley. The men who hired substitutes were Jervis Burroughs, William Burroughs, and I think George Dana and Joseph Dilley. The substitutes were Joel Bennett, Curtis and Hinman. Pardon Cook served in the company commanded by Captain Charles Devol; Barkley and others from Belpre were in Captain John Thorniley's company; Captain Dana's company extended into Warren and Cooper may have been a citizen of that township at the time.

To confirm the statement that Belpre folks were called Tories a drafted man says, "When spoken to I was always called Tory except at roll call."

James Lawton, of Barlow, responded as follows:

In regard to the War of 1812, a large class of the then voters thought it unnecessary and impolitic. My father and most of his neighbors took that view of it. Of course, we rejoiced at our victories, but farther than that took but little interest in it. Doubtless the case was very different in some quarters, and many prominent citizens participated in it, but with comparatively few exceptions it was not the case here.

Joel Deming's letter was in substance as follows:

I can recollect many events of the War of 1812. There were a number of young men went from Waterford into the service, Elias Wolcott, Lorey Ford, Elisha Mallory, Norman Hart, Benedict Hutchins, Duty Green, David Deming, William Henry, Alexander Walker, Neal Walker, who all lived to return except Norman Hart.

In the summer or early fall of 1812 General Edward W. Tupper came to Marietta to recruit a force of volunteers for the war. A consultation was held between leading men as to the propriety of raising men in this manner, and it was decided to resort to the draft. Caleb Emerson, in the Western Spectator, of which he was the editor in 1812, says that it was feared that the volunteers would be from the ranks of the Democratic party, which was strongly in favor of the war, and thus the chances of success at the approaching October election would be endangered, whereas, if the draft was resorted to, men of both parties would be taken. The result was that the young men, and others without families, who could conveniently go, were not afforded a chance to volunteer, but men with families to support, and others who were not well suited for soldiers were forced into the service. General Tupper left without any recruits.

From the military papers of Captain Rotheus Hayward, late of Waterford township, furnished by Rotheus Hayward, it appears that on February 15, 1814, he was ordered to furnish men for the service. Thereupon Corporal John Craft was given a list of thirteen members of Captain Hayward's company, with orders "to begin at the first and proceed down the list until he found two men who were willing to serve, and warn them to appear at Anthony McCandish's in Waterford, on Wednesday, February 23, 1814, armed and equipped as the law directs, to march on a tour of duty, to rendezvous at Franklin, in this State." The men who were willing to go were Edward Miller and William Prewitt.

The attempt, however, to class the Federalists with the Tories was a failure, for many of them were Revolutionary soldiers, and the whole tenor of their lives amply disproved the charge. We are inclined to believe that it was merely a campaign epithet used to help James Madison to his second term in the White House. The War of 1812 really began the year previous, although no formal declaration was made; it was the same conflict, and many Indians that fought at Tippecanoe, in 1811, doubtless fought with Tecumseh and General Brock the year following.

An early intimation of the pending war was afforded the citizens of Washington county by the landing, at Marietta, of the old Fourth regiment, United States infantry, commanded by Colonel Boyd, during the summer of 1811. They were mostly from New Hampshire and Massachusetts, a fine looking and intelligent body of men, who were destined to see hard service. They passed on their way to join General William Henry Harrison at Vincennes, where they were met by several regiments of mounted volunteers from Kentucky. General Harrison, with this force, moved on up the line of the Wabash, and on November 7, 1811, at Tippecanoe creek, Indiana, met and defeated the Indians under the Prophet, brother of Tecumseh. The Indians lost one hundred and seventy killed and one hundred wounded; the Americans sixty-two killed and one hundred and twenty-six wounded. The Fourth United States infantry lost heavily in this battle. Captain Robert C. Barton, a Washington county man, commanded a company, and General Harrison, in his report of the battle, mentioned Captain Barton for his gallant conduct. The Fourth United States infantry were stationed at Fort Harrison and Vincennes during the winter, and in May, 1812, marched to Urbana, Ohio, and joined the northwestern army.

The certainty of war with Great Britain prompted the Government, in the winter of 1811-12, to call for three regiments from Ohio to serve in the northwest; the plan being to move this force early in the spring and occupy Detroit, which, in event of a war, would be an important strategic point in movements against Canada.

Brigadier General William Hull was at that time governor of the Territory of Michigan, and early in May he arrived with his staff from Washington city and assumed command of the northwestern army. General Hull had seen service in the Revolutionary War, and under General Anthony Wayne, at the storming of Stony Point, had distinguished himself, but he had lost his youthful vigor, and lacked the inspiring presence of "Mad Anthony" to urge him on to deeds of valor, as the sequel will show. The three regiments asked from Ohio were promptly furnished. They were the First, Second and Third regiments of Ohio volunteers, commanded respectively by Colonel Duncan McArthur, of Ross county; Colonel James Findlay, from the western part of the State, and Colonel Lewis Cass, from Muskingum county.

Colonel Cass gathered a few companies at Zanesville in May, 1812, and proceeded thence down the Muskingum, to Marietta, where he was joined by Captain John Sharp with the Washington county company. Colonel Cass arrived at Marietta May 25th, and was received amid the firing of cannon and other public demonstrations. On the next day he departed for Cincinnati, his men numbering two hundred and fifty in all, travelling in keel boats. On their arrival at Cincinnati they were joined by two hundred more men. From there they marched to Dayton.

After obtaining the consent of the Indian tribes through whose country the expedition was to march, General Hull moved forward through the pathless forests, the unbroken wilds of Ohio to the foot of the Maumee rapids, where he arrived June 30, 1812, and by July 4th the Fourth United States infantry took possession of Fort Detroit.

The other regiments coming up, encamped around the fort.

A sufficient number of bateaux (a boat somewhat larger than a skiff) having been procured the expedition by July 9th was ready to cross the Detroit river and invade Canada. They accordingly moved up the river on that day in the following order: first, the Fourth United States infantry Lieutenant Colonel James Milier; second, the First regiment Ohio volunteers, Colonel Duncan McArthur; third, the Second regiment Ohio volunteers, Colonel James Findlay; fourth, the Third regiment Ohio volunteers Colonel Lewis Cass. Thus the Third regiment became the right wing of the army. Arriving at the point selected for the crossing, they entered the bateaux at daylight, and launched out upon the broad river in perfect alignment, the right a little in advance. They reached the other shore in due time, formed on the bank, but were not attacked as they expected. Marching down to Sandwich opposite the fort, they encamped. A reconnaissance in force was soon made, in the direction of Malden, by Colonels McArthur and Cass capturing a battery over the Canada river, four miles above Malden. Several other reconnoissances were undertaken which developed the fact that the enemy were weak and disposed to avoid an engagement.

General Hull, from some reason best known to himself, on the seventh of August ordered the whole force to recross the river and occupy their old position which movement was effected without molestation and the invasion of Canada ended. The enemy now crossed opposite Malden and interrupted communications with Ohio. On the ninth of August a strong detachment was sent down to drive them back. Here was fought the battle of Brownston, in which the National army lost sixty-eight men. The enemy were defeated, driven back to Canada and communications with Ohio restored.

The officers commanding the troops under General Hull now discovered that something was wrong at headquarters; that the old general was either a coward or a traitor, and giving matters their most charitable construction, it was thought he ought to be deposed from command.

An effort to accomplish this change was started, all the officers signing a petition, their names being arranged in a circle so that no one came first. The design was to place one of the Ohio colonels in command, but nothing came of it.

On August 15th the British opened on Fort Detroit from a battery located on the opposite shore, which could not possibly have dislodged the garrison at Fort Detroit without a heavy supporting force which they did not have. This fort had been designed and laid out by army engineers, and was—what it was intended to be—a very formidable work; heavily armed, and surrounded by common stretching back for a mile or more to the forests, across which an enemy would have to approach without cover, a circumstance which, in event of attack, would have deprived general Brock of the aid of six hundred Indians under Tecumseh, who would never have approached the fort across the open plain in the face of the artillery on the bastions and curtain walls of this formidable fortress. The total effective force of General Hull was two thousand three hundred officers and men, well supplied with artillery, independent of the guns in advanced batteries.*

The force of Brock consisted of two hundred and thirty British regulars, four hundred Canadian militia, and the six hundred Indians above mentioned, to which was attached a battery of three six-pound and two three-pound guns. Besides this there were in Fort Detroit ammunition, arms and equipments in abundance.

General Brock, with his forces, crossed below Detroit on the morning of August 16, 1812, before dawn and marched up to within a mile of the fort and sent Tecumseh with his Indians by a detour around to the west side, keeping them concealed in the woods. Brock promptly sent in his demand for a surrender, which General Hull accepted, and the Northwestern army was no more.

This army was composed of brave men who were anxious for a fight, yet their reputation and opportunity for destruction were thus basely compromised and surrendered by General Hull without cause or justification.

General Hull was afterward tried by court martial and sentenced to be shot, but was spared on account of former services.

The Government, during General Hull's operations at Detroit, had called for additional troops from Ohio to support him. These were collected at Urbana by Governor Meigs, and among them was the Second brigade of Ohio militia, commanded by General Edward W. Tupper, with Horace Nye as brigade major, both citizens of Washington county. The brigade consisted of one regiment from the eastern part of the State, commanded by Colonel Charles Miller, of Coshocton; one regiment from Gallia and Athens, the county below, commanded by Colonel Robert Safford, of Gallia; and a battalion under command of Major James Galloway, of Xenia, with two companies of scouts of about twenty-five men each—one commanded by Captain Thomas Hinckson, the other by Captain Wood. The whole effective force was about one thousand, until subsequently reduced by sickness.*

At the rapids of the Maumee there had been planted some three hundred acres of corn, in clearings made at that point. About October 30, 1812, General Tupper, being informed of the above fact, through his scouts sent out from Fort McArthur, and having also learned through an Indian interpreter captured by the same scouts, that there was an expedition of some thirty British and five hundred Indians, on the way to secure this corn for the Indians to live on during the winter, he at once resolved to defeat them in their undertaking. A courier was sent to General Winchester, who was lying within forty miles of the cornfields with three thousand men, in order that the general might be on the alert to either drive the enemy back or cut off his retreat. Meanwhile General Tupper determined to proceed at once to the rapids with what force he had—some six hundred effective combatants, with a six-pound gun drawn by six horses. The field-piece was, however, abandoned the second day out from camp, and the carriage broken up; this was about the eighth of November. General Winchester had been notified of the departure of the expedition, of its object, and the length of time the subsistence taken would enable them to stay away from the base of supplies.

When General Tupper arrived at the rapids he found the Maumee so swollen that it was impossible to cross. The scouts reported the enemy on the opposite side some distance from the rapids, and as yet unaware of the approach of Tupper and his command. After an unsuccessful attempt to cross his force he marched down the river until opposite the Indian camp, still undiscovered. Captain Hinckson, however, with nine of his scouts came on to three Indians, who had crossed to the cornfields. Shots were exchanged, killing one Indian and wounding another. The whole Indian encampment was aroused and agitated at once, like a hive of bees that had been disturbed. They dashed up the river for the ford, but upon arrival there found Tupper and his men ready for them. This was not what they expected, and they immediately resorted to their usual Indian strategy of picking off the stragglers. After several hours of desultory firing, the Indians were driven back at every approach, and many of them killed in the water while attempting to recross. They seemed to have quite a number of horses and used them to ferry the warriors over. These horses were afterwards ascertained to be the same captured from General Hull, at Detroit. The rations of the command being exhausted they fell back slowly to Fort Findlay, on the river Auglaize. The Indians did not attempt to follow.

Had General Winchester cooperated with General Tupper, there is no doubt but that the whole detachment of British and Indians would have been either captured or so punished that the subsequent disaster at the river Raisin would not have occurred.* The motive of General Winchester in not seconding this movement was a desire to thwart the plans of General Harrison; at least this is the construction given to his actions by cotemporary writers.

The winter of 1812-13 was a very severe one, and the troops on the frontier suffered greatly, especially from lack of sufficient clothing. The time of most of the brigade was out by the last of February, 1813, and General Tupper and his staff, with the men whose time had expired, were discharged and returned home.

During the War of 1812 Washington county furnished seven companies, some volunteers, some militia, some regulars, to-wit: Captain Sharp, already mentioned as being in the Third regiment, Ohio volunteers, so basely surrendered by Hull at Detroit; Captain Timothy Buell, who went out in May and also in August, 1813. The latter were mounted volunteers. They went to Zanesville; from there to Franklinton, a post situated opposite what has since become Columbus. They went from there to Mansfield, when the emergency at Fort Meigs being over, they returned home.

* The guns surrendered by Hull were as follows: Iron—seven twenty-four-pounders, in water battery; two twenty-four-pounders, on new field carriages; eight twelve-pounders, in and around fort; five nine-pounders, in and around fort; three six-pounders, in and around fort; four twelve-pounders, not mounted. Brass—three six-pounders, at fort; two four-pounders, at fort; one three-pounder, at fort; one eight-inch howitzer, at fort; one five and one-half inch howitzer, at fort; one mortar; total, thirty-eight pieces.

* From Reminiscences by Major Horace Nye.

* General Harrison's order to General Tupper is dated October 4, 1812, and the report of the expedition October 12th; showing that they were out some seven or eight days. The object was partly a reconnaissance in force and partly to surprise any force of the enemy that might have been in the vicinity of the rapids.

Captain John Thorniley's company was made up by draft. They were in the infantry, and formed part of the First regiment of Ohio militia, and were called out in the fall of 1813, and their term of service expired March 13, 1814,* which term included seven days for returning home, one hundred and forty miles. The company was stationed at Fort Stephenson most of the time of their term of service.

Captain Charles Devol's company of dragoons was called out October 20, 1812. They reported for duty, but not being needed were ordered to hold themselves in readiness to march on short notice, which they did until the emergency was over.

Captain James Flagg's company were drafted men called out the same day as Captain Devol's.

October 20, 1812, the following is the captain's journal:

A. D. 1812:

Journal of the First company of militia detached from the First regiment, First brigade and Third division of Ohio militia.

On Tuesday, the twentieth October, the company rendezvoused at Colonel Davis', in Waterford.

On the twenty-first we took up our march at 3 o'clock P. M. and marched seven miles to Stevens.

22d. We marched to the salt works, twenty and one-half miles.

23d. Arrived at Zanesville, ten and one-half miles, where we found good accommodations.

Sunday, November 1st, we took up our march for Mansfield; went three miles and camped.

Monday, 2d, we marched nine and one-half miles.

Tuesday, 3d, to Newark, thirteen miles.

Wednesday, 4th, we camped on Mr. Davis' farm, fifteen miles from Newark—rainy night.

Thursday, 5th, we marched to Mt. Vernon, ten miles, and camped.

Friday, 6th, we marched eight miles and camped—rainy weather.

Saturday, 7th, we marched to Lewis' block-house, fourteen miles—twenty-eight hours steady rain.

Sunday, 8th, lay in camp—rainy day.

Monday, 9th, I went with five of our men to the Indian village called Greentown, where we fell in with the Pennsylvania troops. Very wet and rainy; we got very wet.

Tuesday, 10th, went to look for a lost man; he was not to be found.

Wednesday, 11th, sent a scout of fourteen men to look for the lost man; the man returned about twelve o'clock the third day from camp.

Thursday, 12th, we left Potato camp and marched six miles to Mr. Hill's and camped on the same ground the Pennsylvania troops did.

Friday, 13th, marched to Burns' mill, four miles, and camped within three miles of Mansfield.*

Here the journal ends. The outfit of the company receipts for October 20, 1812, was as follows:

Fifty arms and bayonets, fifty cartridge boxes, one wagon, four set of horse gears, four horses, two tents, two bags, six axes; and at Zanesville they received two more tents, eight pots, two kettles and powder and ball.

In this connection it is curious to note what one ration for a soldier was, to-wit: "One and one-fourth pounds beef, or four and three-fourth pounds salted pork, eighteen ounces of bread or flour, one gill of rum, whiskey or brandy, and at the rate of two quarts of salt, four quarts vinegar, four pounds soap and one pound and a half of candles to every hundred rations;" also what the uniform of a soldier of 1812 was, to-wit: The regulation coat was a "swallow tail," made of dark blue cloth, faced and trimmed with buff, buttons of white metal, with "U. S. A." on them. The hat was a tall bell-crowned affair, with no brim except a small visor in front. To this costume was added the "stock" for the neck, of polished leather, wide enough to fit up snug under the chin.

Captain Alexander Hill's company was recruited principally in Washington county for the regular army in the summer of 1813, and was part of the Nineteenth United States infantry. Captain Hill was, in the fall of 1813, ordered by Colonel George Paul, commanding the regiment and having charge of the recruiting station of Zanesville, to report at that place. Captain Hill after his arrival at Zanesville was ordered to Detroit, arriving there after the battle of the Thames. The company was next ordered back to Zanesville by Colonel Paul, soon after arriving there. Captain Hill was placed in command of a battalion of the Ninth infantry and ordered to report at Fort Erie, in Canada, near the head of the Niagara river, where he arrived before the battle at that place in 1814.

On July 31st the British, under General Drummond, appeared before the fort with about four thousand five hundred men and laid siege. The garrison now began a vigorous use of spades, perfecting the works which were quadrangular in shape. They also constructed some advanced works, in which were placed guns with proper infantry supports. On August 2d the firing from the opposing batteries began which continued until August 15th. General Gaines, having arrived a few days before, was in command at the fort at this time, and on the fourteenth had discovered signs of a new movement in the enemy's camp. He accordingly put his forces in best shape possible for an attack and awaited developments. About two o'clock in the morning, August 14th, the enemy, under Lieutenant Colonel Fisher, thirteen hundred strong, attacked the left, when the Twenty-first regiment, under command of Major Wood, and Towson's battery repulsed them and fell back. The firing had scarcely subsided on the left when Lieutenant Colonel Drummond and Colonel Scott, with fifteen hundred picked men, moved up to the assault on the right. The night was exceedingly dark, but by the commands of the enemy's officers two columns were discovered approaching. Boughton and Hardings' volunteers and the Ninth United States infantry were manning the works on the right, but owing to the unfinished condition of an advanced bastion the enemy carried it and turned the guns on the defenders of the fort. The battle now raged furiously, but by renewed exertion the enemy was driven back and Colonel Scott and Lieutenant Colonel Drummond, the leaders of the assault, killed, but the British still held the captured bastion. The passage from this bastion to the body of the fort was in a great measure closed by the position of the block-house there located. This, though in a ruinous condition at the time, had been occupied the evening before by Lieutenant

*From original furnished by T. P. Flagg, esq., Clayton, Illinois.

Colonel Trimble with a detachment of the Nineteenth infantry, including Captain Oliver Hill's company, whose well-directed fire, at the same time that it galled the enemy severely in the bastion, had completely defeated every attempt he made to penetrate farther.

The column of Colonel Scott being now routed, the guns of the Douglass battery were so directed as to cut off all communication between the contested bastion and the enemy's reserve—and a party of desperate fellows were about to rush in and finish the work, when a spark being communicated by some means to an ammunition chest under the platform, the bastion with those who occupied it were blown into the air together.*

The enemy's loss and that of the National forces in this engagement were estimated at the time as follows: British, two hundred killed and wounded and two hundred prisoners; United States troops, three officers and eight to ten killed and fifteen to twenty wounded.

The British now waited reinforcements and soon received two full regiments, established a new battery, and recommenced the cannonade. This state of things continued until September 17th, when a counter assault was undertaken in two columns, commanded respectively by Generals Porter and Miller. This sortie was well conducted and successful in driving the enemy from his entrenchments. The victorious columns, satisfied with having beaten the enemy in his chosen position, returned within the works of Fort Erie, and four days afterward the British broke camp and retired rapidly down the river, thus ending a siege of fifty-one days.

The victory of Commodore Perry near Put-in-Bay Island, Lake Erie, September 10, 1813, relieved the whole Northwest Territory of the presence of hostile forces. The British and Indians retired to Canada, abandoned Detroit, and but for the urgent demands of Tecumseh would have abandoned the whole of Lower Canada. Tecumseh, however, insisted upon a vigorous resistance to the advance of General Harrison, who pressed close on the retiring enemy.

On October 5, 1813, with what forces the combined efforts of Tecumseh and General Proctor could muster, battle was offered at the Moravian town on the River Thames. General Harrison engaged the enemy with a fine body of Kentucky mounted riflemen who carried confusion and destruction into the ranks of the British, but met with a vigorous resistance from the Indians. The Kentuckians, however, attacked them vigorously, and after a desperate resistance defeated and routed them, killing their celebrated chief, Tecumseh. The theatre of war was from this time on transferred to Niagara frontier and the east, and continued with uniform success to the American arms both on land and sea. The sharpest fighting, however, of the War of 1812, was done on the ocean, and the people of the United States can always refer with pride to that series of brilliant victories won by American seamen, who seemed sent by an avenging Nemesis to redress the long standing grievances and punish Great Britain for her wrong and oppression.

*From Frost's Remarkable Events in the History of America (1848).

The battle of New Orleans was fought January 8, 1815, fifteen days after the treaty of peace was signed at Ghent, the news not arriving until after the battle, presenting one of the anomalies of history, a thing that could not happen at the present day with our great facilities for transmitting information. The Senate confirmed the treaty of Ghent February 17, 1815, and President Madison made proclamation of the fact the following day.

We have said nothing of many important conflicts of the War of 1812, as the scope of this sketch was to give only that part in which troops from Washington county figured; and considering the population of the county at that time, we may say that she did her part nobly and would have done much more had the occasion offered.

COMPANIES FROM WASHINGTON COUNTY.

(Rolls obtained from official files in Washington, D. C.)

Muster-roll of a company of volunteers under the command of John Sharp, captain of a company, under the act of Congress of the sixth of February, 1812, and afterwards under the command of Colonel Lewis Cass:

COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

Captain John Sharp, Lieutenant William Sawyer, Ensign Jacob Trowbridge.

NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

First Sergeant John H. Simon, Second Sergeant Thomas Green, Third Sergeant Chester Wilcox, Fourth Sergeant Otis Record, First Corporal Peter F. Schenck, Second Corporal William Crane, Third Corporal David Miskimens, Fourth Corporal James Elwell, Musician Christian B. Smith.

PRIVATEs.

Joseph Clark, Benjamin Beers, James Mall, Abraham Lyon, David Williams, William Goldsmith, William Lynch, Brazilla Browning, Samuel Null, John Shingler, John Skinner, Alvin Benedict, Samuel Nixon, James Gary, Joseph Rogers, Joseph Knox, John Black, Jacob Nechilow, William Duncan, Harris Ellis, Lewis Frazy, Benjamin Badgeley, Philip Langdon, William Anderson, James T. Downing, Joseph Fox, John Ward, Samuel Murphy, Ezra Kelly, Jabez Tuttle, John T. Robertson, Samuel McMullen.

CAPTAIN JAMES FLAGG'S COMPANY.

Muster-roll of a company of militia commanded by Captain James Flagg; ordered into the service of the United States on the twentieth day of October, 1812, by the authority of his excellency, R. J. Meigs, governor of the State of Ohio, and commanded by Samuel Connel, major commandant.

Commencement of service October 20, 1812, expiration of service January 11, 1813.

COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

Captain James Flagg, Lieutenant Benedict Hutchison, Ensign Nathaniel Olney.

NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

First Sergeant Dora Ford, Second Sergeant John Greenman, Third Sergeant David Trobridge, Fourth Sergeant Peletiah White, First Corporal Jacob Larn, Second Corporal Charles Thomas, Third Corporal Joseph Whilton, Fourth Corporal John Haskel.

PRIVATEs.

Daniel Alpha, George Abbot, James Adams, James Anderson, John Baker, John Barret, Nathan Briton, Seth D. Burbank, Jonah Burchet, Philip Cady, Simeon Chapman, George Castle, William Cline, Daniel Coleman, Henry Coverstone, George Daugherty, Thomas Dennis, Daniel Dunahue, Asa Emerson, James Ewings, Stanton Fordice, James Goodwin, John Gosset, George Harris, Curtis Hinman, James Hutchison, James Hutchins, John Ingles, John Kid, James Knight, Elisha Malery, Nehemiah Morris, Gilbert Otis, Daniel Penny, Richard D. Priest, Pardon Starkes, James B. Walker, James Whitton.

Total officers, eleven; privates, thirty-eight.

We do certify that the said company of infantry were regularly drafted from the militia of the State as a part of her quota, and mustered, and that they served the time specified, and that the muster-roll as it stands is accurate and just.

JAMES FLAGG, Captain.
BENEDICT HUTCHINS, Lieutenant.

I do certify on honor that the said company of infantry was regularly drafted from the militia of this State, that they were commanded by me, and served the full time specified, and that the muster-roll, as it stands, is accurate and just.

SAMUEL CONNELL,
Major Commandant.

FRANKLINGTON, September 19, 1813.

I certify that the company of militia mustered on the within muster-roll were in the service of the United States.

RETURN J. MEIGS,
Governor of Ohio.

A list of names, with rank, in Captain Alexander Hill's company, Nineteenth United States infantry, War of 1812.

COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

Captain Alexander Hill, First Lieutenant Charles L. Cass, Second Lieutenant John Carrel, Third Lieutenant Alexander Patterson, Ensign Nathan Reeves.

NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

First Sergeant John Elliott, Second Sergeant Stephen Worthington, Third Sergeant Allen Lowry, Fourth Sergeant Elijah Adams, Fifth Sergeant Ambrose A. Ford, First Corporal Manna Root, Second Corporal John Franks, Third Corporal William Wallace, Fourth Corporal Daniel Moore, Fifth Corporal Cyrus Bailly, Sixth Corporal John L. Gordon, Musician Christian B. Smith, Musician William Spurgon.

PRIVATES.

James Armstrong, William Arnold, Abraham Badgly, Nichola Bumgarner, James Brooks, John Barker, Adam Bair, John Bowman, Ebenezer Buckley, Jacob Brosius, Thomas Clark, Nathan Cross, Israel Cross, John Cox, Lewis Clapper, Shirley Callogg, Samuel Cooper, Henry Crown, Joseph Dean, Jehu Dealy, Noah Demster, William Elliott, John Fishback, Samuel Fisher, Ira L. Foster, Joseph Fisher, Matthias Gates, John Gates, Jesse Graham, Thomas Grey, James Garner, Joseph Heaton, John Hill, Elisha Heitt, James Hillyard, Samuel Higley, Samuel Henning, John Johnston, David Johnston, W. M. Lockhart, William Lyons, John Lyons, John Loveland, Ephraim Lucas, Jacob Monteith, Samuel Morfoot, William Morgan, John McCombs, Nehemiah Morse, John McMullen, John Mowry, Andrew Millburn, Stephen Mowry, George Osborn, Benjamin Patrick, Hira Pettee, James Prichett, John Potts, Daniel Paine, John Ridingour, William Reynolds, Gabriel Root, John Swift, Oliver Stockings, John D. Smith, John W. Smith, John Stanley, John Silvers, Christian Standsburg, Philip Swagert, Benjamin Snyder, William Syder, William A. Strong, Jesse Spalding, Nicholas Teel, John Taylor, Daniel Trumble.

Total, ninety-three.

Pay roll of a company of Ohio militia, commanded by Captain John Thorniley, of the First regiment of Ohio militia, in the service of the United States, stationed at Fort Stephenson by order of General John S. Gano, commencing January 6, 1814, and expiring March 13, 1814, including seven days for returning home one hundred and forty miles, both days inclusive.

COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

Captain John Thorniley, Lieutenant David Merideth, Ensign Elisha Chapman.

NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

First Sergeant St. Clair Kelly, Second Sergeant Thomas Addy, Third Sergeant Daniel McCleain, Fourth Sergeant Lemuel Cooper, First Corporal Solomon Tise, Second Corporal William Smith, Third Corporal William Henkins, Fourth Corporal Daniel Alpha, Drummer William Magee, Fifer David Cox.

PRIVATES.

John Archer, Jerid Andrew, Jonah Birchett, John Bell, Daniel Booth, Perry G. Banthan, William Bird, Henry Baner, Samuel Barkey, Jesse

Brown, Joel Bennet, Robert Corbit, William Clark, George Cline, Samuel Crouch, Simon Chapman, John Creig, Hezekiah Chapman, John Connet, Abraham Connet, Jonathan Darling, Mathew Davidson, David Edwards, Luke Emerson, Jeremiah Fugate, Abner Furgusen, Ephraim Frost, John Gose, Norman Hart, Thomas Hill, Thomas Hartley, Kertis Henman, George Harris, Benjamin Hepsen, William Jolly, John Kisley, William Kidd, John Lynn, Benjamin Lamb, Thomas Marshall, Joseph T. Milford, Andrew McCleain, Thomas Newal, James Oglesbay, Presseley Petty, William Ramsey, John Ramsey, Thomas Ramsey, Nicholas Row, John Skinner, John Saltingstall, John Smith, Jonathan Sils, Francis Stanley, Zephaniah Tisen, Solomon Tipton, Jacob Vulgermot, Alexander Vaughan, Richard Willis, William Walker, James Riley.

Muster roll of a company of dragoons (of the State of Ohio) commanded by Captain James Devol, called into the service of the United States on the twentieth day of October, 1812, by the authority of his Excellency, Return J. Meigs, governor of the State of Ohio.

COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

Captain Charles Devol, First Lieutenant Josiah Scott, Second Lieutenant Washington Olney.

NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

First Sergeant James White, Fourth Sergeant William White, First Corporal John Clark, Second Corporal Pardon Cook, Third Corporal Samuel Reed.

PRIVATES.

Solomon Brown, Thomas Browning, Movus Finch, Gilbert Olney, Argalus Pixley, John Quigley, Joseph Shuttlesworth, Joshua Tucker, Samuel Whipple, Paulus E. Wood.

"We do acknowledge to have received of Return J. Meigs, jr., esq., the sums annexed to our names respectively, in full for our pay for a tour of duty in Captain Timothy Buell's company of Ohio mounted militia, under the command of his excellency, the governor of Ohio, called into the service of the United States on the first of August, 1813, upon the requisition of Major General Harrison, commanding the Eighth Military district."

COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

Captain Timothy Buell, First Lieutenant Peletiah White, Second Lieutenant Sylvanus Olney.

NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

Ensign James Liggett, First Sergeant Nathaniel Hamilton, Second Sergeant George Nixon, Third Sergeant Jabez Palmer, Fourth Sergeant Salmon D. Buell, First Corporal Samuel Nott, Second Corporal Edward Corner, Third Corporal John Darrough, Fourth Corporal Nicholas Chapman.

PRIVATES.

Timothy Blackmor, Daniel Coleman, John Corns, John C. Clark, Elisha Coleman, Z. Cuddington, Henry Delong, Thomas Dunbar, Richard Demont, Thomas Dennis, Benjamin Ellis, Timothy Gates, jr., Stephen Gates, William — (worn from original), Henry Havens, Zebulon Jennings, Titus Kimball, R. Lawrence, jr., Robert Liggett, John Longhery, William Longhery, Alexander McCoy, Jacob Miller, Robert Magee, John McConnell, Samuel Miller, Jacob Multon, Benjamin F. Palmer, John Perry, John R. Porter, William Brevelt, Horace Quigley, Dennis Raur, James Ray, Clark Springer, John Scott, Nathaniel Smith, John Taylor, Jonathan Wilson, Jonathan Whitney, Pollice E. Wood.

Captain Buell was out in May, 1813, with a company, as has been mentioned, but the rolls of the company have not been preserved, and can not be found at Washington, as will be seen by the following letter from the Third Auditor:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
THIRD AUDITOR'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, March 31, 1881. }

SIR: In reply to your letter of the twenty-eighth instant, herewith returned, I have to inform you that Captain Timothy Buell has no other service in the Ohio militia, War of 1812, than that which has already been furnished you.

Respectfully,
E. W. KNIGHTLY,
Auditor.

S. J. HATHAWAY, ESQ., Marietta, Ohio.

Pay roll of a detachment of Ohio militia, commanded by Lieutenant John Devault, of Colonel McDonald's regiment, late in the service of the United States, from the thirty-first of January, 1815, commencement of service, to the tenth of April, 1815, expiration of service, or of this settlement:

COMMISSIONED OFFICER.

Lieutenant John Devault.

NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

Sergeant Levi Bevington, Corporal James Playwell.

PRIVATES.

Henry Aye, George Chadd, Ephraim Doty, William Harrison, Philip Hobaugh, John Harter, Benjamin Long, Robert Mitchell, Samuel Moore, Benjamin Neely, George Rhodes, Richard Shacles, John Sanders, Ezra Travis, David Thompson, Caleb Wright, Morris Yates.

Pay roll of a company of Ohio militia, commanded by Lieutenant John Devault, of Colonel James Stuart's regiment, late in the service of the United States, from the twenty-sixth of July, 1813, commencement of service, to the sixteenth of August, 1813, on expiration of service or of this settlement:

COMMISSIONED OFFICER.

Lieutenant John Devault.

NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

Second Sergeant Isaac House, Third Sergeant Thomas Devault, Second Corporal Gilbert Hurley, Third Corporal Morris Baker.

PRIVATES.

William Hurley, Jacob Dunkle, John Collender, Benjamin Roebuck, William Dyer, William Kerr, Joseph Ohaner, David Hays, Daniel Sharrot, Oliver Kyle, Joseph Windle, George Roebuck.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES OF OFFICERS, WAR OF 1812.

GENERAL EDWARD W. TUPPER.

Edward W. Tupper, son of General Benjamin Tupper, an officer in the Revolutionary army, was born in Chesterfield, Hampshire county, Massachusetts, in 1771. His father was an officer of the Revolution, from the commencement of the war, in 1775, until its close, in 1788. The subject of this notice was, at the opening of this war, only four years old. His father, with several other families, came to Marietta in August, 1788. These were the first families who came to Marietta. Edward W. Tupper was then seventeen years of age. He was in Campus Martius during the Indian war, and began his business life at its close.

At the organization of the State government, in 1803, he was appointed clerk of the court of common pleas, and of the supreme court, for Washington county, which offices he continued to hold until he left Marietta. At an early period he opened a store for the sale of general merchandise, at the corner of Second and Putnam streets, Marietta. In 1802 he established a ship-yard at the foot of Putnam street, and built the brig Orlando.

This vessel went out under command of Captain Matthew Miner, with Anselem Tupper for second officer, in 1804. The Orlando was at New Orleans July 4, 1804, at the time of the first celebration of that day after Louisiana was ceded to the United States. She made her first voyage to the Mediterranean and Black sea, as far as Trieste on the latter.

In 1807 Edward Tupper built two gun-boats, under contract with the United States Government.

In 1803 he built the house well known as the residence of the late Nahum Ward, and, since that, of his son, William S. Ward. This property he held until after he left Marietta, and sold it to Mr. Ward. It was occupied, for some years, by General Joseph Wilcox and his family.

On the third of May, 1804, Mr. Tupper married Mrs. Bethia S. Putnam, widow of Dr. William Pitt Putnam—who was a brother of the late David Putnam, of Harmar. The house built by him, in 1803, was their residence while they remained in Marietta. In 1809 or 1810, he removed to Gallipolis. He was one of the most prominent and useful men of the place, and he had few superiors in southeast Ohio. He represented Gallia county in the legislature for several terms. Some time, before leaving Marietta, he had been elected to the office of brigadier general of militia, of the counties of Washington, Athens, and Gallia.

Soon after the commencement of the War of 1812, Governor Meigs made a requisition for a brigade to be raised in this division, composed of counties along the southern and western portion of the State. This brigade was organized at Urbana in August, 1812, and the command of it was assigned to General Tupper—he being the oldest brigadier general in the division. The surrender of the army under Hull prevented this brigade from advancing beyond McArthur's block-house, where they went into camp, and where they remained for a considerable part of the following winter. In January, 1813, General Tupper learned that the British and Indians were collecting their forces at the foot of the rapids of the Maumee, to carry away a quantity of corn which had been left standing during the winter. He immediately made preparations for driving them away. Many of his men were unfit for duty, but he called for volunteers from among those fit for service to go on the expedition to the rapids. About six hundred responded, and a forced march of several days was made to the Maumee, through the Black swamp, then frozen over. On arriving at the rapids the river was found to be so high that it was not possible to get the troops over in condition to make an attack. Only about two companies passed over, and these found their ammunition so wet that they had to withdraw. It became necessary, therefore, for the troops to fall back a short distance, for the purpose of drying their clothes and their ammunition. Next morning, however, all were fit for active duty; meantime, the Indians, having learned of the approach of our troops, marched up towards the rapids, on horseback, for the purpose of making an attack. They attempted to cross the river with a large force, but were driven back by our troops with considerable loss. The British and Indians retreated, and abandoned the corn, which was afterwards used by General Harrison's army. Our troops lost no men, but some few stragglers from the ranks, who were killed by Indians. None of the troops of this brigade were from Washington county, except Horace Nye, brigade major. They returned to Camp McArthur after an absence of four days. In February, 1813, the brigade was advanced to Fort Meigs, where it was under command of General Harrison. About the first of March, 1813, their term expired, and they were mustered out of service. The following is a copy of the letter discharging General Tupper and his command:

"HEADQUARTERS CAMP MEIGS, }
MIAMI RAPIDS, 21st Feb'y, 1813. }

"Dear Sir:

"The term of service for which the greater part of your brigade was engaged having expired, and the remaining part not forming a command even for a field officer, you will be pleased to consider yourself and them discharged as soon as they arrive at Urbana. On your way to the latter place, and whilst there, you will be pleased to give such directions with regard to the troops and public property as you may deem proper. I cannot take my leave of you without expressing my sense of zeal and ability with which you have discharged your duty in every instance whilst acting under my orders, and my wishes for your health and happiness.

"With great respect, I am

"Your obedient servant,

"WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON.

"Brigadier General Edward W. Tupper."

In September, 1813, General Tupper, then senior brigadier general, organized a regiment of drafted men at Zanesville, which went out under command of Colonel Bay, of Guernsey county. One company of this regiment was from Washington county, and was commanded by Captain John Thorniley.

After the war General Tupper continued to reside at Gallipolis until his death in September, 1823. Mrs. Tupper died in 1858.

CAPTAIN JOHN SHARP.

The subject of this sketch was born in 1771, at a place in Pennsylvania, then known as the "Burnt Cabins." He came to Washington county about the year 1800, settled on the Little Muskingum, in Lawrence township, near where the townships of Marietta, Newport, and Lawrence, have their corner.

He was of large stature and inclined to corpulency, and was a man of force and influence in the affairs of Washington county, in his time.

When the call for volunteers came in the spring of 1812, Captain Sharp raised a company and joined Colonel Cass' regiment when he passed from Zanesville down the Muskingum and Ohio to Cincinnati. The troops lay over at Marietta one day, were received by the citizens with an artillery salute and other demonstrations of public approval. They took on board Captain Sharp's company, and on April 25, 1812, proceeded on to Cincinnati. They were transported in keel-boats. This regiment was the Third Ohio volunteer infantry, army of Ohio.

After participating in the hardships and fatigues of the march to the rapids of the Maumee, Captain Sharp was there detailed, for what purpose is not known, probably to command the escort, to go on board a schooner laden with the sick, baggage of the officers and army stores of General Hull's army. The schooner was accompanied by a boat also loaded with army stores. This was to facilitate the march of the army, which was hastening forward to occupy Detroit. Dr. James Reynolds, surgeon's mate of the army of Ohio, was in charge of the schooner and boat, but took up his quarters on the boat. They sailed July 1, 1812, from the mouth of the Maumee for Detroit, but in passing Malden the schooner was captured by the British, with all on board, including Captain John Sharp, Lewis Dent, paymaster, a lieutenant of the Fourth United States infantry, and about fifty soldiers. The boat escaped. They were afterwards exchanged, and Captain Sharp arrived home soon after the surrender of Hull, and it may be said of this affair of the schooner that it saved the officers and men on board the disgrace of being surrendered by General Hull.

Captain Sharp was chosen senator from Washington county for 1808, representative for 1814, senator again for 1815 and 1816. He was for some years one of the judges of the county court. He died very suddenly in 1823.

CAPTAIN JAMES FLAGG.

James Flagg was born near Springfield, Massachusetts, May 17, 1779, and came to this county about 1790. December 4, 1803, he was married to Sarah Corner. They settled near Cornersville, in Washington county, where he followed his trade of blacksmithing, until the breaking out of the war with Great Britain, at which time he was captain of a company of militia.

Captain Flagg was designated to command a company for active service October 15, 1812, and started for the field October 20th of the same year, for a term of service of six months, but was honorably discharged January 13, 1813. He filled the office of magistrate in the county for many years. His children were: Edna P., wife of Silas Richardson; William C., who married Valeria Hays; Gersham Flagg, who married — Cislser; Thomas P., who married Sarah Corner; Susan Flagg, wife of David Racer; Catharine Flagg, wife of James Rood; Sarah Flagg, wife of Marian Rood; Mary E., wife of John Corner. Captain Flagg's sister, Cynthia, was the wife of Joseph Kelley and mother of Mrs. Levi Barber, of Harmar, Ohio. Captain James Flagg died in 1854, at Cornersville, in this county, respected and honored by his acquaintances and friends.

CAPTAIN JOHN THORNILEY.

The subject of this sketch was born in England July 17, 1781, and came to this country April, 1795. The means of conveyance were at that early day limited, especially through the western wilds and over the Alleghanies. He, with his father and the family, walked to Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, where they built boats, and came down the Ohio river to Marietta, after being six months on the way. They settled near the Little Muskingum in Marietta township of this county. When the war with Great Britain broke out in 1812, Captain Thorniley commanded a company of militia, and was assigned to the command of a company of drafted men called out in the fall of 1813. His company was in the second battalion of the First regiment of the First brigade, Third division Ohio, militia, and was stationed at Fort Stephenson, Captain Thorniley commandant, Lower Sandusky.

Captain Thorniley was married July 12, 1810, to Mary Compton. He died August, 1844. The names of his children are as follows: William, Mary, Ann, Thomas, John, James, George, Caleb, Elizabeth, Harriet, and Adaline Thorniley.

CAPTAIN ALEXANDER HILL.

He was of Scotch-Irish descent, and was born February 28, 1777, in the County of Antrim, Ireland, near Belfast, and landed at Philadelphia in 1784. His parents were strict Scotch Presbyterians, and Captain Hill doubtless owed much of his success in life to the wholesome training of his youth. Force of circumstances put him in the way of learning the cabinetmaker's trade, though his tastes strongly impelled him to a seafaring life.

Captain Hill started from Pittsburgh with an English emigrant named Alcock, in canoes lashed together, expecting to have gone to New Orleans and shipped as a sailor at that point, but on arriving at Marietta, in 1798, he found it inadvisable to proceed further without more money than he possessed. He, therefore, plied his trade at Marietta, and soon found that the demand for furniture to supply the new settlers was increasing, and offering opportunities for active and profitable business in that line. He established the first furniture factory in that county, and the cabinetmaker of those days was also the undertaker, and Captain Hill constructed the first coffin that was placed in Mound cemetery.

Captain Hill was married in 1801 to Sarah Foster, daughter of Ephraim Foster, a Revolutionary soldier.

Captain Hill now became prosperous, and the idea of going to sea was abandoned. He was accustomed to load a boat (one of the old time "broad horns") every year with furniture for the southern market, generally going to New Orleans, and either walking back or going around by sea to Philadelphia, and thence across the mountains in a wagon train. On one of these trips south the broad-horn had just reached New Madrid, Missouri, at the time of the great earthquake, which occurred in that country in 1811, and it was with much difficulty that the boat was rescued from destruction.

At the breaking out of the war with Great Britain Captain Hill was a major in the State militia. In the spring of 1813 he received a commission as captain in the Twenty-seventh United States infantry, and on April 22, 1813, he advertised for recruits in the counties of Washington, Athens, and Gallia. He was ordered with his men to Zanesville, and the Twenty-sixth and Twenty-seventh regiments were consolidated, and the Nineteenth United States infantry formed out of the two.

Captain Hill, in the fall of 1813, was ordered to Detroit, and is said to have been placed in command of Malden. He was ordered from there to Zanesville, and from there to Fort Erie. He took part in the battle and siege of that fort, his company being stationed on the right in a block-house, from which they maintained a destructive fire on the enemy, who had captured an outlying work, but could not hold it. The battalion of the Nineteenth infantry, in this battle, was commanded by Major Trimble, and the garrison and post by General Gaines.

Soon after his return from the war Captain Hill was summoned to New York to attend a court-martial. Meeting General Gaines there he asked the general what he thought of the conduct of his men, seeing that it was the first time many of them had been in battle. "Why, sir," said General Gaines, "I could not have expected better service from veterans."

Upon his return from the war, his term of enlistment being for one year, he opened a tavern in Marietta, under the "Sign of the Swan." Captain Hill was elected sheriff of Washington county as the successor of Captain Buell in 1815.

Captain Hill kept tavern until 1827, when, owing to the prevalence of the use of spirituous liquor and necessity almost of keeping a bar if he kept hotel, he decided rather than do it to quit, and accordingly, with his own hand, sawed down his sign-post and closed the tavern. His Scotch Presbyterian training was stronger than the greed for gain. The furniture business was not neglected during these years, but kept up, and when the market would justify it, a boat was loaded for the south, and the outcome was uniformly profitable until the fall of 1836, when he entered into a contract with the State to build the dam and one-half the canal at Lowell, the State being engaged at that time in providing slack water navigation for the Muskingum river; but Captain Hill died in February, 1841, before the work was completed, leaving his heirs to finish the contract, the consideration of which was eighty-five thousand dollars. This money enabled the heirs to settle the estate and pay the debts of Captain Hill, who had become somewhat embarrassed, financially.

Captain Hill was of temperate and exemplary habits, and considering the extent and character of his public services, had very few enemies. He had seven sons and two daughters; one son and daughter died in childhood. Ephraim Hill died of the prevailing fever in 1823, aged nineteen years. The remaining children all grew up to mature age. They were John, Hugh, Jessie, Hiram A., Daniel Y., and Eliza Hill.

Eliza Hill was married to Spencer T. Bukey, June, 1835. He was a son of Hezekiah Bukey, a pioneer who settled on and owned a tract of land in Virginia, nearly opposite to Marietta. The children of Spencer T. Bukey were Van H., Alexander H., John, Joseph T., and Sarah Bukey.

Wallace Hill, son of John Hill, was lieutenant of company B, Eighteenth Ohio volunteer militia, for the three months' service, April, 1861. Alexander H. Bukey, son of Spencer T. Bukey, was a private in the same company; also served as commandant of a gun in Buell's battery during the war. Subsequently Wallace Hill was lieutenant in company C, First West Virginia light artillery, familiarly known as Buell's Pierpoint battery, command by Captain Frank Buell, and after the death of Captain Frank Buell, at the battle of Freeman's Ford, August 22, 1862, Wallace Hill became captain of the battery, and so continued during the remainder of the war.

Frank Hill, son of Hiram A. Hill, born 1847, was appointed third sergeant of company A, One Hundred and Forty-eighth Ohio National guards, Samuel S. Knowles, captain, and on July 23, 1864, was appointed commissary sergeant of the regiment.

Ephraim A. Hill, son of Daniel Y. Hill, served three months in company A, Eighty-seventh Ohio volunteer infantry, and returning enlisted in battery K, Second Ohio heavy artillery, and served until April 15, 1865, when he died at Knoxville, Tennessee.

Alexander Hill, son of John Hill, served in the same company Van H. Bukey enlisted in—the Eleventh West Virginia infantry—October 16, 1861; was commissioned first lieutenant February, 1862; captain August, 1862; major March, 1863; lieutenant colonel August, 1863, colonel November, 1864; Brigadier general, by brevet, May, 1865.

John Bukey enlisted in company D, Eleventh West Virginia infantry, and was promoted from sergeant, orderly, second lieutenant, to first lieutenant in January, 1865.

Joseph T. Bukey enlisted as a musician in company D, Eleventh West Virginia infantry, and was afterwards drum major of the regiment. In 1866 he enlisted for three years in company A, First United States dragoons; served his term on the Pacific slope, and then reenlisted in the Twenty-second United States infantry, and was accidentally drowned at Sitka, Alaska, May 12, 1872.

CAPTAIN TIMOTHY BUELL.

He was born October 18, 1768, at Killingworth, now Clinton, Connecticut, son of David Buell, of same place; came to Ohio June 15, 1789, and settled at Cincinnati, Ohio, where he is said to have built the first brick house in that city. Wishing to live near his friends and relatives, who had settled in Washington county, he returned to Marietta. When the conspiracy of Aaron Burr began to attract public attention, in 1806, the President of the United States sent out a confidential agent to Marietta to ascertain the true situation and relations between Burr, Blennerhasset, and the expedition then being fitted out. This agent became convinced, from what he saw, that the enterprise of Burr and Blennerhasset, if not treasonable, was at least alarming. He therefore went to Chillicothe, and laid the matter before the Ohio legislature, then in session; and on the second of December procured an act to be passed, "authorizing the governor to call out the militia on his warrant to any sheriff or militia officer, with power to arrest boats on the Ohio river, or men supposed to be engaged in this expedition, who might be held to bail in the sum of fifty thousand dollars, or imprisoned, and the boats confiscated." Under this act a company of militia was called out, with orders to capture and detain the boats (which were being built about six miles above Marietta, on the Muskingum), and the provisions, with all others descending the Ohio under suspicious circumstances. This force was placed under command of Captain Timothy Buell. One six-pound gun was placed in a battery on the river bank at Marietta, and pickets disposed at proper places along the shores to watch the river and give the alarm if any persons attempted to pass with the suspected boats. The dispositions of Captain Buell resulted in the capture of all but one of Mr. Blennerhasset's boats, which escaped during a very dark night.

After General Hull's surrender, the British and Indians began to move southward from Detroit and infest the territory opened up by their victory, and in the spring of 1813 they gathered in force and laid siege to Fort Meigs, situated at the rapids of the Maumee. General Harrison immediately made a requisition on Ohio for troops, and Governor Meigs called for mounted volunteers to hasten to the relief of the beleaguered garrison. Captain Buell immediately raised a company of mounted men, and on May 12, 1813, left Marietta for the rapids. Captain Robert C. Barton, who was highly spoken of in the battle of Tippecanoe, was lieutenant, and Manly Morse, ensign. After being some days on the march, they were met with instructions to return, as the enemy had retreated. Over four thousand mounted men, in Ohio, turned out under this call, and all but a few were sent back. Governor Meigs arrived at his home in Marietta (the same now owned by Hon. M. D. Follett) about the last of May, and Captain Buell, on arriving at Marietta, drew up his men in front of the governor's house and tendered their services for any expedition he might direct. The governor responded in very complimentary terms as to their promptness and patriotism in going to the relief of Fort Meigs. He observed that he was the more gratified at their demonstration of zeal in their country's cause, as it was the first specimen of public military spirit which had been exhibited in the county of Washington since the commencement of the war. That henceforth he augured a revival of a redeeming spirit of military energy worthy of the county which bears the name of the illustrious Father of his Country. To those gentlemen who had aided the company in equipments he returned his sincerest thanks. Of those who had endeavored to discountenance the expedition, he observed that such merited, what they must eventually receive, the contempt of all honorable men. The company was then honorably discharged.

On August 1, 1813, to meet a similar emergency at Fort Meigs, the mounted volunteers were again called upon, and they responded with the same readiness. Captain Buell gathered another company and went to the front, but before they had arrived at the scene of action the British and Indians had fled, and an order from General Harrison gave them his thanks and an "honorable discharge." This was the last demonstration of the British and their allies in the northwest. The victory of Commodore Perry, in September, 1813, compelled them to retire to Canada.

Captain Timothy Buell and Alexander McConnell were elected to represent the district composed of Morgan and Washington counties in the nineteenth general assembly, 1820, and Captain Buell and William M. Dawes to represent the same district in the twentieth general assembly. Captain Buell was sheriff of the county for several years, being succeeded in that office by Captain Alexander Hill, in 1815. He was also a magistrate for many years. Died February 6, 1837.

Captain Buell was the brother of General Joseph Buell, and grandfather, on the maternal side, of Major General Don Carlos Buell. His children were: Eliza Buell, born at Marietta August 22, 1798, died August 3, 1823; Joseph H. Buell, born October 20, 1812; William Plummer Buell, born June 18, 1815; Milo M. Buell, born September 18, 1817; Hiram B. Buell, born in 1824; George D. Buell, born in 1826; and Columbia Buell, born in 1828. Of these, Eliza married Hon. Salmon D. Buell, April 9, 1816, who was son of Hon. Salmon Buell, of Ithica, New York. Their children were: General Don Carlos Buell, born near Marietta, March 23, 1818; Sally M. Buell, born near Marietta, February 26, 1820; and Aurelia A. Buell, born near Marietta, February 27, 1822, wife of Hon. William F. Curtis, of Marietta.

LIEUTENANT TIMOTHY E. DANIELSON.

There is a degree of sadness connected with the life of this young officer who came to Marietta about the year 1804, from Brimfield, Connecticut. His father was General Timothy Danielson, of Union, Connecticut, who died in 1791. The widow (his mother), Eliza Danielson, married Hon. William Eaton, of Brimfield, Connecticut, August 21, 1872.

Mr. Eaton had been for many years connected with the diplomatic service of the United States, and stationed in the Barbary States.

Upon his return to this country in 1803, he had promised young Timothy a position in his suite when he should return. Mr. Eaton however changed his mind, and took out a younger brother, Mr. E. E. Danielson.*

This was a great disappointment to Timothy E. Danielson, and he left home for the west, arriving at Marietta shortly after the departure of his stepfather in 1804.

Great care and attention had been given to the education of the children of Mrs. Danielson, both by General Danielson and Mr. Eaton, and young Danielson turned his training to account by teaching school in Marietta for several years.

At the opening of the War of 1812, Danielson was commissioned as lieutenant in the regular army, and July 29, 1812, he advertised for recruits—headquarters at Marietta. The recruits were taken for either three or five years. With what men he could raise he left for the front, and entered the Seventeenth United States infantry. He was taken with malarial fever, and died December 21, 1812, at Fort Winchester.

We have the following notice of his death: Died at Fort Winchester December 21, 1812, after a long illness which he bore like a soldier, Lieutenant Timothy E. Danielson, of the Seventeenth United States regiment.†

Caleb Emerson was appointed his administrator, and among his effects was a large assortment of law books, medical works and a general assortment of other works.

* He was afterwards, upon his return to this country, killed in a duel with a naval officer.

† Western Spectator, January 23, 1813.

MAJOR HORACE NYE.

Horace Nye came to Ohio when a child, August, 1788, with his father, Colonel Ichabod Nye. From that time until his death Ohio was his home, and until 1813 his residence was Marietta.

He was the grandson of General Benjamin Tupper, a soldier, and the son of Colonel Nye, also a soldier, and was surrounded by men who put themselves under strict military discipline during the Indian war, while living in Campus Martius. Thus he became a soldier himself, and was all through life noted for his military bearing and soldierly qualities.

Though but a child, he shared in the privations and hardships and dangers of the garrison, and at an early age began to share in the toils, and to form habits of endurance and energy.

His life was coeval with the first settlement of the State, and the history and experience of its tragic scenes and patient toils and heroic sufferings were as familiar to him as household words.

He furnished many facts from memory to the historian, and published some valuable sketches of early times. In the summer of 1812 he was called into the service of his country as brigade major, in General E. W. Tupper's brigade of Ohio militia. This brigade was composed of troops mostly from southern Ohio, and was called into service shortly before the surrender of General Hull at Detroit. The men were ordered to the frontier—Ohio then being a frontier State—and spent most of the winter near Urbana and McArthur's block-house. They suffered much from bad quarters, bad food, poor clothing and the severity of the winter. Later they were advanced to Fort Meigs, where they remained until their return of service expired. The service rendered was important and severe. Major Nye returned home in the spring of 1813, and during the following summer engaged successfully in business in Putnam, Ohio.

Few men ever lived who have established a better character for uprightness of purpose and unbending integrity. He scorned the idea of bending his principles to expediency or of smothering his honest convictions. He was a reader, a thinker and a keen observer of men. For thirty years he was a member of the Presbyterian church, and to know the right was with him to do it. Always the friend of the slave he was an advocate of immediate emancipation.

In 1835 his life and property were threatened by a Zanesville mob. There was a little band of Abolitionists in Putnam, of which he was one, and when the mob threatened to burn the town, he saw no reason to change his views, but armed himself under the authority of the mayor, and purposed to fire at the word of command. He would have braved the dungeon or the stake in defence of the inalienable rights of man.

He was born at Chesterfield, Massachusetts, June 8, 1786, and died at Putnam, Ohio, February 15, 1859.

CAPTAIN JASON R. CURTIS.

Jason R. Curtis was born in 1785 at Warren, Litchfield county, Connecticut, removed to Marietta in 1792, and married Mary Clark, daughter of Major John Clark. Captain Curtis served during the War of 1812, as aid-de-camp of Governor R. J. Meigs, with the rank of captain. Jason R. Curtis, father of Hon. William F. Curtis, died in Marietta September 12, 1834.

CAPTAIN ROBERT C. BARTON.

Robert C. Barton came to Marietta during the War of 1812. We have not been able to obtain any facts as to him, except that he commanded a company under General Harrison at the battle of Tippecanoe, and was mentioned by General Harrison in his report of that battle for gallant conduct. He was afterwards, during the same war, first lieutenant under Captain Timothy Buell in a company of mounted volunteers, and was also on duty with Governor Meigs, probably as aid-de-camp.

CHAPTER XVII.

WAR OF THE REBELLION.

Causes of the War—Leaders North and South, Political Campaign of 1860—Position of the People of Washington County as to the War—Public Meeting January 8, 1861—Progress of Public Sentiment—View of the Country April, 1861—War Begun at Sumter—Call of the President for Troops—The "Union Blues"—Ceremonies on Departure of First Company—The Beverly Company—Militia System of Ohio—Preparing for Invasion—Appeal to the Governor for Aid—Arrival of Colonel Barnett's Artillery—Camp Putnam Established—The Military Situation—Governor Dennison's Plan of a Campaign Successful—McClellan's Communications—Battle of Bull Run—Romance no more, but Dead Reality—New Policy Inaugured—Call for Five Hundred Thousand Men for Three Years—Hon. William P. Cutler's Offer—Thirty-sixth Regiment—First Three Years Company—Groesbeck's (Thirty-ninth) Regiment—Company L, First Ohio Volunteer Corps—Buell's, De Beck's and Huntington's Batteries—Seventy-seventh Regiment—Sixty-third Regiment—Camp Tupper Established—Military Committee Appointed—Close of the Year 1861—Beginning of Governor Tod's Administration—First Volunteer Killed in Battle—"Shiloh"—Washington City Threatened—The "Putnam Guards"—Organization of the Ninety-second Regiment—Parkersburgh in Danger—The Draft—Camp Marietta Established—Battles of South Mountain and Antietam—Death of Colonel Melvin Clarke—Battle of Corinth—Organization of Company H (the "Newton Guards")—Seventh Cavalry Alarm along the Border—Military Strength of Marietta—Close of 1862.

THE WAR OF THE REBELLION—INTRODUCTORY.

Reader, let us stand together on a crest of the Alleghanies, commanding a splendid prospect to the westward. It is a bright clear day in September, the year 1788. Here lies the course of the wagons of the mountains up from the east and down to the west, the grand thoroughfare of emigration, now scarcely begun westward. We see spread out before us a grand expanse of forest and stream. In the far distance from north to south is the Mississippi river. On the hither side, like a silver thread from northeast to southwest, winds the Ohio river. On the north, like burnished shields, lie the great lakes Erie, Huron, Michigan and Superior, and spread out between these bounds, like an open scroll, lies the Northwest Territory. The pleasing fancy cherished so long in Connecticut and Virginia that those old commonwealths owned strips of country from the Atlantic westward to the South sea, or more familiarly the Pacific, have been exploded and abandoned, and the claims of those States in the Northwest Territory formally released.

Look at the vast expanse of forest in the foreground, undulating like the green waves of the ocean and traversed by silvery streams flowing to the Ohio or to the lakes. Westward in the far distance the country breaks away from the forests and spreads out into broad savannahs, studded with groves, and beyond the eye detects the sheen of the Father of Waters.

This vast domain possesses the finest climate of the continent. In a similar climate the human race attains its highest development. Neither too hot or too cold, but finely tempered as a Damascus blade. Mother of energy, endurance, enterprise and civilization, this beautiful land lying before us will certainly be fruitful and productive. Vast in extent, encumbered by the finest timber, the growth of centuries, it is now a wilderness. The primeval forest clothes it like a garment. The great valley of the Ohio falls away to the southwest with nothing to disturb its placid stillness but here and there an Indian guiding his rude canoe.

Excepting a few settlements on the hither side of the Ohio river, the whole is one vast solitude—but hold, there at the junction of the Ohio and Muskingum, the blue smoke curls up, and a clearing appears. The white man has come to take possession, and he has come to stay; now through the aisles of the stately forest is heard the woodman's axe. The Indian pauses on the trail while hunting the bear, the deer, or the wild turkey, to listen; and he creeps through the thicket to obtain a view of the newcomers, who are soon to dispossess him and bring a nobler race to take possession. But, reader, think not these fertile acres, fraught with such great possibilities, have been overlooked and forgotten.

This settlement is but the result of a cause that went before. That cause was as subtle in its results as the falling dew or gentle rain, and came as silently. Every inch of land, from the great lakes on the north to the Ohio on the south, is held as firmly as though caught by hooks of steel, and every man, woman and child destined to be born in and to occupy and cultivate this land can not, if they would, escape its influence. The Ordinance of 1787, the second great charter of American progress and liberty, has silently gone into possession. Law, enthroned in a temple built without hands, has assumed sovereignty over a vast domain, having as yet but few occupiers, but waiting for the teeming millions of the future. "Law it is," as the Hindoo says, "which is without name or color, or hands or feet, which is the smallest of the least and the largest of the large; all, and knowing all things; which hears without ears, sees without eyes, moves without feet, and seizes without hands."

Let us now turn to the southward, there lie Virginia and Kentucky soon to be settled from eastern Virginia and the Carolinas by a brave and hardy race, but wedded to the institution of human slavery. There is but the narrow Ohio between the north land and the south, yet even at this early date the forerunners of the race to come are separated very widely in sentiment by the institution referred to. And their children shall grow up with the cherished sentiments of their parents, instilled into their minds at their mothers' knee, to be intensified by each political contest, and confirmed as time advances in their various opinions. Time will show to what dread extent two great contending ideas will carry the sections. Oh! pine on the crest of storm swept Alleghany sigh, and ye mothers in the far off clearings weep for the evil days to come, and that so fair a patrimony should be destined to witness so fierce a struggle between such noble men, children of a common brotherhood,

When this soft turf, that rivulets sands,
Were trampled by a hurrying crowd,
And fiery hearts and armed hands
Encountered in the battle-cloud.

Ah! never shall the land forget
How gushed the life-blood of her brave—
Gushed, warm with hope and courage yet,
Upon the soil they fought to save.

It is necessary in writing the military history of the first county and oldest settlement in the Northwest Territory to bring prominently to the front that great ordinance which has so largely shaped the destinies of the populous commonwealths of Ohio, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin, especially as that ordinance contained the germinal cause that made the States named to go with the Government, when the crisis of revolution came. Let us therefore examine very briefly that part of the ordinance which pertains to the subject in hand—the cause of the War of the Rebellion. That it was no sudden growth all will readily admit. The men, south of the Ohio and north of the same, were generally of a common origin, Amerians all. It will not do to say that these States would have gone with the North in 1861, had there never been such an ordinance as the one referred to. Indiana, Illinois, and Ohio, at least, could have been slave States as easily and consistently as Virginia and Kentucky, having substantially the same climate, the same products and therefore the same demand for slave labor; but the fundamental law governing the territory, out of which all these States were erected, prohibited slavery, and thus each State constitution contained a clause of similar prohibition.

The article of the ordinance referred to is as follows:

ARTICLE 6. There shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the said Territory otherwise than in punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted: provided always that any person escaping into the same from whom labor or service is lawfully claimed in any one of the original States, such fugitive may be lawfully reclaimed and conveyed to the person claiming his or her labor or service, as aforesaid.

The Jeffersonian ordinance of 1784 providing for the government of Kentucky and the Southwest, contained nothing in regard to slavery; an amendment had been offered, putting an end to the peculiar institution after the year 1800, but failed of passage by one vote, the delegate of one State, New Jersey being temporarily absent. On what a slender thread often hang the destinies of millions! The Resolutions of 1798 as passed by the Kentucky legislature were preeminently a State Rights document. They were a natural outgrowth of the doctrine of slavery; and as that institution increased so did the States Rights heresy.

We quote the first resolution which is a sample of all the others:

RESOLVED, That the several States composing the United States of America are not united on the principle of unlimited submission to their General Government, but that by a compact under the style and title of a Constitution of the United States, and of amendments thereto, they constituted a General Government for special purposes—delegated to that Government certain definite powers, reserving, each State to itself, the residuary mass of right to their own self-government; and that whensoever the General Government assumes undelegated powers, its acts are unauthorized, void, and of no force; that to this compact each State acceded as a State, and as an integral party, its co-States forming, as to itself, the other party; that the Government, created by this compact, was not made the exclusive or final judge of the extent of the powers delegated to itself; since that would have made its discretion, and not the constitution, the measure of its power; but that as in all other cases of compact among powers having no common judge, each party has an equal right to judge for itself, as well of infractions, as of the mode and measure of redress.

Similar resolutions were passed by the legislature of Virginia the year following. They were afterwards repeated, but not until they had largely sown the seed of rebellion and revolution.

MAJ. GEN. DON CARLOS BUELL.

In the earlier days of the Republic the great question of slavery, and especially of States Rights, had already been formulated and stated in terms that were not materially altered during all the great political contests that followed.

Patrick Henry, June 4, 1788, in the Virginia convention called to ratify the new constitution of the United States, said:

"That this is a consolidated government is demonstrably clear; and the danger of such a government is, to my mind, very striking. I have the highest veneration for those gentlemen (the framers of the constitution); but, sir, give me leave to demand, 'What right had they to say We, the people? My political curiosity, exclusive of my anxious solicitude for the public welfare, leads me to ask who authorized them to say, We, the people, instead of we the States? States are the characteristics and the soul of a confederation. If the States be not the agents of this compact, it must be one great, consolidated National government of the people of all the States. . . . I need not take much pains to show that the principles of this system are extremely pernicious, impolitic and dangerous."

Washington, in his Farewell Address, said:

"Citizens by birth or choice of a common country, that country has a right to concentrate your affections. The name of American, which belongs to you in your National capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism more than any appellation derived from local discriminations."

Alexander Hamilton, June 18, 1787, in the debate on the new constitution, said:

"The general power, whatever be its form, if it preserves itself, must swallow up the State governments, otherwise it would be swallowed up by them. It is against all the principles of good government to rest the requisite powers in such a body as Congress. Two sovereignties cannot exist within the same limits."

The people of the States formed out of the Northwest Territory were by education and tradition, and more especially by virtue of the moulding power of a great fundamental law, opposed to slavery and to the doctrine of States Rights. They naturally went with the North; and we believe we are justified in saying that the North could not have succeeded in the war for the Union if the States named had refused to cooperate.

Previous to the war, through much discussion and many political campaigns, the people of the States named, as well as the balance of the great North, had settled, as far as they were concerned, the momentous question forced upon them by the slave power. The venerable John Quincy Adams, ex-President, in his gallant fight for the right of petition in Congress, was one of the first to take up the gage and begin the battle, and he was successful. Then followed that noble galaxy of leaders, Joshua R. Giddings, William Lloyd Garrison, John Greenleaf Whittier, Henry Ward Beecher, William Cullen Bryant, Wendell Phillips, Charles Sumner, Gerritt Smith, Cassius McClay, Owen Lovejoy, Benjamin Lundy and a host of others, who appealed to the North in the name of liberty and humanity, and eventually carried the great majority to victory in the Presidential campaign of 1860.

The people of the South also were led by men of ability, who fought long and hard for what they considered truth and justice, and they have left their mark upon their generation. Some of them, indeed, in certain localities, are deemed martyrs to a noble cause, lost and hopeless though it be, forever. Beginning with John C.

Calhoun, the great advocate and expounder of the States Rights doctrine, there were Jefferson Davis, Judah P. Benjamin, Henry A. Wise, R. Barnwell Rhett, Alexander H. Stephens, James M. Mason, John Slidell, John B. Floyd, William L. Yancy, Robert Toombs, Isham G. Harris, and many others, under whose teaching and leadership the great States of the South were induced to try the arbitrament of the sword to decide their grievances.

Thus the two sections of the country with the leaders named and entertaining the principles they did, glowing with the white heat of a great political campaign, gradually drifted asunder. In the south free speech was denied to northern men. Northerners at the south on business were violently treated and hundreds returned, bringing the story of their treatment home. John B. Floyd, Buchanan's Secretary of War, had quietly removed cannon and other munitions of war to southern arsenals, and these and many other events which occurred in swift succession, enhanced the excitement. Early in January, 1861, news of an alarming character began to be received, and the "War News" headlines of the newspapers had come to be so common as to be regularly looked for by the readers.

Mr. Dennison, governor of Ohio, while reviewing the situation in his message to the legislature, January 7, 1861, says:

The patriotism of the country is justly alarmed. The unity of the Government is denied. Doctrines subversive of its existence are boldly advocated and made the basis of State action, under the pretended right of a State to secede from the Confederacy at its pleasure, in peace or war, constitutional liberty is imperilled, revolution is meditated, and treason is justified.

On the occasion of my inauguration I felt it to be my duty to warn my countrymen against those hostile designs against the Federal Union. But then they were in speculation only. Now they are in act. Shall they be consummated? Shall the National Government be degraded into a mere league between independent States, existing only by their appearance, subordinate to them and subject to be destroyed at the pleasure of any State of the Confederacy? Or shall it continue to be maintained, as it has always been maintained, as a government proper—sovereign within its prescribed sphere—as the States are sovereign within their prescribed spheres—founded on the adoption of the people as were the States, and creating direct relations between itself and the individual citizens, which no State authority has power to impair or disturb, and which nothing can dissolve but revolution.

The people of Washington county fully endorsed these sentiments. They had stood arrayed against each other in the two great political parties, but when the Union was threatened, irrespective of party they gave their allegiance to the Government of the fathers. On the evening of January 8, 1861, pursuant to a call for a union meeting, the people of Marietta and vicinity, including a number of citizens from the adjoining county of Wood, Virginia, assembled at the court house, in Marietta, and the mayor, Hon. William A. Whittlesey, was chosen chairman; Hon. T. W. Ewart and C. F. Buell, secretaries. Thereupon a committee consisting of Melvin Clarke, Arius Nye, Rufus E. Harte, Andrew W. McCormick, Davis Green, Douglas Putnam, William West, David C. Skinner and Charles F. Buell, were appointed to draw up resolutions expressive of the sentiment of the people on the condition of the country. The meeting then adjourned to 2 P. M., January 12th. On the day named a large number of citizens of Washington county and of Wood county, Virginia, without distinction of party, assembled at the court house, and the committee, through Melvin Clarke, reported resolutions at length, condemning the secession movement and affirming their devotion to the cause of the Union.

The following are the second and seventh resolutions passed:

II. The doctrine of the secession of a State has no warrant in the constitution, but, on the contrary, is in its effects fatal to the Union, and subversive of all the ends of its creation; and in our judgment secession is revolution; and while we fully admit the right of revolution for the causes set forth in the Declaration of Independence, or for others of equal force, and while we are grieved to say that the Government and citizens of several of the States, both north and south, have been guilty of acts of great injustice toward others, yet facts do not exist which warrant a resort to that last and final remedy, revolution, and we have still an abiding faith in the capacity and adaptation of the General Government to redress all grievances suffered by its citizens, whatever their origin.

VII. Notwithstanding former differences of opinion on this subject, for the purpose of making a final adjustment of the unfortunate controversy now raging in our country, we are willing to accept as the basis of a compromise, the reenactment of the eighth section of the Missouri Compromise act; or we are willing to adopt the principle, that the whole subject of slavery in the territories, shall be left to be determined by the will of the bona fide residents of such territory, provided they also be left free to elect their own officers, executive and judicial, as well as legislative.

The history of the progress of public sentiment in this county is but a repetition of that of many others in the State. The people of Ohio would have compromised with the south gladly; but it is an old story, often told, how the southern leaders disregarded all overtures. They were bent on having a new government, founded upon the institution of human slavery and awaited their opportunity. In the fullness of time that opportunity came.

But, reader, come again with me to the crest of high Alleghany and let us look once more westward. It is noontide of a beautiful day in April, 1861. Seventy-three years have elapsed since the first settlement of the Northwest Territory. To the southwest are the broad valleys of the Ohio. In the far west, by the shore of the Mississippi is Illinois. On the north, like burnished shields, lie the great lakes. The forests have melted away. No more does the Indian lurk in the thicket or guide his rude canoe on the broad Ohio; but the great Anglo Saxon has built his domicile beside every stream, and his cattle graze upon the hills and in all the valleys. On the Ohio, the great steamer, bearing the commerce of populous States, pursues her way. Instead of a few hamlets, we see the populous valleys of Virginia. In place of the lone wagon trail over the mountain, is the wonderful railroad, connecting Ohio and the east. Instead of the small settlement at the mouth of the Muskingum, we see a thriving city, and the county of Washington with thirty-six thousand five hundred inhabitants. The wilderness has been subdued, and out of it has grown Ohio with two million three hundred and forty thousand, Indiana with one million three hundred and fifty-five thousand, Illinois with one million seven hundred and fifty thousand, Michigan with seven hundred and fifty thousand, and Wisconsin with seven hundred and eighty thousand inhabitants. Cultivated fields interspersed with woodland extend as far as the eye can reach and the thrifty son of toil has made the land "to blossom like the rose." Peace and prosperity have wrought their perfect work. Great cities have sprung up. Thousands of manufactories, giving employment to a million of workmen, dot the land. Institutions of learning are scattered here and there over the whole land. Unexampled prosperity! Amazing transformation! Surely this Northwest Territory has more than fulfilled its early promise. Sad, that the wheels of industry should be stopped, the plough left standing in the furrow, the college deserted, and that the red hand of war should paralyze a State in the full tide of prosperity, sending mourning to so many hearts and disaster to so many homes; but such is war.

At the hour of 4:30 on the morning of April 12, 1861, the boom of a mortar on Sullivan's Island, in Charleston harbor, gave notice to the country and to Major Anderson, pent within the walls of Fort Sumter, that the war was begun. The news was not wholly unlooked for, yet the dread reality was difficult to comprehend. Soon, however, the patriotic impulse of the people obtained control and carried everything before it. Washington county was thoroughly aroused. The news of the beginning of hostilities reached Marietta on Saturday morning, April 13th, and on Monday morning the call of the President for seventy-five thousand men was received. Captain Frank Buell, of the Union Blues, a Marietta company, called his men together the same evening, and the company promptly tendered their services, were at once accepted by the governor, and ordered to march on the following Monday morning. The company was soon filled more than to the maximum, officers elected and preparations made for departure at the date named.

As this was the first company from this county to offer its services to the Government, and as this was an event of great moment at the time, we give the names of this company and a short sketch of the events attending their departure.

COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

Captain Frank Buell, First Lieutenant Dennis O'Leary, Second Lieutenant William H. Bisbee, elected major of Eighteenth Ohio volunteer infantry, May 29, 1861; Second Lieutenant Wallace Hill.

NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

First Sergeant John Theis, Second Sergeant Daniel Y. Hill, Third Sergeant Owen O'Neal, Fourth Sergeant Theodore G. Field, First Corporal Wallace W. Withrow, Second Corporal John D. Holden, Third Corporal Samuel C. Skinner; Fourth Corporal George B. Haskins, Musician Louis Fourgeres, Musician Manly Warren, Musician Ebenezer Corry.

PRIVATEs.

Amos Mordecai, Eli P. Boring, Frank H. Bosworth, R. H. Bull, William Bryan, Robinson Blain, Jacob Bower, Benjamin Bragg, Absalom Boring, George R. Burris, Alexander H. Bukey, John F. Booth, Guy Barrows, Henry Claus, John Clark, Peter L. Coniffe, Stephen H. Collins, Charles Clogston, George Coon, Joseph Corey, E. Corey, Daniel Close, John Chase, John Calvert, David Craig, Thomas Dyar, David Dow, George W. Devin, Juthro Davis, Thomas Driscoll, Thomas C. Daily, Hannibal Dibble, D. T. Deming, Henry Eastman, William N. Foulke, Thomas Fisher, Jeremiah Fairhurst, Daniel Goodman, Allen Green, William Gay, L. R. Green, Milton Gillingham, Henry Henning, John Henning, George B. Haskins, Albert Hamilton, Thomas Hatfield, William Holden, Henry Kellner, August Kropp, Herman Ketchner, Lafayette La Grange, Philip Loufman, Levi F. Lamotte, Frederick Living, J. H. Lapham, Milton H. Laughlin, Augustus Morris, John Mahnkin, Wesley Miner, John N. Miner, George

Moore, Wilbur F. Morse, Leonidas R. Meriber, Lewis Monroe, Thomas McNamara, John McCullough, George McCadden, John Neigham, Reuben L. Nye, Thomas North, James S. Parker, Anthony Padden, Wallace W. Pixley, William Parker, George Pixley, Michael Padden, James Phelps, Jewett Palmer, jr., Thomas Phelps, Daniel Quimby, Philetus S. Ripley, George W. Ridgeway, John Ranger, William Robinson, Walter Reppert, Milton Regnier, William Ranger, James H. Sniffen, William Stewart, Daniel Soler, John L. Shaw, Elijah G. Smith, Peter Sherrer, Jacob Shaw, William Spence, Ordman Snier, Horatio Stark, John W. Smith, Robert Shiers, Henry B. Stanton, James Stanley, William N. Scott, William H. Snodgrass, Charles W. Sprengle, Tartus L. Stewart, Hugh Shoop, David Shockley, James Turner, Thomas R. Thorniley, Samuel Tracey, Abner Tucker, T. W. Terry, Oscar Underwood, George Vickers, James Voschel, Gordon B. West, Charles B. Wetson, Jacob Wood.

Quite a number whose names appear in the above list were not accepted, being under age, over age, or physically unfit for service. On Sunday evening before the departure of the company a meeting was held at the Congregational church in Marietta, all the other churches meeting at the same place.

The church was crowded with an earnest and attentive throng, seats being reserved at the front for the volunteers. They marched in. The choir sang the National hymn "My country, 'tis of thee." After which Rev. Dr. Wicks preached from the text—Isaiah xi: 4—a sermon full of patriotic zeal and devotion to country. The concluding part of his sermon was more directly to the volunteers, and was in part as follows:

Never did I think to perform such a task as this; never imagined that I could stand in the midst of such an assembly, to give the parting word from this sacred desk to a company of volunteer soldiers enlisted in their country's defence. Yet let me say, that strange and painful as the service is, it is no unwilling part that I perform. I have never been an advocate for war. I have preached the gospel of peace and good tidings. I would that there were no such necessity laid upon you and upon me; yet my heart is with you, my countrymen, and I bid you God speed in this work, though it may be a mission of death to many.

In the name, therefore, of God, and from this house of God, where prayer shall continually ascend for you, we bid you go forward; we give you our blessing, and shall not cease to implore the blessing of heaven upon you. Your cause is ours. Dear as you are to us, and bound in the tenderest ties of earthly kindred, yet for our country's service and the maintenance of all that is most precious in human society, we give you up, sons, brothers, husbands though you be, to stand in the deadly breach. We know well the danger. Some of you may not return to us again. Your ranks may be fearfully thinned, though it is not certain but that we who remain here behind at home may be called to fall first at our own firesides. It is not certain yet where the blow will first be struck. The danger is widespread and threatening, and we cannot escape it. God be thanked that we are all aroused as one man to meet it, and that he has given us one heart to take the sword of justice to avenge that accursed treason, which, considering all the circumstances of the case, is without a parallel in the history of the world, and which demands the most signal, summary punishment that violated law can inflict.

In the name then of our loved country, in the name of fathers and mothers, and sisters and wives, whom you love; in the name of the ministers of our holy religion; in the name of God—that God who loveth truth and justice, and is terrible to the evil doer, we bid you go and God go with you. May He make your arm strong, and your hearts courageous to do valiant service, while you are ever cheered in the darkest hour, when the missiles of death load the air, and there are many here who will not cease to pray for you and commend you in humble supplication to heaven.

Dr. Wicks was followed by Dr. L. G. Leonard, of the Baptist church, who with Rev. Mr. Wakefield, of Harmar, and Rev. Mr. Mumford, of the Unitarian church, occupied the pulpit. D. P. Bosworth, president of the Washington County Bible society, then addressed the volunteers and presented each with a neat pocket edition of the New Testament. At the close of the ceremony Reuben L. Nye, one of the volunteers, ascended the pulpit stairs, "and responded in behalf of the company in an exceedingly appropriate and eloquent speech."

Dr. Leonard then closed the exercises with the benediction.

This was in the oldest church in Ohio, and these ceremonies are said to have been the most impressive and effecting ever witnessed within its walls.

Before the volunteers left for Columbus on Monday morning, the ladies of the city of Marietta presented them with a splendid silk flag. This was in the presence of an immense crowd on the commons, Melton Clarke making the presentation speech and Captain Frank Buell responding.

Thus cheered and encouraged, and with the benediction of the entire community upon them, the first company of volunteers from Washington county left for the war. Their progress up the Muskingum was like a triumphal march. People flocked to the landings to greet them as the steamer approached. At Lowell the entire population turned out, and cheer upon cheer was given. Speeches were made, and a purse of over sixty dollars was raised for them. After the boat was gone, Albert Chandler and Warner Green started a subscription paper to raise money for the equipment of a company, and for the support of the families of those who should volunteer. In one hour's time, thirteen hundred dollars were subscribed, one man, James S. Stowe, pledging five hundred dollars. At Beverly, the citizens had already formed a company of home guards of over a hundred strong, and as the steamer approached they fired a salute. The Beverly brass band then played a patriotic air, and were followed by the Beverly vocal band, who sung the stirring song, "My Native Land." Speeches were made—George P. Buell responding on behalf of the company. It is said, on good authority, that Colonel E. S. McIntosh, an old citizen, probably upon a timely suggestion, bought up all the underwear in town and presented it to the volunteers. The company went into quarters at Camp Jackson, Columbus, and were assigned to the Eighteenth regiment as company B, of that regiment.

A company of volunteers of about one hundred strong was organized at Beverly, April 23, 1861, called the Washington guards. The following were the commissioned officers: John Henderson, captain; Thomas Ross, first lieutenant; Oliver H. P. Scott, second lieutenant. They were assigned to the Eighteenth regiment, and became company K, of that organization.

The militia system of Ohio, under the fostering care of Governor Chase, had, at the beginning of the war, grown to be an institution of some consequence, and in nearly every county of the State could be found one or more companies, with more or less proficiency in drill, and the tactics, according to the length of time such companies had been organized and the efficiency of their officers.

When the war broke out these military organizations were of great utility in furnishing men somewhat familiar with the military art, to take the lead in forming companies and regiments out of the mass of raw volunteers offered the State.

Ohio was, at the time, divided into military divisions. The Seventh division comprised the counties of Fairfield, Hocking, Perry, Scioto, Lawrence, Jackson, Pike, Newton, Washington, Athens, Meigs, and Gallia. The whole of this large district was under the command of Major General Jesse Hildebrand—headquarters at Marietta. This division was subdivided as follows: Fairfield, Hocking, and Perry counties, under command of Brigadier General N. Schleich—headquarters at Lancaster; Scioto, Lawrence, Pike, Jackson, and Vinton counties, under command of Brigadier General Peter Kinney—headquarters at Portsmouth; Washington, Athens, Meigs, and Gallia counties, under command of Brigadier General Robert A. Constable—headquarters at Athens.

General Hildebrand's staff was as follows: Colonel A. W. McCormick, assistant adjutant general and division inspector; Colonel John Marshall, assistant quartermaster general; Colonel Melvin Clarke, assistant judge advocate general; Colonel A. L. Haskins, assistant engineer-in-chief; Major J. B. Hovey, Major I. R. Waters, and Major W. B. Whittlesey, aids.

On April 22, 1861, in pursuance of orders received from Columbus, General Hildebrand issued his general order No. 1, calling on the people of the Seventh division for ten thousand men. Whenever eighty men should be secured they were authorized to form an infantry company, and if forty men be secured, a light artillery company, and to elect one captain, one first lieutenant, one second lieutenant, four sergeants, four corporals, and two musicians. This was promptly responded to, more men being offered than could be used, under the President's call, the quota of the State being thirteen regiments.

The language of the general order as to the disposition of the men was as follows:

All companies which may be organized in counties near the Ohio river to remain where organized, to defend the frontier, while all other companies will hold themselves in readiness to march when and wherever the President of the United States, through the Governor of Ohio, may direct.

General Hildebrand and his staff soon afterwards tendered their services to the Government; but the general and the most of the members of his staff were destined to other duties, and to act important parts on widely separated fields, and in commands tried by the storm of battle, where the glory of a military uniform was little thought of. The general himself died in the service, at Alton, Illinois. He was a man of good presence, brave, and did good service as commandant of a brigade at Shiloh. His career will be more fully noticed further on. Colonel McCormick was severely wounded at the battle of Shiloh, in a charge by Forest's Texan cavalry. Colonel Clarke, while in command of the Thirty-sixth Ohio, was killed by a cannon shot at Antietam. Colonel Haskins died of injuries received while colonel of the Sixty-third Ohio, and Captain Whittlesey was killed at the battle of Mission Ridge, while leading his company in that memorable charge.

During the first two years of the war there was great fear along the border and in Washington county, of raids by the rebels. News came to Marietta on Sunday, April 21, 1861, that a large body of rebels was about to descend on Parkersburgh, and great alarm was felt as to the threatening attitude of affairs, and the following dispatch was sent to the capital:

MARIETTA, OHIO, April 21—5 P. M.

To Governor Dennison:

It is rumored that rebel troops are on their way to Parkersburgh, Virginia. We do not know what credit to give this report. It is, however, reasonable to suppose that Parkersburgh, being the terminus of one branch of the Baltimore & Ohio railroad, will be made in any event a base of operations by the rebel military, and that we are in danger of being overrun by foraging parties and perhaps worse events. We therefore feel that an absolute necessity exists of being at least prepared with a full supply of arms and ammunition, of which we are wholly destitute. We may also need more troops than can be raised on the border, and experienced drill officers. We shall at once organize a home guard, which we believe it to be of the utmost importance to arm. We want especially cannon, and as many as we can have. We think there can be no possible doubt of the existence of an overwhelming necessity for the occupancy of this point and Belpre, opposite Parkersburgh, at once. A messenger will leave for Columbus tonight.

A. T. NYE,

President of City Council.

M. CLARKE,

Of Major General Hildebrand's staff.

The messenger sent was Beman Gates, esq., who went to Columbus and laid the matter before the governor, with what success will be seen further on.

On the next day, pursuant to a resolution passed by the city council of Marietta, on Saturday, April 20th, a large number of citizens of the county assembled at the court house to arrange for home defence. Two committees were appointed to carry out the objects of the meeting, one to raise money for the benefit of the families of volunteers, consisting of Hon. William R. Putnam, J. S. Sprague, and Henry Fearing; the other a committee of safety, consisting of Colonel John Mills, William P. Cutler, William R. Putnam, Davis Green, Anselem T. Nye, Harlow Chapin, Rufus E. Harte, David C. Skinner, and the mayor, Hon. William A. Whittlesey.

Measures for the defence of the county, and especially of Marietta city, were adopted. Arms and ammunition were needed, and very few, if any, arms were to be had. Meanwhile, in order to utilize the means of defence at hand, two iron cannon, in the city, were put in readiness for active service, and an order was given to the foundry of A. T. Nye, jr., to cast solid shot for fixed ammunition. In response to the dispatch and to the personal application of Mr. Gates, the governor ordered the First regiment, light artillery, Third brigade, Fourth division of Ohio volunteer militia, from Cleveland and vicinity, to report at Marietta for the defence of that point.* The regiment was made up of six companies,

*Mr. Reid, in Ohio in the War, says: "Governor Dennison, as early as April 19th, four days before the call for volunteers, determined to protect the exposed points. Marietta, Parkersburgh, and Gallipolis were the points, and Marietta was considered the place of greatest danger. Colonel Barnett, of Cleveland, had already tendered the services of himself and command, and he was ordered to report at Columbus. Meantime, on Sunday, April 21st, the Columbus machine shops were opened at the request of the governor, and before night two hundred solid shot were cast. The next day, the twenty-second, the battery arrived, and went by way of Loveland to Marietta." And in a foot note he says: "As the battery entered Columbus, a committee of citizens from Marietta arrived to represent their danger to the governor and to ask for succor. They found that his foresight had already secured them, and some of the committee, turning immediately back, reached Marietta again on the same train which bore the battery they had gone to ask."

of twenty men each, and six guns, under command of Colonel James Barnett.

On Tuesday night, April 23rd, the regiment arrived and went into camp at the fair grounds. This was the first camp established, and was named Camp Putnam, in honor of General Rufus Putnam, of the Revolutionary war. These were the first troops to arrive in Washington county. The next was the Fourteenth regiment Ohio volunteer militia, raised in the Tenth congressional district, and commanded by Colonel James B. Steedman. Then came the Eighteenth regiment, on its way to Virginia. The latter regiment was made up as follows:

Company A, Lawrence County guards, Captain Rogers; company B, Marietta Blues, Captain Buell; company C, Lawrence County guards, Captain Bolles; company D, Vinton County guards, Captain Caldwell; company E, Lawrence County guards, Captain Merrill; company F, Meigs County guards, Captain Curtis; company G, Gallia County guards, Captain Aleshire; company H, Meigs County guards, Captain Waller; company K, Washington County guards, Captain Henderson; company L, Jackson County guards, Captain Hoffman. Regimental officers, elected at Parkersburgh, Virginia: colonel, J. R. Stanley, of McArthur; lieutenant colonel, William Bolles, of Ironton; major, William H. Bisby, of Marietta; quartermaster, Beman Gates. Mr. Gates afterwards resigned, and John C. Paxton was appointed.

At this point it will be well to understand the situation. The rebels had penetrated western Virginia and pushed their forces along both branches of the Baltimore & Ohio railroad, from Grafton westward, towards Parkersburgh, and along the northern branch toward Wheeling, burning bridges and trestle works as they went. This spread general alarm throughout western Virginia, to Wheeling, Parkersburgh, and along the border in Ohio. Governor Dennison resolved that the line of battle should not be on the border of Ohio, but along the natural line made by the Alleghanies. And this was against the advice of General McClellan, who counselled delay, but the governor was positive, and his plan prevailed. Accordingly, on the twenty-sixth of May, the following movement was ordered: The Fourteenth regiment, Colonel Steedman, stationed at Zanesville, and the Eighteenth, Colonel Stanley, stationed at Camp Jackson, were ordered to Marietta to support Barnett's battery. The Seventeenth regiment, Colonel Connell, stationed at Lancaster, was ordered to Zanesville. The Fifteenth regiment, Colonel Andrews, stationed at Zanesville, was ordered to Bellaire, to await orders. The Sixteenth regiment, Colonel Irvine, stationed at Columbus, was ordered to Zanesville to support Colonel Andrews. The Nineteenth regiment, Colonel Beatty, and the Twenty-first, Colonel Norton, stationed at Cleveland, were ordered to Columbus, there to await orders. Colonel Steedman, with the Fourteenth and a part of Barnett's artillery, crossed to Virginia on the morning of May 27th, arriving at Parkersburgh at eleven o'clock, being the first troops to enter southern territory, Ellsworth, with the New York Zouaves, entering Virginia from Washington at 2 P. M. After putting a quietus on the secession element in Parkersburgh, they moved out on the Baltimore & Ohio railroad, rebuilding bridges and trestle works as they advanced. Colonel Irvine, with his regiment at Bellaire, crossed the day following, and was joined by a regiment of loyal Virginians, under Colonel Kelley, and they pushed on out the northern branch of the Baltimore & Ohio, repairing and rebuilding bridges and trestles. The two columns met and formed a junction at Grafton, Virginia. After them the gallant sons of Ohio and Indiana went pouring into Virginia, driving the rebels before them. Fifteen miles beyond Grafton, at Philippi, they fought the first battle of the war, and gained a victory.

Thus, by the foresight and energy of Governor Dennison, was West Virginia saved to the Union, important railway communications recovered and held, and Ohio and the border protected from invasion and predatory warfare.

On the twenty-third of June, pursuant to an order of the adjutant general of the State, the following militia companies arrived and were distributed along the railroad between the city of Marietta and Athens to guard the Marietta & Cincinnati railroad, known as the "old line." General McClellan feared that his communications would be interrupted and that his supplies might be cut off by the destruction of the bridges and trestle works on this railroad, which was an important matter at that time. These companies were: company F, First regiment, Captain Miller, thirty men; company B, Second regiment, Captain King, thirty men; company F, Second regiment, Captain Garrett, thirty men; company D, Second regiment, Captain Menken, fifteen men; company E, Third regiment, Captain Buckner, forty men; company G, Third regiment, Captain J. H. Carter, sixty men. The whole under command of Lieutenant Colonel A. E. Jones. Afterwards four of these companies were relieved by four Washington county companies, one of which was the Union Blue company recruited up after the three months men had gone, commanded by Captain William B. Mason; the Fireman Zouaves, Captain S. F. Shaw—both companies from Marietta—one company from Harmar, Captain Joseph B. Daniels, and one—the Belpre guards—commanded by Captain F. H. Loring, from Belpre. They were distributed along the railroad in squads, and were armed, clothed and subsisted the same as other volunteers. This service although not especially dangerous, was important, and as these companies are not elsewhere recorded we give them below as far as possible to ascertain their names:

COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

Captain F. H. Loring; Lieutenant James King.

NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

Orderly Sergeant A. P. Sherman, Sergeant J. L. O'Neal, John Mitchell, C. W. Stone, John Drain.

CORPORALS.

A. H. Browning, P. W. Simpson, E. M. O'Neal, A. D. Stone.

PRIVATEs.

H. G. Allen, D. C. Allen, James R. Barrows, George Ballard, Daniel Breckenridge, William Baker, W. W. Botkin, William Berry, Samuel Barkley, Jacob Clark, A. F. Downer, Moses Dugan, George Dunlevy, J. G. Ellenwood, Council Flowers, George Flowers, L. R. Forbes, George Gage, Alexander Galbraith, George Hutchinson, John Had-dow, George A. Howe, John Hutchinson, D. B. Horton, C. B. Kirkpatrick, Fremont Kirkpatrick, Henry Kirkpatrick, Corwin H. Loring, George Lysle, George M. Conaughy, Joseph Marsh, Joseph Miller, James Mendenhall, James McGaffey, F. F. Newport, J. R. Newport, M. Noland, Joseph Noland, F. Odenahan, E. R. O'Neal, William Powell, James Powell, Josiah Rutherford, Jacob Rutherford, B. B. Stone, Frank Stone, George G. Stone, William F. Shee, Joseph Sterlin, William F. Sayre, Henry Schram, Harrison Smith, John A. Shipe, S. C. H. Smith, Milton Stone, F. B. Simpson, Martin Tharp, John Thompson, William White, Noah Welch.

Roll of Captain William B. Mason's company D, in the First regiment, Third brigade, Seventh division of Ohio volunteer militia, enrolled on the twenty-seventh day of July, 1861, and mustered into the service of the State of Ohio the twenty-seventh day of July, 1861.

COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

Captain William B. Mason, First Lieutenant James McCaddon, Second Lieutenant James Lewis.

NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

First Sergeant W. L. Theis, Sergeants George W. Kennedy, Robert H. McKittrick, Louis Schmidt; Corporals Jacob Unger, John Mahuken, John Plug, William L. Porterfield; Bugler Louis Schlieker.

PRIVATE.

George Baldwin, Frank Braddock, Peter Beck, George Booth, John Burke, Frederick Becker, John Dow, John Danker, Henry Estman, John W. Eaton, David M. Grimes, William Hose, Seymour J. Hathaway, Andrew Holden, Luther M. Ingraham, David F. Jones, Frank E. Jett, Arius Nye Kennedy, Joel Kennedy, David H. Lewis, Dennis Mulhane, John J. Medlicott, Patrick C. Meers, Frank McCaddon, Theodore McCaddon, Frederick Mahuken, Michael Manly, George W. Reynolds, John Ratgen, Nicholas Roeder, William Robinson, Frank Shafer, William W. Skinner, William H. Storrs, Richard Siebers, William Salzman, Samuel Tracy, Frank Towsley, Jacob Wood, J. Henry Wellbrook, Julius Wenland.

Muster roll of Captain Joseph B. Daniels' company, First regiment, Third brigade, Seventh division, of Ohio volunteer militia, commanded by Major O. Bennett.

COMMISSIONED OFFICER.

Captain Joseph B. Daniels (both lieutenants refused to respond to the call).

NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

First Sergeant Arthur B. Chapin, Sergeants William S. Judd, Diton Fearing, George Maxon; Corporals George Reppert, George Marsh, Abram Daniels, Otis J. Chambers, Drummer John Knox.

PRIVATE.

Daniel Bingham, William Bingham, Joseph Boyd, John Chambers, Salmon Chambers, Charles Dugan, James Doughitt, William Dugan, John Edelston, Dennis A. Finch, Charles L. Gates, John Huff, Isaac Lucas, Solon Mathews, Horatio W. Mason, Thomas McNamara, Henry E. Nugent, Samuel H. Niece, Madison J. Naylor, James S. Parker, William Parker, Samuel H. Putnam, Simon Readin, Byron P. Reppert, William W. Rice, Darwin A. Scott, William Snodgrass, William Tunncliff, James Wright, Luther Wright, John L. Young.

We have now passed the opening chapter of the war as far as it relates to Washington county. This was the romantic period of the contest, if such a thing can be said of so grim a subject. The hardships, dangers and privations of active service had not been fully realized. The theory at first entertained that armed resistance could be put down in a three months' campaign was soon dismissed, and the enormous strength of the Rebellion began to be understood.

On July 21st the great battle of Bull Run was fought and lost, the flower of the Union army destroyed, or turned into a fleeing rabble, and a great mass of war material swallowed up in the vortex of war. It was hard to believe this news, but what seemed at that time a dire disaster proved, in reality, a loud note of warning, and to that extent, at least, beneficial. It broadened the views of the administration as to war measures. Henceforward the war was to be carried on more aggressively, and on a gigantic scale. The President, on the day after the battle, issued a call for five hundred thousand three years' men. Another outburst of patriotic feeling ensued. This was the first great call to arms. The country was stirred to its centre, and the scenes of volunteering that followed were grand. It was from these five hundred regiments that the vital power to crush the Rebellion came. They furnished the great bulk of the officers who finally led our armies to victory.

The Representative of this district at that time was the Hon. William P. Cutler, who was attending a called session of Congress. Having received enquiries about raising a regiment in Washington county he telegraphed as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 23, 1861.

M. Clarke and J. Hildebrand:

Government will probably accept an infantry regiment if ready in fifteen days. Can you raise it? I will bear all incidental expenses of raising it. Answer.

WILLIAM P. CUTLER.

The response sent was that Washington county could and would do it.

This was the beginning of the Thirty-sixth regiment, companies for which began to rendezvous immediately at Marietta.

Colonel John Groesbeck, of Cincinnati, had offered to raise and equip a regiment at his own expense, and the liberality of this offer attracted general attention and commendation. The companies for that regiment were about this time gathering at Camp Colerain, near Cincinnati. There was a company in Marietta at this time known as the "Washington County Rifle Guards." They resolved to join Groesbeck's regiment. Lieutenant W. H. Edgerton came from Newport with a battalion of men and joined the guards, the election of officers resulted as follows:

John C. Fell, captain; William H. Edgerton, first lieutenant; Henry W. Shepard, second lieutenant.

This was the first three years' company that left the county. They numbered one hundred and fifteen men. Upon leaving Marietta July 22, 1861, for the war, they were escorted by a Marietta company called the Fireman Zouaves, Captain S. F. Shaw, the German brass band, and a large concourse of citizens, relatives and friends. They marched through the streets, Ohio and Front, from their headquarters at the old woollen factory and across to the Harmar depot. The Zouaves, finding that the guards had no colors, presented their beautiful flag, through Captain Shaw, who made the presentation speech, which was responded to by Captain Fell in appropriate words, and which act of courtesy was received with cheers by the departing volunteers. This company became company B, and Groesbeck's regiment the Thirty-ninth Ohio volunteer infantry.

The following is the complete roster:

COMPANY B, THIRTY-NINTH OHIO VOLUNTEER—FIRST THREE YEARS COMPANY.

COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

Captain John C. Fell, First Lieutenant William H. Edgerton, Second Lieutenant Henry W. Shepard.

PRIVATE AND NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

Henry Adams, Furman Abbot, Jacob Abendshau, J. Abernachard, Samuel Ackerson, William C. Buck, John C. Buck, Henry Bast, C. Briggs, P. Bronson, Wilson Congdon, J. S. Carver, James Cahoon, John Cisler, B. Congdon, John Congdon, H. Coleman, T. J. Conner, M. L. Cook, G. W. Chapman, J. Carson, William Carpenter, David C. Day, E. J. Douglass, W. W. Dye, K. Davis, L. K. Dutton, J. Eifer, G. Ellifritz, J. Ebinger, Lewis W. Lynch, W. Fise, H. Farnsworth, William Grass, B. F. Gilpin, A. H. Gardz, J. W. Goodrich, J. Goddard, I. Green, D. D. Huntsman, William Hobby, C. Hallet, D. D. Hughes, J. Hutchinson, W. Hackathan, Lyman Hall, Luther Hathaway, L. Hyer, Jacob Johnson, A. Johns, William Kennedy, William J. Kemp, Frederick K. Lebzner, A. W. S. Landy, Joseph H. Lapham, T. Lang, E. J. Ludgen, Smith Ming, William S. Morse, James McCall, George Moore, M. McManus, Neil McLaughlin, A. F. Moore, W. Miller, M. Miller, L. Mine, J. McCullough, A. A. Middleswart, G. W. Middleswart, Lewis Noe, David P. Pugh, Daniel Pfaff, Ebenezer Pearce, George Payne, C. Pfaff, F. B. Reckard, C. L. Russell, E. H. Richards, Nedor Roon, C. Riesch, C. W. Reynold, A. Rudig, William Rouse, F. W. Ranger, D. S. Reynolds, George T. Rice, Moses Smith, George Soler, John Stewart, Frederick Solzer, William St. Clair, C. J. Skidmore, N. H. Shaw, Matthew Stricker, William Stewart, S. H. W. Smith, J. E. Schmidt, Eli Steen, F. Snodgrass, W. J. Severs, J. F. Snoetast, J. E. Smith, William Theis, John E. Thurman, R. Taylor, John Wood, Henry Wendelker, S. Wells, Lewis Zimmer, L. Zimmerman.

The second company was "Koenig's German Rifles," which was raised in one week. It was composed mainly of Germans, and included many of the best shots of that nationality in the county. They elected Jacob Koenig captain, and left for Camp Colerain July 31, 1861, deferring the election of the other officers until their arrival in camp. The company became company F, Thirty-ninth Ohio volunteer infantry.

About the first of August, 1861, the "Muskingum company" went into camp at Marietta, the first of the gallant Thirty-sixth regiment. They were composed of the young men of the valley of the Muskingum, immediately above Marietta. Twenty of them were from Rainbow and the neighborhood of Devol's dam, and comprised the best, and in fact, nearly all the young men in that locality. They were officered as follows: Captain Hiram F. Devol, First Lieutenant J. Gage Barker, Second Lieutenant J. C. Selby, First Sergeant Miles A. Stacy. The next company was the "Salem Light Guard,"* a splendid body of men, officered as follows: Captain Jewett Palmer, jr., First Lieutenant James Stanley, Second Lieutenant Ernst Lindner, First Sergeant John A. Palmer. Soon the Thirty-sixth regiment was full.

Captain T. W. Moore's company was raised in the vicinity of Tunnel Station, in Washington county, and were considered a fine body of men, and Captain Adney's was from the west end of Washington and from Athens county. The governor appointed Melvin Clarke lieutenant colonel, Professor Ebenezer B. Andrews, major; Benjamin D. Fearing, adjutant, and John M. Woodbridge, quartermaster. Neither of these officers had any military education, and it was decided to secure a regularly educated army officer, if possible, as colonel of the regiment. Major E. B. Andrews, to carry out this idea, went to Columbus to lay the matter before Governor Dennison. At first it was supposed that Colonel Sill would be appointed; but Colonel Sill, a member of the governor's staff, was needed in organizing the thousands of raw recruits then flocking to the Ohio camp. Major Slemmer, however, of the regular army, inspector general on the staff of General Rosecrans, was designated as commanding officer, for the time being—the same Lieutenant A. J. Slemmer who was in command of Fort Pickens, at the entrance of Pensacola harbor, Florida, when the war began, and who, by his prompt refusal to surrender, and promptness in preparing for defence, saved that important fortification to the Union.

The Thirty-sixth was, on August 30th, ordered into Virginia, Major Slemmer joining the regiment at Parkersburgh; but soon after Colonel George Crook, of the Eighth United States infantry, was assigned to the command of the regiment, and began at once the task of drilling and disciplining both officers and men.

The advent of Colonel Crook was an event of great importance to the Thirty-sixth. He won the confidence and respect of the men, and imparted to the regiment a character for discipline and good behavior that they never lost during subsequent terms of service.

During the months of September and October of 1861, several important commands were in process of formation in Washington county. Colonel T. C. H. Smith, of Marietta, was commissioned as lieutenant colonel of the First Ohio cavalry; and soon after, on September 11th, Captain Thomas J. Patten, and Lieutenant John D. Barker went into Camp Putnam with sixty men for that regiment, which became company L, First Ohio volunteer cavalry. At the same time Pierpoint battery, De Beck's battery, Huntington's battery, the Sixty-third Ohio volunteer infantry, the Seventy-seventh Ohio volunteer infantry, were all enlisting men—the men that were shortly to do such gallant service for their country.

Captain Frank Buell who was always devoted to his men, had become dissatisfied at Ohio's treatment of the volunteers, and with the delay of the State authorities in paying off his men, recently returned from the three months' service, and he therefore resolved to raise a company of artillery for the new State of West Virginia. He had no difficulty in securing a sufficient number of men, many of the old company of three months' men joining him, the entire company being from Marietta and vicinity. They were accepted by Governor Pierpont, whose name they took, and were known as Buell's Pierpont battery and Battery C, First regiment West Virginia, light artillery. They left October 9th for Camp Carlisle on Wheeling Island, West Virginia. A large concourse of citizens and friends witnessed their departure. The Young

* Before the departure of the guards from Salem the ladies of that place presented the company with a fine flag, their spokesman addressing the departing volunteers in appropriate words. Their captain, Jewett Palmer, jr., responded as follows:

"Ladies of Salem: We thank you for this stand of colors; we know and fully appreciate the spirit which prompted you in procuring them for us, and knowing this we receive them promising as we do to defend them if necessary with our lives, and to return them to your hands. It may be tattered and torn, but not dishonored.

"In speaking of this noble ensign of freedom, it is not necessary to enumerate the causes which by degrees have brought about this very presentation. Suffice it to know that on the fourteenth day of April last, for the first time since this flag has had a national existence, it was struck, and that too, by fraternal hands raised in rebellion against it; therefore we consider it the duty of every loyal citizen to rally beneath its folds and march in solid phalanx to the defence of our country."

America brass band accompanied them to Wheeling, the leader and one of their number, William Jenvey, having joined the battery.

At this time Captain William Craig, of the regular army, had charge of the army stores and military depots at Bellaire, Marietta and Parkersburgh, with headquarters at Marietta. He desired to raise a regiment for the war, and was commissioned by Governor Dennison as colonel, for that purpose. He was a graduate of West Point, and was much esteemed as an officer and gentleman. The prospects for raising the regiment seemed good, and it was christened the Sixty-third Ohio volunteer infantry. Alexander L. Haskins, a civil engineer of Marietta, was appointed major, and the lieutenant colonelcy temporarily left vacant.

About the same time a vigorous movement was inaugurated to raise a regiment for Colonel Jesse Hildebrand, who stood high in the State militia service, and had strong hold upon the popular heart. He had, for a long time, been the favorite military man of the county, and many people wished to have him command a Washington county regiment. His friends had expected that he would command the Thirty-sixth, but a regular army officer was appointed. His cause was urged upon Governor Dennison, but to no purpose. The governor was hampered in some way, and could not act. He had learned by this time that there was a war department in this country, and governed his actions accordingly. Colonel Hildebrand finally tendered his service to Governor Pierpont who did not need any urging to take advantage of the situation, and at once issued a commission to Hildebrand as colonel, and ordered him to rendezvous his men at Parkersburgh. This led to an emphatic protest by the friends of the colonel.* About this time the War Department authorized Governor Dennison to commission all Ohio officers who were promised commissions by Governor Pierpont, and so the merits of Colonel Hildebrand were recognized, and he was immediately commissioned by the governor to raise a regiment of three years men in Washington county. W. De Hass

* Memorial numerously signed by citizens of the city of Marietta:

MARIETTA, OHIO, September 14, 1861.

We, the undersigned citizens of Marietta, Ohio, having felt a deep interest in the appointment of General J. Hildebrand to the command of a regiment, regret very much that the governor of Ohio refused to commission him to such command, and we regret still more that General Hildebrand is after many efforts of his numerous friends to procure for him the aforesaid command, compelled to either remain out of the service of our country or take command of a regiment in the State of Virginia, which command we understand he is about to take, and which patriotic course in him we do most sincerely and heartily endorse:

W. F. Curtis, A. N. Hill, W. A. Whittlesey, James B. Hovey, Isaac N. Goldsmith, H. B. Shipman, H. H. Drown, A. T. Nye, B. F. Hart, Arius Nye, David Alban, Davis Green, W. P. Cutler, John Mills, Douglas Putnam, E. W. Buell, James Holden, Jesse Vickers, H. Brennan, C. E. Glines, George S. Jones, William S. Ward, James M. Booth, J. S. Sprague, H. Purch, E. F. Hill, Jacob Cram, Thomas W. Ewart, J. A. Hicks, A. Finch, George W. Wilson, D. G. Mathews, Charles B. Hall, J. R. Waters, John Hall, A. L. Haskins, A. Tupper Nye, jr., Warner Green, John Scott, jr., Joseph Holden, jr., James McLeod, R. E. Harte, E. Winchester, D. B. Bosworth, S. P. Hildreth, W. H. Buell, John Marshall, John W. Thomas, A. W. McCormick, L. Sayes, Horatio Booth, C. E. Sherman, W. L. Ralston, Charles F. Buell, Hugh Donahoe, E. A. Jones, George Benedict, F. A. Lovell, J. M. Hook, E. C. Daves, W. G. Bloomfield and others.

was appointed lieutenant colonel, and Benjamin D. Fear- ing at that time serving as adjutant of the Thirty-sixth, was appointed major.

Here then were two regiments authorized to be raised at the same time, in the county, and this naturally led to some friction between the parties interested in these different organizations. The fact of Colonel Craig being a West Pointer, acted against him as well as in his favor. The volunteer could never exactly understand the regular army officers' manner and style of doing things, and they often charged him with being haughty and tyrannical with the common soldier. No doubt great injustice was done Colonel Craig in this way, but he had able defenders, and they only intensified the opposition. The result was that the Seventy-seventh was soon full and ready for service, while the Sixty-third was slow in getting men. Finally the Sixty-third was ordered to Columbus to consolidate with the Fifty-second, but that proved an unfortunate combination, and the Sixty-third returned again to Marietta for the purpose of filling up its ranks. The Twenty-second regiment, a fragmentary organization at Camp Dennison, was ordered to Marietta to consolidate with the Sixty-third, and arrived January 30, 1862. Colonel William Craig having resigned the colonelcy, John W. Sprague, a captain in the Seventh regiment, was appointed colonel, and after remaining in Camp Putnam until February 18, 1862, they received marching orders and departed for Paducah, Kentucky.

Colonel Jesse Hildebrand, immediately after being commissioned by Governor Dennison, received orders to form a camp and recruit up a regiment, which was to become the gallant Seventy-seventh. Accordingly, he chose a public square in Marietta, the Quadra-naon, and named it Camp Tupper, for General Anselem Tupper. On the south side, along the line of Third street, he built ten barracks, for as many companies, and on the elevated square in the camp, a field piece was placed for firing a morning and evening gun. The regiment was rapidly filled. Many of the recruiting lieutenants held meetings through the east side of the county, as did the Rev. William Pearce, who afterwards became the chaplain of the regiment. On January 9, 1862, the regiment received marching orders, and went to Camp Dennison.

Governor Dennison, in the fall of 1861, finding that the recruiting and handling of a large number of soldiers entailed an immense amount of labor upon the executive department, and especially on the adjutant general, resolved to systematize and divide the work so that each county would have its share, and at the same time have competent supervision and proper attention given to details incident to the service. He accordingly divided the State into military districts, which were the same as the congressional districts. Each district had over it a district military committee, appointed by the governor, and they appointed a committee of five for each county, and the county military committee appointed a committee of three in each township. These were the men to whom the governor appealed in emergencies, and they appealed directly to the people. Their duties were varied and often arduous, at times requiring their constant attention to the exclusion of all other business. They served without pay, and considering the character and value of the service rendered, deserve to be gratefully remembered.

Colonel Jesse Hildebrand.

Engd. by H. B. Hall & Sons 13 Barclay St. N.Y.

The military committee appointed in the fall of 1861 for Washington county were William R. Putnam, chairman, Samuel F. Cooke secretary, and John Newton, Mark Green, and George W. Baker.

The township committees appointed at the same time by the committees were as follows:

Adams—Dr. William F. Clark, Dennis Gibbs, Jonas Mason. Aurelius—Thomas Ellison, Samuel L. Berkley, Theodore Jevres. Barlow—J. W. Merrill, H. E. Vincent, William Breckenridge. Belpre—O. R. Loring, John Stone, Joseph Potter. Decatur—William P. Gamble, Jonah McGirr, W. C. Smith. Dunham—J. J. Hollister, William A. Chevalier, Edward McLarty. Fairfield—Dr. J. W. Marsha, John B. Farris, William Thompson. Fearing—Joseph W. Stanley, Orin Chapman, F. G. Guitteau. Grandview—Samuel F. Cooke, Moses Meeks, John Pool. Independence—John G. Thomas, Squire D. Riggs, Dr. Valentine. Lawrence—A. J. Dye, A. W. Dye, J. M. Caywood. Ludlow—George W. Harvey, Christopher Dickson, William Bell. Liberty—Jackson A. Hicks, John H. Jamison, John Roberts. Newport—Luther Edgerton, Aaron Edgell, Edgar O'Neal. Palmer—John Breckenridge, sr., J. M. Murdough, D. J. Richards. Salem—Josiah Morgan, Henry Schofield, Moses Blake. Marietta City—George Benedict, First ward; David C. Skinner, Second ward; Thomas W. Ewart, Third ward. Muskingum—Colonel William West, William F. Curtis, Johnson Bean. Harmar—David Putnam, Colonel D. Barber, Henry Fearing. Waterford—Enoch S. McIntosh, Samuel B. Robinson, Mathew Patterson. Warren—Moses Morris, Dean Briggs, August S. Bailey. Wesley—S. C. Van Law, Robert Hodgins, J. P. Bruce. Watertown—W. F. Lasure, Henry McGrew, H. L. Deming. Union—Wesley Coombs, J. B. Dyar, Samuel Maxwell.

It was upon the county military committee, however, that the most of the labor and responsibility fell. They were charged with the entire business of recruiting in their counties; and could adopt such measures to hasten the work as they thought proper. All candidates for commissions had to have an endorsement by the county committee, and they were enjoined to be very careful whom they recommended. They were also charged with collecting clothing and supplies for the army. No further praise need to be bestowed upon the conduct of the military committee of Washington county than to say that through all the emergencies and trying ordeals of four years of the war the same men first appointed were retained to the end.

In closing the year 1861 there are many things that might be said in regard to the management of military affairs outside as well as in this county, about which there was great difference of opinion at the time, but it is not the province of this history to discuss such matters nor have we room for an extended examination, but one thing should be said, at least, a word in justification of Governor Dennison. The governor was not renominated, but was passed with a commendatory resolution and David Tod, a war Democrat, taken up in his stead, and elected. Governor Dennison sought no vindication nor asked any one to defend his course, but left it to the future and the sober judgment of the citizens of Ohio to vindicate him, and he has, indeed, been fully justified. He said "Ohio must lead in the war," and he nobly endeavored to make good the promise. The war found him a plain but versatile and talented civilian, with no knowledge of military affairs and with a staff totally unacquainted with the demands and emergencies about to overtake them. When hostilities began, and the thousands of citizen soldiers began to crowd into the capital city, it was utterly impossible to meet their demands with even the barest necessities of camp life, and so on, during the succeeding weeks as each new exigency arose, it was met manfully and all demands filled as soon as possible; but Governor Dennison fully realized the great burdens imposed upon him and laid his plans to meet them, and in a short time he had so fully mastered the situation that he was enabled to give his attention to other matters than the mere details of military organization. He planned the first campaign against the enemy in West Virginia which was a grand success, but enough offence had already unavoidably been given to the volunteers, fresh from the comforts of home, to raise a great clamor against him, which extended to every part of the State from which a three months' man had come. The legislature took up the cudgel also and asked for the resignation of certain members of his staff, but the governor, firm, yet dignified, declined to dismiss them, and knowing that he was doing all that could be done, continued to work out his task, and the sequel showed that he did his work well and that a greater part of the complaints were causeless and unjustified by the facts.

When Governor Tod took the reins of government in January, 1862, he found the State fully organized and ready for a vigorous war administration. Many of the men who were subsequently to distinguish themselves and reflect honor upon their native State had already been commissioned by Governor Dennison, and gone to the field.

Mr. Whitelaw Reid, in Ohio in the War, says of the opening of Governor Tod's administration:

With trained assistants, and organized system, and the work thus gradually coming upon him, Governor Tod speedily mastered his new duties. There was no opportunity for distinguishing his administration by the redemption of a State, or the appointment of officers who were soon to reach the topmost round of popular favor, or the adoption of independent war measures during a temporary isolation from the General Government. But what there was to do he did prudently, systematically, and with such judgment as to command the general approval of his constituents.

There was, however, room for all the zeal of patriotism to have full play. The war was constantly affording opportunities for men in authority to show what they were made of, and the year 1862 furnished its full share.

The first soldier from Washington county to be killed in action was Albert W. Leonard, private of company C, Second West Virginia cavalry. He was killed in an action on Jennie's creek, Kentucky, January 7, 1862. His command was in pursuit of Humphrey Marshall, and, on turning a curve in the road, was attacked by the enemy, young Leonard falling at the first volley. He was the son of J. D. Leonard, at that time living at Matoras, but for many years previous a resident of Marietta. His captain, Thomas Neal, said of him: "Officers and men will attest to his bravery on the field, his exemplary conduct as a soldier, and his honest, upright course as a comrade."

On April 6, 1862, the great battle of Shiloh took place.

It was a momentous and memorable event, as being the first great engagement for our western troops, and one exciting especial interest in Washington county as being the first battle in which the Seventy-seventh regiment was engaged, having seven companies from this county. It was not until the ninth that the full news of the battle was received, and it revealed a tale of slaughter and suffering that startled and aroused the community. On April 10th a public meeting was called at the court house in Marietta to provide means of assistance for the wounded. Beman Gates, William F. Curtis, George M. Woodbridge, Henry Fearing, Dr. Benjamin F. Hart, and George Benedict were sent at once to Cincinnati to make arrangements with the sanitary commission for the relief of the wounded from Washington county, and if necessary to go directly to the battle-ground. Meanwhile ladies assembled at the Episcopal church and made up four boxes of hospital stores, which, together with three hundred dollars in money, were sent along with the committee. A standing committee consisting of Davis Green, W. R. Putnam, W. F. Curtis, I. W. Andrews and Stephen Newton were appointed to raise subscriptions and render such aid to the wounded as occasion might thereafter require.

In this engagement the Seventy-seventh bore a gallant part, and on the third day, while in the advance in pursuit of the enemy, were charged upon by Forest's Texan cavalry and rode down and literally cut to pieces. Their conduct was worthy of regulars. The commanding general of the division neglected to have the Union cavalry within supporting distance, which exposed the infantry to a destructive charge. General Hildebrand, in his official report, says of the battle:

Early on the morning of Sunday, 6th inst., our pickets were fired upon, and shortly after seven o'clock the enemy appeared in force, presenting himself in columns of regiments, at least four deep. He opened immediately upon our camp a heavy fire, following up rapidly with shell. I ordered an advance. The Seventy-seventh and Fifty-seventh regiments were thrown forward to occupy a certain position, but encountered the enemy in force within three hundred yards of our camp. Unfortunately, we were not supported by artillery, and were compelled to retire under cover of our camp, the engagement becoming general along the entire front of the command. A battery having been brought to support our right, the Fifty-seventh and Seventy-seventh stood gallantly side by side for four hours, contending with a force of at least four to one. The battery having been forced from its position, and the infantry both on our right and left having fallen back, it finally became necessary that the regiments forming part of my command should fall back lest their retreat be effectually cut off. The night I passed on the battlefield in company with Colonels Buckland, Cockerel, Rice and other officers.

That night was one of intense interest on both sides. Beauregard, impatient for the morning light, that he might complete the work so auspiciously begun; and Sherman and Grant hoping for Buell with his fresh divisions, to reinforce the Union army. Buell arrived and crossed, and one of his officers remarked to a gunboat officer, "We will show you some man-of-war fighting to-morrow," and they kept the promise well. Marching to the front they relieved the exhausted troops engaged the day before and drove the rebel army back, regaining the lost ground, and the victory was complete.

General Hildebrand says of Monday's battle:

On Monday morning I marched near the field of battle, forming near the rear, holding my force in readiness to enter into action at any moment, when called upon. We remained in this position, until the enemy had retreated and the victory achieved.

On the eighth instant, in compliance with your order, I marched my brigade, accompanied by a large cavalry force, also by Buckland's brigade, on the Corinth road, about four miles from camp. Halting in an open field, skirmishers were sent forward, who discovered rebel cavalry in considerable force, exhibiting a disposition to fight. The skirmishers immediately fired upon the enemy, when the Seventy-seventh regiment, under command of Lieutenant Colonel De Hass, was ordered up to support them. Soon after forming in line a large body of cavalry made a bold and dashing charge on the skirmishers and the whole regiment. So sudden and rapid was the charge, shooting our men with carbines and revolvers, that they had not time to reload, and fell back, hoping our cavalry would cover the retreat. Unhappily our own cavalry was not sufficiently near to render essential assistance. The rebel cavalry literally rode down our infantry, shooting, sabering, and trampling them under foot. We sustained a loss in killed, wounded, and missing of fifty-seven—nineteen killed on the spot, thirty wounded, and the balance missing. Of the latter, two captains and one second lieutenant are numbered. Captain A. W. McCormick and Captain A. Chandler were meritorious officers. This I may also say of Lieutenant Criswell.

With regard to the officers and men who participated in the battle of Pittsburgh, and the affair of Tuesday, I am happy to bear testimony to the fidelity, bravery, and devotion of all.

Major B. D. Fearing, who was immediately in command of the Seventy-seventh regiment, acquitted himself with as much skill, bravery and military bearing as an old officer of long experience, and was not excelled by any other field officer who came under my observation.

In a letter to his wife the general says:

To the credit of the Seventy-seventh and Fifty-seventh be it said, that they fought on their own ground for four hours, against at least four times their number, nor did they fall back in the least until completely overpowered with numbers, and to show how well they fought over two hundred rebels fell and lay dead on the battle-ground in front of our lines, besides double that number wounded, while there were not fifty in both of our regiments, killed, and about a hundred and fifty wounded. I was in the fight all day Sunday, but on Monday held my command as a reserve, ready to bring it into action at any minute needed. The shells and balls flew as thick as hailstones around me on Sunday, but still I came out untouched.

The Seventy-seventh has lost in killed, wounded and missing over two hundred, and, in short, I may say that the Seventy-seventh was in the hardest and most important part of the engagement. The rebels fought like devils; they were determined to whip us. They had the best of the battle on Sunday, but we returned the compliment on Monday! I cannot describe to you the awfulness of this most terrible battle, but if I ever live to get home I will try to give you some idea of what it was like.

The roll of killed, wounded and missing of the Seventy-seventh sufficiently attests the brave stand they made. The following is a recapitulation of the whole number:

Company A—4 killed, 13 wounded, 3 missing; total, 20. Company B—4 killed, 10 wounded, 6 missing; total, 20. Company C—3 killed, 10 wounded, 3 missing; total, 16. Company D—5 killed, 18 wounded; total, 23. Company E—6 killed, 13 wounded, 10 missing; total, 29. Company F—2 killed, 11 wounded, 1 missing; total, 14. Company G—9 killed, 10 wounded, 11 missing; total, 30. Company H—4 killed, 8 wounded, 19 missing; total, 31. Company I—11 wounded; total, 11. Company K—5 killed, 9 wounded, 16 missing; total, 30. Total—42 killed, 113 wounded, 69 missing—Total, 224.

Colonel Hildebrand himself exhibited fine, soldierly qualities in this action, and when the Union line was driven back on Sunday he was of great service in rallying the men, not only of his own brigade but of other brigades, and his portly figure and fearless demeanor inspired many a company with renewed confidence and turned them again to the front; and he was, no doubt, of great service in saving the army from complete rout before overpowering numbers.

Colonel T. C. H. Smith, of the First Ohio volunteer cavalry, in a letter to George M. Woodbridge, of Marietta, written from the field of battle, April 12, says:

"Hildebrand and Fearing showed distinguished courage. The first account I had of Hildebrand was from a major of the Fifteenth Illinois, who, unasked, gave me an account of their part in the fight, of their being surprised and their field officers killed, etc. While we were scattered there came along a Colonel Hildebrand rallying the men. I don't know what State he is from, or what his regiment is, but he showed grit. We rallied under him, and fought there until they sent Lieutenant Colonel ——— to command us."

On the twenty-sixth of May the startling news was received that Washington city was about to be attacked, followed by a dispatch from the governor of the State calling for troops. The call designated three classes that would be received for the term of three years, for the term of three months, and for guard duty within the State, and saying: "Everything is valueless to us if our Government is overthrown."

This dispatch was accompanied by another, directed to the Washington county military committee, as follows:

"Astounding as the fact may be, Washington city is in imminent danger. You will please raise, without delay, one hundred men, and send them as fast as raised to Camp Chase, where they will be organized and equipped; and such as are not willing to proceed to Washington will perform guard duty in place of the regiment now at Camp Chase.

DAVID TOD, Governor."

A meeting of citizens was immediately called to take action. Upon assembling at the usual place of holding such meetings in Marietta, R. H. Harte was chosen chairman, and G. R. Rosseter, secretary. Judge Green then addressed the assembly, and was followed by William R. Putnam, who made a stirring appeal to men of all ages to respond promptly to the call of their country. Rev. D. H. Moore, a Methodist minister of Marietta, spoke, saying that he "had held back from enlisting by the advice of his friends long enough, and now he was bound to go at all hazards." The court house was filled to overflowing, and this declaration of the reverend gentleman had a stirring effect. Others followed in patriotic appeals, and enlistment rolls being circulated quite a number of names were secured. The students of Marietta college held a meeting and twenty-five young men offered themselves as volunteers.

The following is the closing part of an appeal sent out through the country as a hand-bill:

We call upon our fellow citizens at once to stand forth for their country in this emergency! Your country calls, and it is the duty of patriotic citizens to obey the call! Old Washington to the rescue! Volunteers along the banks of the Muskingum river should be in readiness to take the steamer for Zanesville on Wednesday. Volunteers from other parts of the county will report themselves immediately to the undersigned at Marietta.

WILLIAM R. PUTNAM,

Chairman military committee Washington county.

Marietta, May 26, 1862.

On the twenty-eighth the company embarked on the steamer Ema Graham for Zanesville, and a large concourse of citizens assembled on the commons at Marietta to see them embark. The company was named the Putnam guards, in honor of Judge William R. Putnam, chairman of the military committee. On arriving at Camp Chase they elected Rev. D. R. Moore captain, who was afterwards lieutenant colonel of the Eighty-seventh when in the three years' service; E. S. Aleshire, first lieutenant, and J. R. Jenkins, second lieutenant, and became company A, Eighty-seventh regiment. This regiment was at Harper's Ferry, under Colonel Mills, when the surrender took place, and were parolled, their time being out.

On the second of July, 1862, the President called for three hundred thousand more volunteers for three years, and Ohio's quota was about forty thousand. Governor Tod issued an earnest appeal to the military committees and the citizens of the State, calling upon them to furnish the men. The military committee of the county resolved that old Washington should not be behind in any emergency, and invited a general meeting of the citizens of the county in Marietta, on July 19th. Meantime a meeting of the military committees of the counties comprising the third military district was held in Marietta, to promote concerted action, and to provide officers for the new regiment, which was to be the Ninety-second.

On the fifteenth of July they assembled, members present:

Athens: J. M. Dana, T. F. Wildes, W. R. Golden, and W. T. Brown.

Meigs: J. V. Smith, G. W. Cooper, J. J. White, D. A. Smith, and George Eiselstein.

Noble: E. G. Dudley, Jabez Belford, W. H. Frazier, and Dr. M. Martin.

Washington, William R. Putnam, G. W. Barker, John Newton, and S. F. Cooke.

Monroe: Not represented.

Colonel William R. Putnam, chairman; J. M. Dana, and J. Belford, secretaries.

A committee consisting of G. W. Cooper, of Meigs, E. G. Dudley, of Noble, W. R. Golden and G. W. Barker, of Washington, having been appointed to devise a plan of organization for the new regiment, reported that the several counties of the district should furnish the following number of companies: Washington, three; Noble, two; Monroe, two; Athens, one, and Meigs, one. Monroe county not being represented they adjourned until July 22d, and upon the adjourned meeting elected officers for the Ninety-second regiment, and passed the resolutions following:

Resolved, that we pledge ourselves one to another, to use all diligence in recruiting our respective portions of the Ninety-second regiment, and that we will exert ourselves to the extent of our ability to maintain harmony and good feeling in our proceedings, upon which we feel will depend, to a great degree, our success, as well in recruiting as in every other branch of the service in this military district.

Resolved, that we call upon every loyal man in this military district to aid us with his might and strength and means to recruit the men called for to fill up the Ninety-second regiment.

Resolved, that we go home and go to work.

Resolved, that we make everybody else go to work.

With this declaration of purpose to raise a regiment for the war these gentlemen went home, and we shall presently see with what success.

The mass convention of the citizens of the county, called to meet on the nineteenth of July, assembled at the courthouse in Marietta, at ten o'clock A. M. of that day, and Colonel David Barber, of Harmar, was chosen chairman, and S. B. Robinson, of Beverly, secretary.

The object of the meeting having been stated by the chairman of the military committee, the following gentlemen were appointed to report resolutions: R. E. Harte, Davis Green, C. R. Rhodes, E. S. McIntosh, and Douglas Putnam. After the resolutions had been prepared Mr. Harte reported them, and they were unanimously adopted; they declared the confidence of the citizens of the county in the Government and in the power of the country to sustain itself in the struggle for equal rights and in the integrity of the Union, and pledged anew the men and means of the county to carry out the war to a successful issue. After remarks by George Benedict and William F. Curtis, an effort was inaugurated to raise a fund to assist in recruiting three hundred men in the county for the new regiment. Two thousand one hundred dollars was raised in about five minutes. In the afternoon Hon. W. P. Cutler, having returned from a session of Congress, made an eloquent and forcible speech upon the situation of public affairs. Further subscriptions raised the total to three thousand five hundred and fifteen dollars. This amount was further increased to four thousand and twenty-six dollars by the twenty-fourth of July, Henry Fearing, of Harmar, donating a house and lot in Beverly, worth nine hundred dollars. August 1st, the war fund amounted to five thousand and eighty-one dollars. William Pitt Putnam, of Belpre, obligated himself to pay eight dollars a month to two volunteers and a third volunteer fifteen dollars bounty.

On July 28th the following despatch was received at Marietta.

PARKERSBURGH, July 28, 1862—1:50 P. M.

To the mayor of Marietta:

Send us all the men and arms you can at once. We are about to be attacked by a force of rebels.

M. P. AMISS, mayor.

Soon one hundred men were raised, and Lieutenant George T. Rice, being home on recruiting service from the Thirty-ninth regiment, was placed in command, as captain, also Lieutenant Robert Booth, of the Sixty-third regiment, and Lieutenant C. B. Way, of the Eleventh Virginia were appointed lieutenants, and Manly Warren, orderly sergeant. They marched to the depot to take a train for the beleagured city, but there received a second dispatch "we are not yet attacked and no reinforcements are needed now."

On August 4th the call for a draft of three hundred thousand nine months' men came, and this, in addition to the calls for three years' men, made the quota of Washington county under both at two thousand and thirty. The total number of enrolled militia at that date was six thousand and eighty-nine, making two calls equal to about thirty-three per cent. of the whole number of militia in the county.

The draft commissioner for this county was George Benedict; provost marshal, William F. Curtis, of Marietta; examining surgeon, Dr. James Little, of Beverly. After several postponements by Governor Tod the draft finally took place on October 1st as follows: Adams, eleven; Barber, nine; Fairfield, four; Fearing, fifteen; Grandview, six; Independence, two; Lawrence, nine; Liberty, six; Ludlow, ten; Palmer, three; Union, one;

Warren, seven; Watertown, seven; Wesley, sixteen—total, one hundred and seven, which was afterwards increased to one hundred and thirty-one. A great effort was made to save the county from the draft, and large sums of money were raised in all parts of the county to facilitate enlistments. Barlow was down for over two hundred dollars; Waterford, over twelve hundred dollars in addition to one thousand dollars subscribed to the county war fund previously. To this must be added large sums in every township, of which we can find no record, running up into the thousands. It should be said, however, in regard to drafted men from this county, that a greater portion of them volunteered for three years when they reached Camp Dennison, and some even before. Noble county had over three hundred men drafted, Monroe sixty-one, Morgan one hundred and sixty-seven, and Muskingum two hundred and ninety-three, Gallia two hundred and seventeen. Athens, Lawrence and Scioto escaped.

Judge William R. Putnam having been placed in command of the post at Marietta, with rank of colonel, was authorized to lease ground and erect additional barracks. Accordingly, in September, of 1862, he selected a site which, at that time, lay between the fair grounds and the Muskingum river, and constructed quarters to accommodate the new regiment. By the nineteenth of September the Ninety-second regiment was complete; it contained as good material as any regiment from this part of the State, the men being from among the best citizens of the district, and its subsequent history fully justified the expectation of its friends. The time in camp at Marietta was devoted to drill and disciplining the men for active service. On October 7th they received orders to march, and left Camp Putnam for Gallipolis. Many of those who marched out on that October day with such fine martial bearing were destined never to return. Again Washington county was sending forth her bravest and best, but the sacrifice was not considered too great for the issues at stake.

On October 12th the battle of South Mountain was fought, in which the Thirty-sixth was engaged. It was in this battle that the future brigade commander of the Thirty-sixth was severely wounded—Colonel Rutherford B. Hayes, the successor of Grant to the Presidency. On the seventeenth of July the Thirty-sixth was hotly engaged in the great battle of Antietam, in which its colonel, Melvin Clarke, was killed, and losing heavily in non-commissioned officers and men.

The great battle of Corinth took place on October 4th, resulting in a crushing defeat to the armies of Price and Van Dorn, and not without great loss to the Union army. The Sixty-third regiment, containing two companies of Washington county men, stood the brunt of the charge at Fort Robinet, and lost very heavily in officers and men—fully forty-five per cent. Colonel J. W. Sprague, of that regiment, said of his regiment: "The loss of my regiment has been terrible, but I have the consolation of believing that no braver or truer set of men were ever taken into battle. Every officer distinguished himself for gallantry and daring."

In October, 1862, Captain Arthur D. Eells, recruited a company of cavalry for a new regiment authorized by the governor. Captain Eells' company was recruited very rapidly, as he was a popular man and had seen service as captain of company F, Second West Virginia cavalry, from which position he resigned in May, 1862, on account of ill-health, but by October of the same year was again engaged in the service of his country, as captain of company H, Seventh Ohio volunteer cavalry. At the date of leaving for the front the company had one hundred and one men, officered as follows: Captain, Arthur Eells, First Lieutenant, William L. Tripp, Second Lieutenant, John J. Smith.

The year 1862 was one of great military activity in Washington county. Over two thousand men were sent out, many to fill up old regiments, but the greater part to form new organizations, which were, in the main, recruited for three years' service. The danger of invasion from Virginia had thoroughly aroused the county, and the militia companies throughout the townships were called out for drill at regular intervals. The citizens of Marietta during the summer closed their places of business at four o'clock p. m., and all the able-bodied men, including the Silver Grays, turned out to drill.

On Tuesday, August 26th, Colonel William R. Putnam, commandant of Camp Marietta, received a dispatch from Governor Tod, saying, "You are in danger of invasion on the border; prepare for it." The citizens of Marietta then had the following companies: Silver Grays, Captain D. P. Bosworth, First Lieutenant C. J. Shepard, Second Lieutenant R. E. Harte; Home Guards, Captain Charles R. Rhodes, First Lieutenant James Lewis, Second Lieutenant John B. Dutton; First ward company, Captain Robert Booth, First Lieutenant Dan Y. Booth, Second Lieutenant Philip Schramm; Second ward company, Captain R. E. Harte (promoted from Silver Grays), First Lieutenant Samuel C. Skinner, Second Lieutenant Lewis Theiss; Third ward company, Captain John S. Conley, First Lieutenant S. J. Dutton, Second Lieutenant Joseph S. Stephens; Bloomfield Guards, Captain Nathaniel F. Bishop, First Lieutenant Joseph E. Hall, jr., Second Lieutenant D. A. Belden; Putnam Light Artillery, Captain A. T. Nye, jr., Lieutenant Charles A. Hall, Gunner John Hall. On September 13th Ernst Lindner having resigned as adjutant of the Thirty-sixth regiment and residing for the time being in Marietta, was placed in command of the companies of Marietta and Harmar, by order of the commandant of the Washington county militia. The companies were placed as follows: A, Captain Charles R. Rhodes; B, Captain Rufus E. Harte; C, Captain Nathaniel F. Bishop; D, Captain Oscar Underwood; E, Captain Robert Booth; F, Captain I. W. Andrews; G, Captain D. P. Bosworth; H, Captain Casper Crouss; I, Captain John W. Conley; K, Captain W. B. Hollister. Smith J. Dutton was appointed adjutant, and D. P. Bosworth, jr., sergeant major; George Payne, sr., drum major. We give these details to show how pressing the emergency was considered and how the men of those days rallied to meet it. The city of Marietta was laid off for the purposes of guard duty into beats, and for many weeks the night patrol paced the streets expecting a border foray.

Many brave sons of Washington county fell in the year 1862, among them Captain Frank Buell, Captain Theodore Greenwood, Colonel Melvin Clarke, and Lieutenant J. J. Steenrod.

The closing event of the year was the arrival in the county of Major General J. D. Cox and staff on December 7th, who established at Marietta the headquarters of the department of West Virginia, which included the State of West Virginia and the bordering counties of Ohio from Wheeling to the Big Sandy. General Cox remained until April 8, 1863, when he went to Columbus, Ohio, having been assigned to a new command.

CHAPTER XVIII.

WAR OF THE REBELLION—CONTINUED.

Battle of Stone River—Emancipation—Secret Political Organizations—Battle of Chancellorsville—Lee's Army Invades the North—Battle of Gettysburgh—Capture of Vicksburgh—The Morgan Raid—Battles of Chickamauga and Mission Ridge—The Brough Campaign—The Veterans Reenlist—Death of Colonel Jesse Hildebrand—Beginning of Governor Brough's Administration—New Militia Law—Conference of the War Governors—Call of Governor Brough for Thirty Thousand Ohio National Guards—Departure of the One Hundred and Forty-eighth Ohio National Guard—General Steele's Arkansas Expedition—Battle of Marks Mills and Capture of the Seventy-seventh Regiment—Raid of Hunter, Crook and Averill—The Great Plank Movements of Grant and Sherman—The Atlanta Campaign—Sherman's Movements to the Right—March to the Sea—March Through the Carolinas—Battles of Averysborough and Bentonville—General Sheridan in the Shenandoah Valley—Battles of Opequan, Fisher's Hill and Cedar Creek—Battle of Nashville—Army of the Potomac—Battles of the Wilderness—Petersburgh—Sheridan's Raid—Wilson's Great Raid—Grant's Movements to the Left—Evacuation of Richmond—Surrender of Lee at Appomattox—Great Rejoicing—Assassination of President Lincoln—The Soldier Becomes a Citizen Again.

THE year 1863—the great battle year of the war—was ushered in by two important events: the memorable battle of Stone River and the emancipation proclamation striking the shackles from three millions of slaves. Washington county had not been strongly for the abolition of slavery, but the fierce logic of war had convinced the most conservative that the time had come and they heartily approved the action of Abraham Lincoln when he issued the emancipation edict to take effect January 1, 1863, and the grand Union party of Ohio, which swept everything before it in the great political contest of the year, endorsed the conduct of the war by a hundred thousand majority for John Brough. The partisan feeling that characterized this campaign was something fearful to contemplate, the party of the Union could brook no resistance, and there was a strong tendency to brand as traitors all who were not in its ranks, when in fact many good and true men of the opposition were devoted to their country and to the preservation of the Union; but some of the opposition were not for the Union or the war, and were so outspoken and active in their course that they were arrested in their course as was their leader C. L. Vallandigham, but not like him arrested, tried, convicted and sent south.

On the thirty-first of March the citizens of Marietta, Harmar and vicinity formed what was known as the Union league, with the object of binding together all loyal men of all trades and professions, in a common union to maintain the power, glory and integrity of the Nation, to spare no endeavor to maintain unimpaired the National unity, both in principle and territorial boundary, and to vote for no man for office whose loyalty is questionable or who is not willing to support the principles set forth in the foregoing declaration. The officers elected were George M. Woodbridge, president; H. H. Brown, vice-president; S. S. Porter, secretary; W. F. Curtis, treasurer; M. H. Needham, J. H. Best, Daniel Y. Hill, John M. Hook, W. S. Ward, Thomas F. Jones, Beman Gates, Lewis Lenhart, B. F. Pixley, W. W. Hutchinson, George E. Stratton, and William H. Smith, executive committee. The formation of this society was doubtless prompted by the formation of lodges of Knights of the Golden Circle and Sons of Liberty in the county by the opposition.

On the first of May occurred the great battle of Chancellorsville in which Huntington's, DeBeck's and Pierpont's batteries were engaged, and when J. F. Huntington's battery H, First Ohio light artillery, made a gallant stand against great odds holding the enemy in check until deserted by the supporting infantry. For his conduct in this battle Captain Huntington was promoted to chief of artillery of his division.

In the same action Colonel Rufus R. Dawes, an old Washington county boy, bore a conspicuous part, in carrying out Fighting Joe Hooker's plans for crossing the Rappahannock prior to the battle. A surgeon of the Sixth Wisconsin, which regiment Lieutenant Colonel Dawes then commanded, was an eye-witness to the achievement. He says:

The steep bank on the opposite side was lined with rifle pits from which our troops on this side tried in vain for several hours to dislodge the enemy. It was impossible to lay the pontoon bridges on which to cross the corps until the rifle pits were cleared, and to throw troops across in boats for this purpose was a necessary condition of success.

It was regarded by all as a most desperate and perilous undertaking, and none but troops of tried valor could be relied on.

The Sixth Wisconsin was one of the two regiments (Twenty-fourth Michigan was the other) which had the honor of being the "forlorn hope" selected to cross the river and carry the heights beyond. When the order was given to "fall in" not a man faltered or hesitated a moment, though fully conscious of the danger he was to meet. I shook hands with Lieutenant Colonel Dawes, as I honestly believed for the last time, and said "God bless and protect you." Our troops double-quickened down the slope on this side, sprang into the boats, and pushed out boldly across the river under a perfect storm of bullets. The river, which is about one hundred and fifty yards wide at this point, was soon passed, and our brave men sprang ashore, dashed up the hill, capturing the rebels in the rifle pits, and in less than twenty minutes from the time the order to march was given on this side, our regiment was formed in line of battle on the top of the opposite shores. Lieutenant Colonel Dawes stood up in the boats while crossing, and assisted in pushing his boat along, and seized the colors to rally the regiment as soon as a landing was effected. I rejoiced greatly when I saw the rebels on the opposite side "skedaddling" in fine disorder. It seemed a miracle no more were hurt.

Early in June the threatening movements of the enemy under Lee alarmed the cabinet at Washington, and the President issued a call for one hundred thousand six months' men to be raised in the States of Maryland, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and West Virginia. Lee had divided his army into three grand divisions, cut loose from the base, and it was reported that one of these divisions was intended for the invasion of West Virginia and Ohio, another to strike the western part of Pennsylvania, and the third to invade Maryland. Under this call Ohio was to have furnished thirty thousand men, but the call for six months was soon found to be very injudicious, and two thousand was the total number from Ohio, of which none were from Washington county. Lee's movements were witnessed with great alarm, but it was soon evident that he was not expecting to divide his forces but bent on taking Philadelphia and New York, and carrying the war into the north.

The Rebel invasion culminated at Gettysburgh, where he was met by General Meade with the army of the Potomac, and the greatest battle of the war and the one most momentous in the results involved, was fought. Washington county was represented by Buell's Pierpoint battery, Huntington battery and DeBeck's battery under command of Captain J. F. Huntington. They fought nobly and stood to their guns as only veterans can. Who can describe the battle, who will ever adequately chronicle the deeds of heroism there enacted? It will never be done. Lines of battle five miles long, Round Top, Cemetery Hill, Culp's Hill, Wolf Hill, Power's Hill, Benner's Hill, all the scenes of charge and counter-charge, and all in one great battle. Let us take a bit out of this great master-piece, this crowd of heroic achievements and let it stand for all the rest: "Agate" then the nom de plume of Whitelaw Reid, correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazette, wrote:

Let me give one phase of the fight—fit type of many more. Some Massachusetts batteries—Bigelow's Captain Phillip's, and Captain McGilroy, of Maine—were planted on the extreme left, advanced, now well down to the Emmitsburgh road, with infantry in their front—the first division, I think, of Sickles' corps. A little after five, a fierce rebel charge drove back the infantry and menaced the batteries. Orders are sent Bigelow on the extreme left, to hold his position at every hazard short of sheer annihilation, till a couple more batteries can be brought to his support. Reserving his fire a little, then with depressed guns opening with double charges of grape and canister, he smites and shatters, but cannot break the advancing line. His grape and canister are exhausted, and still, closing grandly up over their slain, on they come. He falls back on spherical case, and pours this in at the shortest range. On, still onward, comes the artillery defying line, and still he holds his position. They are within six paces of the guns—he fires again, once more, and he blows devoted soldiers from his very muzzles. And, still mindful of that solemn order, he holds his place, they spring upon his carriages, and shoot down his horses! And then, his Yankee artillerymen still about him, he seizes the guns by hand, and from the very front of that line drags two of them off. The caissons are further back—five out of the six are saved. That single company, in that half hour's fight, lost thirty-three of its men, including every sergeant it had. The captain himself was wounded. Yet it was the first time it was ever under fire! I give it simply as a type. So they fought along that fiery line!

The rebels now poured on Phillips' battery, and it, too, was forced to drag off the pieces by hand, when the horses were shot down. From a new position, it opened again; and at last the two reinforcing batteries came up on the gallop. An enfilading fire swept the rebel line: Sickles' gallant infantry charged, the rebel line swept back on a reflux tide—we regained the lost ground, and every gun just lost in this splendid fight.

Buell's battery was in the thickest of the fight and fired over twelve hundred rounds. De Beck's battery lost two pieces. Huntington's battery was forced to retire for fresh ammunition. Let Captain Huntington tell the story himself:—"Started from Taneytown with my brigade, at 4 A. M., second inst., reached Gettysburg at 2 P. M., and about four o'clock was ordered to relieve some of the First corps, who were in the battle the day before. Position of our army peculiar, the line forming a triangle with the apex towards the enemy, whose line was in front around ours, we having the advantage of being able to throw troops across, while the enemy had to go around. The salient part of our line was an elevated piece of ground just on the edge of town, on which was a beautiful cemetery, and here, at the centre, my batteries were posted—a position fine for artillery, yet quite exposed, being swept by rebel batteries in front and on our left flank. Shelling was going on vigorously, when we took position, and we replied with great vigor. Meanwhile the tremendous attack was made on our left. Had this been successful every battery on the hill must have been taken, as our only line of retreat was by the Baltimore pike, directly in our rear. At one time when our left was forced back by a tremendous charge of the enemy, I thought "the jig was up" with us, but fresh troops were just brought up, and the enemy fell suddenly back. Just before dark, another column attacked our batteries on the hill, which were supported by part of the Eleventh corps, who, as their custom is, gave way, and part of Captain Ricketts' battery of my brigade, in the extreme front, was actually taken. General Carroll, with his brigade, of old Shields' fire-eaters, came up just in the nick of time. Carroll sung out, 'Where is Huntington?' 'Here I am, general,' I said. 'I am sent here' he continued, 'to support something or some one—where is the enemy?' I showed him their advancing line, and he commanded, 'Forward! double quick march!' And in they went, turned the advancing rebels, and saved the batteries. It was sharp while it lasted. Ricketts' battery lost seventeen killed and wounded and five prisoners in that charge." We quote further:

The night was spent in preparing for the struggle of the next day (July 3rd). At 4 A. M., Friday, the enemy attacked the right of our line. From that to eleven the musketry never slackened for a single moment. Such a sustained fire I never heard before, and to look at the place it was terrible. The rebels charged up a hill against log breast-works, lined with our splendid infantry. I was on the ground afterwards. It was a sickening sight. In one place I traced the line of an entire company, shot dead where they stood, with the captain at his post. Here General Ewell's adjutant general was killed, while trying to rally his men.

After this fight there was a lull, but about 2 P. M., while a knot of officers were lying down near my battery to avoid the sharpshooters, who were constantly firing at us, all at once there came a most terrible storm of iron. They had been quietly placing their batteries in position, and opened at a signal. The howling of the shells, the deadly hiss of the solid Wentworth, and the crash of the twelve-pound spherical case, was awful beyond description. Most of the fire came from the left, and my battery was then faced to the front; we had to change the position of the guns under that fire. For the first time the men of battery H hesitated to obey my orders; but they were almost exhausted by fatigue and intense heat, and it was only for a moment that they forgot their duty. We soon had our guns around, and opened one section to the left, another to the front, and the third I could not work for the want of men able to stand on their feet. Captain Wallace Hill's battery (Pierpoint) behaved most nobly. I never saw guns served better than theirs, until they fired their last round. I ordered them to leave the field, and replaced them with Captain Edgell's (New Hampshire) battery. Meanwhile, my own was about exhausted, and, feeling the importance of maintaining the fire at this point, I started to the reserve headquarters, with Orderly Fred Regnir, to run the gauntlet of the enemy's batteries for a mile, every shot that came over our batteries striking in our track—no pleasure trip to be sure—but we got through. Could obtain no relief, as every battery was already engaged. Starting back, I met my battery coming out, its ammunition exhausted, and one piece dismounted by solid shot. Under cover of this fire the enemy made their last charge on our left, suffered awfully, and were utterly routed—their last effort.

General Grant, after a series of battles and brilliant manoeuvres around Vicksburgh, had penned up the rebel General Pemberton, and by July 4th had compelled him to surrender. The fourth of July, 1863, was a glad day for the National cause. "To whom shall we Grant the Meade of praise?" was telegraphed throughout the country; but Grant's star was in the ascendant. Meade's victory was grand, but his tactics were defensive, while Grant's were aggressive. These victories occasioned general rejoicing. The friends of the Union throughout the north now saw the beginning of the end. The gloom that had overshadowed the past year was dissipated, and the name of Grant was thenceforth to be the watchword to victory and the omen of success.

THE MORGAN RAID.

It was in July of 1863 that John Morgan made his raid through southern Ohio, passing through Washington county, an account of which follows.

John Morgan, with his bold troopers, had, up to July, 1863, made numerous raids and forays across the mountains of eastern Kentucky and Tennessee into the Blue Grass region of Kentucky. These forays were a source of alarm to the Unionist, and exultation to the secessionist. He generally captured all the good horses within his reach, provoked a vigorous pursuit, and although he uniformly had to get out much faster than he came in, he generally accomplished all that he set out to.

Encouraged by his successes he planned a grand raid to the northward, which should give the northern people a taste of war as well as the sunny south. General Bragg, however, ordered Morgan not to go beyond the State of Kentucky. Bragg was then confronted by General Rosecrans, at Stone River, and the object sought to be accomplished was to strike the communications and rear of the Union army, and divert the flanking columns of Rosecrans from annoying Bragg, the supposition being that a strong force sent to the rear would engage the attention of a large part of the Union cavalry, and the sequel proved this to be true.

Collecting a body of cavalry, numbering about two thousand five hundred men, with two twenty-pound Parrot rifle cannon and four other guns of lighter metal, he was ready for the enterprise. Basil Duke, the "brains of John Morgan," was second in command, with Colonels Cluke, Dick Morgan, and others of lesser note commanding regiments.

He crossed the Cumberland at Burkesville, Kentucky, * Letter to Mrs. Huntington July 6th.

July 3, 1863, and, marching rapidly north, drove or evaded all the Union forces that disputed his progress, and on the eighth arrived on the banks of the Ohio at Bradenburgh, Kentucky. He gave out as he went that he should attack Louisville. He captured two steamers, the J. J. McCoombs and Alice Dean, and disregarding his instructions, crossed the Ohio, burned the steamers, and disappeared among the hills of Indiana.

General Judah, commanding the Union cavalry in Kentucky, began at once a vigorous pursuit. Colonel Garrard, of the Seventh Ohio cavalry, in command of a brigade composed of the Seventh and Second Ohio cavalry, Forty-fifth Ohio mounted infantry, Law's howitzer battery, and the First Kentucky cavalry, started the same day Morgan crossed the Cumberland, where Garrard had been watching him, and was joined, at Bardstown, Kentucky, by General Hobson with Shackelford's brigade, consisting of the Third, Eighth, Ninth, and Twelfth Kentucky cavalry, and two pieces of artillery. Hobson assumed command, and the whole force hurried on after the raider.

Morgan, after getting safely across into Indiana, gave out, seemingly as in confidence, to prisoners, that he was moving on Indianapolis, but immediately afterwards bore off to the eastward, crossed the Ohio line, and was soon in the neighborhood of Cincinnati. Upon nearing that city he gave out that he expected to attack Hamilton, but instead passed by so close to the great city that part of his command, embarrassed by the darkness and the labyrinth of streets in the suburbs, came near losing their way. This was the night of July 13th.

General Burnside was in command in Cincinnati and General Judah was there also hurrying up with fresh cavalry.

Ohio was soon thoroughly aroused. Governor Tod, July 12th, issued a proclamation calling out the militia of all the southern and southwestern counties.

Morgan, no doubt, endeavored to enhance the prevailing alarm, hoping to make his escape more certain amid the general uproar before any definite or concerted action could be taken to intercept him. Onward he went eastward, his men plundering everybody without fear or favor, through the counties of Warren, Clermont, Brown, Adams, Pike, Jackson, and Meigs, while detachments from the main body made detours through other counties, and the whole body bringing up at Portland, near Buffington's Island, on the evening of the eighteenth, and would doubtless have crossed at once but for the threatening appearance of an earthwork then and there appearing.

Morgan had run the gauntlet of the militia through the State, with Hobson but a few hours in the rear, eager to bring the raider to bay after the long pursuit. Tired, jaded and harassed, and withal heavily loaded with booty, the rebels rested at the river, expecting in the morning to make a short job of the earthwork and cross to the Virginia shore.

Let us now turn to the scene of operations in Washington county, and see what was being done there to capture the bold raider.

Governor Tod, in his proclamation, had ordered "all the militia companies in Washington, Monroe, Noble, Meigs, Morgan, Perry, Hocking, and Athens, to report forthwith to Colonel William R. Putnam at Camp Marietta, who was to organize them into battalions or regiments and appoint temporary officers therefor." Immediately following the proclamation came a telegram from Governor Tod to Colonel Putnam, stating that three thousand militia had been ordered to Marietta. At this date there were one hundred and seventy-five six months' men in camp, including company A, One Hundred and Twenty-eighth Ohio volunteer infantry. Governor Tod telegraphed on the fourteenth that Morgan had crossed the Little Miami, and was probably making for some ford near Marietta. Colonel Putnam at once began to act—first, to prevent Morgan crossing the Ohio; second, to keep him west of the Muskingum; and, third, to shut his forces between the Ohio river and Marietta & Cincinnati railroad if possible. He therefore set about guarding the fords as the first part of the programme. On the fourteenth there were four hundred and fifty-seven men in camp, but no arms had arrived, although a thousand stand had been promised by the governor. At this time Captain D. L. Wood, of the Eighteenth United States infantry, was stationed at Marietta, and Lieutenant J. W. Conine, aide-de-camp to General Cox, was in immediate command of the six months' men at Camp Marietta. On July 10th the following order was issued:

HEADQUARTERS, CAMP MARIETTA, O., July 15, 1863.

Special Order No. 1.

The following companies now at camp are hereby detached under command of Captain D. L. Wood, Eighteenth United States infantry, and will put themselves in readiness to march:

Marietta artillery company, Lieutenant Nye commanding.

Volunteer mounted company, Captain Bloomfield commanding.

Company A, One Hundred and Twenty-eighth Ohio volunteer infantry, Captain Stedman commanding.

Captain J. P. Putnam's company, Captain Putnam commanding.

Post Quartermaster Croxton will provide transportation and forage for five (5) days for fifty (50) horses. Post Commissary R. B. Treat will turn over to Charles Jones (who will act as quartermaster of the detachment), twelve hundred and fifty (1250) rations.

Surgeon S. D. Hart will be acting surgeon.

By order of WM. R. PUTNAM,

Colonel Commanding.

Captain Woods instructions were as follows:

You are hereby ordered to assume command of the troops detached by special order No. 1 of this date, and proceed with them to the ford below Parkersburgh, where you will make such disposition as you deem fit and proper to prevent the rebel forces now in the State from crossing at that place.

WM. R. PUTNAM,

Colonel Commanding.

But now an unforeseen difficulty arose. Lieutenant Cornine refused to allow the United States troops in Camp Marietta to be moved without orders from a higher source. Governor Tod was telegraphed, and all that day spent in waiting for an answer. The answer came finally ordering Lieutenant Cornine to obey all orders from Colonel Putnam, and Captain Wood started early on the morning of the sixteenth. The expedition numbered about three hundred men. The cannon were two iron pieces that had been used in Marietta and Harmar for firing salutes, and the arms for the infantry and cavalry were such as could be hastily gathered in the city and Camp

Marietta. Captain Wood reached Blennerhasset island the same day, and began entrenching, informing Colonel Putnam by telegraph of the fact. Captain Wood had stopped short of the point intended to be covered by the movement. At this time four thousand two hundred and fifty-nine men reported for duty, and Captain R. B. Wilson, of Meigs county, was ordered to proceed to Mason City, West Virginia, with his company and that of Captain George G. Woodward armed as infantry, to prevent Morgan crossing at that point. On the same day (seventeenth) the following order was sent to Captain Wood, at Blennerhasset island:

The shoal at the foot of Blennerhasset island is deemed impracticable on account of quicksand. The ford you were to guard is at the foot of Buffington's island. You will therefore take your forces to that point. Use the flats and steamer Logan in conjunction with Captain Wilson, in transporting your forces, sending baggage overland, if necessary. Delay Captain Wilson as little as possible.

Lieutenant Conine will report to you with reinforcements as soon as they can be armed.

By this arrangement Captain Wood and his little force reached Buffington at 7 P. M. of the seventeenth, and at once began to intrench, throwing out pickets and preparing for such defence as his limited means afforded. Captain Wilson proceeded to Mason City.

In the meantime Captain Henry Best, on July 13th, with his own company and those of Captains Stone, Dana, Pugh, and Rutherford, had been ordered to proceed on the steamer Buck to Blennerhasset island and open the channel so that the gunboats could pass, and on the way down remove all boats of every description to the Virginia shore, which order was faithfully carried out. Captain Wilson arrived at Mason City at 11 P. M. of the seventeenth, and hearing that the rebels had appeared about five miles back of Middleport, he crossed the river and advanced promptly but cautiously through the darkness and took up a position three miles to the rear of that place. Here Morgan's men, or a part of them, advanced, captured a scouting party of Captain Wilson's force, pushed on to within a quarter of a mile of Wilson, when they were fired on, and delayed until noon of the eighteenth, when the Twenty-third Ohio infantry came up, and an attack was immediately made by the two commands on the rebels, resulting in their retreat. On the nineteenth, Captain Wilson was ordered up to Bowman's run, seven miles up the Ohio from Middleport, where he made such dispositions of his men as to capture seventy-seven men and officers, and eighty horses. Captain Wilson took his prisoners to Pomeroy, when he was ordered six miles below to guard another ford, and arrived just in time to prevent a body of Morgan's men from crossing, and turned them back on their pursuers, who captured them.

By July seventeenth a thousand stand of arms arrived, and Colonel Putnam ordered Lieutenant J. W. Conine, with a detachment consisting of the companies of Captains Knowles, Moore, Jaynes, Brown, Seaman, Dyar, Jenkins, Comley, and Davenport, to proceed on board the steamer Eagle and reinforce Captain Wood, and report to that officer for orders. The Eagle got fast aground on a bar, and Conine disembarked, marched his men to the mouth of the Little Hocking, and bivouacked, deciding to act independent of Captain Wood. At this time there were reported for duty seven thousand and sixty-four men, with scarcely any arms in camp, but in order to utilize these men as far as practicable they were provided with spades, axes, and picks, and sent to the proper places to fell trees and obstruct the lines of retreat along the supposed route of Morgan.

Hon. William P. Cutler on the eighteenth was ordered to obstruct the roads between the line of the Marietta & Cincinnati railroad and the Ohio river. He had in his command the railroad employes, Captain Holmes' company, and that of Captain Grewell; and at Cutler's Station and Big run he was joined with three more companies under Captains Waugh, Maxwell, and Dee. With these forces, Mr. Cutler says, in his report: "We succeeded in accomplishing the object in a thorough manner from Big Hocking (including all roads leading into the ravines of that stream), as far east as the road leading from Vincent to the Ohio river by way of Daniel Shaw's, in Dunham township."

On the seventeenth General Burnside telegraphed Colonel Putnam that if Morgan was driven from the ford at Buffington, he would probably strike for Marietta, the roads therefore were to be well obstructed, the flooring of the bridge across the Muskingum torn up, and rifle pits so constructed as to command the crossing. General Cox who was with General Burnside at Cincinnati, telegraphed that if the roads were so obstructed as to prevent Morgan dodging north between Athens and Marietta, there was force enough following to crush or capture him. Three companies under John Newton were sent up the Muskingum to remove all boats to the east side of the stream, and three more under command of Captain Levi Barber were sent to blockade the roads between Coolville and Little Hocking. Meantime, mounted scouts were sent out from Mr. Cutler's camp, and from all points practicable, and the best information possible obtained as to the enemy's movements. Several companies were stationed at the Marietta bridge, and such arrangements made that the drawbridge could be turned at a moment's notice. In addition to the rifle pits a barricade of bales of hay was made commanding the bridge and the ford below. On the night of July 17th Colonel B. P. Runkle's forces arrived at Scott's landing three miles below Marietta.

Let us now return to Morgan's command whom we left on the evening of the eighteenth, near Buffington's Island.

Basil Duke, in his "History of Morgan's Cavalry," says:

July 18th, at 3 A. M., we moved on. By this time the militia had turned their attention seriously to felling trees, and impeding our progress in every conceivable way. Advanced guard was forced to carry axes to cut away frequent blockade. In passing on the eighteenth near Pomeroy, there was one continual fight, but not wholly with militia, for some regular troops now appeared. We had to run a terrible gauntlet for nearly five miles, through a ravine, on the gallop. . . . We reached Portland (Buffington) about 8 P. M., and the night was one of solid darkness. General Morgan consulted one or two of his officers upon the propriety of at once attacking an earthwork, thrown up to guard the ford. From all the information he could gather, this work was manned with about three hundred infantry—regular troops, and two heavy guns were mounted in it. Our arrival at this place after dark had involved us in a dilemma. If we did not cross the river that night, there was every chance of our being attacked on the next day by heavy odds—by infantry sent after us from Kentucky, and by gunboats at the ford, which we could not drive off, as we had not more than three cartridges apiece for our artillery. General Morgan fully appreciated these reasons for getting across the river that night, as did those with whom he advised, but there were also very strong reasons against attacking the work at night; and without the capture of the work which commanded the ford, it would be impossible to cross. Attacks in the dark are always hazardous experiments, in this case doubly so as we knew nothing of the ground and could not procure guides. Our choice of the direction in which to move to the attack would have been purely guesswork. The defenders of the work had only to lie still and fire with artillery and musketry directly to their front, but the assailants would have had a line to preserve, and to exercise great care lest they should fall foul of each other, in the obscurity. He determined, therefore, to take the work at early dawn, and hoped to effect a crossing rapidly before the enemy arrived.

Captain D. L. Wood in his report to Colonel Putnam says: "On the morning of the eighteenth I made a line of entrenchments covering the approach to the ford, sent out cavalry scouts and ascertained that the enemy were advancing on me in force. I had all my stores removed to the boat (steamer Starlight) and ordered it to be ready to move. At half past seven o'clock the enemy appeared in force in front of my works, at which time my forces were in line to receive them as best I could. At twelve o'clock, having received an order from General Scammon to retire, I did so. Being hardly pressed by the enemy, I was obliged to abandon my artillery."

Lieutenant C. B. Lewis, of the One Hundred and Twenty-eighth Ohio volunteer infantry, was officer of the day; posted pickets at different points around the ford to watch for the approach of the rebels, and while out on the picket line was taken prisoner by the rebels the night before the battle.

BATTLE OF BUFFINGTON'S ISLAND.

The valley in which Morgan encamped on the night of July 18th was about eight hundred yards wide at the lower end and gradually narrowed above until the hills approached near to the river at the upper end. The river road coming from Pomeroy was upon the bank of the river. About midway of the valley a road winds into the valley to the river. The rebels had encamped on the night of the eighteenth (Saturday night) in the corn fields at the end of a private lane running parallel to the road on which General Judah was approaching from the direction of Pomeroy. A dense fog covered all the bottom lands. General Hobson had with his command followed Morgan for two weeks, and on the night of the eighteenth went into camp to rest both horses and men. Colonel Garrard, of the Seventh Ohio cavalry, remonstrated with Hobson for delaying the march at the critical point of the pursuit, but Hobson decided to halt. Colonel Garrard then asked permission to continue the pursuit that night, and in reply was informed that he might take his regiment and "go to hell."* So Garrard kept on in pursuit. General Judah pressing forward during the night with his command was, with his staff including Major Daniel McCook, early in the morning of the nineteenth, in the advance, and when within a short distance of the ford, there being a dense fog, came unexpectedly upon the rebel cavalry, who received them with a volley and pursued, killing Major McCook, wounding several and taking some prisoners together with one piece of artillery. General Judah now hurried his forces forward, and the fog suddenly lifting disclosed the enemy in the valley before them. While Judah was bringing his forces into action, Lieutenant O'Neil, of the Fifth Indiana cavalry, appeared on another road with but fifty men and charged two different regiments so desperately that they were broke and left the captured gun, also their prisoners. Meanwhile Colonel Garrard with the Second and Seventh Ohio cavalry came in by the road about the middle of the valley and charged them in flank and rear. Captain Fitch with the gunboat Moose now attacked from the river, playing on them with his twenty-four pound Dahlgreen guns. With Judah up, Hobson up and the gunboats up, the situation of Morgan became not only interesting but desperate.

Judah and Hobson, from different points, soon opened on the rebel ranks with shell, and, according to Basil Duke's account, the air was fairly filled with pieces of shell, compelling the enemy to retreat. Duke was in command of the line designed to cover the retreat, with instructions to make the best fight he could, and but for being attacked in the flank, would have given General Judah a more stubborn resistance than they did. General Duke attempted to retreat in good order, but soon a regular stampede took place, many made a rush for the ford, others ran from point to point over this field, taking a new direction at the chance explosion of a shell near by. The most of the rebels, however, still clung to the booty stolen on the march.

The victors now closed in on them and captured between seven and eight hundred, including Basil Duke, Colonel Dick Morgan, Colonels Smith, Ward and Hoffman. All their artillery, wagons, etc., were captured. About twelve hundred men, under Morgan, escaped, and, pressing on up the river, tried to cross at Belleville, but were headed off by the gunboat Moose. A few got across, and some were killed in the river. The bulk of the raiders, however, turned away from the river and disappeared among the hills. It is a remarkable fact that two out of the six or seven guns captured were twenty-pound parrots, which Morgan had dragged over his extended line of march, and had he not run out of ammunition, would doubtless have given the gunboats as well as his other pursuers a more desperate battle than he did. The Union loss was five killed and twenty-five wounded. Rebel loss, twenty killed, wounded not known.

In regard to the conduct of Captain Wood, the Rebellion Record has the following:*

Captain Wood, of the Eighteenth regulars, while stationed at Marietta as mustering officer, was induced to take command of two companies of volunteers, and proceeded to Buffington bar on Saturday. He found the steamer Starlight aground, with only two men aboard, and loaded with three thousand barrels of flour. He immediately unloaded the vessel, raised steam and manned the boat, from the captain to the deck hand, with his men, and run her out of the range of Morgan's guns, which, before he could get away, had arrived on the bank. Before leaving with his little band of true gallants, he rolled his two heavy pieces of artillery over into a ravine, so that the enemy could neither take nor use them. After the fight, Captain Wood reported to General Judah for duty with the boat, and was highly complimented by the general and placed in charge of several hundred of the prisoners to bring to Cincinnati. Had the boat not been seized by Captain Wood when it was, Morgan would have had it and crossed the river with it, for the gunboats did not arrive till Sunday morning, while Morgan was there the night before. So let Marietta be proud of her gentlemen soldiers who were not too proud to carry coal or do any work which would hinder the enemies of the Union and help her defenders.

* From one of the Seventh cavalry.

* Frank Moore's Rebellion Record, Volume VII, page 267.

Captain Wood and his command returned to Camp Marietta from Cincinnati, July 25th.

When Major McCook was shot, the country lost a noble patriot, who had sent his distinguished sons to the war and only remained at home himself on account of the infirmities of age. The horse he rode remained in the hands of the enemy. There is an interesting incident related in regard to the horse, "Old Joe," as he was called, which we give as we heard it:

When Captain Arthur D. Eells, H Seventh Ohio volunteer cavalry, on the failure of his health, left the army at Somerset, Kentucky, he sold his horse "Joe" to Major John Dalman, at that time paymaster, who took the horse to Cincinnati. Very soon after this John Morgan made his raid through Indiana and Ohio.

When Morgan and his troops were passing near Cincinnati, a force of volunteers gathered to pursue him. Old Major McCook went to Dalman's stable and took the horse Joe, and, with the others, followed Morgan, overtaking him, as we have seen, at Buffington. As soon as Major McCook fell, the horse galloped over the field at will. Soon the Seventh Ohio cavalry attacked the rebels on the flank and rear, and the horse, doubtless recognizing familiar voices in the direction of the gallant Seventh, galloped through the tumult and confusion of the battle to the position of the Seventh cavalry and took his wonted place in the line, much to the edification of the boys, who shouted, "Look! there comes Captain Eells' horse, Old Joe."

So ended the battle of Buffington's Island, in which there were more men killed than some of the famous battles in Mexico.

About three hundred and fifty rebels succeeded in getting across at the different fords, and between one and two hundred were taken prisoners after becoming detached from the main body. Morgan himself was half way across at the upper Buffington ford, when he saw that a large part of his command were so hard pressed that they would not be able to escape, and he turned back and continued his flight north, but doubled on his track and again attempted to cross near Blennerhasset's island, but was foiled in this and compelled to make a detour to get out of the trap set for him by Colonel Putnam. In order to do this he marched outside the lines of Mr. Cutler and Lieutenant Conine and the other forces sent out to obstruct and hold the roads leading to the river. He was, however, followed by Shackelford, and also by a force of militia sent forward by Colonel Runkle, under command of Colonel Hill. These moved by boat up the Muskingum, and landed at McConnelsville, July 23d, just as Morgan crossed at Eaglesport seven miles above. Colonel Hill took an unfrequented road over the hills and succeeded in flanking Morgan, and getting his artillery into position, opened on the rebels and threw them into confusion. They dropped their guns, booty, and everything that would impede progress and fled, followed by Hill as long as his artillery could get positions from which to shell them, keeping up the pursuit until about four P. M., when General Shackelford's cavalry came up and relieved the militia, now very much exhausted, whom Colonel Hill ordered back to the Muskingum.

Thus harassed the remnant of the raiders pursued their toilsome march. General Brooks, who had taken up his headquarters at Wellsville, Ohio, finding that there was a strong probability of Morgan crossing the Cleveland & Pittsburgh railroad at Salineville, sent Colonel Gallagher, with a regiment of six months' men, to a point about two miles from that place, and had them posted advantageously near the supposed place of crossing. Major Way, with the Ninth Michigan cavalry, was also moving up to the same point. In a short time the expected rebels made their appearance, coming around a bend in the road. On catching sight of the infantry they halted and turned their horses' heads in another direction. Before they could get out of the trap Major Way, with two hundred men of the Ninth Michigan cavalry, dashed among them and commenced cutting right and left. The rebels made but a brief resistance, when they broke in utter confusion. The scene that followed was almost ludicrous, and could only be matched by the previous stampede at Buffington's Island. Men dismounted, threw down their arms and begged for quarter, whilst others galloped around wildly in search of a place of escape and were "brought to time" by a pistol shot or saber stroke.

Morgan himself was riding in a carriage drawn by two white horses. Major Way saw him, and galloping up, reached for him. Morgan jumped out at the other side of the carriage, leaped over a fence, seized a horse, and galloped off as fast as horse flesh, spurred by frightened heels, could carry him. About two hundred succeeded in escaping with him. In the buggy thus hastily evacuated by Morgan were found his rations, consisting of a loaf of bread, some hard-boiled eggs, and a bottle of whiskey.*

The number of rebels killed in this engagement was five or six; number wounded not stated; prisoners, about two hundred, together with horses and arms. A few Union cavalry men were wounded.

About two o'clock P. M. of the same day the forces in pursuit of Morgan closed in around him in the vicinity of West Point, between New Lisbon and Wellsville. The rebels were finally compelled to take refuge on a bluff, and finding escape impossible, they surrendered to Colonel Shackelford and the militia, who now started on a general hunt for straggling rebels, brought in numbers of them, found concealed in the woods, all of whom were sent to Columbus.

A rebel account states that Morgan on this raid captured six thousand prisoners, all of whom were paroled, destroyed thirty-four important bridges, and the railroad tracks in sixty places, that they lost twenty-eight commissioned officers killed, thirty-four wounded, and two hundred and fifty men killed, wounded and captured; that by Federal accounts, they killed more than two hundred, wounded at least three hundred and fifty, and captured as above mentioned, six thousand; that the damage to railroads, steamboats and bridges, added to the destruction of public stores and depots, cannot fall short of ten million dollars; that they captured three pieces of artillery, and one twenty-four pounder at Lebanon, which they destroyed, one Parrot three-inch gun at Brandenburg, and a twelve-pounder at Portland; that the Copperheads and Butternuts were always in the front opposing them; that occasionally they would meet a pure "Southron," generally a person banished from the border states.

* Correspondence Cleveland Herald July 27, 1863.

The above mentioned account was written by one of the raiders who escaped at Buffington, and as far as it relates to the Union loss, is not trustworthy, being an over-estimate, but as far as relates to the destruction of property is doubtless not up to the mark.

Morgan and his officers were confined in the penitentiary, from which prison Morgan and six others made their escape November 27, 1863, by cutting through the stone floors of three cells with knives carried off from the prison table, till they reached the air chamber below and tunneling thence under the prison walls into the outer yard, and climbing the surrounding prison wall by the aid of ropes made from their bed clothes. An investigation into the cause of the escape showed that the usual routine of sweeping the cells was omitted in the case of those occupied by the rebels, and they were thus enabled to cover up and conceal their work. The omission to sweep was at the suggestion of one of the directors of the penitentiary.

Morgan reached his hiding-place beyond the mountains of Kentucky and Tennessee in safety, and afterwards led several bands of raiders into the Blue Grass, in one of which he was killed in a skirmish, while endeavoring to escape from a house in a little village in East Tennessee.

THE MILITIA.

Under order to organize the force assembled at Camp Marietta during the Morgan raid, Colonel Putnam appointed on his own staff:

Josiah H. Jenkins, assistant adjutant general; P. B. Putnam, quartermaster; George O. Hildreth, post hospital surgeon; James Little, post hospital surgeon; F. D. Howell, post hospital surgeon; B. F. Culver, post hospital assistant surgeon; John W. White post hospital assistant surgeon; Michael Edwards, post hospital assistant surgeon; Joseph M. C. Moorhead, examining surgeon; William Beebe, examining surgeon; William Ackley, examining surgeon; besides a corps of clerks and assistants.

ATHENS COUNTY MILITIA.

A. D. Jaynes, colonel; E. L. DeWitt, colonel; Jared Moris, adjutant. Names of Company commanders—Charles Matheny, E. D. Harper, reported July 14th; Charles Goodspeed, Elias Grewell, Edward Wheeler, C. Cooper, F. L. Junrod, C. Winget, I. C. Shotts, A. D. Jaynes, H. Nauna, and Daniel Fulton, reported July 16th; Charles Stout and James M. Holmes, reported July 17th; S. H. Smith, E. Stalder and E. P. Pickett, reported July 18th.

Highest number men from Athens county, one thousand eighty-two; total number companies, seventeen.

MEIGS COUNTY MILITIA.

Nathaniel M. McLaughlin, colonel; William B. Skrevner, major. Names of Company Commandants—I. H. Rutherford, L. E. Campbell, John Barrot, G. G. Woodward and R. B. Wilson, reported July 16th; John F. Martin, Minor Reed and S. Riggs, reported July 17th.

Total number companies, nine; highest number men reported, seven hundred and six.

MONROE COUNTY MILITIA.

Joseph Kelley, colonel.

Company Commandants—R. T. Beiber, S. C. Kelley, Henry Scott, J. M. Evans, reported July 17th; J. L. Watson, S. F. Ellsworth, G. W. Bennett, C. M. Stewart, J. M. Jones, J. A. Fleischmann, C. B. Way, H. R. Mason, Joshua Way, J. Daugherty, Max Albert, A. C. McElroy and Elias Hoppmann, reported July 18th; Peter Dover, George Ring and J. Roemer, reported July 20th; John Mallory, J. J. Hurd, James Adams, J. F. Culverhouse and J. Rupp, reported July 21st; W. Truax, July 22d; and M. Thenen, John Bellman and John Monroe, July 24th.

Total number companies, twenty-nine; highest number men reported one thousand three hundred and sixty-seven.

NORLE COUNTY MILITIA.

William P. Sprague, colonel; William H. Frazier, adjutant.

Company Commandants—Pearson Mordeck, James A. Morrison, B. B. Taylor, Asa Barton, and John Hesson, reported July 15th; D. L. Weems, July 16th; J. R. Rickley, Louis Headly, Lorenzo Powell, Israel Harris, July 17th; Dudley Evans, Enoch Wilkinson, William Fowler, J. M. Walters, James Gibson, William L. Parks, William Ogle, C. Clymer, David McGary, Robert Bary, and Robert Hayne, July 18th. J. F. Briggs, George E. Geddes, July 19th.

Number of companies, twenty-three; highest of men reported on any one day, two thousand one hundred and twelve.

PERRY COUNTY MILITIA.

W. Cook, colonel; S. F. Muzzy, colonel; A. W. Poundston, adjutant.

Company Commandants—D. W. Marsh, John S. Nixon, Obediah Larimer, J. Mackin, and W. H. Spencer, reported July 17th; John Dike, A. T. Sharp, J. Clark, James C. Ritchey, James R. Fulton, and W. L. Harbough, July 18th.

Number of companies, eleven; highest number of men reported, eight hundred and fifty-six.

HOCKING COUNTY MILITIA.

David Little, colonel.

Company Commandants—Samuel Creighton, Abraham McLain, John O. Kennedy, D. Little, and John Oaks, reported July 18th.

Number of companies, five; highest number of men reported, three hundred and forty-four.

MORGAN COUNTY MILITIA.

John C. Ellston, jr., colonel; William B. Loomis, adjutant; Frederick W. Wood, colonel; Bearly Davis, adjutant.

Company Commandants—J. H. Roland, reported July 14th; A. J. Harte, J. McVay, H. R. Seaman, Sidney Newton and Thomas Hammond, reported July 15; J. D. Lashley, George Hedges and William Balding reported July 16th; J. L. Pierrot, S. S. Jenkins, William Miller, James B. Tannehill, John Henderson, H. R. Hughes, E. G. Caulson, H. B. White, Charles McCarthy, John Preston, reported July 17th; H. C. Harvey, P. D. Danford, John Rollison, William McIntire, G. B. Fowler, F. G. Phillips and Thomas Vicroy, reported July 18th; D. D. Scott and John Fouraker, reported July 19th.

Total number companies, twenty-eight; highest number of men reported, two thousand three hundred and sixty-two.

WASHINGTON COUNTY MILITIA.

J. Mills, Kendrick, colonel commanding; Thomas W. Moore,* colonel First regiment; Joseph B. Kinkead,* colonel First regiment; Thomas Day, colonel First regiment; Edwin Cood, colonel Second regiment; Joseph Dyar, colonel Third regiment; O. P. Scott, colonel Fourth regiment.

Company Commandants—Augustus Dyer, and A. T. Nye, jr., reported July 14th; S. S. Knowles, J. W. Tripp, John Holst, jr., K. Krauss, Elijah Locker, John W. Conley, Henry Kelley, David P. Pugh, P. L. Cole, J. H. Brown, W. L. Baldwin, and J. L. W. Newton, reported July 15th; D. Y. Hill, E. M. Howland, Loring E. Stone, J. P. Sanford, Charles A. Cook, George Davenport, John Magee, Charles H. Cook, R. P. Delley, B. Racer, H. M. Brown, M. Ryan, J. W. Brabham, J. M. Warren, E. D. Smith, and Thomas W. Moore, reported July 16th; Oscar Liackey, J. A. Brown, Jacob Hagar, G. R. Goddard, Washington Wilson, G. B. Turner, July 17th; J. P. Kinkead, Charles Luckens, C. H. Goddard, John E. Smallwood, John Dretchell, * Relieved to command men on detached duty.

J. F. Deshler, and S. P. Willis, July 18th; William Smith, J. D. Gates, July 19th, J. C. Campbell, and Israel N. Dye, July 20th.

Total number of companies, forty-seven; highest number of men reported, two thousand and thirty-nine.

Besides these, there were volunteers under command of S. Mason, Major Bloomfield, J. W. Brabham, D. Y. Hill, one hundred and ninety-eight men, and six months' men in camp at this time numbering two hundred and fifty. In addition to the companies already enumerated, six others from counties outside the first military district came in with six hundred and thirty-four men. The daily aggregate of forces reported at Camp Marietta during the Morgan raid was as follows: On July 13th, the day after the Governor's proclamation, there were in camp one hundred and seventy-five men—the militia had not yet started; July 14th, 457; fifteenth, 1,732; sixteenth, 4,259; seventeenth, 7,064; eighteenth, 11,782; nineteenth, 12,082; twentieth (owing to an order from the governor to send the militia home), 6,434; twenty-first, 5,826; twenty-second, 3,939; twenty-third, 2,721; twenty-fourth, 3,372; twenty-fifth, 2,466; twenty-sixth, 2,389; twenty-seventh, 2,384; twenty-eighth, 449; twenty-ninth, 284; all the militia disappearing again.

AGGREGATE FROM COUNTIES.

On July 19th there were reported at Camp Putnam, either as on duty or in camp, militia and other soldiers, as follows:

| NAMES OF COLONELS COMMANDING.                     | NUMBER OF MEN. |
|---|----------------|
| Colonel E. L. DeWitt, Athens county; militia..... | 1,036          |
| " D. Little, Hocking county, " .....              | 337            |
| " N. M. McLaughlin, Meigs county, " .....         | 708            |
| " Joseph Kelley, Monroe county, " .....           | 1,355          |
| " J. C. Elston, jr., Morgan county, " .....       | 2,364          |
| " W. P. Sprague, Noble county, " .....            | 2,117          |
| " L. F. Muzzy, Perry county, " .....              | 827            |
| " J. M. Kendrick, Washington county, " .....      | 3,039          |
| All others.....                                   | 252            |
| Total.....  | 12,082         |

The results of the operations planned at Camp Marietta were to compel Morgan to make an extended detour to the northward, thereby saving a large tract of country from devastation. Another and more important result was the preventing of his escape across the river, at Buffington. There is no doubt but that the timely arrival of Captain Wood at Buffington, and the construction of the earthwork mentioned, prevented Morgan from crossing with his entire command the night before the battle. The statement of General Basil Duke heretofore referred to fully corroborates this fact. Captain Wood left the fortification under orders from General Scammon, of the Kanawha department, a superior officer, and he left none too soon. Six hours later and the rebels would have attacked him, overpowered his small force, captured the steamer and ferried their troops across before either Judah or Hobson, or the gunboats, could have prevented it.

There are few men that could have handled so large a body of men so well, under such circumstances, as Colonel Putnam did these who came so suddenly upon his hands. They came by the thousands, wholly unarmed, unequipped and unorganized. His action in this situation was admirable, preserving his usual fine equanimity through it all; and superintending the details of the whole camp, he still had time enough to plan for the capture and detention of Morgan. Down the Ohio, out on the line of the Marietta & Cincinnati railroad as far as the Big Hocking, up the Muskingum, up Duck creek, up Little Muskingum as far as Woodsfield, and up the Ohio, everywhere his regiments and companies were prepared to repel and delay the invaders. While we say this of the commandant of Camp Marietta, we must not forget that grand array of militia, twelve thousand strong, who sprang to the defence of their invaded State, many of them leaving their crops unharvested in the fields, and often compelled to march by their own fields that needed their attention, and doing it without a word of complaint; many leaving their stores, their shops, and employments that required hourly attention, to engage in an uncertain enterprise, the danger of which at the time seemed threatening and hazardous.

It was fully demonstrated by Morgan's raid that no freebooting foray, no matter how well planned or how well carried out, could succeed on Northern soil, and this raid was the last of the kind ever attempted.

On September 19th and 20th occurred the battle of Chickamauga, in which the following regiments having Washington county men in them were engaged: The Ninety-second, Thirty-sixth, and Eighteenth infantry, and First Ohio cavalry. They fought nobly to save the day in this most desperate battle, losing heavily—the Ninety-second seven killed, seventy-eight wounded, including Colonel D. B. Fearing, and twenty missing; the Thirty-sixth twelve killed, including Colonel Jones, sixty-five wounded, and eighteen missing.

The First Ohio cavalry, in this battle, were ordered to charge, through some mistake, and had started toward the enemy's line, some three hundred in number, with sabers drawn; it would have been a second Balaklava, where the famous "six hundred" composing the Light brigade, made such a hopeless charge, but for a timely countermand of the order.

The famous charge at Chickamauga, made by Turchin's brigade, in which were the Thirty-sixth and Ninety-second regiments, should not be passed without adequate mention. A correspondent of the Cincinnati Commercial says:

After resisting several heavy charges the brigade changed direction by filing to the left, into the woods skirting the road on that side, and were halted and brought to a front, leaving the brigade in columns by companies, forming two lines of battle, the Eleventh Ohio and Eighteenth Kentucky in front, and the Ninety-second and Thirty-sixth in the rear. Hardly had this been completed when a rebel battery opened a perfect storm of shell and grape-shot into our ranks. This was entirely unexpected to us. It seems a whole division of the enemy had passed entirely around our left, and, coming up in our rear, expected to capture the entire left wing of our army.

Just at the moment the rebels opened General Thomas rode up:

"Whose brigade is this?"

"General Turchin's," was promptly answered.

"General, can your brigade break through those lines?"

"Yes, I guess so, if any brigade can."

"Very well, do it at once."

General Turchin had been commanding our brigade but a short time, but long enough to gain the confidence of his men. Rising in his stirrups he gave the command—"About face—forward, double-quick—charge bayonets—mar-c-h!" With a yell, the volume of which was decreased not a whit by the fact that the men fully realized that everything depended on the success of this movement, they did charge.

The enemy were drawn up in three lines in an open field, and as we emerged from the woods delivered a volley that tore through our ranks, but failed to check the onward course of our men, who returned the fire, charged bayonets, and dashed into them before they could reload.

The rebels broke in the wildest confusion, while cheer upon cheer from our brave boys added swiftness to their flight. A running fight now ensued which baffles description. The smoke arising from the discharge of so many guns, and the thick clouds of dust completely obscured both rebel and federal, while the hoarse commands of the officers, endeavoring to keep their men in line, the lurid flash of artillery, and the bursting of shell and rattling of grapeshot, which the rebels continued to pour into our ranks, at short range, from three points, made up a picture as nearly resembling Pandemonium as any one need wish to see.

On this charge our brigade captured about six hundred prisoners and four pieces of cannon, but were so closely pushed that we had to abandon the cannon, and half of our prisoners escaped in the confusion, but three hundred were marched along and sent safely through to Chattanooga that night.

Officers of the reserve, who had a fair view of the whole charge, describe it as the grandest spectacle imaginable.

Lieutenant Colonel Douglas Putnam, jr., who took command of the Ninety-second after Colonel Benjamin D. Fearing was wounded, says in his report of the battle:

The smallness of the loss was due to the very skilful management of Colonel Fearing, and his coolness and bravery while under fire and in command.

Major Golden assisted me in every possible manner, and did himself credit. Captains Grosvenor and Whittlesey are especially deserving of notice for bravery and coolness, and for the manner in which their companies were managed. After Colonel Fearing was wounded Captain Grosvenor took command of the left wing, Major Golden going to the right. I feel under obligations to Adjutant George B. Turner, whose assistance was invaluable to me, and whose coolness and forethought were manifested on every occasion. He is deserving of especial notice and commendation. Surgeon J. D. Cotton was with us whenever it was possible for him to reach us, and left nothing undone for the comfort of the wounded. Quartermaster Priestly showed himself to be a brave man, and was on the field attending to the wants of the men.

The next great battle in which Washington county figured was Mission Ridge. Rosecrans had planned to carry the enemy's position on the ridge and on Lookout Mountain, and when Grant relieved him everything was ready to his hand. Bragg, with his rebel legions forty thousand strong, held high Lookout and Mission Ridge fully fortified and bristling with cannon; but Sherman, with the army of the Mississippi, had reenforced Grant, and now everything, by November 23rd, was ready. Sherman, by a detour, had quietly taken position to the northeast unknown to the enemy, and was now ready to cross the Tennessee river and attack the northern fortifications on the ridge. Hooker had crossed the Tennessee by a pontoon bridge at Bridgeport, southwest of Chattanooga, and was ready to storm Lookout Mountain. Meanwhile "Pap" Thomas, with the army that had fought its way from Stone River to the Chattanooga, moved out from the centre. Let an eye witness relate the story:*

The day was bright and beautiful; the rays of the sun, reflected from ten thousand bayonets, dazzled the beholder's eyes; the men were dressed as if for holiday; proud steeds, bearing gallant riders, galloped along the lines; every eminence about the city was crowded with spectators; and for the first time in my experience I saw soldiers of the Union march to battle to the beat of the spirit-drum. This was indeed the "pomp and circumstance" of war; and it is no wonder that the rebels whom we afterward captured declared they did not think we were going to make an attack upon them, but had our troops out for a review or dress parade.

On the eventful day of which I write, I saw an exultant and lofty pride, a high and patriotic hope, a firm and deep resolve expressed in the countenance of each soldier as I had never seen them expressed before, and no one could doubt, as he looked upon them, that they would go that day wherever they were bidden, even should they be compelled to pass through surges of vindictive fire.

Thomas' men moved out swiftly, drove in the enemy's pickets, and captured his first line, known as Orchard Ridge, where they intrenched. The next day, the twenty-fourth, Hooker attacked Lookout, and fought his celebrated "battle among the clouds," driving the rebels from their position; and Sherman, having constructed a pontoon bridge across the Tennessee, above, had attacked and carried the north end of Mission Ridge. Accordingly, on November 25th, everything was ready for the final grand assault on the stronghold of the enemy on Mission Ridge. The rebel General Bragg, trusting to the natural strength of his position, had sent off part of his command, under Longstreet, to capture Burnside at Knoxville, and from his eyrie on the ridge surveyed with complacency the preparations of his foe for the attack. At last Grant was ready, and at the preconcerted signal of six guns, fired at intervals of two seconds, the assault began all along the line, up the steep side of the mountain. Soon the grand roll of musketry, and a line of smoke encircling the mountain, told that they had started the enemy from his lair. A long line of blue, broken into triangles, with their points toward the crest of the mountain (fifteen of them), and at each apex a stand of colors marks the centre of the regiment. Upward they rush. Anon, a standard goes down, which means that the entire color guard have been shot.

Mr. Furay continues:

And still the Union troops pressed on, scaling unwaveringly the sides of Mission Ridge; the blood of their comrades renders their footsteps slippery; the toil of the ascent almost takes away their breath; the rebel musketry and artillery mow down their thinned ranks—but still they press on! Not once do they even seem to waver. The color-bearers press ahead, and plant their flags far in advance of the troops; and at last—O, moment of supreme triumph!—they reach the crest and rush like an avalanche upon the astonished foe. Whole regiments throw down their arms and surrender; the rebel artillerists are bayoneted by their guns; and the cannon which had a moment before been thundering on the Union ranks, are now turned about, pouring death into the midst of the mass of miserable fugitives who are rushing down the eastern slope of the ridge.*

Lieutenant Colonel H. F. Devol, commanding the Thirty-sixth regiment in this battle, in his official report, says:

My regiment was assigned to the centre of the first line, the Eleventh Ohio volunteer infantry on my right, and the Ninety-second Ohio volunteer infantry on the left. Two companies, B and H, were thrown forward as skirmishers. Remaining there until three o'clock, we moved forward a short distance, halted, deployed, and immediately again moved in line of battle through a skirt of woods. As soon as we reached the open ground the enemy opened on us with artillery from the top of Missionary Ridge. We were then ordered to double-quick, which we did, passing the second line of the enemy's breast-works, which were occupied by General Beatty's brigade; reached the base of the ridge, where also were some troops under cover. We rushed up the ridge as fast as possible, under a terrible enfilading fire from both right, left, and front. Near the top, and about six rods from the enemy's breastworks, we passed over (I think) the Ninth Kentucky volunteer infantry. Reaching the breast-works, where the enemy lay, a terrible, almost hand-to-hand fight ensued. Stubbornly did the enemy contest the works. There we took a number of prisoners, which I passed to the rear without a guard. Those of the enemy who escaped made a second stand on the crest, from four to six rods beyond; but they were at once killed, captured, or routed. On our left was a heavy force of the enemy's infantry, and two pieces of artillery. The infantry kept up a constant fire. The artillery fired two rounds, when we made a charge on it and captured the two pieces, but not until they had succeeded in getting them some distance down the eastern slope of the ridge to the rear. They were unlimbered and immediately hauled back to the top of the ridge by the men, and placed in position. The taking of the artillery was done, mainly, under the superintendence of Sergeant Adney, of company B, and Sergeant Holliday, of company H. Some men from the Eleventh and Ninety-second Ohio volunteer infantry assisted in hauling the guns back.

*W. S. Furay, correspondent Cincinnati Gazette.

Captain J. C. Selby, company K, was wounded in the right arm (which has since been amputated) near a log cabin, to the left of where we went up the ridge. First Lieutenant O. J. Wood, company B, when in command of the company, was seriously wounded, the ball passing through from left to right side and through the right lung. Second Lieutenant J. W. Hanlin, company H, was slightly wounded in the leg.

It would be in vain for me to try to express how nobly and with what daring both officers and men conducted themselves, in this their fifth great battle. Never as yet have they fallen back under fire in the face of the enemy. In this all seemed eager to fight, and under the leadership of their general, felt confident of success. I would particularize, did I not have to mention the whole.

The Thirty-sixth lost nine killed, sixty-five wounded and five missing, and the Ninety-second, twelve killed and forty-two wounded. Among the former killed were Captain W. Beale Whittlesey and Adjutant George B. Turner, both promising young officers, from Marietta, a fuller account of whose lives will be found further on. Lieutenant Colonel Douglas Putnam, jr., received a severe wound in the ankle. Mission Ridge was the most peculiar battle of the war. No other presented such natural obstacles to be overcome at such high altitudes. Bragg had forty thousand men, and Grant, seventy five thousand, but the advantages of position in Bragg's favor fully made up for the disparity of numbers. Grant went to Chattanooga on crutches to relieve Rosecrans, but now his fame travelled on the wings of the wind. To Vicksburgh, through a fortunate turn of affairs, he had added Mission Ridge, and the country went wild with enthusiasm for Grant. He was made lieutenant general, and Sherman taking command of the army at Chattanooga, soon began his march on Atlanta.

The year 1863 closed without any further great battles, and the Union armies generally went into winter quarters. Nearly all of the three years' men reenlisted as veterans, showing their devotion to country and the flag, and their great interest in carrying the conflict to a successful close.

The regiments having companies from Washington county, who reenlisted, furnished veterans as follows: Eighteenth regiment, sixty-two; Thirty-sixth regiment, three hundred and sixty-four; Thirty-ninth regiment, five hundred and thirty-four; Sixty-third regiment, four hundred and fifty-five; Seventy-seventh regiment, three hundred and four; First cavalry, two hundred and eighty-five; Second West Virginia cavalry, three hundred and thirty-three; First light artillery, five hundred and fifteen, and also Pierpont battery, eighty. The Thirty-ninth Ohio furnished more veterans than any other regiment from Ohio, and Washington county more veterans than any other county in the State, except Hamilton.

Upon the return of the veterans from the front on thirty days' furlough, they were met with a continuous ovation. The citizens of Washington county greeted them with gratitude and respect.

The roll of dead officers and soldiers for the year 1863 includes many good names, none, however, more lamented than Colonel Jesse Hildebrand, a fuller notice of whom will be found in another part of this work.

CHAPTER XIX.

WAR OF THE REBELLION CONTINUED—1864-65.

Beginning of Governor Brough's Administration—New Militia Law—Ohio National Guard—Conference of the Governors—Call of Governor Brough for Thirty Thousand Ohio National Guards—Response.

GOVERNOR BROUGH entered upon his term with a more emphatic endorsement than any former governor ever had in the State, receiving over one hundred thousand majority, of which Washington county contributed as follows: Home majority, eight hundred and sixty-five; soldier's majority, eight hundred and four; total majority, one thousand six hundred and sixty-nine. This was a very decided endorsement of the war policy and was an emphatic pledge to devote the resources of the county to the prosecution of the war, not only by furnishing additional soldiers, but money through taxes and voluntary contributions to support the families of the soldiers left behind as the wards of the Nation, and the history of 1863, 1864 and 1865 shows how fully the county came up to the work. The whole amount of money thus furnished can never be known. The value of the service rendered could not be measured by money because it involved the expenditure of the best energies, finest talent and noblest courage, involving loss of life and of all that men hold most dear, but the feeling was benevolent and deep seated in the hearts of the people that no sacrifice was too costly to serve the Union, for without union all the rest was worthless. Now the fine theories of other days, the high periods and eloquence of the statesmen and patriots of the illustrious past were being forged into the life and experience of the Nation. Men were living what before they had only dreamed. The great battle year of 1863 had developed heroes and leaders. The Nation had grappled with and worsted the foe, and it was now only a question of time as to how long the rebellion would hold out.

In the spring of 1864 the legislature passed a new militia law repealing the one enacted the previous year requiring military encampments. The new body of State soldiery thus summoned into existence was the Ohio National guards that was soon to become so famous in the annals of the State.

From the time Governor Brough was inaugurated a new impetus was given to all the military affairs of the State, which in no way reflected on the able administration of his illustrious predecessor, David Tod. Governor

Brough was a man of strong feelings and convictions, and he greatly desired to see the war end in an honorable peace. He was anxious to help the President and vigilant in watching for opportunities to help on the good work. The invasion of the State during the last year had induced the governor and legislature to favor a thorough militia organization, and Governor Brough, fearing incursions by the enemy along the southern border of the State, sent Ex-Governor Dennison to Washington to urge upon the Secretary of War the necessity of putting State regiments into the service along the border and on the northern line at proper posts, to discourage any invasion from Canada which was feared, but the Secretary denied the necessity. Failing in this, and the circumstances of the situation showing that soon all must either be gained or lost by striking heavy blows, thick and fast, Governor Brough adopted the theory that the next best way to prevent invasion was to keep the enemy busy at home. He, therefore, argued that all veterans and volunteers should be in the field in the immediate presence of the enemy, ready to push him to the wall, and that all soldiers on guard duty should be relieved and sent to the front. The National guards offered a partial solution of the problem, and seeking the cooperation and counsel of the governors of other States, he arranged for a meeting of the governors of Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, and Wisconsin, to be held at Washington, where it was decided to offer the President the services of the militia of the States named for one hundred days. The offer was couched in the following terms:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON CITY, April 21, 1864. }

To the President of the United States:

I. The governors of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, and Wisconsin, offer to the President infantry troops for the approaching campaign, as follows: Ohio, thirty thousand; Indiana, twenty thousand; Illinois, twenty thousand; Iowa, ten thousand; Wisconsin, five thousand.

II. The term of service to be one hundred days, reckoning from the date of muster into the service of the United States, unless sooner discharged.

III. The troops to be mustered into the service of the United States by regiments; when the regiments are filled up, according to regulations of the War Department; the whole number to be furnished within twenty days from date of notice of the acceptance of this proposition.

IV. The troops to be clothed, armed, equipped, subsisted, transported, and paid as other United States infantry volunteers, and to serve in fortifications, or wherever their services may be required, with or without their respective States.

V. No bounty to be paid the troops, nor the services charged or credited on any draft.

VI. The draft for three years' service to go on in any State or district where the quota is not filled up, but if any officer or soldier in this special service should be drafted, he shall be credited for the service rendered.

JOHN BROUGH, Governor of Ohio.
O. P. MORTON, Governor of Indiana.
RICHARD YATES, Governor of Illinois.
W. M. STONE, Governor of Iowa.

The President accepted the offer two days after, and on the same day the adjutant general of Ohio received a dispatch from Governor Brough to call out thirty thousand of the Ohio National guard for one hundred days' service. They were to rendezvous at the nearest practicable point in their respective counties. A week was given for the muster, and by sundown of May 2, 1864, over thirty thousand of Ohio's substantial citizens reported for duty, and demanded to be sent on to the post of duty. Such an uprising had not been seen since the first alarm of Sumter. Governor Brough at one stroke, like that of a magician's wand, had summoned an army into existence. Over forty regiments, containing thirty-four thousand men, responded to the call and were accepted, thus relieving thirty thousand veterans to go to the front.

The situation in Washington county as to the draft at this time was very encouraging. Under all the calls of 1863, and the calls of March 14, 1864, for two hundred thousand more, there was an excess of one hundred and ninety-two to the credit of different townships, but as the credit of one township would not help the deficiency of another, it so happened that fifty-four men were drafted as follows: Belpre, ten; Decatur, twenty-one; Dunham, one; Lawrence, four; Liberty, fifteen; Ludlow, three.

The draft, therefore, had nothing to do with the great uprising of the National guard, although the guards were, by a subsequent arrangement, credited to Ohio on her quota.

The Washington county regiment of the National guard, organized under the militia law of 1863, remained substantially the same under the new law creating the Ohio National guard. It was the Forty-sixth regiment but the number was changed to One Hundred and Forty-eighth. The regiment was commanded by Colonel Thomas W. Moore, of Warren township, and all but two companies were from Washington county. Three companies having come from Vinton county they were consolidated with the eight from Washington county, and on May 22, 1864, they left Marietta for Harper's Ferry. A fuller account of the services of the regiment will be found further on in this work.

General Banks, supported by Commodore Porter, with a fleet of gunboats, during the month of March, 1864, started up the Red river, and General Steele with the army under his command from Little Rock, Arkansas, to effect a junction with Banks, but the rebels having driven Banks back, turned their whole force upon Steele. On April 25, the brigade, consisting of the Thirty-sixth Iowa, Forty-third Indiana, and Seventy-seventh Ohio regiments, under command of Lieutenant Colonel Drake, of the Thirty-sixth Iowa, was sent from General Steele's army to guard an empty train of two hundred and seventy wagons returning to Pine Bluffs. The whole force numbered about fifteen hundred, with a battery of four guns. When the train reached Marks Mills it was attacked by Shelby's cavalry, estimated at seven thousand, and the Thirty-sixth and Forty-third, after a gallant fight were driven back; the Seventy-seventh guarding the rear hurried up on the double quick to the help of the Forty-third and Thirty-sixth, running over five miles. They charged the enemy with a yell, and killed them by the score, but found an overpowering force of rebels closing in on them from every side. "They fought desperately hand-to-hand and foot to foot," says an eye witness, but all in vain; they were all taken prisoners except one lieutenant and forty men, who cut their way out and escaped to the Union lines after travelling over one hundred miles, swimming many streams and eating nothing for forty-eight hours. Captain McCormick and Lieutenant Smithson were taken prisoners with the rest, and marched from the battle-field to the prison pen at Tyler, Texas, marching fifty-two miles in twenty-four hours. The negro servants of the officers were shot at once after the surrender.

P. D. Keating

This was the second term in rebel prisons for Captain McCormick, he having been rode down, shot and captured at Shiloh, by the Texan cavalry.

One of the men of company C, Seventy-seventh, tore the colors from the staff and wrapped it around him, when the rebels were within twenty yards of it, cut his way through the rebel lines and brought the colors into camp, in triumph. The flag has nineteen holes in it.*

The Union loss in killed and wounded was about two hundred and fifty, the rebel loss was much larger, estimated at the time by Union officers at one thousand. The Seventy-seventh lost as follows: Killed, seven; mortally wounded, one; severely wounded, fourteen; slightly wounded, seventeen; wounded prisoners, six; prisoners, three hundred; paroled, seven; missing, eighteen; total, three hundred and seventy.

A rebel officer in a letter to General Fagan, of Dick Taylor's army, gives the following account of the battle of Marks Mills:

After driving Steele into Camden, General Fagan started with three thousand five hundred cavalry for Little Rock, but fell in with the enemy at Marks Mills, where we had a terrible fight. Our arms were finally victorious, and we succeeded in capturing about fifteen hundred prisoners, two hundred and fifty wagons, and five pieces of artillery. It was a complete rout and few of the enemy escaped.

In June the great raid of Generals Hunter, Crook, and Averill, took place. They destroyed the military institute at Lexington, Virginia, and did great damage to the enemy. The Second Virginia cavalry and Thirty-sixth regiment took a gallant part in this expedition.

July 24th the Thirty-sixth regiment was in the battle of Winchester, and lost heavily, and all along the line the soldiers from Washington county were getting in their work.

The war had now resolved itself into two great movements—Grant on Richmond and Sherman on Atlanta. Sherman had gathered within his grasp the armies of the departments of the Ohio, the Cumberland, the Tennessee, and the Arkansas, and after a thorough understanding with Grant, he began his famous campaign against Atlanta. Washington county had companies in five regiments which took part in this campaign, the First and Ninth cavalries, the Thirty-ninth, Sixty-third and Ninety-second regiments, besides men in the Seventy-third, thirty-third, and other regiments.

Sherman, by a series of brilliant flank movements to the right compelled the enemy to abandon every position from Dalton to Atlanta, and fought the battles of Rocky Face Ridge, Resaca, Pumpkin Vine Creek, Kenesaw Mountain, Niojack Creek, Peachtree Creek, the battles around Atlanta and Jonesborough. In all these battles, making about one hundred and twenty days of nearly constant fighting, he lost but one—that of Kenesaw Mountain, which was immediately retrieved by another movement on the right flank, compelling the enemy to evacuate Kenesaw. The rebel authorities being dissatisfied with the Fabian policy of Johnson, removed him and placed Hood in command at Atlanta, where, by July 22, 1864, Sherman had extended his lines in the form of a semi-circle, partially enclosing the city and the enemy's works. Hood, on the day named, wishing to begin a strong and aggressive policy, quietly stole out and got on the flank and rear of the gallant McPherson before the movement was fully known to the Union generals. Here occurred one of the most desperate and hard fought battles of the war, the rebels hoping to surprise and beat McPherson, and then each of the other divisions in turn made charge after charge on our lines. The Thirty-ninth regiment was in the thickest of this engagement, and suffered severely, losing one-third of the entire number in killed and wounded. Our line was beaten back and several batteries captured, and more than all, McPherson killed. Sherman hurried Schofield up to the scene and after a hard struggle, lasting until night, drove the enemy back with a loss of eight thousand, the Union loss being three thousand seven hundred and twenty-two. General John W. Sprague says:

Before Atlanta, on the twenty-second of July, the Twenty-seventh and Thirty-ninth rendered their greatest service of the war. A great opportunity was here made the most of. Upon the valor of the Sixteenth corps rested the safety of all our trains, and perhaps that of a part of the Army of the Tennessee. It is safe to say that no regiments of the corps had more responsibility in the great battle than did these two. None, certainly, proved truer to their trust. Twice they charged the enemy who essayed to take possession of the open field where they were fighting, and twice they drove him back ingloriously to the woods.*

Sherman finally, by another movement to the right and rear of Atlanta, cut the enemy's communications, destroyed all railroads leading into the city when it was abandoned, and on September 1st Sherman's triumphant legions marched in and took possession. Reorganizing his army and sending part of it with Thomas to Nashville, Sherman retained and consolidated the remaining forces into four corps, the Fourteenth, Fifteenth, Seventeenth, and twentieth, which, together with Kilpatrick's cavalry, numbered about sixty-five thousand men.

After perfecting his arrangements, Sherman by November 11th was ready to begin his famous "march to the sea." The army marched in two columns, the right with the Fifteenth and Seventeenth corps, commanded by General O. O. Howard, and the left, with the Fourteenth and Twentieth corps, led by General H. W. Slocum. Each wing had a pontoon train, and kept their line of march about twenty miles apart. Kilpatrick, with the cavalry hovered around the front demonstrating first on one flank and then on the other to deceive the enemy as to the real intentions of Sherman. By thus widening his lines he enabled the foraging parties to cover forty miles of territory from which to obtain subsistence for the troops, and they lived well. On December 10th, after marching two hundred and fifty-five miles, being six weeks, on the way, they arrived at Savannah. Soon Fort McAllister fell, and the grand march was successfully ended. It is an extra honor to have been with Sherman on this "march to the sea" for history presents few parallels to it, and though little fighting was done it was a grand achievement, and far-reaching in its results.

*Letter of Lieutenant Gordon B. West to his sister Miss Lottie West.

*Address at reunion of the Ohio brigade, October 3, 1878.

After resting and refitting his army, Sherman, on February 1, 1865, started northward through the Carolinas, devastating the country and teaching the South Carolinians a few lessons in the hardships of war as he went. General Johnston having been restored to the command of the decimated divisions of his old army, hurried up from the southwest on the trail of Sherman, to intercept him, but by skilful handling of the cavalry, General Sherman deceived Johnston into believing that he was going to Charlotte, North Carolina, and as soon as the rebel force had concentrated there turned to the eastward and started direct to Goldsborough, where he expected to be joined by the divisions of General Schofield. Johnston, however, by rapid marches intercepted four divisions of the left wing on March 15th, at Averysborough, on a narrow swampy neck of land, between Cape Fear and South rivers, North Carolina. The rebels under General Hardee, estimated at twenty thousand, attacked the Union lines with great spirit, hoping to beat them before reenforcements could be brought up. By a rapid movement to the left the enemy's flank was turned, and being pressed in front by other divisions, they were repulsed.

A gallant officer from Washington county, General B. D. Fearing, commanding the old "McCook brigade," was on the left of the line, and General Davis ordered him "to check the enemy and hold them if it cost his whole brigade."

The charge of General Fearing was made with spirit and accompanied with hard fighting. The general had his horse shot under him, and was himself wounded, a minnie-ball passing through his right hand from the wrist forward, carrying away the thumb, fore-finger and left portion of the hand. Being permanently disabled by this wound, General Fearing, now at the age of twenty-seven years, was mustered out of the service, having, as a private, taken part in the first, and as commander of a brigade, in the last important battle of the war.*

At Bentonville, on March 18th, the enemy made their last attack, Johnston hoping by a swift and heavy assault to break the left wing before the other could be brought to reinforce it. Johnston accordingly made several desperate charges on our left wing. In the first, two brigades of Carlin's division were driven back, losing three guns. Slocum thereupon stood on the defensive, placing four divisions in line to the front and making such slight defensive works as they could, while Kilpatrick attacked the enemy on the left. The left received six fierce assaults from Johnston's army. They came on after the old style, line upon line, closing up the gaps made by our fire, but were met by equal discipline and coolness, and by superior numbers. Our artillery did terrible execution on the foe, inflicting heavy loss on his devoted ranks. The rebels had hoped to crush Slocum, but they were disappointed. Night came, and nothing had been gained; and during the night Slocum brought up and disposed three more divisions, rendering his position safe, and Johnston fortified, but made no more attacks. Sherman and his entire army came up next day, and movements were immediately begun to cut off the wiley Johnston, but he decamped that night, and Sherman, with the entire army, moved on to Goldsborough. After paying a hasty visit to Grant at City Point, Sherman again began operations against the enemy, which speedily ended in the surrender of Johnston and the collapse of the confederacy.

While these memorable events were transpiring, and Sherman was establishing for himself a name and fame equal to that of any military chieftain of modern times, equally brilliant successes were attending the Union arms in other fields, in which Washington county figured.

In August, 1864, Grant desiring to have a trusty lieutenant on the Potomac and Shenandoah, sent General Phil Sheridan to take command of those armies. Sheridan's instructions were comprised principally in two words—"Go in!"—and he went in.

On September 13th he confronted the rebel General Early on Opequan creek, near Berryville, in the Shenandoah valley, a few miles south of Harper's Ferry, and on the nineteenth, at 2 A. M., began dispositions for battle. General Crook, with the Eighth corps (the army of West Virginia), including the Second Virginia cavalry and the Thirty-sixth Ohio volunteer infantry, was sent out on the right to turn the enemy's left flank, while the Sixth and Nineteenth corps assaulted the enemy in front, but were met with a vigorous resistance, and Grove's and Rickett's divisions were repulsed with great loss.

From Greeley's Great American Conflict the following account of that battle is taken:

The One Hundred and Fifty-sixth New York had barely forty men grouped around its colors. Captain Rigby, Twenty-fourth Iowa, was seen retreating firmly, deliberately followed by a sergeant and twelve men, who, reaching the assigned rallying point, halted, faced to the front, and gave three hearty cheers. Five minutes later that platoon had been swelled by other such to a battalion; while Captain Bradbury, First Maine battery, had, by Grover's order, posted two guns in a gap and opened on the exultant rebels, who, charging to seize them, received a volley in the rear from the One Hundred and Thirty-first New York, which General Emory had rallied and posted in a projection of wood, with orders not to fire until the enemy should have passed them. As they staggered under this unexpected salute, a volley from the newly-formed line in their front sent them pell mell back across the fields to their original cover.

And now a shout from the far right, shut out from view by woods and hills, announced that the turning movement was effected—that our cavalry under Torbert and Crook, with his Eighth corps, have struck the enemy's left flank, and are charging it under a terrible fire. Instantly a redoubled fire breaks out along our central front, in spite of the general scarcity of cartridges; and these being soon exhausted, Colonel Thomas, Eighth Vermont, ordered his men to charge at double-quick with the bayonet. In vain general officers shouted "Halt!" "Lie Down!" "Wait for supports!" etc.; for while some were still confused and vacillating, a staff officer from the right galloped in front, and pointed with his sabre to the woods which sheltered the enemy. At once all dissent was silenced, all hesitation at an end. The whole centre, as one man, swept forward cheering, and plunged into the woods, meeting there Crook's corps, charging from the flanks. All the rebels who could still travel were by this time going or gone.

A height in the rear, still held by the enemy, was soon stormed by Crook and carried, and Early retreated to his second position, Fisher's Hill, south of Winchester, but was attacked by Sheridan's victorious columns, beaten, and compelled to retreat ignominiously, followed by Sheridan's cavalry, destroying everything as they went, and what they missed going up they destroyed on their way back, "so that nothing should be left to invite the enemy to return."

* From General Fearing's Biographical Sketch, Ohio in the War.

On October 9th, General Sheridan, in compliance with an order from Washington, went to that city, and by the eighteenth had returned as far as Winchester. Meanwhile, Early, chafing under his recent defeats, had demanded and received reinforcements. Planning to take advantage of Sheridan's absence and effect a surprise, he stole out of his lair at dusk on the evening of the eighteenth, and to insure silence his men were divested of canteens and other equipments that would be likely to make a noise in marching. The Union army, six miles distant, lay encamped at Cedar creek, with Crook's army of West Virginia in front, the Nineteenth corps half a mile behind, and the Sixth corps to the right and rear of the Nineteenth, Kitching's division behind Crook's left, and the cavalry, under Torbert, on the right of the Sixth. This army was perfectly unsuspecting of an attack, as they were in a measure justified in being. Early had divided his forces in two columns to take our army on both flanks. An hour before sunrise the rebels were in position, and had not been discovered by our pickets, and our army slumbered in peace, with the deep slumber of the early morning upon them, when all at once there came a crash of musketry on the morning air, and the rebels rush over the trenches and upon the gallant veterans of so many well-fought fields. They seize their arms, the hurried command is given to form, but the rebel line presses them out of their camp, and by their rapid pursuit prevent any formation. The enemy, perfectly familiar with every foot of ground, rushed on, and the army of West Virginia took its way as best it could towards Winchester. The Sixth corps attempted to stay the rebel advance, and the Nineteenth, to the right, offered a stubborn resistance to the rebel onslaught, but gradually fell back.

The Sixth fell back in good order, and the whole army after losing twenty-four guns and twelve hundred prisoners was in full retreat. The rebels stopped to plunder our camps. Meantime Sheridan riding out of Winchester found the first stragglers of the retreat and at once took in the situation. Putting spurs to his horse he rode with all speed to the scene of action, turning back the soldiers and cheering them with such remarks as, "Face the other way, boys! we are going back to our camps—we are going to lick them out of their boots!" Hastily reforming the broken divisions he arranged anew a line of battle and in two charges sent the rebels flying up the valley, capturing twenty-three guns and fifteen hundred men and recovering the guns lost in the morning, and camping at the old camp so hastily abandoned in the early part of the day. This was the last of the Shenandoah campaign. Early's army was destroyed, and Sheridan had no enemy worth his attention to molest him in the valley.

T. Buchanan Reed has given to posterity the following lines in relation to this famous battle:

Up from the South at break of day,
Bringing to Winchester fresh dismay,
The affrighted air with a shudder bore,
Like a herald in haste to the chieftain's door,
The terrible grumble and rumble and roar,
Telling the battle was on once more,
And Sheridan twenty miles away.

But there is a road from Winchester town,
A good, broad highway leading down;
And there, through the flash of morning light,
A steed, as black as the steeds of night,
Was seen to rush as with eagle flight.
As if he knew the terrible need
He stretched away with his utmost speed;
Hill rose and fell—but his heart was gay,
With Sheridan fifteen miles away.

The first that the general saw were the groups
Of stragglers, and then the retreating troops;
What was done—what to do—a glance told him both.
Then striking his spurs, with a terrible oath
He dashed down the line 'mid a storm of huzzas,
And the wave of retreat checked its course there, because
The sight of the master compelled it to pause.
With foam and with dust the black charger was gray;
By the flash of his eye, and his red nostril's play,
He seemed to the whole great army to say:
"I have brought you Sheridan all the way
From Winchester down to save the day!"

Hurrah! hurrah for Sheridan!
Hurrah! hurrah for horse and man!
And when their statues are placed on high,
Under the dome of the Union sky—
The American soldiers' Temple of Fame—
There with the glorious general's name
Be it said, in letters both bold and bright,
"Here is the steed that saved the day,
By carrying Sheridan into the fight
From Winchester—twenty miles away."

Washington county was represented at the battle of Nashville by one company in the First and one in the Seventh Ohio volunteer cavalry, one company in the Eighteenth Ohio volunteer infantry, besides a large number distributed through other Ohio regiments. This battle, fought December 15th and 16th, 1864, was the crowning triumph of General George H. Thomas, a perfect Waterloo to General Hood and the rebel army in the west. Thus ended the eventful year 1864. From the beginning of the year to the end it was a series of Union victories, and Washington county's sons were on every field. All during the great battle year she had kept a steady stream of recruits going to the front, where they stepped into the places made vacant by the loss in battle or in hospital. She had sent out nearly a thousand of her best citizens for the hundred days' service. She had furnished more veterans for reenlistment than any other county in the State excepting Hamilton, the number being four hundred and forty, Stark being next with four hundred. The counties of the Fifteenth district stood as follows: Meigs, 245; Athens, 246; Washington, 440; Morgan, 251; Monroe, 238—total number of veterans, 1420. During this year the grand army of the Potomac, under General Grant, had engaged the flower of the rebel army in Virginia, who fought stubbornly for every inch of ground. It was on May 11th that Grant telegraphed the Secretary of War:

We have now ended the sixth day of very heavy fighting. The result to this time is much in our favor.

Our losses have been heavy, as well as those of the enemy. I think the loss of the enemy must be greater.

We have taken over five thousand prisoners, whilst he has taken from us but few except stragglers

I propose to fight it out on this line if it takes all summer.

U. S. GRANT,

Lt. Gen. Commanding.

It was this tenacious spirit and steady hammering that gradually overcame the rebel armies.

By the battles of the Wilderness and the other great engagements fought during the year 1864 between Grant and Lee the rebel forces were terribly reduced in number, so also were ours, but the great North stood ready to fill the ranks and to furnish the treasure to carry on the war indefinitely, while the South, already exhausted, could scarcely hope to supply fresh regiments or more money. Thus although Grant did not succeed in giving Lee a crushing defeat, he so weakened him that when he set down before Petersburg and began his series of movements towards Richmond, he left Washington and the rear in a measure secure from molestation, that city being fully fortified and the fortifications being manned by the artillerists of the reserve—the heroes of many battles—who were not needed at Petersburg. Among them were our Washington county Pierpont battery, also Huntington's battery.

The war had lasted nearly four years. Long and dreary they were, but filled with intensely exciting episodes. The people of the north were heartily tired of war and longed for peace. They had sent their bravest and best to the support of the Union and were ready for further sacrifices.

The following poem, by J. J. Piatt, was first printed August 6, 1864, in Harper's Weekly:

THE MOWER IN OHIO.

The bees in the clover are making honey, and I am making hay;
The air is fresh, I seem to draw a young man's breath to-day.

The bees and I are alone in the grass; the air is so very still
I hear the dam, so loud, that shines beyond the sullen mill.

Yes, the air is so still that I hear almost the sounds I cannot hear,
That, when no other sound is plain, ring in my empty ear;

The chime of striking scythes, the fall of the heavy swaths they sweep—
They ring about me, resting, when I waver half asleep;

So still, I am not sure if a cloud, low down, unseen there be,
Or if something brings a rumor home of the cannon so far from me.

Far away in Virginia where Joseph and Grant, I know,
Will tell them what I meant when first I had my mowers go.

Joseph he is my eldest—how his scythe was striking ahead!
William was better at shorter beats, but Joe in the long run led.

William he was my youngest; John between them, some how I see,
When my eyes are shut, with a little board at his head in Tennessee.

But William came home one morning early, from Gettysburgh last July
(The mowing was over already, although the only mower was I);

William, my captain, came home for good to his mother; an' I'll be bound
We were proud and cried to see the flag that wrapt his coffin round;

For a company from the town came up ten miles with music and gun—
It seemed his country claimed him then—as well as his mother her son.

But Joseph is yonder with Grant to-day, a thousand miles or near,
And only the bees are abroad at work with me in the clover here.

Was it a murmur of thunder I heard hummed again in the air?

Yet, may be, the cannon are sounding now their "Onward to Richmond" there.

For I saw my boys, across the field, by the flashes as they went,
Tramping a steady tramp as of old with the strength in their arms unspent;

Tramping a steady tramp they moved like soldiers that march to the beat
Of music that seems, a part of themselves, to rise and fall with their feet.

Tramping a steady tramp, they came with flashes of silver that shone,
Every step, from their scythes that rang as if they needed the stone—

(The field is wide and heavy with grass)—and, coming toward me they beamed

With a shine of light in their faces at once, and surely I must have dreamed!

For I sat alone in the cloverfield, the bees were working ahead;
There were three in my vision—remember old man; and—what if Joseph were dead!

But I hope that he and Grant (the flag above them both to boot)
Will go into Richmond together, no matter which is ahead or afoot!

Meantime alone at the mowing here—an old man somewhat gray—
I must stay at home as long as I can, making myself the hay.

And so another round—the quail in the orchard whistles blithe—
But first I'll drink at the spring below, and whet again my scythe.

The newspapers of the year 1864 were filled with discussions of the terms of peace and propositions for settlement of the existing war, but nothing could be accomplished. It remained for Grant, Sherman, Thomas, and Sheridan to show the way to an honorable peace. At the beginning of the year 1865 Sherman had virtually completed his part in the great drama. Thomas had defeated and utterly routed and destroyed the rebel army under Hood, at Nashville, leaving nothing to fear in the west. Sheridan, by his crushing defeat of Early, in the Shenandoah valley, had made a good beginning on his part, and with Crooks, Custer, and the others commanding that splendid body of cavalry, started on their great raid toward Richmond, broke down all opposition like a whirlwind, swept through Virginia at will, destroying railroads, canals, and everything in their track, and joined Grant at Petersburg on March 27th. The final surrender of Lee and his remnant of an army was only a question of time, but Grant had his plans fully matured, and he now considered the time most opportune to close in on the rebel stronghold. He accordingly continued the flank movements to the left, placing Sheridan with his trusty cavalry on the extreme left, with orders to proceed southwestward and develop the enemy's position and strength. Washington county was represented in Sheridan's cavalry by company F, Second Virginia cavalry, as well as in other regiments. Heavy masses of infantry were sent out to support Sheridan, and then began the most skilful and brilliant handling of large bodies of cavalry of any part of the war. The enemy were compelled to throw out a heavy force to meet this new movement, and thereby weakened the garrison at Petersburg and Richmond. A series of engagements took place, in which the Union troops were successful, taking many prisoners, and gaining many new and important positions, so that by April 2nd, Lee, realizing that his extended works around the two beleaguered cities had become untenable, sent the following dispatch from Petersburg to Jefferson Davis, at Richmond: "My lines are broken in three places. Richmond must be evacuated this evening." It was Sunday, and Davis was at church. He at once went out, and by 10 P. M. the rebel government was well on its way towards Lynchburgh, securing their own safety, and leaving the army stores that Lee depended on for support during the retreat at Richmond. Lee, therefore, had to forage for subsistence, which greatly impeded his retreat. It was indeed a losing game from the first, to contend with hunger and greatly superior forces at the same time. Four trains of provisions had been sent from Lynchburgh to Appomattox station, and the rebels were pushing on with all haste to gain that point, but their horses were worn out, and they had no cavalry of any consequence. A man will stand hunger and fatigue and outlast several horses, in an emergency. So with Lee's grand army of northern Virginia, now reduced to barely thirty thousand men, the veterans of so many battles, they could still offer a stubborn resistance; but the dumb brutes, that pulled their wagons and cannon, were totally exhausted. Sheridan, taking in the situation, dispatched Crook and Custer to capture the four trains, intended for the rebel army. This they did by a rapid march, riding up to the astonished train men before they were aware of their danger; and when Lee's advance guards came up they found no provisions, but saw an impenetrable wall of blue-coats, blocking their further advance. Lee, coming up, ordered a charge, supposing there was nothing but cavalry to oppose him. Accordingly, on came the charging column, when, at the proper time, Sheridan rapidly drew off his cavalry, and revealed a heavy force of Union infantry, outnumbering the rebels two to one. The rebel line wavered, and seeing the cavalry on the right getting ready to charge their flank, they immediately sent in a white flag, which led to the famous interview between Grant and Lee and the surrender at Appomattox—the final collapse of the confederacy—the consummation so devoutly wished.

The glorious news caused the greatest rejoicing throughout the north. Governor Brough issued a proclamation announcing the great victories, and recommended April 14th, the anniversary of the fall of Sumter, as a fitting day on which to celebrate the fall of the Rebellion.

The people of Washington county needed no proclamation to urge them to celebrate. The news was no sooner received at Marietta, than the streets were filled with a joyful throng made up from all classes, old and young, grave and gay—every one that could make any kind of a gleeful noise was resolved to do it. The tinners did a good business in tin horns that day. Platoons of the best citizens went arm in arm down the street like drunken men, and the whole community was given up to rejoicing.

The programme for the fourteenth was as follows: National salute and ringing of bells at sunrise; 10 A. M., grand procession—Captain A. W. McCormick and Major Jewett Palmer, jr., just returned from the war, and Captain Levi Barber, commanding; 2 P. M., assembly of the people to listen to speeches, songs, etc., at corner of Greene and Front streets, Marietta; in the evening, general illumination, procession, fireworks, music, etc.

Hon. W. E. Stevenson, of Wood county, West Virginia; President J. W. Andrews, of Marietta college, and Hon. George W. Woodbridge, of Marietta, were the orators of the day. Just as the procession was forming a steamer landed, with the left wing of the Eighth United States colored infantry on board, six hundred men, under command of Major Long. They marched up to the common in front of the Congregational church for dress parade, in the presence of the assembled multitude. This occurrence, just at the time, was an eloquent commentary on the results of the great contest for human rights, now so successfully ended.

While these glad citizens were rejoicing and the illumination and fireworks were progressing so happily, there was being enacted in the far off capital of the Nation a tragedy that on the morrow would send a thrill of horror throughout the country. Abraham Lincoln, that evening, was assassinated. Alas! that so sad a morn should succeed so joyful a day. The flags that were displayed so proudly and exultantly Friday, on Saturday were draped in mourning for the great and good man, the martyred President. In compliance with the request of the Secretary of War, the day of the funeral, Wednesday, April 19th, was appropriately observed. The mayor of Marietta issued a proclamation asking all citizens of the city to desist from their ordinary occupation on that day, and attend religious services at the Centenary Methodist, and Congregational churches. This request was generally complied with, and the day was very generally observed. The speakers at the churches were Revs. W. M. Mullenix and C. D. Battelle, at the Centenary, and President J. W. Andrews and Rev. Thomas Wicks, at the Congregational. After the services an immense throng was formed in procession at the foot of Putnam street, under Colonel William R. Putnam as chief marshal, assisted by Major Jewett Palmer, jr., and Captain Levi Barber. They marched in the following order: Music, pall-bearers, colors, pall-bearers, clergy, mayor and council of Marietta, mayor and council of Harmar, citizens. The procession moved up Putnam to Second, up Second to Scammel, and down Scammel to Front, where a hollow square was formed, and the benediction pronounced by Rev. C. D. Battelle.

Thus ended the great Rebellion. Washington county had done her part fully, and with distinguished honor, and it was the delight of her citizens during the next few months to welcome back to their homes and to the ranks of peace, the veterans, the citizen soldiery she had sent forth, where they took their places, started again the wheels of industry and resumed the occupations they had left, and in a few months the blue-coats were lost to sight, but the wearers were destined never to be forgotten.

CHAPTER XX.

WAR OF THE REBELLION—CONTINUED.

Women's Work in the War.—The Marietta Military Hospital.—Short Sketches of the Military Organizations from the County.—Buell's Pierpoint Battery.—Huntington's Battery.—De Beck's Battery.—K, Second Ohio Heavy Artillery.—General Thomas' Body Guard (L, First Ohio Volunteer Cavalry)—Company H, Seventh Cavalry.—Company B, Ninth Cavalry.—Company F, Second West Virginia Cavalry.—Eighteenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry.—Thirty-sixth Ohio Volunteer Infantry.—Thirty-ninth Ohio Volunteer Infantry.—Sixty-third Ohio Volunteer Infantry.—Seventy-third Ohio Volunteer Infantry.—Seventy-seventh Ohio Volunteer Infantry.—Ninety-second Ohio Volunteer Infantry.—One Hundred and Forty-eighth Ohio National Guards.—The Silver Grays.—The Pony Section.—The War Editors.—Biographical Sketches of Officers from Washington County.—Major General Don Carlos Buell.—General B. D. Fearing.—General H. F. Devol.—General R. R. Dawes.—Colonel Jesse Hildebrand.—Colonel Melvin Clarke.—Colonel Ebenezer B. Andrew.—Colonel John C. Paxton.—Lieutenant Colonel Alexander L. Haskins.—Lieutenant Colonel Ephraim C. Dawes.—Major Jewett Palmer.—Major George T. Rice.—Captains Jacob Koenig, James C. Selby.—William B. Whittlesey.—Madison Hoon.—Frank Buell.—Augustus T. Ward.—Arthur D. Eells.—Theodore E. Greenwood.—John J. Jumper.—George B. Bartlett.—Lieutenants Levi J. Fouraker.—George B. Turner.—Timothy L. Condit.—Charles B. Gates.—Richard D. Mason.—Edgar P. Pearce.—Richard B. Cheatham.—Assistant Surgeon Pardon Cook, jr.—Luther Hathaway.—William L. Porterfield.—Roll of Honor.—History of the Washington County Soldiers Monument Association.—Roll of the Dead.

WOMEN'S WORK IN THE WAR.

WHILE recounting the deeds of Washington county soldiers, let us not forget the noble part taken by the women of the county during that struggle, in ministering to the wants of the Union soldiers and in alleviating that world of suffering in the hospital and camp, and on the field of battle.

Their work was done quietly and without ostentation, and they modestly hoped that by helping the sick and wounded of the grand armies, to bear their burdens of pain and disease, they should be counted as having done something for the Union.

They had husbands, sons, brothers, fathers and other very dear friends with Grant, Sherman or Sheridan, at the front. Not a day passed but that their hearts were troubled for the welfare of the loved ones. How anxiously did they look for the letters. If only a few lines were received, those few lines told the story that he was still among the living and battling for his country. How they tried the patience of the postmasters, especially after a great battle. "Are you sure there is no letter? Please look again," and then, perhaps, the mother, in her anxiety, before another mail, would send around the little boy to ask still again. Then there came too often, not the longed-for missive, but the telegram or hurried line from a comrade, stating that he was dead. Dead for his country, for liberty and union, in so much a great consolation, but how could even that console her who bent under the stroke. All the courage and fortitude was not displayed on the battle line. By thousands of hearthstones, here and there through the land, came occasions for great courage and great fortitude, especially when it was the bread-winner stricken down in his prime, leaving a young family, with none to provide.

Who can tell to what extent the loyal homes at the north influenced men in the field. The brave words sent, the noble sentiments penned by fair hands, all glowing with patriotism and love at country. All honor to the noble women of the great north.

On Monday, October 28, 1861, seventy-five ladies of Marietta and Harmar met at the vestry of the Episcopal church, pursuant to a call of the United States sanitary commission, and organized by electing Mrs. Mumford, president; Mrs. Stephen Newton, vice-president; and Mrs. W. L. Rolston, secretary; Mrs. James Dunn, Mrs. Pardon Cooke, Mrs. T. P. Harshberger, Miss M. Woodbridge, Mrs. William S. Ward, Mrs. M. P. Wells, Mrs. C. B. Hall, Miss Phebe Fuller, Mrs. C. Regnier, Mrs. O'Leary, Mrs. Paul Bradbeck, Mrs. McLeod and Mrs. S. R. Turner, receiving committee; Mrs. James Ball, Mrs. Judge Green, Mrs. William Pearce, Mrs. L. Hathaway, Mrs. Bonner, Mrs. Beman Gates, Mrs. I. W. Andrews, Mrs. D. R. Sniffen, Mrs. H. Hill, Mrs. Levi Barber, Mrs. Oscar Chapin, Mrs. E. R. Cadwallader, committee for preparatory work.

The society was called the Union Soldiers' Relief association. Each member paid a small initiation fee with liberty to contribute as much more as possible. Application was made at once for material to make up into quilts, socks, slippers, comforts, etc. Donations of canton-flannel, fruits, half-worn calico, etc., were also received, which were speedily made up, boxed and ready to ship. Gallipolis hospital was the first place supplied, there being many men from Washington county lying there sick and destitute. Two boxes were sent within a few days, one filled with clothing and bedding from Marietta; the other with wine, jellies and fruit from Harmar.

The society met at the lecture room of the Episcopal church during all the war, varying the frequency of its meetings with the demand made upon them—usually meeting once a week.

Mrs. Rolston, in the first report, dated April 28, 1862, a semi-annual one, says:

We have had thirty-one regular meetings, and three extra ones. The attendance has ranged from seventy to eighty, and the average about twenty-five, and at no time has the interest flagged, for when few were here they worked the faster.

We have met from week to week, and this gathering has been a source of pleasure as well as profit, and will long be remembered a bright day amid the dark horrors of this war. The merry peals of laughter have lightened many a heart that came here sad.

When we learn through reports from the different hospitals of the west; how much the sufferings of our wounded soldiers have been alleviated by the sanitary commission we are amply repaid, and must feel like continuing our labors unwearied.

The German ladies of Marietta also formed a society, as did the ladies of Waterford, Barlow and Salem townships, and others of which we have no record.

In April, 1863, the Beverly Advertiser contained the following: "No accurate record of the contributions of the Waterford Township Soldiers' Aid society for three fourths of its existence can be procured, but recently its records show items, viz: one hundred and seventy-five dollars cash, one hundred and forty-three shirts, one hundred and seventy-four pairs socks, sixty-eight blankets, fifty-three handkerchiefs with canned fruits, lint, bandages, etc., in abundance.

The heart of old Waterford is wholly pledged to the glorious cause, and she has still enough sturdy sons of patriot sires, lovers of freedom and union to make the air of this part of the Muskingum valley exceedingly unwholesome to traitors.

In this connection it should be said that the first woman to subscribe to the Soldiers' Relief fund in the county was Mrs. William R. Putnam. On December 15 and 16, 1863, a special effort was made by the society at Marietta to raise funds by a sanitary fair. Contributions were sent in from all the townships in the vicinity, in money, apples, quinces, potatoes, turnips, onions, cabbages, pumpkins, butter, cheese, eggs, chickens, honey, dried and canned fruits, flour, buckets, ornamental and fruit trees, blankets, socks, furniture, and many other things—"almost everything that could be turned into money, or sent to the soldiers." From Union and Muskingum townships, large lots of fruits, vegetables, and trees were received. From Rainbow, fifty dollars in cash—Lowell, eighty-six dollars in cash and a large contribution in socks and canned fruits. Belpre, Warren, Barlow, Fearing, Salem, and Newport, all gave large contributions. A dinner was donated by the citizens of Marietta which added largely to receipts, the net amount cleared being one thousand nine hundred and ninety-one dollars and seventy-five cents.

The following are the items:

|                                       |           |
|---------------------------------------|-----------|
| Cash contributions.....               | $ 427.00 |
| Receipts from door.....               | 234.70    |
| "    from dinner.....                 | 108.00    |
| "    from supper.....                 | 245.25    |
| "    from fancy tables.....           | 243.10    |
| "    from cake table.....             | 163.36    |
| "    from grab box.....               | 39.30     |
| "    from toys and confectionary..... | 49.57     |
| "    from pictures.....               | 43.00     |
| "    from pipe of peace.....          | 33.50     |
| "    from ring cakes.....             | 30.00     |
| "    from guess cake.....             | 32.45     |
| "    from auction.....                | 82.00     |
| Sums from various sources.....        | 73.49     |
| Receipts from Harmar table.....       | 339.30    |
| Total.....                            | 2166.52   |
| Expenses.....                         | 174.77    |
| Net.....                              | $1991.75 |

Part of the above amount was paid over to the Harmar association, how much we cannot ascertain.

In Belpre the Ladies' Union circle on February 22, 1864, held a festival "for the aid of soldiers in the field," and cleared three hundred and seventy dollars, and so in all parts of the county the generous hearted women devoted themselves to the work.

At Bonn, in Salem township, they formed a branch No. 420 of what was called the "Union League of Loyal Women of America," an organization which originated in Illinois, having the same purpose as similar societies. This was begun in the fall of 1864 and continued during the balance of the war. It had between sixty and seventy members, and notwithstanding the lateness of the start they forwarded a number of invoices of sanitary supplies to the Cincinnati branch of the United States sanitary commission, amounting in all to about one hundred dollars. The fund remaining at the close of the war, amounted, August 2, 1865, to seventeen dollars and twenty cents which was donated to Washington County Soldiers' Monument association.

Among the many women of Washington county deserving of special mention, we can only notice one whose talents and industry gave her special prominence—Mrs. Francis Dana Gage, "Aunt Fanny Gage." She acquired a national reputation by her devotion to the cause of the freedmen and her untiring energy in working for the sanitary commission: "Through all the inclement winter weather (1863-4), through Pennsylvania, New York, Ohio, Illinois, and Missouri, she pursued her labors of love, never omitting an evening, when she could get an audience to address, speaking for soldiers' aid societies, and giving proceeds to those who worked only for the soldiers,—then for freedmen's associations. She worked without fee or reward, asking only of those who were willing, to give enough to defray her expenses—for herself—thankful if she received, cheerful if she did not."* Mrs. Gage was the daughter of Joseph Barker, late of this county, and Elizabeth Dana, a descendent of Mary Bancroft, thus being allied on maternal side to the well-known Massachusetts families of Dana and Bancroft. She has also acquired a reputation in literature from the beauty and pathos of her numerous poems.

On December 2, 1865, Mrs. Rolston made her final report, showing the work of the Marietta Soldiers' Relief association from October, 1861, to June, 1865, when the meetings ceased, as follows:

During the three and a half years over two thousand garments were made. Articles made: one thousand and forty shirts, three hundred and seventy-five pairs of drawers, sixty comforters, one hundred and sixteen sheets, two hundred and sixteen pillow-cases, fifty-nine pillows, two hundred and three towels, thirty-one pairs slippers, two hundred and seventy-one pairs socks, thirty-four pairs mittens, twelve pairs suspenders, three hundred and thirty-four pocket-handkerchiefs, twenty-one dressing-gowns; in all, two thousand eight hundred and thirty, besides many other articles for hospital use.

The association has been well supplied with material, which was made into bandages, compresses, towels, pocket-handkerchiefs, lint, etc.

There have been bought four thousand three hundred and thirty yards of cotton and flannel, besides much donated. Goods were sent once a month, or oftener, where most needed, generally to the Cincinnati branch of the United States Sanitary commission; but the hospital here (at Marietta), and those at Parkersburgh, Charleston, and Cairo, and sometimes regiments in the field, have been supplied.

Boxes sent: sixty-five—containing shirts, sheets, drawers, socks, mittens, blankets, towels, etc., to the number of three thousand five hundred and forty-three, besides, slings, wound-supporters, eye-shades, pincushions, compresses, bandages, lint, etc., too numerous to mention.

In February, 1863, the hospital at Marietta having been abandoned, the military committee gave all the goods remaining there to the association.

More than six hundred cans and jars of fruit, at least forty gallons of pickles, several barrels of sauerkraut, more than twenty bushels of dried fruit, with various articles of hospital aid have been sent.

The association has never asked in vain for anything that could be of service to the soldier, nor have the citizens ever failed to respond to the call for money. The association has not been for one day out of funds. Voluntary contributions of ninety-three dollars and fifty cents have been received from different sources. The military committee gave, at different times, forty-five dollars; four public entertainments realized one thousand six hundred and seventy-six dollars and sixty-seven cents; a fee of five cents per month from members raised fifty-two dollars and ninety cents; with one hundred and fifteen dollars and fifty-eight cents interest on the money deposited, gives the total receipts one thousand nine hundred and eighty-three dollars and sixty-five cents.

The expenditures have been chiefly for materials for work, with incidentials, such as fuel, boxes, although most of these have been donated. About fifty dollars have been given in small sums to soldiers and their families.

* Women's Work in the Civil War.

Receipts.....$1,983 65
Expenditures.....1,274 15

Balance in treasury..... 709 50

This balance, by vote of the association, was given as follows: two hundred dollars to the Washington County Soldiers' Monument association; and five hundred and nine dollars and fifty cents to the Marietta Charitable association.

After a vote of thanks to the vestry of St. Luke's church for the use of the lecture room for over three years, the association dissolved.

S. C. ROLSTON,

Secretary and treasurer.

The officers of the Marietta and Harmar society were as follows: 1861—Mrs. T. F. Mumford, president; Mrs. Stephen Newton, vice-president; Mrs. W. L. Rolston, secretary and treasurer. Work committee: Mrs. James Booth, Mrs. Beman Gates, Mrs. Davis Green, Mrs. Luther Hathaway, Mr. I. W. Andrews, Mrs. Bonner, Mrs. D. R. Sniffen, Mrs. Levi Barber, Mrs. Oscar Chapin, Mrs. E. R. Cadwallader.

The Harmar ladies formed a separate association in 1862.

1862—Mrs. Nahum Ward, president; Mrs. Melvin Clarke, vice-president; Mrs. W. L. Rolston, secretary and treasurer.

1863—Mrs. Nahum Ward, president; Mrs. William A. Whittlesey, vice-president; Mrs. R. P. James, second vice-president; Mrs. W. L. Rolston, secretary and treasurer. Work committee: Miss McFarland, Miss Hobby, Mrs. R. E. Harte, Mrs. Joseph Lovell.

1864 and 1865—Mrs. William A. Whittlesey, president; Mrs. B. W. Lovell, vice-president; Mrs. W. L. Rolston, secretary and treasurer. Work committee: Miss McFarland, Miss Hobby, and Mrs. R. E. Harte.

After the first year the Harmar ladies had their own association, an account of which, by Mrs. John Pool, is given herewith.

The foregoing is a brief record of the part taken by the women of Washington county during the great war for the preservation of the Union. It does not fully record their work. No historian will attempt to do it; for who could ever hope to adequately describe the burden of heart, the burden of work, and the burden of patriotism borne by the devoted women of the north during that eventful struggle. Let us honor them, and let posterity hold them in grateful remembrance.

SOLDIERS' AID SOCIETY OF HARMAR, OHIO.

Immediately following the departure of our volunteers from Marietta, Harmar and the adjoining towns, in response to President Lincoln's call for troops in 1861, to suppress the great Rebellion,—the loyal women, all aglow with the patriotism which had inspired the hearts of those who had so recently left— anxiously inquired in what way they, too, could serve their country.

The weeks preceding had been eventful and stirring times in the history of our quiet town, for the call for troops had met with a hearty and ready response. Students from the college, mechanics from factories and workshops, clerks from offices and stores, and young men from country homes had volunteered their services—companies had been formed and drilled in military tactics,—while over dwellings and stores the stars and stripes waved, and the streets resounded with the notes of warlike preparation.

At length marching orders were received, and the volunteers had left, and then to the mothers, wives and children of these—some of whom were sick and destitute, the attention and sympathy of the patriotic women was directed. Subscriptions had already been received from many of the citizens, to meet the present necessities of such as needed help, and as far as possible, generous assistance had been proffered.

Then, followed letters from our volunteers in camp, or on the march, some of whom unaccustomed to exposure, were sick, and requiring home comforts or articles of clothing. These supplies were immediately sent from private sources until, as the wants became greater, committees were appointed, who went from house to house soliciting donations.

Meanwhile, our troops had moved southward, rumors of anticipated battles were reported, and as the necessity of hospital supplies became apparent, meetings were held for consultation to meet the approaching emergency.

The various benevolent and church organizations were merged into soldiers' aid societies, and articles for the comfort of the sick and wounded were in constant preparation. The following ladies were prominently connected with the Harmar Aid society, and until the close of the war, closely identified with its interests: Mrs. Levi Barber, president; Mrs. Harlow Chapin, Mrs. Douglas Putnam, Mrs. David Putnam, Mrs. Henry Fearing, Mrs. Oscar Chapin, Mrs. Dr. Frank Hart, Mrs. L. Wheeler, Mrs. Dr. L. Hart, Mrs. S. Stratton, Mrs. W. Crawford, Mrs. Barber, Mrs. Rev. Wakefield, Mrs. Newton, Mrs. Fuller, and Mrs. L. Reppert.

To this committee a corps of young ladies was added, as follows: Miss Julia Barber, Miss V. Reppert, Miss Martha Putnam, Miss J. Wheeler, Miss E. Stratton, Miss E. Barber, Miss M. F. Newton, Miss Mary Hart, Miss A. Reppert. Through the newspapers, from the pulpit, and in every available way, urgent appeals were made for assistance, and from individuals and churches liberal donations were sent. From country societies and from sources unknown to us, supplies of delicacies, jellies, canned and dried fruits were added, which to the stores of clothing in readiness were carefully packed and consigned to surgeons in various regimental hospitals, who by letter had specified previously the articles most needed. From month to month this work went on, varied only by sad tidings of battles fought and the intelligence of many of our brave soldiers wounded or sick in hospitals, requiring special supplies, when boxes of bandages, lint, and the various appliances for hospital use were hastily prepared and dispatched. No official record has been preserved of shipments made to Western Virginia, Louisville, Pittsburgh Landing, Murfreesborough and other points, which were forwarded in request of surgeons and officers in Ohio regiments, with whom our society was in direct communication.

While sending supplies to distant hospitals, the ladies of the Aid society and others were not unmindful of the present wants and needs of the Union soldiers at our doors, to whom a helping hand could be extended. There were regiments encamped temporarily within the precincts of our own town—some awaiting transportation to the front or for regimental supplies, which had been detained or interrupted on the route thither, in consequence of which the soldiers were exhausted from want of proper food. The presence of these troops would stimulate anew the patriotism of the citizens, whose generosity was unbounded; and everything which could be provided for their comfort was most freely bestowed.

In these kindly offices of hospitality, of which also no record has been preserved, the capacity of the dwellings and the resources of the larder were often tested to their utmost limit; our doors were thrown wide open, and all who could be accommodated were most cordially invited to enter and served with impromptu meals, calling forth, as our guests departed, their warmest thanks, and leaving us with the cheering thought that we had "done what we could."

There were also unwritten kindnesses which could be rendered our Union soldiers on these occasions—sometimes in writing letters at their dictation, to wives, mothers, and sisters, far distant, bearing messages of comfort and cheer; to others some forgotten or lost article could be supplied, or some needed repair of clothing made, while to all words of encouragement and kindness could be spoken which were always gratefully appreciated. To those regiments, also, who were in transit to distant points, and who for long, weary hours were detained in railroad cars near the town, awaiting orders to move on—to these we could render service. On many a cold and chilly morning the intelligence would come that these soldiers, too, were within reach of sympathy and help; and as speedily as possible messengers would be dispatched with plentiful supplies of hot coffee and sandwiches, distributed amid the cheers of the soldiers, to whom this unexpected repast was a welcome surprise.

Each day brought special demands upon the time and attention of our Aid society, either in supplying the wants of our troops passing through the town, or in preparing boxes of sanitary stores for points already designated.

There were also the families of our volunteers, who needed assistance. Liberal subscriptions had been repeatedly made for this purpose, by the citizens, and also for the purchase of hospital supplies. Numerous collections had been taken in the churches for the same object; and as larger cities and towns had raised sums of money by means of sanitary fairs and entertainments, it was proposed that a fair be held in Marietta, in which the ladies of Harmar be invited to unite. This plan met with hearty approval, and a committee was appointed, consisting of Mrs. Levi Barber and Mrs. John Poole, to make necessary arrangements. Subsequently other committees were added, to obtain articles of beauty and utility to be placed on sale, and for refreshments, etc., who canvassed the town thoroughly. After weeks of preparation the fair was opened, with an admiring throng of visitors in attendance, and its success was assured. The receipts were unexpectedly large, many pleasant acquaintances formed, harmonious feelings prevailed, and results were in every respect satisfactory. The receipts, of which the ladies of Harmar received a fair proportion, were expended for the relief of soldiers' families, and paid in weekly instalments, after a careful investigation of the circumstances of each family had been made. The fund, amounting to several hundred dollars, was judiciously and systematically disbursed, bringing much comfort to the recipients and gratification to all those who by personal effort or influence had secured these results.

In all these beneficent efforts, extending through the war, and never ceasing until the conflict was over, the aid society was indebted to many of the citizens of Harmar for invaluable assistance, rendered in the prosecution of their work, at home and abroad, for which services, we record in behalf of the society, our appreciation and thanks.

The foregoing pages comprise but a fragmentary and imperfect report of the work accomplished by the Soldiers' Aid society of Harmar; but are submitted in the hope that they may be of some interest to the home workers, who were thus privileged to minister to some of the Union soldiers, without expectation of either mention or reward—but grateful then and now, for the opportunity of expressing, in the slightest degree, their gratitude to those brave men who were willing to sacrifice their lives in the service of our country.

THE MARIETTA HOSPITAL.

About May 26, 1861, a hospital was opened for the soldiers then in Camp Putnam. It was located on the upper or eastern side of Second street, a short distance from the camp, and was conducted and supported by the ladies of Marietta and Washington county, assisted by the officers in command at the camp. Drs. Frank Hart, Samuel Hart, and George O. Hildreth were in attendance when their services were needed, and always without pay. No records of this hospital have been preserved, but it was used more or less all through the war.

BATTERY C, FIRST WEST VIRGINIA LIGHT ARTILLERY.

COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

Captain Frank Buell, mustered March 30, 1862, died from effects of wounds at battle of Freeman's Ford, August 23, 1862; Captain Wallace Hill, mustered August 1, 1862, promoted to captain August 1, 1862; First Lieutenant Dennis O'Leary, mustered March 30, 1862; First Lieutenant John G. Theis, mustered August 1, 1862, promoted to junior first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Theodore G. Field, mustered December 23, 1863, promoted to first sergeant August 1, 1862, to second lieutenant December 23, 1863, vice Langley, resigned; Second Lieutenant John W. Jacobs, mustered December 29, 1863, promoted from corporal, vice Miner, resigned, December 29, 1863.

NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

First Sergeant William H. Goldsmith, mustered March 31, 1864, veteran; Quartermaster Sergeant Thomas Phelps, mustered March 31, 1864, veteran; Sergeant Owen O'Neil, mustered March 31, 1864, veteran; Sergeant Alexander H. Bukey, mustered March 31, 1864, veteran; Sergeant L. R. Miraben, mustered March 31, 1864, veteran; Sergeant David Dow, mustered March 31, 1864, veteran; Sergeant Adam B. Rook, mustered February 24, 1864, veteran; Corporal Turrell Cusack, mustered March 31, 1864, veteran; Corporal John Meighan, mustered March 31, 1864, veteran; Corporal William F. Minster, mustered March 31, 1864, veteran; Corporal Charles Clógon, mustered March 31, 1864, veteran, promoted January 1, 1864; Corporal William H. Ranger, mustered March 31, 1864, veteran; Corporal Milton H. Laughlin, mustered March 31, 1864, veteran; Corporal John Lehnhard, mustered September 2, 1862, promoted to corporal September 1, 1862; Corporal George W. Stanley, mustered March 31, 1864, veteran; Corporal Jeremiah H. Dooley, mustered March 31, 1864, veteran; Corporal John H. Miner, mustered March 31, 1864, veteran; Corporal James Wright, mustered March 31, 1864, veteran, wounded at Bull Run, August 30, 1862; Corporal Frank R. Benan, mustered March 31, 1864, veteran; Corporal William Jenvey, mustered March 30, 1862.

BATTERY C, FIRST WEST VIRGINIA LIGHT ARTILLERY.

When President Lincoln made his first call for troops to serve three months, a company of infantry, under command of Captain Frank Buell, left Marietta in April, 1861, and as heretofore noticed became company B, Eighteenth Ohio volunteer militia. The other officers were Dennis O'Leary, first lieutenant; William Bisbee, second lieutenant, who was afterward elected major of the regiment, and Wallace Hill elected to fill the vacancy.

The company served in West Virginia under General Hill, and was most of the time guarding railroads. There was no engagement with the enemy and it was mustered out in August, 1861. This company reenlisted almost entire, as a battery of light artillery, the reenlistment dating from September 1, 1861. Owing to a misunderstanding among those in authority in Ohio, the service of the battery was offered to Governor Pierpont, of West Virginia, and accepted, and was named by the captain in the governor's honor.

The battery left Marietta for Wheeling, West Virginia, in October, 1861. The officers: Frank Buell, senior captain; Dennis O'Leary, junior first lieutenant; Wallace Hill, senior first lieutenant; John P. Theis, junior second lieutenant; William W. Witherow, second lieutenant.

The battery remained in Wheeling until ordered to Point Pleasant, West Virginia, for recruiting purposes, and from there to Charleston, West Virginia, where it remained till early in the spring of 1862, when it was ordered back to Wheeling and was mustered into the service of the United States, March 30, 1862. Here the injustice was done the battery of not dating the muster back to the date of enlistment, it having been in the service seven months.

These seven months had not been idly spent. Although not fully mounted, the battery had thorough and continued drill and practice in firing, with study of the tactics, so that when at this time they were fully equipped, they were by no means raw recruits.

The battery was supplied with six ten-pounder Parrott guns. After the effective work done with those guns at Cross Keys, Bull Run, Gettysburgh, and elsewhere, it would be hard to convince any member of this battery that it was not the most accurate shooting gun in the service.

General Fremont having taken command of the mountain department, the battery served under him during his campaign in West Virginia in the summer of 1862.

Leaving Wheeling in May for New Creek, West Virginia, we immediately proceeded to reinforce Milroy and Schenck, who were hard pressed by Stonewall Jackson on the upper south branch of the Potomac. Here they were assigned to Stahl's brigade, of Blencker's division. Arriving at Franklin, in Pendleton county, they found Generals Schenck and Milroy had fought Jackson at Bull Pasture Mountain, but had been compelled to fall back to Franklin.

In the meantime Jackson, instead of remaining in front, as it was supposed he would, had gone over the mountains into the Shenandoah valley, and had driven General Banks out. In order to intercept Jackson, Fremont fell back from Franklin to Moorefield and crossed the mountains into the Shenandoah valley and struck Jackson's army on his retreat at Strasburgh. Jackson sent out a force and held Fremont in check near Strasburgh, where he had quite a skirmish, while his army passed up the valley. The next day Fremont started in pursuit, and the battery was assigned to the cavalry advance, and the Eighth West Virginia infantry and the Sixtieth Ohio infantry under Colonel Cluseret—the infantry was called the Cluseret light brigade. This colonel, afterward General Cluseret, was subsequently in the war of the French commune.

BATTLE OF TOM BROOK.

At Tom Brook, some few miles above Strasburgh, the battery came up with the enemy's rear and forced him to form. Here, for the first time, the battery met the foe, June 2, 1862. Unfortunately two of the guns were temporarily disabled by loosing the wheels while galloping into action, caused by the linch-pins bouncing out. This defect was afterward remedied throughout the army by using a pin with a clamp. The right and left sections, however, went into position under fire, which proved to be inaccurate, and when the centre section came up the chief of artillery, Colonel Pilsen, moved it to a position to the right and front some three hundred yards. The ground being very uneven, the progress was slow, which was trying to new troops going into their first engagement under fire, but every man stood to his post like a veteran, and all of them were complimented by the chief of artillery for coolness and accuracy of firing, which, all things considered, was admirable. The enemy was compelled to retreat.

The next day, at Woodstock, they met the enemy, and the next at Mt. Jackson, where "Stonewall Jackson," to delay the Union pursuit, burned the bridge over the Shenandoah. The river was very high and swift, which rendered fording impossible, and the current was too strong to admit of laying pontoons. They were compelled to wait till the water receded. The next morning was rather hazy. They were aroused very early by the "long roll" and the cavalry and artillery buglers calling to "boots and saddle." Orders were given to hitch up as quickly as possible, as the enemy had flanked us on the left. The river, some distance below the bridge, makes an abrupt turn, and the sentries had discovered, through the fog, as they thought, a six gun battery, which would enfilade their position and would open on them as soon as the fog lifted. During the bustle and confusion of a change of front the fog cleared away and disclosed six beautiful piles of rails, at about the usual interval of a battery of field guns in position. After great delay in laying the pontoon bridge, which was a clumsy affair, the battery again started in pursuit, this time bringing the enemy to bay a short distance above Harrisonburgh, where he had left the main turn-pike and started on a cross-road to the left, where he was vigorously attacked by the light brigade and the Pennsylvania Buck Tails. The deadly aim of the latter punished the rebels severely. Among their slain was the notorious General Ashby, Jackson's chief of cavalry. General Fremont, not wishing to bring on a general engagement, the enemy were not pushed, but were allowed to retire unmolested.

CROSS KEYS.

The following morning the army of General Fremont moved out and found the enemy in position at Cross Keys, eight miles from Harrisonburgh, and about nine from Port Republic. Stahl's brigade, including the battery, held the left, Milroy the right, and Cluseret the centre. The battle had continued about four hours when Jackson massed on the left and swept Stahl's infantry from the field, driving all of the line to the left of the battery back to the rear, and leaving the battery in a very exposed position. Captain Buell hesitated to leave the field, and did not attempt to retire until the general in person ordered him to do so, as they were about to be surrounded and cut off. Finally the order was given to "limber to the rear." In doing so they were compelled to pass to the left and rear through a wood, on the other side of which were the victorious "Johnnies," coming up to capture a lone, unsupported battery, as they doubtless imagined, but they were badly mistaken, for there was the Buck Tail battalion, who deployed among the trees between the battery and the rebels, who, as soon as they saw the deer tails on their caps, fell back and allowed the battery to retire unmolested. Captain Buell, not wishing to desert his friends who had so bravely defended him, unlimbered the left section in the woods, determined to stand by the Buck Tails. Although in a military sense this movement would have been considered highly imprudent, yet it showed the indomitable courage of the man. On coming out of these woods the balance of the brigade, mistaking our battery for the enemy, opened fire doing perhaps better firing than they ever did before, killing one of the battery horses. It was by force that a demoralized infantry color bearer was induced to advance with his colors, when the firing was stopped. This ended the battle. Stahl's brigade lost about five hundred, while the troops to the right suffered but little loss and held their position.

At the request of Jackson an armistice was granted to bury the dead, and in the night he folded his tents, and, Arab-like, stole away.

The next morning the army was to move to the attack at 5 A. M., the battery in columns of sections, the infantry in columns of divisions, with a strong skirmish line in front ready to deploy instantly into line of battle. The signal to move was to be two cannon shots in succession. For some reason this signal was not given until 9 A. M., or later, when we could distinctly hear fighting at Port Republic, where Carroll, with his brigade, was holding the bridge against Jackson's whole army. We moved on to port Republic, arriving in time to see the rear of the rebel army passing over the Blue Ridge mountains miles away.

The battery then fell back to Harrisonburgh, thence to Moorefield, thence crossed over the Blue Ridge, at Thornton's Gap, and joined Pope's army at Sperryville.

BATTLE OF FREEMAN'S FORD.*

One evening at dark an orderly dashed up with orders to fall back to Culpeper without delay; then came one of the most trying campaigns we ever experienced. We marched eleven days and nights, and never took the harness off our backs, and the only time we could get to cook would be when our advance would encounter the enemy, causing a check, or when we were guarding some ford while the infantry were passing. It was a terrible experience. At length the enemy were discovered strongly posted at Freeman's Ford.

Johnson's, De Beck's, Dickman's, and a portion of Weidrick's batteries had tried in vain to dislodge them, when we were ordered up with our long range Parrots. This was August 22, 1866. I shall never forget the last order Captain Buell ever gave me. I was then his color-bearer. As soon as he received orders to go into position he turned with sparkling eye to me and exclaimed:

"Show your colors, Will."

I unfurled my colors and rode by his side up the hill. The rebels having engaged so many of our batteries' on that hill had the exact range, and every shell came thundering in our midst, cutting up the ground terribly. The rebels picked out every conspicuous mark; my brigade flag (a present from the Marietta ladies) soon drew their fire, when Lieutenant Hill ordered me to draw off to the left, as it formed too good a target. The battle waged warmer and warmer; our boys having got the range were soon enabled to send as good as we received; this was perceptible from the increasing wildness in the rebel fire.

Captain Buell, mounted on "Billy," a light dun horse, formed a fair and easy mark, passing continually along the line directing here, encouraging and applauding there; he appeared omnipresent. His daring recklessness soon drew the attention of officers on him: General Milroy, renowned for gallantry, turning to his staff, remarked: "Gentlemen, if you desire to see a brave man look there." But all anticipations of our gallant captain's future were soon to be cut off. A shell, as fatally aimed as the bullet which laid our martyred President on a bloody bier, and set a Nation in mourning, struck his horse in the shoulder, and, passing through, broke his left leg. So suddenly did the horse fall that the captain, unable to extricate himself, was thrown violently forward as the horse fell backward, injuring the captain internally. As he fell four boys sprang to his side and carried him from the field. I was watching him as he fell. It appeared as if the grave had suddenly yawned wide and taken father, mother, brothers, sisters, friends, all, so blank did life appear to us, and I have heard many of our bravest and truest say that they were not ashamed to confess that they cried like children. But our misfortune never for a moment interfered with the battle; if anything, all appeared to enter still more heartily into it, influenced, as they were, by a desire for revenge. Gun after gun was discharged with fearful rapidity. The men worked with a will that promised soon to turn victory's uncertain scale in our favor. Each and all appeared oblivious to all else than seeking a terrible retribution. Nor were our endeavors futile. Soon we beheld a wavering and wildness in their fire; soon one by one their guns ceased, until all became silent, and we saw them drawing from the field. Corporal A. H. Bukey, fortunately having his gun loaded, took deliberate aim as the last gun was leaving and fired. I saw horses rear, cannoneers scattered in a manner not laid down in artillery tactics, so I should judge the piece was dismounted. The battle was over.

Captain Buell died of his injuries, loved and lamented by his men, and respected and admired by all who knew him.

Orders came August 23, 1862, for the battery to leave its position at Freeman's Ford and take up the line of march with their corps. They had not gone far when they encountered the enemy at Sulphur Springs, where they gained an easy victory, after an hour's vigorous shelling, driving them from their position, and enabling the corps to resume its march in peace.

*From account by William Jenvey.

The next day, the twenty-fourth, they met the enemy at Waterloo bridge, and held the bridge until the army had all passed, when they witnessed its destruction by the Union troops, and again sped on. The march now became a race between the Union forces and the rebels, on parallel lines, the objective point being Bull Run. During the still marches of midnight they could distinctly hear the rumbling of Jackson's artillery, and by day they would occasionally catch the gleam of lines of bright muskets in the sunlight.

SECOND BATTLE OF BULL RUN.

The following is from an account by William Jenvey:

Bull Run was at length reached on the evening of the twenty-eighth of August, 1862. Milroy's brigade deploying, encountered their skirmishers, drove them, and pushed back a portion of their lines, and enabled our whole line to take position that night. All slept on their arms and tried to snatch a few moments' sleep to enable them to do well their parts on the coming morrow.

The next day's sun found us all bustle and activity. Aids-de-camp on jaded horses, were dashing and tearing here and there, receiving and delivering orders. Brigade commanders were busy arranging and disarranging their lines. Division commanders, older and wiser, were coolly witnessing the preparatory manoeuvres, and concentrating all their energies for the desired time.

Suddenly Milroy, advancing, sought the foe, and full soon did he find them, for with his characteristic recklessness he advanced too far and encountered a full rebel division. Not a whit intimidated, he deployed his lines and opened with a murderous fire, but numbers soon told on him. Rapidly his lines thinned, and he stood in imminent danger of being cut off; but, collecting all his energies, he charged, extricated himself, and rejoined our line.

By this time the battle had become general. Our battery, being in position near the Washington pike, was keeping clear all before it. Manoeuvres and counter-manoevres took place, yet neither side gained any advantage. After noon, Hooker and Kearney coming up and taking position with us, we gained visible successes; gradually we gained ground, though every step was hotly contested. Night closed on the combatants, leaving the Union forces in possession of fully a mile of conquered ground.

The "sun of Austerlitz" scarcely dawned with prospects of a more sanguinary conflict than did the sun of the thirtieth. McDowell had abandoned Thoroughfare Gap, Lee had largely reinforced Jackson, and we had been reinforced by several divisions of McClellan's Peninsular army.

Our battery was scattered on three parts of the field. The right, under Lieutenant Witherow, was ordered to report to General McLean, of Schenck's division. The centre section, disabled by the heavy and incessant firing of the previous day, was nevertheless kept close at hand ready for any emergency, while the left, under Lieutenant Hill, together with three brass guns placed under his command, advanced up the Washington pike, and poking their noses fair in the midst of the Johnnies, soon created havoc and dismay in the rebel ranks. The first day's fight taxed our energies greatly, but the exertions of the second were two-fold greater. The rebels outnumbered us greatly and punished us terribly. The part of the field on which our right section was in position, was a scene of terrible carnage, the rebels opening with artillery strove in vain to dislodge us, the infantry was then called into requisition. Advancing in perfect order they attempted to take the place by assault, a terrible discharge of cannister met them and forced them back. Several times did they rally and advance, but as often were they repulsed. At last, largely reinforced, they took advantage of a piece of woods to our left and flanked us from that direction. Turning our guns on them we poured storms of canister into their faces, cutting swaths through their massive ranks. Piercing their column appeared like piercing a rubber ball, the hole was scarcely made before it closed. Notwithstanding the dreadful havoc, on they came, and still on until they nearly grasped our guns. Our canister had all been expended. Bukey, intent on fighting to the last, inserted a shell minus either fuse or cap in his gun and sent it as a solid shot right through their ranks. McLean's brigade, not unlike the British Home Guards at Waterloo, sprang from their cover, and as we limbered to the rear to fall back they closed in on our rear and opened such a storm of musketry that mortal men could not withstand it. The rebel charge was thus checked, and we were allowed to draw off in peace. Lieutenant Witherow, on mounting his horse was badly wounded, eventually causing his discharge. Thomas Driscoll in the hurry forgot his sponge bucket, and on going back after it got several holes through his blouse, but fortunately none hit the brave fellow. Several horses were shot.

In the meantime Lieutenant Hill and the left section had been hard pressed. Being in position in the centre of the pike, he presented a fair target to the whole of the rebel artillery, and well did they improve their opportunity, for shot and shell and the more deadly shrapnel fell on all sides with one continuous roar and hiss, and added to this the whistling of the musket balls and the discharge of our own guns, it created confusion enough to try the bravest of hearts. During the whole engagement Siegel remained in our midst, his uniform and splendid staff drawing the fire of the rebel sharpshooters on us quite briskly. After a while Hooker established himself with us, and also for a while Reno and Kearney. These generals centering in us caused the tide of war to roll all around us. Assaults would be made in front, then the task would be comparatively easy, but when the flanking charges came then came danger. Sergeant Wes. Miner, having possessed himself of a musket, had busied himself during the whole engagement picking off sharpshooters. One in particular we saw roll in the dust from his unerring aim.

To the right and left of us the day was going badly. Fitz John Porter, lying within hearing of our guns and knowing of the fearful slaughter, refused to support us. Our overtaken and outnumbered boys were gradually obliged to give way, still we in the centre held our own until the rebels concentrating their infantry and a portion of their artillery, opened on us most terribly; for a while it seemed as if nothing could stay there and live. At last a shell, surcharged with destruction, came hurtling along, and striking Sergeant Goldsmith's gun on the right side, glancing, struck the elevating screw and bursting severely wounded Corporal James Wright and John Eaton; the former in seven places, the most of them severe, the latter in four places and mortally. For a time all appeared confounded, so close did the shell come to all, and so severe was the concussion. The shell passed over Sumner Ellis' shoulder, for a time stunning him. Soon the confusion died away, and they found the extent of the injuries. To stay longer was madness, for certain death awaited them; so limbering up and carefully supporting their wounded comrades they coolly and slowly made way for the rear.

All had now become lost; "rout, ruin, panic scattered all." The baggage wagons, having been foolishly brought up to the very front, commenced a base and confused retreat; but one road led to the rear, and to this road all fled. Artillery, baggage wagons, ambulances and vehicles of almost every sort were locked in utter and inextricable confusion, unable to move themselves, and preventing egress to those who were retreating in good order. In vain did officers ride to the rear and entreat, and curse, and shoot, and cut, and do all that mortal man could do to stop the rout. No; fear had seized all, and all sought to save themselves. Our battery, by strange though lucky fortune, from their different parts of the field, found each other, and, although three pieces were disabled, we drew ourselves across the road, and drawing sabres and revolvers, refused to let a man pass. Staff and field officers perceiving our design, galloped to our aid and assisted in rallying. As soon as a battalion could be formed, an officer would put himself at their head and march them back. Thus our line was restored, and we were enabled to hold the enemy in check. Many a man did I see who, having escaped death in the two days' engagement, would be either shot or cut down for refusing to halt. It was hard, but it was necessary. The cause of the Union demanded that they should be checked, and even though it should cause the loss of the best half of the army, still it had to be done. The field of Bull Run was a terrible one; full eight thousand had fallen, but the Capital was saved and the rebel designs foiled. They marched into Maryland, and at Antietam they were most signally defeated.

The battery was not actively engaged at the battle of Fredricksburgh, but was in all the marches of that disastrous campaign, and was waiting within easy reach of the field during the battle, the men listening to the uproar of the engagement, and expecting momentarily to be ordered to the front. Finally the troops were all back across the Rappahanock, and the retreat was commenced.

Mr. Jenvey, wishing to get a view of the battle field before they left, says:

I succeeded in gaining an admirable spot where I could overlook the whole field. First, the Rappahanock rolled under my feet. So smoothly did it flow that one would not imagine that but the day before it was witness to such a dreadful encounter. Next, a vast plain, fully two miles in width, stretched itself under the low range of hills on which the rebel host was encamped. It looked to me impossible that men could charge as far as they did. The rebel entrenchments were on successive hills, each commanding the other, and all commanding the plain. Our artillery was unable to manage them, on account of the infantry intervening, thus throwing the brunt of the battle on the infantry and a portion of the cavalry. Still, the day would have gone well had General Franklin performed his duty. Oh! it appeared mockery to the gallant dead to allow such a man as him to walk the earth.

The following is from an account by William Jenvey:

BATTLE OF CHANCELLORSVILLE, MAY 2, 1863.

Captain Hill and I rode to the scene of conflict and such a scene! The rebels under Jackson, numbering from thirty to forty thousand, had attacked our right and rear, and had driven brigade after brigade in inextricable confusion, until all organization was lost. Colonels and brigade commanders were slain; division generals were riding about, their staffs either killed or scattered, striving to restore the line; wounded men were pouring back; detachments began to give way, then all gave way, and from a retreat it became one confused rout; men refused to obey orders and were shot down; color bearers in vain stopped on every elevation, striving to effect a rally; they rallied but to fall, for bullets from the throats of thirty thousand guns were carrying all before them. I retired with the retreating army until reaching my own battery, found the boys already loaded with cannister, and ready to fight to the last.

The rout at length reached our guns. We drew our sabres, hand-spikes, sponge staves, armed ourselves with stones, anything to keep the cowardly mob from our front. They crowded us so that we were unable to fire. At length all had got back, and we were left almost alone to check the onset of the victorious foe. As well might a child strive to dam up Niagara, but still we refused to give way, until General Schurz riding up, gave us peremptory orders to fall back. Nothing daunted, some one proposed "three cheers for the general," they were given, and then three times three. The general raised his hat in acknowledgement as gracefully as if on parade. After the battle we were complimented in a general order.

Captain Hill commanded "limber to the rear," and the order was executed without any confusion. The road was found completely blocked up, so we took to the woods. All went well until Sergeant Bukey's piece ran foul of a sapling; an axe was produced, the sapling cut, but by that time the rebels were close upon us. About eight of us were there. Out of the eight—Corporal Ranger while lifting at the gun, was hit badly in the side; Smith Miner and Henry Hutchinson slightly wounded, and Wiley Reeves captured, and five horses out of six fell. Can any one wonder that we were obliged to leave the gun. By this time the rebels had brought a piece of artillery captured from us to bear on us. They were but a short distance off, and we saw they would soon have a clean sweep of the road; so, remembering that "discretion was the better part of valor," we dashed off and rejoined the battery.

Just as Lieutenant Miner, disdaining to fall back any farther, had placed the boys in position with the artillery of the Twelfth corps, soon the rebels announced their intention to charge by the usual yell peculiar to them, so we were ready for them. As soon as they made their appearance we fired on them such a storm of shot and shell as would stop a whirlwind, were it composed of animal matter; nothing could withstand it, however brave or desperate; back they went, and cheer on cheer and the most derisive yells arose from our lines. While they were reforming we improved the opportunity, and commenced throwing up intrenchments. Night was coming on, but a good moon furnished enough light to fight by. The rebels, having reformed, advanced with deafening yells to encounter our iron hail. Trees were cut down on their heads, shell and shrapnell were exploded in their midst. At times it appeared as if the whole wood was lighted up, so continuous was our fire. Our line could be easily seen, "as" could the rebel line, by the long glare of discharging muskets. Both lines stood close to each other, each seeking to destroy the other; but no human power of endurance could withstand the fire we hurled at them. The second time they broke and ran. Again while they were reforming did we further intrench ourselves. And thus did it continue, fight and intrench, fight and intrench, until tired nature could stand it no longer.

Morning at length dawned and brought with it prospects of a more sanguinary conflict than had been fought on the day and night previous.

We were encouraged as if ten thousand men had been captured by the report of "Stonewall" Jackson's death, as his name alone was sufficient to carry fear into the northern ranks.

I said the morning of the third gave prospects of a terrible engagement, nor were they unverified, for with the early dawn began the battle in front of the Third corps, and such musketry I never heard before or since. I was actually glad when our guns began their continuous roar so as to deafen me and prevent me from hearing the noise. I am safe in saying that at times from one hundred to one hundred and twenty-five thousand muskets would be going off at once, fairly making the ground shake with each discharge, and the battle in the woods made the noise doubly great. Little by little the rebels gained ground, until at last the Chancellor house was reached. The brave Hooker refused to relinquish his headquarters, although surrounded by danger. At length it had to be abandoned. Inch by inch we fell back, and every inch was hotly contested. At last night set in, and as if by mutual consent both armies wearied and worn rested from the contest.

On the morning of the fourth the Rappahanock was discovered to be rapidly rising and our provisions were nearly exhausted, with all of our trains on the other side. Hooker, fearful that the pontoons would be swept away, ordered the army to recross. We retired very reluctantly; to many of us it was the most reluctant thing we ever did, for we all went over confident of success.

Our boys behaved nobly throughout the whole engagement. Captain Hill, usually brave, surpassed himself. Lieutenant Miner acted in such a way as to receive the commendation of all, but were I to mention all who distinguished themselves, I should have to begin at the top of the battery roll and enumerate every one. Our casualties were as follows: Will Regnier, Smith Miner, Louis Fougères, Henry Hutchinson, wounded, and Wiley Reeves captured; twenty horses lost, three caissons and one gun captured; the latter, however, was recaptured the ensuing fall. By the evening of the fourth the whole army had recrossed and were ordered to Brook's station.

About the last of May, 1863, the battery was transferred from the Eleventh corps to the artillery reserve, under General R. O. Tyler, and they remained in that splendid organization ever afterward.

The following is an account by William Jenvey:

BATTLE OF GETTYSBURGH.

We at length reached Taneytown, Pennsylvania, just one day's march from Gettysburg. All of June 30, 1863, we remained here to allow the artillery to concentrate. All July 1st we heard heavy and incessant cannonading, but could gain no tidings, until toward evening reports came in announcing the disaster to the First and Eleventh Corps, and the death of General Reynolds. All this dampened our enthusiasm considerably, for we all perceived that our duties would be doubly severe to recover the lost ground, and restore confidence. The morning of the second we broke camp early and started briskly toward the contested ground, which we reached early, halted long enough to make coffee, when we were ordered into position on Cemetery hill. Those who are familiar with the history of that memorable day, will remember that Cemetery hill, situated as it was in the centre, and being the most advanced position of the line, was, as a consequence, the most hotly contested part of the field. Directly in our rear lay the Baltimore pike, a most tempting bait, leading as it did to Baltimore.

On a gallop under a heavy fire we dashed up the hill, unlimbered and prepared for action. Soon the conflict raged with redoubled fury, reinforcements were coming up and rapidly taking position, and by noon both lines were completed.

Stretching off to our left in a valley intervening between the two lines, lay a long dark line of blue coated men with gleaming bayonets. By their battle flags we recognized the Third corps, always on hand and always bearing their banners where death flies thick and fast. Their line was fully a quarter of a mile in advance of the Second corps, on their right, thus leaving an interval between the two flanks. General Meade was explaining to General Sickles the danger of his position, when the enemy made a furious assault upon his lines. The moment the rebel host appeared they discharged such a volley as to make the earth quake; their whole line blazed with a sulphurous light, their guns hurled death and destruction into the surprised ranks of our men. Gallantly the brave Third corps held its position. Sickles, dashing into the thickest of the fight, sought to retrieve the fortunes of the day, but was soon brought off bleeding and mangled, almost lifeless, a ball having broken his leg.*

Mortal men could not stand such a fire. They wavered, then rallied, then wavered again, then broke, and with terrific and appalling yells the rebel infantry pursued. Back fell our men, and still back until they were directly in our rear, until we thought our line was broken and all was lost, when lo! a long bright line of bayonets appear, quickly the men are deployed in the field, their knapsacks are unsung, their line formed and all are in readiness for the fray. By their battle flags we discern that the Fifth corps has opportunely come up, by the exultant and confident cheers they charged. A long bright flash burst from their ranks and havoc and dismay were sent into the enemy's ranks. Their line staggered. Another volley from our boys and they fell back. Just then a battery of twenty-pound Parrots secreted on Sugar Loaf hill, opened on them and cut swaths in their retreating ranks, and the orderly retreat was turned to a mob, all organization was lost, and with it all hope.

Many a southern hearthstone was minus a member, and many a sorrowing family can tell how their joy and pride was cut down in that fatal charge. Our lines were firmly reestablished.

All this time we had been actively engaged with the rebel artillery in our front. They were strong in force, and had been tasking us pretty severely. The sharpshooters, too, secreted behind a stone wall but a short distance away in our front, and had been annoying us terribly, but as yet no casualty had taken place. All were congratulating themselves when a shell too surely aimed, came crashing through the air. Louis Fourgeres saw and avoided it, but poor Stephen Braddock more unfortunate, was struck fair in the head, the shell taking as it went, a portion off the top part of his head. If his body had been made of stone, he could not have fallen more rigidly. He threw out his arms, and with a gentle oh! returned his soul to Him who gave it. His death for a time threw a gloom over all, for no one knew but he would be the next. I am convinced from the suddenness of the blow that he never knew the cause of his death.

So hotly were we engaged that no one had a leisure moment to remove him; there he lay grim and ghastly. Although I was commanding the gun next to the one on which Braddock was killed, and was but a few feet from him, still I was ignorant of the fact until quite a time afterward, when Lieutenant Thies informed me. So you may imagine how actively we were engaged. A lull soon occurred in the firing when Braddock's remains were carried off, and laid in their last resting place. Truly a soldier's burial was his, the noise of war was resounding on all sides when we laid him in his grave. He was wrapped in his blanket, a good deep grave dug, and a head board with his name carved on by a comrade, placed at the head. We left his body, but carried away a just appreciation of his worth as a man and a soldier.

Soon, however, under the renewed energy of the battle all else was forgotten, and little by little accidents happened; two of my horses had their fore legs cut off by one shell, and so close did it strike to Charley Boyce, their driver, that it knocked the dust over him, and stunned for a time. Supposing him killed, I ran to his assistance, but found him safe and cool as if nothing had happened. I ordered to unharness his crippled horses, take them to the rear, and have them shot, and am not positive that I did not see a glistening in the poor fellow's eyes, very much like a tear, when he received the order.

John Lehnhard and Martin Wendelkin, both cannoners on my gun, were standing side by side, taking ammunition out of the chest, when a shell came thundering between them, tearing off half the axle, and burying itself in the ground. Each looked at the other, and grasped their legs, thinking one at least was gone, so close did the shell pass, but finding themselves intact, they laughed and went on with their work. Another of my boys, whilst leaning against a wheel, heard a dull thud; on looking around, he found a musket ball, half buried in the wheel close by his head. Sergeant Dow seeing a shell coming too friendly a course, leaped aside, and escaped death. Captain Hill, while walking up and down the line, encouraging all, nearly lost both his legs by a shell.

Seeing a shell coming bent on mischief, I called out "Look out." L. R. Moore on my right hearing me, fell to the ground, and the shell passed so close to him across his back, that he thought he was wounded, and placed his hands on his back like one in intense agony; he looked towards me, and seeing me laughing, found himself uninjured. He laughed also, and went on with his duty. It was now getting dark, and the fire of the artillery was beginning to die away, but still the sharpshooters kept up an incessant fire. I was standing by my gun when I felt a sharp stinging sensation in my throat. I clapped my hand to the spot, imagining myself badly wounded. I felt a second time, but found no blood, and came to the conclusion that it was nothing. The next morning, on mentioning the fact, I was told that there was a red streak across my throat.

About 10 o'clock P. M., the firing ceased, and every man laid down by his gun, and slept.

The next morning, July 3d, we awoke refreshed and ready for the attack, nor had we long to wait, for with the break of day began the engagement, and we kept up a brisk fire until about noon, when a deadly calm fell on the whole field.

Early in the morning a general officer rode up to Captain Hill and told him that they had learned that the rebels designed concentrating all their artillery on our front, to be supported by ten thousand picked men under Rhodes. The artillery was to destroy our lines, when the infantry was to charge and occupy them. He further said that General Meade could not afford us any support, and that we must defend ourselves to keep clear our front, and asked the captain if he could do it. Captain Hill answered, "If any men can, mine can," or words to that effect. The general replied that our position must be held at all hazards, or the day was lost. Knowing as we did the immense responsibility resting upon us, we shut our teeth and vowed we would hold our position.

The intense calm over the whole field we knew portended the anticipated attack, nor were we long in anticipation, for at a signal from a gun on the rebel right, the whole field was as convulsed as if an earthquake had occurred. The whole of the rebel artillery, estimated at from two hundred and twenty-five to two hundred and fifty guns, by General Meade in his official report, had opened on us at once. Mortal pen cannot describe the horrors of that unparalleled cannonade. Nearly five hundred guns were going all at once. The air was alive with shrieking and bursting shells, guns discharging, men shouting, and many crying out in pain, horses rearing and neighing as they were being horribly mangled, caissons bursting, carrying death and dismay to their possessors, until it appeared as if it was impossible for man to survive the destructive missiles. For four long hours did this continue. Men by scores and hundreds had been killed. In the first battery to our left forty men had been killed and wounded, and nearly all their horses. Four pieces had been disabled, and at one time we saw three of their limber chests blown up. I rode over their position the next morning, and the sight fairly sickened me. Their guns had to be hauled off in baggage wagons. Still, although our position was higher and more exposed, it appeared as though some guardian angel was watching over us, for our losses were but few. Charles Lacey, a driver on Sergeant O'Neil's gun, while keeping his horses still, was struck by half of a light twelve pounder shell above the right eye, killing him the same way as Braddock, but there he had to lay until after the battle, when we gave him a decent burial. James Loufman was struck in the breast with a piece of shell, but his force had been spent, causing no injury.

The battle still raged hotter and hotter. Our ammunition having given out, we fired back a few of the rebel shells, hot as they were, literally paying them back in their own coin. Our ammunition being exhausted, we were compelled to withdraw.

Our journey down the Chambersburgh pike was, if anything, hotter than the field itself, for it is proverbial that the rear is the most dangerous place, for on it is concentrated all the shot and shell that have passed over the front. We had no sooner got out of harm's way than the firing ceased. The artillery having failed to break our line, the rebel infantry was drawn up in line to attempt it. Right nobly they came, but it was to their death, for our whole line opened on them with full force, and sent such a deadly storm of canister into their ranks that it appeared as if the whole line was doomed. Fully one-third fell, as many more threw down their arms and surrendered, and the rest, demoralized and scattered, sought the shelter of the woods. Thus ended this memorable engagement. Skirmishing, it is true, was still kept up, but the heavy fighting was over. Some of the boys, on going over the field to our front and left, said that fully three acres could be traversed without touching the ground, so thickly were the bodies strewn. I was content to take a view from our position. It was too horrible to take a nearer look at. We remained in position until noon of the fifth, when it was fully known that the rebels were retreating.

*This wound necessitated amputation, and we find it recorded in another place by one who saw him borne from the field, that after his leg had been taken off and the wound dressed, this impetuous leader was borne from the field on a stretcher, lying with his hat drawn down over his eyes, his arms folded tightly on his breast and a cigar in his mouth.

The battle being over and the rebels in full retreat, we started after them, nor were we loth to leave the place. For four days and nights had we been there almost without food, water, or sleep. Is it any wonder that the place had no fascination?

Men blame Meade for not following Lee more closely, and preventing his escape across the Potomac, but had they been there they could readily have seen the reason.

THE LAST BATTLE.

Lee having got fairly away, we started by easy and pleasant marches towards our old haunts. We camped at Warrentown, then at Culpeper, and when in the fall Lee slipped by us and again made demonstrations on Washington, we again took part in that "masterly fall-back." Although the rebels had the start, and the inside track, still, Meade hoped that by strategem he might defeat them. He placed the army in three columns, and marched them by three different roads, keeping each column in sight of the other nearly constantly, and the race became so close that when the head of our column reached and occupied Centreville Heights, the head of the rebel Hill's column could be seen crossing the old Bull Run bridge. Lee manœuvred around a good deal, hoping to find an assailable point, but not finding any, he again fell back. We in this campaign fought our last battle. The Second corps had been warmly engaged, their artillery had run out of ammunition, and it became necessary to relieve them. We were sent up to their relief, and hardly had we reached the front when a rebel battery of four guns opened on us from Mitchell's ford. We asked no better fun than to engage them. Dashing into position we soon exchanged cards, and opened an intimate acquaintance. A short time was sufficient. They tired of our acquaintance and very unceremoniously withdrew, leaving us exulting over our easy, and on our part bloodless victory. We followed Lee to the Rappahannock, where a part of our troops made such a gallant assault on his works, at Rappahannock Station. Here the gun captured from us at Chancellorsville was, to our great joy, recaptured.

Our battery reenlisted and came home on a veteran furlough, and returned expecting to take part in the anticipated engagements under Grant, but that general, having more artillery than he needed, sent us, in connection with a number of other batteries, to man the defences of Washington, where we remained until peace was declared and we were allowed to return to our homes, proud that we should never have cause to blush at our record.

BATTLE RECORD OF THE BATTERY.

Strasburg, Virginia, June 2, 1862; Tom Brook, Virginia, June 3, 1862; Mt. Jackson, Virginia, June 4, 1862; Cross Keys, Virginia, June 8, 1862; Port Republic, Virginia, June 9, 1862; Luray, Virginia, July 11, 1862; Cedar Mountain, Virginia, August 9, 1862; Freeman's Ford, Virginia, August 22, 1862; Sulphur Springs, Virginia, August 23, 1862; Waterloo Bridge, Virginia, August 24, 1862; Bull Run, Virginia, August 29, 1862; Bull Run, Virginia, August 30, 1862; Leesburgh, Virginia, September 17, 1862; Catlett's Station, Virginia, September 25, 1862; Chancellorsville, May 2, 1863; Gettysburgh, Pennsylvania, July 2 and 3, 1863; Mitchell's Ford, October 15, 1863.

HUNTINGTON'S BATTERY H, FIRST OHIO VOLUNTEER LIGHT ARTILLERY.

COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

Captain James F. Huntington, mustered November 7, 1861, resigned on surgeon's certificate of disability October 26, 1863; Captain George W. Norton, mustered October 26, 1863, resigned March 21, 1864; Captain Stephen W. Dorsey, mustered April 13, 1864, mustered out with battery; First Lieutenant George W. Norton, mustered November 7, 1861, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant George Davenport, mustered November 7, 1861, resigned January 7, 1863; First Lieutenant Charles G. Mason, mustered March 12, 1862, resigned April 26, 1862; First Lieutenant William A. Ewing, mustered June 4, 1863, mustered out October 24, 1864; First Lieutenant Albert G. Merrill, mustered March 3, 1864, resigned October 12, 1864; First Lieutenant James Harris, mustered February 8, 1865, mustered out with battery; First Lieutenant William H. Perrigo, mustered February 8, 1865, mustered out with battery; Second Lieutenant Thomas M. Bartlett, mustered November 7, 1862, promoted; Second Lieutenant Martin B. Ewing, mustered November 7, 1862, promoted; Second Lieutenant Albert G. Merrill, mustered September 15, 1862, promoted; Second Lieutenant Frank B. Reckard, mustered January 7, 1863, promoted; Second Lieutenant Albert Reagler, mustered May 9, 1864, mustered out with battery; Second Lieutenant Lewis B. Maxwell, mustered May 2, 1865, mustered out with battery; Second Lieutenant Silas H. Judson, mustered May 2, 1865, mustered out with battery; Second Lieutenant Wallace W. Pixley, mustered October 20, 1864, mustered out July 1, 1865; Second Lieutenant William E. Parmalee, mustered February 8, 1865, mustered out July 1, 1865.

In October, 1861, about sixty men were raised for the field artillery service, in Washington and Monroe counties. An arrangement was made to complete a battery by uniting them with about the same number of recruits from the vicinity of Toledo.

On November 6th the organization was perfected at Camp Dennison, and battery H, of the First light artillery, came into existence. The following was the roster of commissioned officers at that date: I. F. Huntington, of Marietta, captain; G. W. Norton, of Toledo, senior first lieutenant; George Davenport, of Salem, junior first lieutenant; M. B. Ewing, of Cincinnati, senior second lieutenant; T. M. Bartlett, of Cleveland, junior second lieutenant.

The junior subaltern never reported for duty with the battery, and was afterwards transferred. Private W. A. Ewing was promoted to the vacancy. Of the men thus brought together from opposite frontiers of the State, it is but justice to say, that in character and intelligence they were above the average.

The battery was armed with six James' guns—the old bronze six-pounder rifled to throw a thirteen-pound conical shot. It was admirably horsed—better than at any subsequent period.

In January, the battery being reported as ready for the field, it was sent to join General Lander's, afterwards Shields' division, near Cumberland, Maryland. It was first engaged at the battle of Winchester, March 22, 1862; losing one man, Private Jacob Tager, and one horse killed by the same shot. General Shields was wounded while sitting on his horse near the pieces watching the fire. The battery took part in the various operations in Shenandoah valley for the next two months. In May the division was ordered to march for Fredericksburgh and join McDowell's corps, then about to unite with the right wing of McDowell's army in an attack on Richmond.

When Shields' division was fairly out of the way, Stonewall Jackson returned and drove General Banks' small command out of the valley. The advance on Richmond was postponed, and Shields' division, followed by the bulk of McDowell's corps, was started post haste towards the valley. In combination with Fremont, who was to come in from Franklin, they were to "bag Jackson."

As usual, the string slipped—McDowell gave it up at Front Royal, and left Shields to follow Jackson on his own hook. The bridges of the Shenandoah had been burnt, and the stream was unfordable. Shields sent two brigades and three battalions, "H" among them, up the north bank to the village of Port Republic, where a bridge was standing.

Jackson proposed to cross at this point. He found these two brigades under General Tyler, of Ohio, likely to interfere with him. Fremont pressed him south of the river. On Sunday, June 8th, he checked that General at Cross Keys, and, crossing at Port Republic early the next morning, attacked Tyler's small command, expecting to wipe him out in season to return and join with Fremont. In this action battery H was severely handled. Posted on the left flank, without infantry support, a thick wood sheltered the enemy within pistol-shot of the guns. It was charged in front and flanked by the "Louisiana Tigers," and forced to retire, leaving two pieces on the field, having several men killed and wounded, with a large number of horses. Tyler's command made a gallant fight, and the enemy made no serious attempt to follow their retreat. Shields' division retired to Front Royal; the general resigned his command, and the division was broken up.

In July battery H arrived at Alexandria much reduced in strength by the casualties of service. Before the losses in men and material could be repaired, the battery was ordered to Marietta to join General Pike's army. At this place it was inspected and ordered back to Alexandria. Recruiting officers were sent to Toledo and Marietta who soon raised men to fill the attenuated ranks. The James guns were turned in and replaced by six ordnance guns, three inch wrought iron rifles. By this time General Pope was falling back on the defences of Washington. The battery joined him in time for the battle of Chantilly. After various marches and counter-marches the battery permanently assigned to General Whipple's division, proceeded by rail from Washington to join McClellan in Maryland. Thenceforward it belonged to the army of the Potomac. The battery next came in contact with the enemy during a reconnoissance in Manassas gap with Piatt's brigade early in November, 1862.

After General Burnside succeeded to the command, the battery marched to Fredericksburgh. She was detailed with others to cover the laying of the center pontoon preparatory to the bloody and disastrous battle of Fredericksburgh. It took part in shelling the city, but did not cross the river. In Burnside's next attempt known as the "mud march," battery H was one of those assigned to cover the crossing at Bank's ford. It reached the designated position and got back to the old camp by one of the hardest marches in its history.

During the winter of 1862-63, spent at Falmouth, Lieutenant Davenport resigned on a surgeon's certificate. Sergeant F. B. Richard was promoted to the junior lieutenantcy.

Battery H marched to Chancellorsville with Whipple's division of Sickles' corps. When the division went out to join the attack on Jackson's column as it crossed the front of Hooker's position, its batteries H, First Ohio, First and Thirteenth New York Independent, were left in a field near the turnpike. Here it became their duty to meet and repel a strong attack from Jackson's advance after the rout of the Eleventh corps. This was done so as to elicit the warmest commendation from General Sickles when he reached the field.

Early the next morning battery H was left in the same field with two regiments of infantry to make a show of resistance till the new line of defence was completed. The front attack of the enemy was repelled, but being outflanked, the infantry support having retreated in confusion, the battery was forced to retire as best it could through boggy ground and across a creek. It sustained a heavy loss in men and material—two pieces had to be left across the stream, the horses being killed or disabled.

After the return of the army to Falmouth, the artillery was reorganized and a strong reserve formed under General R. O. Tyler, United States Army. It was soon afterwards sent to Banks' Ford, on temporary duty, with the regular division of the Fifth corps. It marched with that division as far as Manassas Junction, en route for Gettysburgh, then rejoined the reserve. Just before this, First Lieutenant M. B. Ewing resigned to accept promotion into the First regiment, heavy artillery. Sergeant Albert Merrill became junior subaltern. At Fairfax Court House a new brigade was formed in the reserve, made up of company H, First Ohio, company C, First Virginia, and company L, First Pennsylvania. Captain Huntington, First New Hampshire independent battery, was assigned to the command; so the immediate charge of the battery devolved on Lieutenant Norton.

At Gettysburgh the battery, posted on Cemetery hill, was exposed to a heavy fire of artillery, as well as from sharpshooters near the edge of the town. Some of the best men in the battery fell in that hard-fought battle.

After the return of the army to Virginia, battery H, with Huntington's brigade, did out-post duty on the Rappahannock and Rapidan rivers. In November, 1863, the battery was at Warrentown, Virginia.

Captain Huntington, in consequence of an injury, resigned on a surgeon's certificate, to accept an appointment in the veteran reserve corps. Lieutenant Norton became captain. The battery took part in the Mine Run campaign, and passed the remainder of the winter of 1863-64 at Brandy Station.

In March Captain Norton resigned. Up to this time promotions had been made by seniority, a selection in the battery where the vacancy occurred. A new rule had been introduced about this time, under which Lieutenant S. W. Dorsey, as senior subaltern of the regiment, became captain of battery H.

Soon after the opening of the spring campaign, the battery was transferred to the Sixth corps, and with it fought at Spottsylvania. At the sanguinary action of Cold Harbor the battery was the first to take position, and was heavily engaged. In the advance on Petersburg the battery held a very exposed position for three days and nights, trying to prevent the enemy from crossing the railroad bridges. In July the battery had a little vacation from siege duties.

In consequence of Early's raid on Washington, it was sent to that city, but after a very brief stay was ordered to return to the front of Petersburg. For over two months the battery held the earthwork officially called Fort Sedgewick, but better known as Fort Hell, the hottest place on the line. Constantly under fire, no amount of active field service is so harassing and trying to soldiers.

Eng<sup>d</sup> by A. H. Ritchie

A. E. Devol

The battery was among the first sent home after the surrender. The muster-out took place at Camp Taylor, near Cleveland, June 15, 1865. The roster of officers then stood as follows:

S. W. Dorsey, captain; James Harris and W. H. Perigo, first lieutenants; W. W. Pixley and W. E. Parmelee, second lieutenants.

Battery H thus completed a record of arduous and honorable service. No man who ever fought at its guns need blush to tell his children, "I belonged to old Battery H." In the matter of losses in action the battery was remarkably fortunate. Few, if any, that saw so much service were equally so. The following is a resume of its career:

Whole number borne on the rolls during service, two hundred and sixty-two; killed in action, twenty-eight; died in hospital, fifteen; discharged on surgeon's certificates, forty; discharged expiration of enlistment, thirty-six; discharged for promotion, etc., eighteen; mustered out at Camp Taylor, one hundred and twenty-five.

About six of the original horses went through with the battery. Promotions from the enlisted men were as follows:

To commissions in the battery, seven; commissions in other batteries, three; commissions in heavy artillery, two; commissions in infantry, two; commission in United States navy, one; total, fifteen.

Battery H was present at the following battles and skirmishes:

Battles—Winchester, Port Republic, Chantilly, Fredericksburgh, Chancellorsville, Gettysburgh, Wine Run, Wilderness, Spottsylvania, Cold Harbor, Chickahominy, Petersburg.

Skirmishes—Edenburgh, Strasburgh, Rudis Hill, New Market, Mount Jackson, Manassas Gap, Mitchell's Station, Bank's Ford, Weldron Railroad.

DE BECK'S BATTERY—K, FIRST OHIO VOLUNTEER LIGHT ARTILLERY.

ROSTER OF OFFICERS.

Captain William L. De Beck, mustered October 10, 1861, resigned May 11, 1863; Captain Louis Heckman, May 11, 1863, mustered out with battery; First Lieutenant George B. Haskins, October 10, 1861, resigned October 20, 1862; First Lieutenant John D. Holden, February 19, 1862, resigned March 27, 1862; First Lieutenant Henry F. Camp, March 27, 1862, died September 15, 1862; First Lieutenant Thomas M. Bartlett, September 15, 1862, resigned October 30, 1863; First Lieutenant Louis Heckman, October 20, 1862, promoted; First Lieutenant Charles M. Schilley, May 11, 1863, mustered out with battery; First Lieutenant Columbus Rodamour, October 15, 1863, mustered out with battery; First Lieutenant Andrew Berwick, October 30, 1863, mustered out with battery; Second Lieutenant John D. Holden, October 10, 1861, promoted; Second Lieutenant Louis Heckman, February 20, 1862, promoted; Second Lieutenant Henry F. Camp, January 7, 1862, promoted; Second Lieutenant Hiram B. Iams, March 27, 1862, resigned May 11, 1863; Second Lieutenant Charles M. Schilley, October 20, 1862, promoted; Second Lieutenant Columbus Rodamour, May 11, 1863, promoted; Second Lieutenant John H. Reis, May 11, 1862, promoted; Second Lieutenant Joseph Maloney, May 9, 1864, mustered out with battery; Second Lieutenant Otto Marolotze, May 2, 1865, resigned June 10, 1865.

DE BECK'S BATTERY, "K," FIRST OHIO VOLUNTEER LIGHT ARTILLERY.

Washington county has just cause to be proud of the three batteries she furnished for the Union during the civil war, viz: De Beck's "L" and Huntington's "H," of the First Ohio and Buell's Virginia First.

"De Beck's Battery," so called in honor of its organizer and first commander, Captain William L. De Beck, of Cincinnati, was first started, in June, 1861, under authority from the State of Virginia with headquarters at Williamstown, West Virginia, opposite Marietta, but recruiting in "Dixie" proving slow, October 10th, of the same year, the command was offered to Ohio, which was accepted, and the company went to Camp Dennison, near Cincinnati, where it was designated as "K" Company, First regiment Ohio volunteer light artillery. During the fall and winter of 1861 and 1862, the drilling and disciplining were incessant, and so proficient did the men become, that the governor of Ohio, as a special recognition, furnished the company six of the famous Wierd steel guns. March 1, 1862, the command went to Parkersburgh, West Virginia, and was incorporated into the army of West Virginia, then under General Rosecranz. Two weeks later, it went forward to Cumberland, Maryland, and reported to General Robert C. Schenck. A few days afterwards it was sent on a forced march, reaching the Wire Suspension bridge over the South Potomac, near Romney, and by its timely arrival, prevented a raid upon the Baltimore & Ohio railroad by a division of Stonewall Jackson's cavalry. For the promptness here displayed, the battery was publicly thanked by General Rosecranz, and Captain De Beck promoted to chief of artillery, on the staff of General Schenck. Early in April, 1862, "K" was engaged in engagements at Grassy Lick, Lost River, Moorefield and Crab Bottom Church, again receiving the thanks of the general.

May 8th of the same year, after a forced night and day march, of more than one hundred miles, Schenck's army reached the overwhelmed forces of General Milroy, the combined army numbering seven thousand, at once engaging Jackson's army of twenty-three thousand in the fierce battle of Bull Pasture Mountain, which lasted till late in the night, and by mutual consent ending as a "drawn game." The Union army under Schenck, being largely outnumbered, withdrew that night, closely followed by Jackson in its retreat, fighting at Mountain Summit, Ighs' Church, Handy's Gap, Washington's Meadow, and Franklin; in all of which Jackson's attempt to cut the army off from its base of retreat was frustrated. During the five days and nights of this terrible retrograde movement, De Beck's battery was assigned the first place of honor, in covering the retreats and driving back the fierce onslaughts of Jackson, in which it was again so successful that General Fremont who had succeeded Rosecranz, in the presence of his staff and other commanding officers, thanked Captain De Beck for splendid work he had done, General Schenck adding that battery K had saved the army.

Fremont now started on his memorable march, to intercept Jackson in the Shenandoah valley, during which were fought the battles of Strasburgh, Middletown, Cedar Creek, New Market, Edinburgh, Woodstock, Mt. Jackson, Harrisonburgh, Rockingham Fields (where the rebel cavalry general, Ashby, was killed), and Cross Keys, and in the latter the terrible firing of De Beck's battery, and work it did, exciting the greatest admiration of all officers and men from the highest to the lowest. Fremont was now succeeded by General Siegel, and Captain De Beck was chief of artillery of the army. While under Siegel, the battery took part in the great battles of Cedar Mountain, Freeman's Ferry, Kelly's Ford, Warrenton, Warrenton Junction, Bristow Station, New Baltimore (second), Chantilly and the second Bull Run, all under Pope.

After this K was assigned to the army of the Potomac, closing the year 1862 by taking part in Burnside's great and fatal battle of Fredericksburgh. General Joe Hooker was now made commander, and K battery was sent to the Eleventh corps under General O. O. Howard.

May 1st, 2d and 3d. battery K was in the terrible field at Chancellorsville, its discipline and drill never proving of greater value than when the Eleventh corps so unexpectedly became demoralized, and began its disastrous retreat. K battery was remained like a solid wall, with cannister and shrapnel again and again driving back the fierce charges of Jackson, remaining in position until our forces had either reformed their lines, or new troops came to the rescue. The next day, while temporarily serving in the Fifth corps under General Meade, the battery again distinguished itself, by driving back with cannister Longstreet's veterans. Captain De Beck being now called to another command, Lewis Heckman, senior first lieutenant, was commissioned captain, and took charge of the battery.

July 1, 2 and 3, 1863, was fought the greatest battle of the war, Gettysburgh, in which battery K was prominently engaged, its terrific fire on Cemetery Hill, eliciting the highest encomiums.

In October the battery went to the west with the Eleventh and Twelfth corps under Hooker, and at Chattanooga was incorporated into the army of the Cumberland, and while there, was participant in all of Grant's battles at Lookout Mountain, Missionary Ridge, etc., and during the rest of the war, remained at Stevenson and Bridgeport, Alabama, finally returning to Camp Dennison, where it was mustered out of service, delivering its guns over to the Ordnance Department of the United States, and having had the rare good fortune of never having surrendered a single gun to the enemy.

Gallant, noble Frank Buell died in battle, lamented and beloved by all the officers and men of the three batteries, while De Beck and Huntington had the good fortune to live through the contest, to see the country restored and reunited, and peace reigning throughout the land.

BATTERY K, SECOND OHIO HEAVY ARTILLERY. COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

Captain Daniel W. Hoffman, mustered August 22, 1863, promoted to major September 30, 1863; Captain Walter S. Bradford, June 16, 1865, mustered out with regiment; Captain Stowell S. Hazen, September 30, 1863, resigned June 24, 1865; First Lieutenant Richard Burns, August 25, 1863, promoted to captain of battery L; First Lieutenant Stowell S. Hazen, August 27, 1863, promoted to captain of battery K; First Lieutenant Thomas M. Sechler, September 30, 1863, resigned June 3, 1865; First Lieutenant Charles A. McManus, October 18, 1864, resigned June 24, 1865; First Lieutenant Francis Reichman; June 16, 1865, mustered out with regiment; Second Lieutenant Thomas M. Sechler, August 25, 1863, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Charles H. Newton, August 25, 1863, promoted to first lieutenant of battery D, and resigned January 19, 1865; Second Lieutenant George W. Bell, September 30, 1863, promoted to first lieutenant of battery B, on General Carter's staff at muster out of regiment; Second Lieutenant Thomas Underwood, September 15, 1864, mustered out with regiment; Second Lieutenant Henry A. Frary, mustered out with regiment.

This was a Washington county organization. By the middle of the year 1863 the National armies had made important captures of forts and other strongholds of the enemy. It became necessary to recruit a class of troops whose duty it should be to fortify, garrison and hold these captures. The Second regiment of heavy artillery was therefore authorized, and rank and file consisted of twenty-four hundred men.

K battery was mustered into the service September 7, 1863, at Covington barracks, Kentucky, and on October 11th, was removed to Mumfordsville. On May 26, 1864, it was transferred to Charleston, Tennessee, where, on the eighteenth of August, it was engaged with the enemy's cavalry, under Wheeler, and participated in the subsequent movements of General Ammen, moving to Fort Saunders and Knoxville, and on November 18, 1864, marched to open communication with the Union forces, then in a critical position at Strawberry plains. On November 20th, returned to Knoxville, and on December 7th, marched with General Ammen's command to Bean's Station, Tennessee. It occupied fortifications at Clinch Gap, Tennessee, until December 31, 1864, when it returned to Fort Lee, at Knoxville. Shortly thereafter the battery was ordered to Greenville, Tennessee, and thence to Nashville, where, on the twenty-third of August, 1865, it was mustered out of the service. On August 29, 1865, it was finally paid and discharged at Camp Chase.

COMPANY L, FIRST OHIO VOLUNTEER CAVALRY.

(General G. W. Thomas' Body Guard.)

REGIMENTAL OFFICERS.

Colonel Owen P. Ransom, mustered August 17, 1861, resigned; Colonel Minor Millikin, January 11, 1862, killed at Stone River December 31, 1862; Colonel Thomas C. H. Smith, December 31, 1862, revoked; Colonel Berth B. Eggleston, April 1, 1863, mustered out with regiment; Lieutenant Colonel Thomas C. H. Smith, August 23, 1861, promoted to colonel December 13, 1862, appointed brigadier general by President November 29, 1862; Lieutenant Colonel James Laughlin, December 31, 1862, resigned April 1, 1863; Lieutenant Colonel Valentine Cupp, April 1, 1863, died September 20, 1863; Lieutenant Colonel Thomas J. Pattin, September 20, 1863, mustered out with regiment; Lieutenant Colonel Stephen C. Writer, December 9, 1864, mustered out with regiment; Major John D. Moxley, February 25, 1865, A. A. G. at Camp Webster, Nashville, Tennessee; Major William McBurney, February 28, 1865, mustered out with regiment; Major Minor Millikin, August 24, 1861, promoted to colonel; Major Michael W. Smith, October 31, 1861, resigned June 10, 1862; Major E. B. Dennison, November 27, 1861, resigned June 10, 1862; Major James Laughlin, June 10, 1862, promoted to lieutenant colonel; Major Berth B. Eggleston, June 20, 1862, promoted to colonel; Major J. W. Robinson, June 1, 1862, died; Major David A. B. Moore, September 7, 1862, killed at Stone River December 31, 1862; Major Valentine Cupp, December 31, 1862, promoted to lieutenant colonel; Major Thomas J. Pattin, December 31, 1862, promoted to lieutenant colonel; Major Stephen C. Writer, April 1, 1863, promoted to lieutenant colonel; Major James N. Scott, April 1, 1863, mustered out with regiment; Major John C. Frankenberger, September 20, 1863, mustered out; Surgeon Rudolph Wirth, September 7, 1861, resigned May 23, 1862; Surgeon John Cannan, February 1, 1862; Wilson V. Cowen, December 16, 1863, resigned October 4, 1864; Assistant Surgeon John Cannan, October 10, 1864, promoted to surgeon; Assistant Surgeon John B. McDill, August 21, 1864, mustered out; Chaplain J. M. Drake, December 13, 1864, resigned May 23, 1862.

COMPANY OFFICERS.

Captain Thomas J. Pattin, mustered September 17, 1864, promoted to major; Captain John D. Barker, December 31, 1863, resigned January 21, 1864; Captain Henry C. Reppert, December 14, 1864, mustered out with regiment; First Lieutenant John D. Barker, September 18, 1861, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant Samuel H. Putnam, September 7, 1862, resigned October 26, 1863; First Lieutenant Henry C. Reppert, March 31, 1864, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant Robert B. Rhodes, January 6, 1865, mustered out May 5, 1863, as second lieutenant; First Lieutenant Daniel W. Dye, July 24, 1865, mustered out with regiment; Second Lieutenant Oscar H. Underwood, September 18, 1861, resigned May 29, 1862; Second Lieutenant Timothy L. Condit, May 29, 1862, killed at Stone River December 31, 1862; Second Lieutenant Samuel H. Putnam, November 20, 1862, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Henry C. Reppert, December 31, 1862, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Robert B. Rhodes, December 9, 1863, promoted to first lieutenant.

NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

First, second and third sergeants at date of muster out.

First Sergeant Edward P. Burlingame, March 31, 1864, mustered out with regiment; Quartermaster Sergeant John Huff, March 31, 1864, mustered out with regiment; Commissary Sergeant Henry Duden, March 31, 1864, mustered out with regiment.

The following sketch of company L, First Ohio volunteer cavalry, was compiled from brief notes taken by Sergeant E. P. Burlingame from a journal kept by him during the war. Many soldiers kept journals, but few were as fortunate as Mr. Burlingame in getting through all the marches and battles and not losing them:

September 5, 1861, Governor Dennison authorized a regiment of cavalry to be raised for the three years' service. Through the efforts of the military committee of Washington county, and especially two members, John Newton, esq., and Colonel William R. Putnam, together with Thomas J. Pattin and John D. Barker, a company was raised in this county, and by September 14, 1861, ninety-three names were enrolled. Thomas J. Pattin was elected captain, John D. Barker first lieutenant, and Oscar H. Underwood second lieutenant.

On the seventeenth of the same month the company reported at Camp Chase, and was assigned to the First Ohio volunteer cavalry, as company L. They were mustered in on the eighteenth, received uniforms the twenty-first, horses the twenty-eighth, horse equipments October 22d, sabres and belts November 25th, and revolvers December 3d. Meanwhile they were exercised at mounted and dismounted drill, until they became very efficient in the manual of arms and cavalry evolutions.

December 11th, the regiment arrived at Louisville, Kentucky, and on the twentieth were reviewed by General Don Carlos Buell, commanding the department.

January 30, 1862, the company made a short tour in search of the rebel chief, John Morgan, but failed to come up with him.

The regiment proceeded southward through Nashville and on March 24th, encamped at Spring Hill, Tennessee, where a detail from company L was made as an escort for General George H. Thomas, under command of Lieutenant John D. Barker.

April 6, 1862, while on the March with General Buell's army in the direction of Pittsburgh Landing, the cannonading at the battle of Shiloh was distinctly heard.

The regiment arrived at Pittsburgh Landing April 8th, too late to take part in the battle, and were actively employed up to May 30th, having several skirmishes with the enemy, and lost one man, William M. Robinson—missing.

On June 4, 1862, they fought their first battle. Company L with part of company D were on picket duty three miles from Booneville, at Carolina church, when the rebels, four companies strong, attacked them. Forming hastily they checked the enemy's advance, and then fell back in good order, to entice the enemy into the open ground. The rebels, supposing they were retreating, charged with a yell, but our men wheeled by fours and faced the enemy, opening on them with their Sharps' carbines, Captain Pattin riding up and down the line, urging the boys to "give it to them." The rebels having a larger force now endeavored to flank them. They consequently were compelled to fall back still farther, turning on the rebels several times, and finally reached their supports at Booneville, when the enemy retired. The company escaped without loss; two of company D, however, were wounded.

In July, 1862, the company was engaged in the siege of Corinth, and on the twenty-fourth of that month joined the regiment at Tusculumbia, Alabama. During August they were engaged in scouting along the line of the Nashville & Chattanooga railroad. September 30th found the regiment at Louisville again under the command of General Buell, where they were clothed and equipped and received four months' pay.

On October 2d company L was thrown out from Louisville to make a flank movement on the rebels who had taken possession of Mt. Washington. Captain Pattin advanced part of the company, dismounted, who were supported by other troops; they were soon briskly engaged, when the enemy opened on them with grape and cannister; they thereupon retired to give room to our artillery; moving now to the other flank the company got into the town, and the rebels rapidly retreated. Loss, Henry Duden, wounded.

October 4, 1862, a detachment under Major Laughlin having been sent out to the front, they left the direct road to Bardstown, and proceeding via Fairfield, came into it again at Bardstown fair-grounds. After some skirmishing we gained the road. Company L was formed parallel to the road, close up to the fence, and was on the left of the line, disconnected. We had commenced letting down the fence to enable us to get on to the road, but a rush of cavalry from the direction of Louisville caused us to make other disposition of our time. We were between a brigade of Texan rangers and Bardstown, and they were charging down upon us in columns of platoons, evidently intent upon cutting through. We fired a few rounds at a right oblique, and the right having broken, we had to fall back. The rebels were between us and our reserves. We must run the gauntlet or jump a rail fence and take a wide circuit around. Captain Pattin's bridle rein caught on a gate latch, and he barely escaped capture. Corporal Daniel W. Dye having dropped his carbine, dismounted and picked it up, and with the rebels demanding his surrender, he put spurs to his horse and escaped. Jonathan H. Smith was mortally wounded after he had been compelled to surrender. Corporal Jacob Gano and privates Edward P. Bigelow, Calvin C. Broughton, Peter Cline, David M. Grimes, John Hoskinson and William Rice were captured and paroled. John Duden and William Reese were captured and dismounted, but watching their opportunity, they escaped.

On October 8th the detachment took part in the battle of Perryville, and bivouacked that night on the field.

By order of General Buell, Major Laughlin's detachment on October 10th started for Bardstown, with a large number of rebel prisoners, and on the fourteenth joined the regiment at Danville, Kentucky.

After another fruitless chase after Morgan, the company was for some time engaged in carrying dispatches from Gallatin to General Rosseau at Tyree Springs, Tennessee.

The regiment was about this time (November, 1862) brigaded with the Third Ohio cavalry, and the Second and Fifth Kentucky cavalry under Colonel Zahn of the Third Ohio. The Fourth Ohio cavalry was afterwards substituted for the Fifth Kentucky.

On December 30, 1862, Captain Pattin was ordered to take his platoon and with a section of artillery, to drive some rebel troops out of Lavergne, Tennessee. Upon coming in sight of the town the artillery was brought into position, and a few shots were fired as "feelers." One of these passing through a house took of the arm of Mr. Tidd of Harmar, Ohio, who was employed by the government, in putting up telegraph lines. The rebels retreated. Pattin pursued and captured a number of mules. The Second platoon, under Lieutenant Timothy L. Condit, accompanied the train, and both platoons met at Wilkes' crossroads, and went into camp there at 10 P. M.

THE BATTLE OF STONE RIVER.

December 31st we were preparing to break camp, when, from the right over the fields, came excited soldiers, with tales of disaster. General Willich's command had been surprised, and the plain was covered with his fleeing troops. The wounded, as they passed, inquired where they might find a hospital, and all seemed more or less panic-stricken. Hastily forming we proceeded to join the regiment, and hardly had we done so when the rebels opened on us with artillery; one of the first shots killing our major, David A. B. Moore. Acting under orders, we fell back to a new position. The enemy, mistaking the movement for a retreat, set up a cheer and charged. Upon our again facing them, however, they came to a sudden halt, and we engaged them with our carbines. Colonel Miliken was cool and brave. "Give it to them, boys," said he, "and if they get too close take your sabres to them." The disaster to General McCook's corps made it necessary for us to fall back again, that the line of battle might not be disconnected. We were closely followed by the rebels, who used the artillery at every opportunity. He had no artillery, and in this the enemy had the advantage. As we were compelled to go through fences we lost our formation and became mixed up. This kept getting worse; we were like a drove, and still harder pressed, the foe riding down on us, and with their revolvers firing upon us as they came. We were nearing the pike; our line of communication to the rear, and the sight of the long line of wagons must have given the rebels encouragement. At this juncture Colonel Miliken ordered "Charge!" repeating the command. Seventy-five or a hundred men wheeled and dashed toward the enemy, but they took to flight. We pursued and had nearly overtaken them when a strong force was hurled against our right flank, and made retreat a necessity. This was a matter of difficulty, and in trying to make it successful Colonel Miliken and Lieutenant Timothy L. Condit, our best officers, were killed; Adjutant Scott was severely wounded, Sergeant George Warren and Bugler John Dulty were taken prisoners, and James S. Parker was captured, disarmed and shot in two places. He managed to escape with his horse. The rebels now had undisputed possession of the train. Our cavalry was scattered, discouraged and fleeing. It was late in the day ere we were again in order. Captain Pattin brought up the first battalion and took command of the company. The rebels were driven from the road by the Fourth regulars, and the fighting for the day, as far as we were concerned, was over. Our colonel died nobly. His loss was deeply lamented, for his place could never be filled. The death of Lieutenant Condit was a grief to all the company. He had no enemies; every one was a friend, and each felt an individual sorrow.

January 1, 1863. Fulton Guitteau was killed by a cannon ball. He belonged to the escort of Major General Thomas, and was on the field when killed. His comrades bear testimony to his excellent qualities as a soldier and his uniform courtesy and gentlemanly bearing.

We were not actively engaged to-day. The rebels advanced but once, and being met with grape and canister from a masked battery, they precipitately retired.

January 2d. The company was in order of battle all day. There was considerable skirmishing, but no general engagement by the Second brigade.*

January 3d. We held our position; raining all day.

The next day it was discovered the rebels had left Murfreesborough, and pursuit was begun, company L taking part, and on the fifth entered the town.

The company, soon after this battle, was assigned to duty carrying dispatches, until April 21, 1863, when the company was permanently detailed as escort of General George H. Thomas.

Captain T. J. Pattin having been promoted to major, Lieutenant Barker was now promoted captain of the company.

The duties of escort to a general in the field are aptly illustrated by the following incident on July 15, 1863:

During the operations against Tullahoma, Tennessee, we were engaged as orderlies and couriers, and in time of expected battle, as General Thomas' personal escort on the field. We are now at Winnefred's Ford, at Elk river, six miles north of Dercherd, Tennessee. To-day *Second brigade, Second division of cavalry, commanded by Colonel Zahn, and afterward by Colonel Eli Long, Fourth cavalry.

General Thomas, accompanied by General Reynolds, went to General Rosecrans' headquarters at Estell Springs. When returning, as he was crossing Elk river, his horse stumbled over a stone and he was thrown into the water. Corporal John W. Price had charge of the detail then with the general, and was close behind him. The current was very rapid, and the general was being carried down stream unable to reach the shore. Corporal Price, without a moment's hesitation, sprang from his horse into the water, and, being over six feet high, by a few rapid strides, reached the general and caught hold of his coat tail. Setting himself against the current he tried to check their progress down the stream, but to no purpose; at each surge the general went under. Finally they reached the shore, the general much exhausted.

THE BATTLE OF CHICKAMAUGA.

September 18, 1863. At dusk General Thomas received a dispatch from General Rosecrans, through the signal corps, which caused orders to be issued immediately for breaking camp. We marched to Crawfish Springs, where General Thomas stopped to have an interview with General Rosecrans. The company, at 10 o'clock P. M., built fires and unsaddled, but remained ready for marching at a few minutes' notice. Troops and trains are passing rapidly towards Chattanooga. The fences on each side of the road are on fire, and diffuse light and warmth.

September 19th, at 2 o'clock A. M. we left Crawfish Springs and proceeded toward Chattanooga. A short time after daylight the general took a detail from the company, and with his staff took a road to the right, leaving the company to escort the headquarters train to Rossville. The road taken by General Thomas ran almost parallel to the line of battle which he proceeded to form as the troops came up. To secure certain advantages an advance was ordered early in the day, and the rebels were driven to the creek, but soon after they advanced and drove our men, capturing some artillery. There was evidently a slight panic, and the movement to the rear was being made in confusion and haste. Officers and men were mixed indiscriminately, and they rushed by the general, paying no heed to the injunction "look behind you." Had they done so they would have stopped, for the rebels had ceased to advance, and of those of our men who had remained to oppose them quite a good line was formed. The detail under Sergeant Daniel W. Dye made efforts to stop those who were fleeing, but it was some time ere they could be convinced that they were out of danger. Fortunately this was confined to but one brigade, and in the remainder of the battle it proved faithful and courageous. Another detail joined the general in the afternoon and performed whatever service was required. At night we stood around the field headquarters, ready at a call. The general sat on a log in the woods near a dim fire, dictating dispatches to his aid. At twelve o'clock he went to see General Rosecrans, a part of the company going as escort.

September 20th those of the company who were with the train yesterday came to the field, and those who were relieved to get rations and forage. These returned again in the afternoon. When the centre was forced to give way the escort was used to supply additional aids with orderlies, and a number of the company performed very satisfactorily the duties of staff officers. Captain John D. Barker, when returning from a distant point, whither he had gone with a message, not knowing that the centre was so far driven back, came unawares upon the rebels, who fired upon him, shooting his horse through the neck. Taking a more roundabout course he came in rear of the left and was again fired upon. At this same place General James A. Garfield, a few minutes later, had his horse shot from under him. Captain Barker reached the General and reported, and was sent with Captain Killogg, aid de camp, to conduct the loads of ammunition to General Reynolds. Here the services of the company were required. The rebels were in the rear of General Reynolds' position, and the ammunition was in some danger of being captured. A number of the company were deployed as skirmishers, and with raised pistols we advanced through a piece of woods on the left supposed to be occupied by the extreme right flank of the rebel army. This was not the case, however, until half an hour later, when General Turchin, with the Thirty-sixth and Ninety-second charged upon them and routed them completely. The ammunition was delivered to the proper officer and we returned to the general. During the afternoon a cloud of dust was seen to the rear at a distance, and as it came nearer troops were discovered. General Thomas had been watching them, and calling Corporal Franklin W. Prunty he instructed him to go and ascertain whether they were rebel or Union troops, cautioning him to be sure to return with a correct report. Rapidly galloping toward the approaching column, Corporal Prunty discovered that they carried the flag of the Reserve corps, and getting sufficiently near to remove all doubt of their being friends he turned back and reported the approach of General Steedman's division of the Reserve corps. The general himself, a few minutes later, came up and was assigned to duty on the right of the line held by General Thomas. At sunset the divisions on the left began to retire, and the general, after seeing everything in order, started late in the evening for Rossville, where the troops were concentrating. We lay down around the fire and being warm and weary fell asleep.

During the entire engagement the officers and men of the company performed valuable services. Captain Barker was on the field all the time, and rendered efficient service as an aide-de-camp. Lieutenants Putnam and Reppert were alternately on the field, and in command of the train guard. There was no manifestation of cowardice on the part of any member of the company. Those who witnessed the coolness of Quartermaster Sergeant John Huff, when danger was most imminent, will not forget it, and the quiet, determined manner in which private Benjamin S. Turner performed his duties was admirable. He realized that there was danger, but never let it keep him from his post of duty. Others are deserving of as great praise as these, but all did not become equally prominent.

After the battle of Chickamauga company L was with General Thomas during all the movements and engagements from Chattanooga and Mission Ridge to Atlanta. On November 19, 1863, the subject of reenlisting veterans came up and Corporal William H. Snodgrass reenlisted at once, one of the first in the army to pledge his services to the country for another term of three years. Afterwards many others of the company took the same step. On December 5, 1863, Captain J. D. Barker having been assigned to duty at headquarters of the department of the Cumberland as acting assistant inspector general, Lieutenant Henry C. Reppert assumed command, and retained that position to the end, receiving his commission as captain June 30, 1865.

On April 27, 1864, the company was joined by thirty-five recruits, and by May 4th they found themselves well equipped, rested, healthy, and ready for the arduous campaign before them. Then began General Sherman's brilliant movements, flanking the enemy to the right and compelling him each time to abandon one stronghold after another until he finally drew up before Atlanta, and then by another flank movement compelling him to abandon that also. During all these movements and battles General George H. Thomas was an important figure as well as a powerful factor in every important move. Sherman, no doubt, owed much of his success on this memorable campaign to his able lieutenants, his corps commanders. General Thomas was himself constantly in the field and his body guard were constantly subjected to dangerous and fatiguing service.

Mr. Burlingame relates the following incident which we give in full:

August 28, 1864. We reached Red Oak post office this evening. During the day the larger part of the company was thrown out as flankers for the protection of the headquarters train. Soon after we arrived at Red Oak (on the Atlanta & West Point railroad) we received information that private Harrison Naylor had been captured by a squad of rebel cavalry about a mile to the rear. A detachment of the company under Sergeant Daniel W. Dye immediately went in pursuit of them and succeeded in falling upon them and capturing four prisoners with their horses, arms and equipments. Naylor was rescued and with him several others who had been captured earlier in the day. Corporal Henry Duden has the credit of capturing the prisoners, having with a few men followed them as they fled until he overtook them. These rebels were scouting here under special orders from General Hood to get information of our movements. Had they escaped that night they would the next day have been in Atlanta. They affirmed that but for having captured that cavalryman they would have successfully accomplished their object. General Thomas expressed his satisfaction with the performance of the company on this occasion. Naylor had stopped in a sweet-potato patch a short distance from the road, and was engaged in digging potatoes when a voice called "Come here," in such a tone as to cause him to look around. From behind a fence there appeared a "Johnny" who, presenting a revolver, repeated his command, "Come here." Naylor was unable to resist the persuasive summons and yielded to the demand. Behind the fence concealed in the bushes and weeds were the rest of the party.

On September 2d, about two o'clock in the morning, heavy explosions were heard in the direction of Atlanta, and they broke camp early and moved towards the city and on the eighth moved up to Atlanta and went into camp, Hood and his army having retreated.

On November 6th, arrived at Chattanooga and began at once to build winter quarters. On January 6th, 1865, arrived at Nashville.

The company continued in service after the fall of Richmond and the final collapse of the Confederacy, scouring the country in the neighborhood of Nashville, Gallatin, Hartsville and Lebanon, Tennessee, looking after Government property and protecting loyal citizens until September 26, 1865, when the company was paid and mustered out at Nashville. The company before disbanding did something that showed their high opinion and regard for General George H. Thomas, the "Pap" Thomas who was so brave, so able and so "popular with the boys." It was a tribute to his social and personal worth.

The company contributed fifty dollars for the purchase of a full length colored photograph of General George H. Thomas, which was taken in charge by a committee, to be placed in the hands of the military committee of Washington county, for exhibition in the soldiers' gallery in connection with the company. And so we part, some to take the evening train for home. Others remain to spend a few days in Nashville as citizens.

Of the ninety-one enlisted men in the company, there were forty-one farmers, twenty-eight carpenters, smiths, machinists, moulders, masons, coopers, etc., ten clerks and students, and twelve of various occupations. Six were commissioned, thirty discharged at expiration of term of service, eighteen discharged for disability, one on writ of habeas corpus, twenty-seven reenlisted, one deserted, one missing in action, and eight dead.

SEVENTH OHIO VOLUNTEER CAVALRY.

REGIMENTAL OFFICERS.

Colonel Israel Gerrard, mustered September 18, 1862, refused promotion, mustered out with the regiment; Lieutenant Colonel George G. Miner, September 18, 1862, on detached duty; Major William Reany, September 20, 1862, mustered out July 4, 1865; Major Augustus Norton, December 28, 1862, resigned January 30, 1864; Major James McIntyre, July 1, 1863, resigned March 26, 1864; Major William T. Simpson, March 28, 1864, resigned August 26, 1864; Major John Leaper, July 13, 1864; Major Solomon L. Green, October 12, 1864, mustered out with regiment; Surgeon Isaac Train, October 9, 1862, mustered out with regiment; Assistant Surgeon R. H. Tullis, November 6, 1862, died at Marietta, Georgia; Assistant Surgeon P. G. Barrett, June 9, 1863, honorably discharged October 26, 1864; Assistant Surgeon John Kraps, January 4, 1865, mustered out with regiment.

OFFICERS OF COMPANY H.

Captain Arthur D. Eells, August 27, 1862, resigned June 28, 1863; Captain Theodore F. Allen, April 2, 1864, mustered out July 4, 1865; Captain Andrew Hall, brevet major, lieutenant colonel and colonel United States volunteers, April 2, 1864, mustered out with regiment; First Lieutenant William L. Tripp, September 2, 1862, resigned December 25, 1863; First Lieutenant John J. Smith, April 2, 1864, resigned as second lieutenant October 30, 1863; First Lieutenant Andrew J. Hardy, May 25, 1864, mustered out with regiment; Second Lieutenant John J. Smith, September 2, 1862, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Andrew J. Hardy, April 19, 1864, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Samuel C. Tappan, March 16, 1865, mustered out with regiment as first sergeant.

SEVENTH OHIO VOLUNTEER CAVALRY.

Company H, named at the time "Newton Guards," in honor of John Newton, esq., of the military committee of Washington county, was organized at Marietta, Ohio, September 8, 1862. It had been speedily enlisted by that popular officer, Captain Arthur D. Eells, who became the first captain of the company. On October 25, 1862, they were mustered in at Camp Marietta, and on the twenty-ninth were ordered to Ripley, Ohio, where they became company H, Seventh Ohio volunteer cavalry, the famous "river regiment." Over sixteen hundred men were offered for this regiment, so popular was this branch of the service at the time.

They left Ripley on January 2d and arrived at Lexington, Kentucky, January 8, 1863. On February 3d they were sent on a scouting expedition to Mt. Vernon, Kentucky, and on March 21st were again on a scout, this time meeting the rebel raider Basil Duke, near Mt. Sterling, Kentucky, on the twenty-second and driving him from the State.

With the other forces under General Gilmore they engaged in the pursuit of the rebel general Pegram's command, which had invaded Kentucky, and at Dutton's hill, near Somerset, where the enemy made a stand in a strongly entrenched position, a sharp battle took place. "Companies G, I, K, L and M made a gallant sabre charge, which decided the day, and the enemy fled in the greatest confusion," leaving in the hand of the companies that charged up the hill one hundred and thirty prisoners and forty-nine dead and wounded on the field. The rebels, however, had sent some veteran cavalry around to the rear and the Nationals had scarcely taken possession of the hill when from their rear was heard the rebel yell, and two regiments of rebels charged at full speed down the valley. They were met at once by a counter charge, led by Captain Saunders, of General Gilmore's staff (afterward General Saunders killed at Knoxville), who charged with companies E, F and H of the river regiment, routed and scattered the rebel charging columns, capturing from them nearly two hundred prisoners and two battle flags. Then followed a vigorous pursuit of the enemy for five miles or more up hill and down, through woods, shooting, shouting, taking prisoners, and strewing the woods with wounded, slain and all the debris of battle. At one place they came unexpectedly onto a company of women from Somerset, who had taken refuge in the woods; these began screaming and were expecting doubtless to be killed in a very short space of time, but the gallant troopers halted in their mad career and allowed the women to pass and then resumed the pursuit, which continued until darkness intervened.

The next work in hand was to drive Pegram beyond the Cumberland mountains, in May, 1863, which they did. Pegram, however, refused to stay whipped, and information being received that he had collected a force near Monticello, the Seventh, with four other cavalry regiments, all under Colonel A. V. Kautz, attacked the enemy June 9, 1863, and drove him from that place. On the return march the river regiment was in the rear of the column, with companies D and H thrown out as rear guard. Presently a huge cloud of dust to the rear announced the approach of the enemy. The two companies nerved themselves to check the rebel advance, and selected a position behind a stone wall. The enemy, coming up, received the well directed fire of the guard, which emptied several saddles; but the rebels, charging gallantly, drove the guard from its chosen position. Galloping along the road, closely pursued by the enemy, the guard loaded their carbines, wheeled into line, and delivered a fire which checked the rebel advance for a moment. The rear guard was soon reinforced by the entire regiment, and afterwards by other regiments and a battery, when a close and desperate fight ensued, lasting till after dark, when both parties withdrew. This engagement was known as that of Rocky Gap. General Burnside complimented the regiment, in orders, for their service in this action, which he announced as "the spirited cavalry engagement at Rock Gap, Kentucky."

The regiment next engaged in cutting the Knoxville & Chattanooga railroad, at Lenoir station, marching from there to a point so close to Knoxville that they threw a few shells into the town. They then drew back and proceeded to Strawberry Plains, and burned a fine railroad bridge over the Holston, the depot, and large quantities of army supplies.

They next joined in the pursuit of the famous raider, John Morgan, who on July 3, 1863, had succeeded in crossing his command over the Cumberland, estimated at three thousand five hundred men. On the tenth Morgan crossed the Ohio at Brandenburg, Kentucky, with Shackelford and his cavalry in hot pursuit, the route taken being through southern Indiana eastward through Ohio, Morgan having the advantage of twenty-four hours' start and all the fresh horses on the line of march. Morgan, becoming anxious for the safety of his command, had resolved to make a desperate effort to cross the Ohio at Buffington's island. His pursuers, however, were too close upon him. At daylight on the morning of July 19th the advance guard of the pursuing column drove in the rebel pickets, and the enemy was found in line of battle near Buffington's island. The river regiment, being in the advance, was the first to attack, and being reinforced by other troops, a sharp engagement ensued, which resulted in the defeat of the enemy, who fled from the field in the greatest disorder, leaving their artillery and dead and wounded on the field. The pursuit was continued until dark, up to which time eight hundred prisoners had been brought in, and the rest of the raiders scattered or hiding in the woods. After the pursuit ceased, a flag of truce was sent to Colonel Garrard, of the Seventh, the bearer announcing that Colonels Basil Duke and Howard Smith, of Morgan's command, with staff officers, had been cut off and were anxious to surrender. Two officers were sent to receive the surrender, and, upon arriving at the designated place, found that two colonels and several other officers and about fifty men had surrendered to one soldier, Sergeant Drake, of the Eighth Michigan cavalry.

The river regiment took part in the movement against Cumberland Gap, the gateway to East Tennessee, which stronghold was invested, and on September 9, 1863, the garrison of two thousand six hundred men, with fifteen pieces of artillery, surrendered, and the Seventh was detailed to receive the surrender.

On August 31st company H was acting as advance guard of the force moving on the Gap, and that night, being well in advance of the main column, they went into camp at a convenient place, and in the morning found they had gone into camp with a party of rebels. The enemy thinking there was a large force present "folded their tents and stole away" during the night, and stole some of the company's horses also. Camping with the enemy was an experiment they did not repeat.

On September 10th the Seventh cavalry took part in the night fight at Carter's station, in upper East Tennessee, driving the enemy away. They then repaired to Bull's gap, in Bey's mountain, forty miles east of Knoxville, and held that position until October 10th, when, in the battle of Blue Springs, it took part in the final charge, near nightfall, routing the rebels, who beat a hasty retreat.

On November 6th occurred the disastrous defeat at Rogersville, Tennessee, where the gallant Seventh, the Second Tennessee mounted infantry, and battery M, Second Illinois light artillery, in all about one thousand combatants, under command of Colonel Garrard of the Seventh, made a desperate stand against greatly superior numbers, losing one hundred and twelve men and some of its best officers. The orderly—Bugler Justus Schminke, a company H man from Marietta, was shot at his post by the side of Colonel Garrard. The enemy were said to number three thousand five hundred men.

From the thirteenth to the seventeenth of December, after the enemy retreated from Knoxville, the Seventh regiment was constantly fighting and skirmishing, subsisting during that time almost entirely on parched corn.

December 23, 1863, they engaged the rebels at New Market, and drove them out of that town. Christmas day they crossed Bey's mountain and joined battle with a largely superior force of the enemy, and, after hard fighting all day, being surrounded at two different times, they were compelled to cut their way out.

The ten days following New Year's day, 1864, were the most dreary days in the history of the regiment; they and their comrades of the other regiments and army lay on the hills about Mossy creek, half starved. A bushel of corn meal was issued to a brigade of men for a day's rations. Horses died by the hundreds from starvation. It stormed fearfully, and the men were without shelter. There was but one blanket for every two men, and they were but scantily clothed for such severe weather.

On January 27, 1864, the regiment joined the force under General Sturgis, and gave battle to Morgan's and Armstrong's divisions of Wheeler's cavalry, at Fair Garden, Tennessee, defeating them and driving them across the French Broad river.

On June 11, 1864, the Seventh, with the force under General Burbridge, began the pursuit of Morgan's force, which had invaded Kentucky, and at daylight of June 12th, at Cynthiana, Kentucky, attacked, driving the rebels in confusion from the field. The left wing, led by company H, and commanded by Colonel Garrard, charged the enemy's right, broke through and reached the rear of the rebel line before it gave way on the centre or left, captured the bridge over the Licking river, on the rebel line of retreat, taking position on the opposite bank, with the rallying cry of "Rogersville," killed, wounded and captured a large number of the same enemy who had defeated them at Rogersville, Tennessee, November 6, 1863. The regiment followed Morgan into the mountains of eastern Kentucky, until forage and supplies failed, when they returned. They had marched two hundred and seventy-two miles in six days and nights.

The regiment was ordered to join General Sherman's army then moving on Atlanta, and by July 26th arrived at that fated city, participated in all the movements around Atlanta, scouting and doing picket duty, until November 6th, when they were ordered to Nashville, where they arrived November 17, 1864.

On November 28, 1864, the Seventh was ordered to join the National forces, then retreating in the direction of Nashville, and at Duck river the regiment was surrounded by the enemy, and were compelled to cut their way out. At the battle of Franklin, Tennessee, the Seventh held the left of the line. In December, 1864, the regiment was assigned to the First brigade, Sixth division cavalry corps, commanded by General Wilson.

On December 15th the regiment participated in the great battle of Nashville, and, charging by squadrons, drove the enemy in its front a mile and a half, and captured four pieces of artillery, with men and horses. On the second day of the battle the regiment was actively engaged; and in the pursuit of Hood's army, on December 17th, marching by a detour to cut off the rebel rear guard, they struck the rebel centre at Franklin, and, charging into the town, found it swarming with rebels, who were fleeing and endeavoring to hide from their pursuers. The rebel officers were unable to bring their men into line, and hundreds of them were taken prisoners, including seven hundred officers and men, two thousand seven hundred rebel wounded, and a large number of National wounded in hospital at Franklin.

On Christmas day, 1864, the regiment engaged the rebel rear guard at Pulaski, drove them from that place in disorder, and captured three pieces of artillery, an ammunition train, etc. The pursuit ended on December 27th, when the rear guard of the defeated army of Hood crossed the Tennessee.

The Seventh then went into winter quarters at Gravelly Springs, Alabama, where they remained until March 22, 1865. At that date the cavalry corps commanded by General Wilson, started on the last great raid of the war. This force numbered about eighteen thousand men, the finest and best equipped body of cavalry of the war. They moved southward with irresistible momentum, driving the few scattered fragments of the rebel army like chaff before the wind. The object of the expedition was to cut off communication between the rebel armies of the east and west. The line of march of the Seventh regiment lay through Jasper, Georgia, Plantersville, Alabama, where three hundred prisoners were taken, Selma, Alabama, where a large number of prisoners were taken; at which place, on April 3d, the regiment had three thousand rebel prisoners in their possession. On April 12th they passed through Montgomery, the capital of Alabama; April 15th, through Tuskegee, Alabama. April 16th the regiment attacked Columbus, Georgia, at night, and captured the same, and on the eighteenth moved down the railroad toward the Andersonville prison pen; and on the twentieth, while skirmishing with the enemy, a rebel officer appeared with a white flag, announcing the surrender of Lee at Appomatox, and end of the war. The pursuit was at once stopped, and the forces which a short time before had been engaged in deadly conflict joined hands and bivouacked on the same field.

The regiment went into camp at Macon, Georgia, on April 25th, and remained there until May 5th, when they were ordered to Atlanta, where they arrived May 9th.

On May 13th eighteen men from company H were detailed to guard Jefferson Davis, the president of the defunct confederacy, who had been captured in women's attire, endeavoring to effect his escape. He was taken to Augusta, Georgia.

On May 22d the regiment was ordered to Nashville, where they arrived June 6th, completing a ride of fifteen hundred miles on horseback.

June 30th the "River regiment" was mustered out of the United States service, and company H arrived at Marietta July 6, 1865.

The total number, including recruits, in the regiment during its service, was fourteen hundred; when mustered out it numbered eight hundred and forty, showing a loss of five hundred and sixty men by the casualties of war.

NINTH OHIO VOLUNTEER CAVALRY.

REGIMENTAL OFFICERS.

Colonel William D. Hamilton, mustered December 2, 1863, brevet brigadier general April 18, 1865; Lieutenant Colonel William D. Hamilton, October 30, 1863, promoted to colonel; Lieutenant Colonel Thomas P. Cook, December 2, 1863, discharged September 9, 1864; Lieutenant Colonel William Stough, October 1, 1864, mustered out with regiment; Major William D. Hamilton, December 6, 1862, promoted to lieutenant colonel; Major Thomas P. Cook, October 30, 1863, promoted to lieutenant colonel; Major William Sims, October 30, 1863, resigned June 27, 1864; Major John Williamson, December 2, 1863, resigned July 28, 1864; Major Henry Plessner, December 7, 1863, discharged January 13, 1865; Major Elijah Hoague, July 13, 1864, resigned March 9, 1865; Major William Stough, September 8, 1864, promoted to lieutenant colonel; Major L. H. Bowlus, October 1, 1864, mustered out with regiment; Major John W. Macumber, February 10, 1865, mustered out with regiment; Major James Irvine, May 31, 1865, mustered out with regiment; Major Joseph B. Daniels, February, 1864, mustered out with regiment; Surgeon C. M. Finch, October 5, 1863, mustered out with regiment; Assistant Surgeon William McMillen, March 26, 1863, mustered out with regiment; Assistant Surgeon James C. Thorpe, October 5, 1863, discharged April 18, 1864; Assistant Surgeon Charles H. Pinney, April 22, 1864, mustered out with regiment; Chaplain Ezekiel S. Hoagland, January 18, 1863, resigned August 20, 1864.

OFFICERS OF COMPANY B.

Captain John Williamson, mustered November 16, 1862, promoted to major; Captain Joseph B. Daniels, December 2, 1863, promoted to major; First Lieutenant Joseph B. Daniels, November 6, 1862, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant Richard B. Mason, December 22, 1863, deceased June 25, 1864; First Lieutenant James Stonehawker, July 30, 1864, mustered out with regiment; First Lieutenant Allen J. Alexander, February 10, 1865, honorably discharged March 25, 1865; Second Lieutenant Richard B. Mason, February 2, 1863, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant James Stonehawker, October 10, 1863, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Allen J. Alexander, December 22, 1863, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Edward Ashley, May 31, 1865, mustered out with regiment; Second Lieutenant Bishop Martin, May 31, 1865, mustered out with regiment.

NINTH OHIO VOLUNTEER CAVALRY.

Company B, of this regiment, was from Washington county. They were raised in the fall of 1862, under the authority of Governor Tod, to make three new regiments of cavalry, the Eighth, Ninth and Tenth. Captain William D. Hamilton, of the Thirty-second Ohio volunteer infantry, then stationed at Winchester, Virginia, had been sent to Ohio to recruit another company for that regiment. He had secured fifty men, when his regiment, with others, was captured by "Stonewall" Jackson, on the fifteenth of September, 1862. Governor Tod then ordered Captain Hamilton to proceed at once to organize a cavalry regiment, to be called the Ninth Ohio volunteer cavalry.

The fifty recruits above referred to formed a nucleus for the new organization, which rendezvoused at Zanesville, and on December 1, 1862, seven companies were ready for muster. Three companies, however, were transferred to the Tenth cavalry, then organizing at Cleveland, to complete that regiment. The four remaining companies were ordered to Camp Dennison. They were designated as the First battalion of the Ninth cavalry, were equipped and drilled until April 23, 1863, when they were ordered to Lexington, Kentucky. The battalion under command of Captain Hamilton, numbering three hundred men, were soon actively engaged driving out raiders and marauders who were so frequently coming down from the Kentucky and Tennessee mountains into the Blue Grass region.

On June 15, 1863, they joined an expedition designed to penetrate into East Tennessee and find out the situation of the loyal inhabitants of that region. The whole force consisted of about two thousand mounted men, of which two hundred were from the battalion, including company B. Crossing the Cumberland river on the night of June 16th, they were soon at Pine Mountain gap, a rebel stronghold. Here the garrison was surprised and captured without firing a shot, and they passed on to Big Creek gap, the Ninth cavalry battalion in the advance. The rebel force at this gap evacuated and fled.

The objects of the raid were accomplished without further opposition, and they returned to London, Kentucky. The battalion on July 5th was ordered to move out after John Morgan, but Morgan having passed by, the battalion was ordered to watch and embarrass the progress of the rebel General Scott, who was reported moving to the support of Morgan. The battalion joined a hastily gathered force at Camp Dick Robinson, and went in pursuit of Scott, who had passed with his command to the right. They then had a running fight for ten days; the battalion marching at the rate of fifty-seven miles in twenty-four hours, the men living chiefly on blackberries gathered at the roadside while the horses were resting.

On August 1st the battalion went from Stanford to Glasgow, Kentucky, and were there assigned to a cavalry brigade for General Burnside's advance into East Tennessee. The capture of Knoxville was effected without much opposition, and Major Hamilton was appointed provost marshal of the city, and the first battalion assigned to patrol and guard duty on the approaches of the city.

The Second battalion was organized November 6th, and the Third battalion December 16, 1863, thus completing the regiment. The two battalions were filled to their maximum, and together with one hundred recruits for the old battalion, were rendezvoused at Camp Dennison and furnished with horses, equipped with sabres and Smith carbines, and carefully drilled until February 6, 1864, when they were ordered by water to Nashville, Tennessee. Arriving at Louisville they were disembarked to follow some guerillas, who were reported to be making trouble in Kentucky. They marched through the country to Nashville without opposition. The regiment was then attached to the left wing of the Sixteenth army corps, and ordered to Athens, Alabama, for field duty along the Tennessee river.

Colonel Hamilton at this time went to Knoxville with orders from the First battalion to join the regiment. The severe campaign through which the First battalion had passed, ending at Knoxville, rendered an entire new equipment necessary. For this purpose they were ordered to Nashville, and after considerable delay waiting for horses, they were again ready for active service. Captain Joseph B. Daniels was now placed in command of the First battalion and so remained until the end—towards the last being in command of the entire regiment. The battalion now moved to Pulaski, Tennessee, and occupied that place about six weeks, Captain Daniels being in command of the post. Several movements were undertaken against the rebel cavalry under Wheeler and Forrest, for which the whole regiment combined, but were not permanently united until all of the battalions reached Athens, in April, 1864.

On the night of April 13, 1864, a company of the Ninth, which with others had been sent out to look for stock, was surrounded in a barn where they were sleeping. The attack was made by an Alabama regiment, and after a short struggle, two officers and thirty-nine men were captured. The remaining three companies soon came to the rescue, but not in time to rescue their comrades.

The non-commissioned officers and men thus taken were sent to Andersonville prison. Eight months after, a report from Orderly Sergeant Kennedy showed that twenty-five of their number had died from brutal treatment.

The two officers taken were Captain Joseph N. Hetzler and Lieutenant Frank H. Knapp, who were sent to Columbia, South Carolina. Lieutenant Knapp, after two efforts to escape, in which he was retaken by the aid of bloodhounds, finally succeeded in reaching Knoxville, Tennessee, after travelling three weeks, principally at night, securing food and assistance from the negroes. At one time he heard the hounds on his trail, and again would have been captured but for the generous assistance of a negro, who, after giving him something to eat, said: "Now, bress de Lord, massa Yank, you jist trust to me and we'll fool dem dogs. You trot along fust, den I'll come too, steppin' in your tracks. Go 'bout half a mile, den you come to some watah; you take right through dat, den I'll keep on t'other way. See dem dogs is used to huntin' niggers, dey knows de smell, and likes to follow de black man's foot." "But," said the lieutenant, surprised at this singular offer, "the dogs will catch you and probably tear you to pieces." "Oh, massa," said he, "let dis nigger alone for dat, I'se fooled dem dogs afore for de Yanks, and, bress de Lord, I'll try it again. Now trot along, massa, for I hear dem dogs a comin'." Shortly after crossing the pond the lieutenant heard the hounds howling in the direction taken by the negro, and he was no longer disturbed by them. He afterwards joined the regiment at Savannah, Georgia, in January, 1865. Captain Hetzler remained a prisoner until near the close of the war, when he was exchanged.

Another battalion of the Ninth was sent out in the vicinity of Florence, to guard the river, thus, for a distance of fifty miles, the Tennessee was patrolled by the two battalions of the regiment, having frequent skirmishes with the enemy.

On May 5, 1864, the regiment arrived at Decatur, Alabama, and on the eighth the place was attacked by the enemy. The Ninth moved out beyond the works a mile and a half, to develop the enemy's strength. The country was about equally divided between timber and level, open land. The rebels formed on the open ground, and, as the Ninth swung around the timber, a battle ensued, in which the rebels were driven back in confusion. The regiment lost one man killed and three severely wounded. From this time until June 1st, cavalry skirmishes were of daily occurrence.

The Seventh Illinois infantry having been driven from Florence to Pulaski, the Ninth went to reinforce that regiment. After driving the enemy beyond Florence, they returned to Decatur.

The Ninth was engaged on various expeditions in the region about Atlanta up to the fall of that city, immediately before the evacuation being attached to the cavalry division under Colonel Garrard, on the extreme right of General Sherman's army. The First battalion was engaged in the battle of Jonesborough.

Four hundred men of the Ninth were now ordered to Nashville to procure horses. On the night of September 2, 1864, while the train containing the men was passing Big Shanty, Georgia, it was thrown from the track and six cars demolished. The enemy, concealed beside the track, opened fire on the wreck; the fire was returned, and the cowards fled. One man was killed and three wounded by the accident, and two killed and five wounded by the enemy's fire. Failing to procure horses at Nashville, the regiment proceeded to Louisville, and having received fresh horses returned to Nashville en route to the front.

This battalion arriving at Nashville found the rebel General Wheeler within twelve miles of the city, and they were sent out with other forces to meet and drive him back. They encountered him at various places during the next ten days until he was finally compelled to retire beyond the Tennessee. They soon received orders to report at once to Marietta, Georgia, to join the regiment which was to form a part of one of Sherman's new cavalry divisions in the "March to the Sea." The battalion found Marietta burned, and pressing on rapidly arrived at Atlanta November 17th, and found it evacuated, having marched eighty miles in thirty-six hours. They proceeded on to McDowell, seventeen miles southward, where they joined the balance of the regiment. They now numbered seven hundred effective men. From this time on they were busily engaged covering the march of the infantry, making false marches to deceive the enemy, and fighting almost daily, until December 4th, at Waynesborough, when a general engagement occurred, in which the Ninth made the second charge that broke the rebel lines.

Arriving at Savannah they were sent on an expedition during the progress of the siege, to destroy railroad communication with the city. Captain Joseph B. Daniels, with the First battalion, was ordered to approach and burn the bridge, and engaging the enemy with their Spencer carbines drove them to cover and burnt the bridge.

The army remained at Savannah after its evacuation until the latter part of January, 1865, at which time one hundred and fifty men of the Ninth, that had been left with the army of General Thomas, and who participated in the battle of Franklin and Nashville, joined the regiment.

On the night of February 3, 1865, the cavalry division crossed the Savannah river at Sisters' Ferry, forty miles above the city, and entered upon the march through the Carolinas. On the sixth the Ninth having the advance, engaged the enemy at a swamp near Barnwell. The men were dismounted and wading the swamp under cover of the timber, drove the enemy from their position. As they progressed through the Carolinas, the forage and grain grew scarce and together with wearing service in the swamps, rendered a great many horses unfit for service, and as a consequence many of cavalymen were dismounted. These were organized into a "dismounted command." On the night of the ninth of March General Kilpatrick went into camp with the Third brigade and the dismounted men, about three miles in advance of the remainder of his command. On the tenth the rebels under General Hampton dashed in upon the camp, and captured the wagons, artillery and many of the officers and men before they had time to dress themselves. The dismounted men, however, opened a close and heavy fire upon the rebels, who were pillaging the camp. A sharp fight ensued, during which the artillerymen recovered their cannon, and opened on the enemy. The Second brigade soon arrived, and the rebels were forced to retire. The loss of the Nationals was twenty-five, and the rebels, seventy-five killed in this short but desperate contest.

In the battle of Averysborough, on March 15th, the Ninth supported the right flank of the Twentieth corps, and was in the thickest of the contest, and at the battle of Bentonville, North Carolina, March 18th to 21st, the final contest of the grand army under General Sherman, General Kilpatrick's entire command occupied the left flank. The enemy being defeated, they occupied Goldsborough, and remained there until April 10th. They entered Raleigh after a slight skirmish April 14th. On the morning of the eighteenth, part of the rebel army occupied the village of Chapel Hill. General Wheeler's rebel cavalry covered the approach to the town, occupying a swamp through which the road passed. At daylight the regiment was ordered to effect a crossing if possible. Arriving at the swamp, the second battalion was ordered forward, dismounted, through the water. They advanced under cover of the cypress timber until the enemy came within range of their Spencer carbines. A spirited engagement ensued, in which the enemy were driven from their position, leaving a captain and staff-officer of General Wheeler, and three men dead on the field.

Orders in the meantime arrived from General Sherman suspending hostilities.

After the surrender the command was ordered to Concord, North Carolina, where it remained until the last of July.

On August 2, 1865, the regimental colors and property were turned over at Columbus, Ohio, and the regiment was mustered out of the service.

SECOND VIRGINIA VOLUNTEER CAVALRY.

REGIMENTAL OFFICERS.

Colonel William M. Bolles, mustered September 16, 1861, resigned June 25, 1862; Colonel John C. Paxton, July 18, 1862, honorably discharged; Colonel William H. Powell, May 18, 1863, promoted to brigadier general; Lieutenant Colonel John C. Paxton, September 16, 1861; promoted to colonel; Lieutenant Colonel Rollin L. Curtis, August 19, 1862, resigned October 25, 1862; Lieutenant Colonel William H. Powell, December 5, 1862, promoted to colonel; Lieutenant Colonel David Done, May 18, 1863, resigned July 5, 1864; Lieutenant Colonel John J. Hoffman, July 14, 1864, mustered out; Lieutenant Colonel James Allen, November 26, 1864; Major Rollin L. Curtis, October 2, 1861, promoted to lieutenant colonel; Major John J. Hoffman, October 2, 1861, promoted to lieutenant colonel; Major Henry Stembach, February 5, 1862, mustered out; Major William H. Powell, August 19, 1862, promoted to lieutenant colonel; Major John McMahon, January 2, 1863; Major James Allen, April 29, 1864, promoted to lieutenant colonel; Major Charles E. Hambleton, July 14, 1864, mustered out; Major Edwin S. Morgan, November 26, 1864; Adjutant John P. Merrill, October 25, 1861, resigned June 5, 1862; Adjutant Elijah F. Gillon, November 5, 1862, resigned September 7, 1864; Adjutant Earl A. Cranstom, November 12, 1861, resigned June 2, 1862; Adjutant George E. Downing, October 25, 1861, resigned May 1, 1862; Quartermaster Sayres G. Payton, October 2, 1861, mustered out; Quartermaster William Holden, October 23, 1861, resigned March 13, 1862; Commissary George S. South, January 2, 1863, mustered out at expiration of term; Surgeon Thomas S. Neal, October 25, 1861, resigned February 9, 1864; Surgeon Matthew McEwen, January 17, 1863; Assistant Surgeon Lucien L. Comstock, November 6, 1861, promoted to surgeon of Eighth West Virginia infantry; Assistant Surgeon Ozias Nellis, March 6, 1863, mustered out at expiration of term; Assistant Surgeon Edward L. Gillian, May 18, 1863; Chaplain Charles M. Bethausser, October 2, 1861, resigned October 12, 1862.

OFFICERS OF COMPANY F.

Captain Arthur D. Eells, November 22, 1861, resigned May 6, 1862; Captain Oliver H. P. Scott, June 26, 1862, resigned December 23, 1862; Captain George Millard, April 1, 1863, mustered out at expiration of term; Captain Henry F. Swentzel, November 26, 1864, promoted from Seventy-ninth Pennsylvania infantry to company E, and from company E to company F; Captain George W. Gilmore; Captain Ed. A. Rosser, promoted from company B; Captain E. S. Fisher; Captain Oliver C. Ong; First Lieutenant Oliver H. P. Scott, November 22, 1861, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant William M. Fortescue, June 26, 1862, promoted to captain of company I; First Lieutenant George Millard, November 5, 1862, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant Lloyd B. Stephens, April 1, 1862, resigned July 13, 1864; First Lieutenant Charles C. Clise, November 26, 1864; Second Lieutenant William M. Fortescue, November 22, 1861, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant George Millard, June 26, 1862, promoted to first lieutenant, Second Lieutenant Lloyd B. Stephens, November 5, 1862, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Oliver C. Ong, April 1, 1863, mustered out; Second Lieutenant Elisha T. Fisher, November 26, 1864.

The Second Virginia cavalry was recruited entirely from the border counties of Ohio. Commencing at Monroe all the counties were represented by one or more companies, ending with Lawrence county. Company F was the Washington county organization. Recruiting for it began in August, 1861, under the management of Captain Arthur D. Eells, and by September the company was in camp at Parkersburgh, West Virginia, where the regiment was mustered into service November 8th. The fall and early winter of 1861 were spent in drill on foot and sword exercise at Parkersburgh, West Virginia. In January the regiment was moved to Guandotte, West Virginia, where they received their horses and completed their drill mounted. The first engagement of the regiment was with General Humphrey Marshall January 6, 1862, on Point Creek, Kentucky. The Union forces were under the command of General (afterward President) Garfield. The first loss of Washington county in battle in the war was Albert W. Leonard, shot in the forehead while in a charge on James' Creek January 7, 1862. His body lies in Mound cemetery at Marietta. On the twenty-eighth of April company F left Guyandotte with the half of the regiment under Colonel William M. Bolles, and marched up the Big Kanawha and over the Sewell mountains and joined the forces of Colonel Elliott of the Forty-seventh Ohio infantry at Meadow Bluff, Virginia. The summer of 1862 was spent in raiding and scouting the counties of Raleigh, Wyoming, Fayette, Greenbrier, Union and Nicholas. These trips brought on many skirmishes and some battles, that of Lewisburgh, May 23d, being quite severe. Company F was with Colonel Paxton, who left Camp Piatt November 24, 1862, and surprised the rebel General Jenkins at Sinking Creek, Virginia, capturing one hundred and seventeen prisoners, one hundred and ten horses, and two hundred and fifty stand of arms. This was one of the most severe marches made during the war, both as regards cold and hard riding. The troops were in the saddle for seventy consecutive hours on the latter part of their trip; and on their arrival at Summersville, West Virginia, numbers had to be lifted out of their saddle, they were so badly frozen. The winter of 1862-63 was spent at Camp Piatt on the Big Kanawha. With the spring of 1863 scouting began early. July 18th the company was in the severe fight at Wytheville, where both colonels were lost. Colonel Toland, of the Thirty-fourth Ohio volunteer infantry, in command of the expedition, was shot dead, and Colonel W. H. Powell, of the Second Virginia cavalry, wounded so badly as to be left and taken prisoner. In this battle one hundred and twenty-five prisoners were taken and seventy-five rebels were killed; Union loss, seventy-eight killed, wounded and missing, the houses in Wytheville having been used as places of concealment from which to pick off the Union soldiers, even the women of the town taking part in the fight. The town was totally destroyed.

The regiment was also in engagements at Lewisburgh May 3d, November 7th, and December 12, 1863.

The winter of 1863-64 was spent at Charleston, West Virginia, and it was at this place that the regiment was brought up to its high standard of drill. The regiment started March 16, 1864, on a scout through Hurricane Bridge, Gyandotte, Trouts Hill and Wayne Court House. The weather was very cold on this trip.

May 1st the regiment was attached to General Averill's division, and with him was in the raid to Wytheville on the Virginia & Tennessee railroad. The route lay through Brownstown, Logan Court House, Wyoming, Tug Fork of Sandy and Jeffersonville. The rebels were met at Cove Gap, a few miles this side of Wytheville, under General John Morgan, and a very severe battle was fought. General Averill complimented the regiment in general orders, saying: "The general commanding desires to express his high appreciation of the steady and skilful evolutions of the Second Virginia cavalry under Colonel Powell upon the field of battle. It was a dress parade that continued without disorder under a heavy fire for over four hours." Company F was with the regiment and participated in all of the engagements on the Hunter road to Lynchburgh, Virginia; was also with it in the Shenandoah valley, being in the fight at Bunker Hill, Stevenson's depot, Winchester, Newton, Kearns-town, Fisher Hill, Mt. Jackson, Cross Keys, Port Republic, Brown's Gap, Luray, Harrisonville, Weirs Cave, Opequan, Martinsburgh, Williamsport, Hagers-town, Chambersburgh, Pennsylvania; St. Thomas, Pennsylvania; Moorfield, Virginia, and many other places. The winter of 1864-65 was spent in the Shenandoah valley, but when in 1865 General Sheridan went up the valley to Waynesborough and on over to the White House, Virginia, company F was along doing fine service. This company held the key to the hill at Dinwiddie Court House, Virginia; was in the charge at Five Forks, Ford's Station, Deep Creek, Namozin Church, Jettersville, and in the first charge at Sailors' Creek; also in the desperate engagement at Appomattox Court House, and on the morning of the ninth of April took part in the final charge on the flank of Lee's army, which would have resulted in the surrender of General Lee to General Custer but for the arrival of General Grant on the ground. After the surrender the company marched to Petersburg where it remained with the regiment until the 23d of April, when it moved to intercept Johnson's army in North Carolina, but was ordered back at Halifax Court House. From there the company marched to Richmond, Virginia, thence to Washington City. In the grand review company F led the cavalry column in review. On the seventeenth of June the regiment was ordered to Texas via Louisville, Kentucky, but was stopped at Wheeling and mustered out, June 20, 1865.

Company F lost the first and last man killed in battle from Washington county.

The neighborhoods that furnished the most men to this company were, first, Coal Run; second, Plymouth; third, Moss Run; fourth, Marietta.

John C. Paxton

COMPANY F, EIGHTEENTH OHIO VOLUNTEER INFANTRY.
REGIMENTAL OFFICERS.
(Three years' service).

Colonel Timothy R. Stanley, mustered August 6, 1861, mustered out November 9, 1864; Colonel Charles H. Grosvenor, April 8, 1865, provost marshal; Lieutenant Colonel Josiah Given August 17, 1861, appointed Colonel Seventy-fourth regiment; Lieutenant Colonel Charles H. Grosvenor, March 16, 1863, promoted to colonel; Lieutenant Colonel John M. Benedict, April 8, 1865, mustered out with regiment; Major Charles H. Grosvenor, July 30, 1861, promoted to lieutenant colonel; Major J. M. Welch, March 16, 1863, mustered out November 9, 1864; Major John M. Benedict, February 1, 1865, promoted to lieutenant colonel; Major Robert B. Chappell, April 8, 1865, mustered out with regiment; Surgeon William P. Johnson, September 24, 1861, mustered out November 9, 1864; Surgeon Horace P. Kay, February 20, 1865, mustered out with regiment; Assistant Surgeon William W. Mills, September 24, 1861, resigned February 28, 1864; Assistant Surgeon Charles H. French, January 1, 1863, mustered out November 9, 1864; Assistant Surgeon Arthur C. Newell, May 2, 1865, mustered out October 9, 1865; Assistant Surgeon S. A. Baxter, May 29, 1865, mustered out October 9, 1865; Chaplain John Dillon, September 16, 1861, mustered out November 9, 1864.

OFFICERS OF COMPANY F.

Captain John J. Jumper, mustered September 8, 1861, resigned October 4, 1863; First Lieutenant Robert R. Danford, September 8, 1861, resigned January 17, 1862; First Lieutenant William B. Williams, February 3, 1862, resigned February 8, 1863; First Lieutenant Charles M. Grubb, April 14, 1863, mustered out November 9, 1864; First Lieutenant David J. Searight, July 12, 1864, mustered out November 9, 1864; First Lieutenant John G. G. Carter, March 29, 1865, transferred to adjutant Eighteenth Ohio volunteer infantry, September 1, 1865; Second Lieutenant William B. Williams, September 8, 1861, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Charles M. Grubb, March 15, 1862, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant David J. Searight, April 14, 1863, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant John G. G. Carter, December 21, 1864, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant James W. Slater, May 31, 1865, mustered out with regiment.

This company was made up of men from Beverly and Newport, Washington county, and Windsor and Ringgold, Morgan county, and was organized early in September, 1861, at Camp Putnam, Marietta, Ohio. John J. Jumper was elected captain.

About the middle of the month company F joined the regiment at Camp Wood, Athens, Ohio, and the regimental organization was completed at Camp Dennison, November 4, 1861.

From Camp Dennison the regiment went to Louisville, Kentucky, arriving November 7th and remaining there about a month, and marching from there to Bacon Creek, where they remained about two months and drilled. Arrived at Green river February 7, 1862, and on the next day started for Bowling Green, which place was occupied on the tenth. Remained there until the twenty-third. After the fall of Fort Donelson they proceeded to Nashville, Tennessee, a distance of sixty-two miles, in three days. At Nashville the regiment encamped until March 18th, suffering many privations and hardships, when they started for Huntsville, Alabama, arriving April 11th. Thence they went to Tusculumbia, Alabama, thence to Athens, Alabama, and deployed along the railroad.

May 1st they were attacked by Scott's rebel cavalry and driven back towards Huntsville, company F going as far as Madison station, where, falling in with a part of the Thirty-third Ohio, they halted and remained.

On May 3d company F and a detail from the Thirty-third Ohio and Twenty-second Kentucky acted as guard to a train that was gathering up cotton that had been used in fortifying at places between Huntsville and Athens, returning to the station at night, where they remained until the ninth, when they moved to Athens.

On the twenty-first company F, with four other companies, guarded a supply train to Huntsville, returning the next day, and remaining at Athens until the thirtieth, when they started for Fayetteville, arriving next day, and where they remained until June 23d, when they marched to Huntsville. All these movements were made under the command of General O. M. Mitchell, who had been sent southward by General Don Carlos Buell, commanding the army of the Ohio, to annoy the enemy and keep him busy while other and more important movements were being consummated.

The regiment at this time was brigaded with the Nineteenth and Twenty-fourth Illinois and the Thirty-seventh Indiana, under the command of Colonel Turchin. At one place during these movements, Tusculumbia, Colonel Turchin, with but a small force, including the Eighteenth regiment, held the town, which was surrounded by a greatly superior force of rebels. In order to keep up the appearance of a large force, however, he had the names of officers from a dozen regiments entered upon the hotel register of the town, whose regiments were supposed to be in camp, but in reality he had not more than six hundred men, all told. No citizens were allowed to leave the town. Soon General Buell ordered all the territory west of Decatur evacuated, and the regiment went to Athens, Alabama.

At Battle Creek they found the enemy in force across the stream, and shelled them, but received no response. July 1st, company F, with C and B, was on detached duty, but soon rejoined the regiment. July 13th the regiment started for Tullahoma, and camped at the foot of the mountain near that place, in the evening. On the fourteenth they passed up and over the mountain. Just at sunset they reached the summit, and began the descent by a very difficult route, reaching the valley about 8 p. m., without serious accident.

July 15th they marched from Decherd for Caledonia, where the regiment remained until July 24th, when they started for Tullahoma, arriving there the day following, when company F was thrown out as a picket guard around the town. August 8th they left Tullahoma for Duck river, and from there went to Manchester. September 3rd the regiment arrived at Murfreesborough, and September 8th arrived at Nashville, and remained there until December 10th, when the regiment went down the Franklin pike about four miles, and encamped until the twenty-sixth, when a general advance was ordered, which was continued until December 30th, when they went into the great battle of Stone River, which continued for three days with terrible carnage, in which the gallant Eighteenth did noble service.

In June, 1863, the regiment was with the force that crossed Lookout mountain into McLamore cove, and confronted Bragg at Dug Gap, September 11th, and the eighteenth, with the balance of the brigade, held the enemy in check.

At Chickamauga the regiment did not participate in the first day's battle, but on Sunday, September 20th, was in the thickest of the engagement, making several brilliant charges.

From this time until the expiration of their term of service the regiment was on engineering duty, and on October 20, 1864, was ordered to Camp Chase, to be mustered out, and on November 9th it was mustered out. Nearly one hundred men reenlisted as veterans, and with those whose time had not expired numbered two hundred and twenty-five men.

Upon reenlisting, the First, Second, Eighteenth, Twenty-fourth, and Thirty-fifth Ohio regiments were consolidated under the name of the Eighteenth Ohio, commanded by Lieutenant Colonel C. H. Grosvenor. The regiment took part in the battle of Nashville, December 6, 1864, losing four officers out of seven, and seventy-five men in killed and wounded out of less than two hundred.

The regiment was engaged from this time to the end of the war in garrison duty. In July, 1865, the regiment was stationed at Augusta, Georgia, and Colonel (now general) Grosvenor was assigned to duty as provost marshal general of the department, where they remained until October 9th, when they were ordered to Columbus, Ohio, to be mustered out, and were there honorably discharged October 22, 1865.

COMPANIES A, F, AND G, THIRTY-SIXTH OHIO VOLUNTEERS.

REGIMENTAL OFFICERS.

Colonel George Crook, mustered September 12, 1861, appointed brigadier general September 7, 1862; Colonel Melvin Clarke, September 7, 1862, killed at Antietam September 17, 1862; Colonel Ebenezer B. Andrews, September 17, 1862, resigned April 9, 1863; Colonel William G. Jones, April 13, 1863, killed September 19, 1863, at Chickamauga; Colonel Hiram F. Devol, September 19, 1863, appointed brevet brigadier general July 20, 1865; Lieutenant Colonel Melvin Clarke, July 30, 1861, promoted to colonel September 16, 1862; Lieutenant Colonel E. B. Andrews, September 7, 1862, promoted to colonel September 17, 1862; Lieutenant Colonel Hiram F. Devol, September 17, 1862, promoted to colonel; Lieutenant Colonel William H. G. Adney, May 9, 1864, mustered out; Lieutenant Colonel William S. Wilson, March 8, 1865, mustered out with regiment; Major E. B. Andrews, July 28, 1861, promoted to lieutenant colonel September 16, 1862; Major Hiram F. Devol, September 7, 1862, promoted to lieutenant colonel; Major William H. G. Adney, September 17, 1862, promoted to lieutenant colonel; Major Jewett Palmer, jr., May 9, 1864, resigned November 29, 1864; Major William S. Wilson, December 30, 1864, mustered out; Major Benjamin J. Ricker, jr., February 3, 1865, transferred from Thirtieth Ohio volunteer infantry; Surgeon Robert N. Barr, August 22, 1861, resigned February 26, 1862; Surgeon J. H. Whitford, March 8, 1862, mustered out with regiment; Assistant Surgeon J. H. Whitford, August 23, 1861, promoted to surgeon; Assistant Surgeon Colin Mackenzie, March 8, 1862, resigned May 19, 1863; Assistant Surgeon John Dickerson, July 4, 1862, promoted to surgeon of new regiment; Assistant Surgeon James P. Welch, July 24, 1862, resigned September 18, 1864; Assistant Surgeon B. F. Holcomb, March 14, 1865, mustered out with regiment; Assistant Surgeon A. M. Beers, June 26, 1865, did not accept; Chaplain George V. Fry, August, 1861, resigned January 31, 1862; Chaplain J. G. Blair, July 25, 1864, mustered out; Chaplain G. W. Collier, August 30, 1861, mustered out; Chaplain William S. Taylor, February 1, 1862, resigned April 30, 1862; Quartermaster First Lieutenant Levi Barber, August 31, 1861, resigned November 29, 1862; Quartermaster Captain Thomas M. Turner, December 30, 1864, declined promotion, promoted to captain December 1, 1862, from first lieutenant, mustered out with regiment as regimental quartermaster; Quartermaster First Lieutenant John M. Woodbridge, July 31, 1861, resigned; Chief Musician Ebenezer Cory, August, 1861, mustered out at expiration of three years; Chief Musician John Tenney, September, 1864, mustered out with regiment.

COMPANY OFFICERS.

Captain H. F. Devol, mustered August 1, 1861, promoted to major September 7, 1862; Captain Thomas W. Moore, August 24, 1861, resigned March 5, 1862; Captain Jewett Palmer, jr., August 24, 1861, promoted to major; Captain Reuben L. Nye, March 3, 1862, mustered out with regiment; Captain Joseph Kelly, March 5, 1862, mustered out with regiment; Captain James Stanley, June 6, 1862, honorably discharged November 25, 1864; Captain Augustus T. Ward, December 30, 1864, mustered out with regiment; Captain James Gage Barker, September 7, 1862, mustered out November 4, 1864; Captain James C. Selby, October 3, 1862, died of wounds September 14, 1864; Captain Wallace S. Stanley, December 30, 1864, mustered out with regiment; Captain James Haddow, December 30, 1864, mustered out with regiment; Captain Miles A. Stacy, December 30, 1864, resigned as first lieutenant December 1, 1864; Captain Jesse Morrow, December 30, 1864, mustered out with regiment; First Lieutenant James Gage Barker, August 13, 1861, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant Joseph Kelly, August 24, 1861, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant James Stanley, August 24, 1861, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant James C. Selby, March 5, 1862, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant A. F. Tiffany, September 17, 1862, resigned November 18, 1863; First Lieutenant O. J. Wood, November 29, 1862, resigned August 27, 1863; First Lieutenant Jesse Morrow, February 22, 1863, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant Miles A. Stacy, January 17, 1863, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant Augustus T. Ward, April 21, 1864, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant James Haddow, May 9, 1864, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant Samuel S. Grosvenor, December 30, 1864, honorably discharged as second lieutenant; First Lieutenant George W. Putnam, December 30, 1864, honorably discharged as second lieutenant; First Lieutenant S. W. Harvey, December 30, 1864, mustered out with regiment; First Lieutenant John A. Palmer, September 1, 1862, resigned June 18, 1863; Second Lieutenant James C. Selby, August 13, 1861, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant A. F. Tiffany, August 24, 1861, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Ernst Lindner, August 24, 1861, resigned June 28, 1862; Second Lieutenant Reuben L. Nye, July 30, 1861, promoted to captain March 3, 1862; Second Lieutenant John A. Palmer, March 5, 1862, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant O. J. Wood, February 5, 1862, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Miles A. Stacy, June 28, 1862, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Wallace S. Stanley, June 28, 1862, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Augustus T. Ward, September 17, 1862, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Jesse Morrow, July 28, 1862, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant James Haddow, September 17, 1862, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Samuel L. Grosvenor, October 24, 1863, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant George W. Putnam, October 24, 1862, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Ransom C. Wyatt, March 8, 1865, mustered out at expiration of service; Second Lieutenant Benjamin Bragg, March 8, 1865, mustered out with regiment; Second Lieutenant Samuel W. Harvey, April 21, 1864, promoted to first lieutenant.

Under the call of President Lincoln, July 22, 1861, for five hundred thousand men, Lieutenant Colonel Melvin Clarke was authorized to organize a regiment at Camp Putnam, Marietta, Ohio. He at once set about it, and hearing that a company was being formed at Lowell for the Thirty-ninth Ohio—Colonel Groesbeck—he met that company on its organization, August 1st, and made known his purpose, asking that the company report at Camp Putnam to form a nucleus for his regiment. He solicited the forming of companies in this and other counties, and the following reported and were mustered in: August 13th, company A; August 14th company B; August 14th, company C; August 22d, company D; August 22d, company E; August 24th, company F; August 24th, company G; August 24th, company H; August 24th, company I, August 31st, company K.

Nearly the maximum number being mustered in, the regiment was armed with the old United States muskets, and uniformed. Not having a colonel, the line officers had a well grounded notion that only a regular army officer could drill and make a standard regiment equal to the ambition of its members. This wish being favorably regarded by the field officers and governor, efforts were made to secure one through the Secretary of War.

In this condition the regiment was ordered, August 30, 1861, to the field, taking transports at Marietta for Parkersburgh. Six companies, A, B, F, G, H and I, under command of Major E. B. Andrews, were there met by Major A. J. Slemmer—at that time of General Rosecrans staff—under the charge of Major Slemmer were transported by cars to Walker station—a few miles out. From that point marched over the mountains. Company A had one man killed that day by the accidental discharge of a musket—Private Steward, from Pinchville.

Arrived at Elizabeth after dark, foot-sore and weary. The object of this forced march was to clear the country of bands of guerillas.

The next morning the advance was fired on by a squad of these fellows from a hill fronting the turn of the road. One of the men was wounded in the shoulder. A company was thrown forward as skirmishers and soon dislodged them. Camped at Reedy that night. The next day marched for Spencer, the county east of Roane county. The place was surrounded by guerillas and three of its loyal citizens had been killed by them. On the approach of the regiment they fled. The people were found in a truly pitiable condition—nothing but corn-meal to subsist on. Rations having given out the men were in much the same plight for two days. Scouts brought in a little beef, but salt there was none. This kind of diet was new, and on the whole it seemed as if the regiment was being roughly initiated. The supply train that three days later followed was surrounded at Reedy. A night march of two companies relieved and brought it forward. Guerillas seemed to be upon all the hills and frequently their signals could be heard. Like the foxes, they knew the woods and were never seen at their houses during the day, so it seemed impossible to catch them. This was a new kind of warfare for the regular major, and when the regiment moved away—being relieved by another command—he ordered flanking parties as skirmishers in advance of the column.

The day before leaving Spencer it was thought best to unload the muskets. A target at fifty yards was placed and the men in turn tried their skill. The small men at every discharge would be either upset or faced about. The recoil of those old muskets with their heavy charge of powder, ball and three buckshot was about as fatal at the rear as in front. The target was not hit. Loud was the cursing of the men. They saw their guns were useless, which accounted for their never bringing down a single bushwhacker, despite their many chances. The march lay through Arnoldsburgh, Bulltown, Sutton to Summerville, Nicholas county. Lieutenant Colonel Clarke, with the other four companies, C, D, E and K, soon joined the regiment, and in a few days Colonel George Crook, who had been appointed to command it, arrived to the great joy of the men.

At this period was laid the solid foundation which gave to the regiment confidence in the future and secured for it a place second to none in the service. Colonel Crook instituted a perfect system of drill and a school in which officers were drilled, and recitations regularly held; and the officers drilled the men. A large drill house was erected that all could use at the same time. Leather stocks—called by the men “dog collars,” were worn under the chin to set the men up. The old muskets were exchanged for new Enfield rifles. The entire regiment was quartered in the houses of people who left at the approach of the Union army. This crowding in houses, change of diet—this seasoning process—caused sickness, typhoid fever, pneumonia and measles. This was a sad era. Fifty deaths was the fearful record. Expeditions were frequently sent out to hunt guerillas and to forage mainly for cattle—all quite successful. There was some lively skirmishing with the bushwhackers; but two men were seriously wounded. Early in the winter one company (A) was sent to Cross Lanes, eight miles distant, to hold that post and guard a ford over the Gauley river.

There was but little intercourse with the people; only a few were loyal to the flag; but we respected both person and property where they showed no open acts of disloyalty. Thus the winter passed. Our numbers were kept full by recruits. May 12, 1862, the regiment—a thousand strong—with cheerful hearts, took up its line of march in the direction of real business. Company B alone remained in charge of the train to come by another route. Forded Gauley river and marched much of the way by bridal paths. The march was a forced one, and the first two days were intensely hot, so that many gave out. The way led via Cold Knob and Frankfort, the object being to get in the rear of a Confederate force under General Heath, at Lewisburgh. At the same time a force under Colonel Gilbert approached from Gauley Bridge. General Heath was too wary and eluded the trap. The Union forces united at Lewisburgh, and consisted of the Thirty-sixth and Forty-fourth regiments and a battalion of the Second Virginia cavalry, all under command of Colonel Crook—about twelve hundred strong. From Lewisburgh, Colonel Crook, with this small force, marched through the mountains to White Sulphur Springs and Covington, to Jackson River depot, and destroyed the bridge at that point. The movement was so bold and rapid, and the enemy so surprised they dare not leave their mountain fastnesses to essay an attack.

A few days after the return of the expedition to Lewisburgh, May 23d, early in the morning, General Heath, with from two thousand five hundred to three thousand men, drove in the pickets and took a strong position on a hill on the opposite side of the town from where the Union forces were encamped, and commenced shelling the camp. The Thirty-sixth, under Colonel Clarke, and the Forty-fourth, under Colonel Gilbert, were ordered to charge the enemy in their position. Disappearing for a few moments in the streets of the town, the National forces suddenly emerged upon the rising ground in front of the rebels—the Thirty-sixth on the left and the Forty-fourth on the right of the line of battle. The rebel infantry was posted behind a rail fence, and between the lines was an open, clear field. Over this ground the Thirty-sixth charged with a yell, receiving a volley from the enemy.

Reserving fire until at close range, and giving the rebels scarcely time to reload, the men were upon them, and they broke in complete route. They escaped down the mountain, and firing the bridge over Greenbrier river rendered further pursuit impossible. In this the maiden battle of the Thirty-sixth regiment, it was pitted against the Twenty-second Virginia, which was recruited in the rich country of Greenbrier county and the Kanawha valley, and was armed with Mississippi rifles. The result of this victory was a loss to the Thirty-sixth of seven killed, forty-four wounded, and five captured on picket. The Forty-fourth lost much less. Rebel loss, sixty killed and left on the field, one hundred and seventy-five prisoners, four pieces of artillery, and three hundred stand of small arms. They carried off many of their slightly wounded.

This being a fair stand-up fight, on ground of the rebels' own choosing, the plan of attack also their own, it increased the men's confidence in the future. It being a rebel town, the wounded who were straggling back were ill-treated; one was shot dead by a citizen. The Union dead were buried in a beautiful grove, and their graves surrounded by a picket fence by their comrades.

This battle occurring near the homes of many of the Confederate soldiers, their friends came in to care for both dead and wounded. The scenes there witnessed were very affecting. Mothers with their dead or wounded sons, sisters with their brothers, wives with husbands. It was truly a sad picture of the realities of war. Added to this was the mortification of defeat in their own country. The Union wounded were sent to Charleston in ambulances. Some were met there by relatives and taken home. Dyar B. McClure, of Warren, Washington county, badly wounded, died soon after reaching home.

After clearing up the wreck of battle and parolling the rebel wounded, May 29th, the regiment took up the line of march to Meadow Bluffs to be more accessible to supplies. They were joined here by the Forty-seventh Ohio, and on June 22d the entire force, under command of Colonel Crook, started to return. General Heath's early call on them at Lewisburgh, by a visit to his camps at Union, Monroe county. Marched via Salt Sulphur springs, forded Greenbrier river the second day, and reached Union in the afternoon. The general, not caring for further acquaintance, had left for the mountains. The command then leisurely retraced its steps, and as it was a very fine country foraged its way back by another route. At Meadow Bluffs, drilling occupied most of the time until August 14th, when the regiment started for Camp Piatt, on the Kanawha river. Here, with most of the force under General Cox, they embarked on transports for Parkersburgh, en route to Washington and the army of the Potomac.

At Parkersburgh recruits were added to the regiment, increasing its numbers to one thousand and twenty men. A happy day was spent here, the regiment mingling with their friends, who came to meet them, and to many it was the last meeting on earth. Left Parkersburgh on stock and freight cars, and went through without change. Through Washington, over the long bridge, through Alexandria, arriving at Warrenton junction August 25th, in advance of the rest of the Kanawha division, and were assigned by General Pope to duty at his headquarters. General Stonewall Jackson having broken in upon General Pope's rear, prevented any more of the division coming forward.

August 27th, in charge of headquarters, train fell back with the rest of the army, and encamped that night near the battle ground of Bristow Station. Marched through Manassa to Centreville, overlooking the second Bull Run battle. Company F was sent back to Bristow on special duty, joining the regiment next day.

In the succeeding battle of Bull Run the Thirty-sixth was held in reserve by General Pope, and on the evening of that defeat, performed signal service in arresting stragglers and fugitives from the battle, thus preventing thousands from hurrying back to Washington and creating a panic of dismay similar to that after the first battle of Bull Run.

September 2d the regiment fell back to Arlington heights, remaining there a few days. September 7th, marched through Washington; were reviewed by Secretary Chase and others from the balcony of the treasury department. The men were proud of their regiment, as compared with any they had seen in the eastern army, not merely because of their numbers (for they were often hailed with "What brigade is that?"), but in their marching and drill they knew they were second to none. Colonel Strother, better known as "Porte Crayon," said of the regiment, after witnessing one of its dress parades, that it executed the most perfect manual of arms he had ever seen in his army experience.

September 7th, after being joined by the rest of the Kanawha division, left Washington, the object being to repel Lee's invasion of Maryland. The Kanawha division had the advance of the entire Federal force, now commanded again by General McClellan; met the advance of Lee's army (General Stewart's cavalry) on the 2d, at Frederick, Maryland. They occupied the town. The Thirty-sixth marched to the attack in line of battle on the left of the pike, the Twenty-eighth Ohio on the right. Colonel Moore, of the Twenty-eighth commanding brigade, kept the pike leading directly into the town with a section of artillery. The moment he reached the town a rush by the enemy's cavalry captured the brave colonel and a few others; then fell back without fighting. The command of the brigade devolved on Colonel Crook, and that of the regiment on Lieutenant Colonel Clarke. The regiment never afterward had its old colonel as its commander. Reached Middletown the thirteenth; here opened the battle of South Mountain.

Early on the morning of the fourteenth, General J. D. Cox, commanding the division, was ordered to storm the mountain. The Thirty-sixth had position in the centre,

The Colors and Battle-flag of the Sixty-third Ohio Volunteer Infantry, crossed on the drum of Drum Major Robert Shiers, and enveloping the sword of Surgeon Arthur B. Monahan, suspended from drum stick in centre.

NOTE.—Only a foot square at the upper corner and the fringe of the Battle-flag remain. The names of the battle borne on the flags and staves are mentioned at the close of the history of the regiment.

THE OHIO BRIGADE STARTING FOR ISLAND No. 10. THE 39TH OHIO EMBARKING ON THE UPPER TRANSPORT FOR THE UPPER FORT. Taken from "Ohio in the War," 2 vols., octavo, by permission of the Publishers, Wilsbach, Baldwin & Co., Cincinnati.

and its march lay through the only open ground, without cover of any kind. The enemy, first with shell, and, as the line advanced, with canister and grape, poured into them a destructive fire. The musketry followed. The line never wavered although subjected to an enfilading fire from artillery, and musketry in front, posted behind a stone wall on the crest of the mountain. The regiment held its fire, the rebels cursing and yelling "You can't come over here." With loaded guns and fixed bayonets they reached the wall, then over it rattled the brave lads with a yell. Then followed a hand-to-hand fight with those who would not surrender or run away. Among the former was a confederate surgeon, who kept firing with his revolver until pierced with a bayonet. The regiment pursued the enemy into the woods beyond, killing and capturing a number, until ordered back in line with the right of our forces, who had not been quite so fortunate. The rest of the day was spent in repelling the efforts of the enemy to retake that line.

The Thirty-sixth lost a number in killed and wounded. Corporal Courtland Shepherd from Washington county, one of the colored guard, was killed. That night the regiment bivouacked among the rebel dead on their chosen ground. A detail rudely buried the Union dead at the rear near where they fell. In this, the second battle of the regiment, not a man was known to have failed in his duty. That night the enemy left the mountain, falling back and across Antietam creek. Early in the morning the Union army was in pursuit. That day (the fifteenth) and the sixteenth little else was done, but as the army came on to take up position, driving in the rebel skirmishers, the rebels from the heights about Sharpsburgh commenced throwing with their cannon pieces of iron rails and sledge hammers as far as our line. General Burnside, the corps commander, gave his command to understand that it was to have an easy victory as the enemy was out of ammunition. Alas, how fatal the delusion! About 10 A. M. on the seventeenth the Kanawha division was ordered to assault the stone bridge and carry it at all hazard. It could not be done till Colonel Crook by a skilful manœuvre with a battery cleared the heights of the enemy at the opposite end. When a crossing was effected the division was rapidly deployed in line of battle and a charge at once ordered. The ground being clear, excepting fences, and the regiment about the centre of the line, it drew a terrible fire from the enemy's artillery. In this charge Colonel Clarke fell, shot through the body by a large shell. The regiment drove the rebel infantry from their first line and was then halted. This part of the field being vital to the enemy they massed a heavy force on the left of the Union line and doubled it back. Colonel Crook drew his brigade with the rest of the division a short distance back under cover of rolling ground. In this movement the regiment did not forget its beloved commander, Colonel Clarke, but carried his remains with them in a blanket. It is but just to say here that Colonel Clarke, by unexampled bearing, even temper and gentlemanly deportment, had steadily won for himself the confidence and a warm place in the hearts of the entire regiment.

His remains were forwarded to his home at Marietta, where they now rest in the beautiful cemetery, and his grave is marked by a monument erected by his fellow officers.

The command of the regiment now devolved upon Major Andrews. That night the groans and cries of the helpless wounded of both armies between the two lines could be heard, but no help could safely reach them. The eighteenth passed with an occasional shot, but a vigilant watch was kept over the enemy. The following night Lee with his entire army escaped, fording the Potomac. After the battle the regiment was moved down near the mouth of Antietam creek, where it remained until October 6th, when the Kanawha division was ordered back to West Virginia. The march lay via Hagerstown to Hancock, then over the Baltimore and Ohio railroad to Clarksburgh. The regiment and brigade left this town the last of October for Charleston. The march lay through Summer-ville, the old familiar quarters of the regiment. Reached Charleston about the middle of November. After the active work of the summer and fall fall it was supposed that here on the lower bank of the Elk river the regiment would winter. Accordingly all actively set about making quarters out of such material as was at hand. Some were completed and all nearly so when, January 25th, transports came up the Kanawha river to convey General Crook with his command to the army of the Cumberland at Nashville, Tennessee. The men regretted to leave their newly constructed quarters, but such are the uncertainties of army life. Crowded on steamers the trip was exceedingly uncomfortable. Remained near Nashville till February 22d, when the Thirty-sixth, Eleventh, Eighty-ninth and Ninety-second Ohio, and Eighteenth Kentucky regiments, and Twenty-first Indiana battery, under command of General Crook reembarked for Carthage, Tennessee. At this place a good deal of important scouting occupied the time till early in June, when General Crook with his command marched to Murfreesborough. In the meantime Colonel Andrews resigned and William G. Jones was commissioned colonel of the regiment. General Crook's brigade was assigned to Major-General Reynolds's division, Fourteenth army corps, commanded by Major General George H. Thomas. June 24th, General Crook with his (Third) brigade, in advance of the corps, took up the line of march on the Manchester pike southward. Late in the day the Thirty-sixth had a few men wounded at Hoover's Gap. Next day moved to the left, to flank the enemy's position at Tullahoma. Found him gone in the direction of Bridgeport, the railroad crossing over the Tennessee river.

The pursuit was necessarily and aggravatingly slow, owing to the wretched condition of the roads, it having rained incessantly since the command left Murfreesborough. At Big Springs, a day's march further on, General Crook was relieved of the command of the brigade and given a division of cavalry, General J. B. Turchin taking his place.

In July moved up to University Place, a beautiful place on a mountain, remained there some two weeks, with little else to do but fight jiggers (a little insect thick on the bushes) and look out for rattlesnakes. In August moved down the southeastern slope into Sweden's cove; stopped a few days at Blue Springs, on Battle creek; marched on through Sequatchie valley to Jasper, Tennessee. This land abounded in very delicious peaches, of which many a heaping hatful was appropriated by the soldiers. September 2d crossed the river at Shell Mound in flats. From this point the march lay over Sand mountain into Lookout valley; moved on in the direction of Trenton, Georgia. Further up the regiment and command performed the task of pulling both artillery and baggage train to the top of Lookout mountain, crossing immediately down the other side into McLemore's cove. Here, on the seventeenth, the enemy made some demonstrations from Catlett's gap. Some manoeuvring was done to mystify the enemy, and on the night of the eighteenth, after issuing a few rations, the entire command moved.

General Crittenden was being pressed in the direction of Rossville, northeast. This compelled a wearisome all-night march. At daylight, on the nineteenth, the regiment was at Crawfish Springs, and a little further on went into its place in line of battle. Soon the work of death commenced—the terrible battle of Chickamauga. Fierce cannonading for miles up and down the valley—a short lull—then the murderous work of the infantry began. The battlefield being largely in the woods seemed to impart a sentiment of awe to the work that was going on. The Thirty-sixth in position seemed a little to the left centre. Suddenly on the right the firing grew nearer and nearer. Many wounded were passing to the rear, the front holding its ground. General Reynolds, division commander, ordered the brigade to change front to the right. Barely was this manoeuvre accomplished when through the ranks rushed some National troops closely pursued by the enemy. The solid front presented checked them, and their broken masses took cover behind trees and logs, giving them great advantage. Not a man of the regiment was known to have turned back unless wounded. The slaughter was fearful, especially on the right of the regiment. The brave Captain James Stanley's men, company D, were falling right and left. Something must be done. General Turchin was not there. Colonel Jones was mortally wounded; Major Adney was wounded. At this critical moment Lieutenant Colonel Devol ordered a charge. With an inspiring yell the men rushed forward and drove the enemy back and beyond their artillery. They had driven them several hundred yards when an aid was dispatched ordering the brigade back. Had the enemy closed that gap in the rear, the subsequent history of the Thirty-sixth and Eleventh Ohio and Eighteenth Kentucky regiments would have had a different reading. There was but little fighting on that part of the line the rest of the day. Exhausted the regiment lay on its arms keeping a skirmish line in front. Early the next morning, the twentieth, General Rosecrans caused word to be passed along the line that as it was the Sabbath fighting should not be provoked.

General Bragg being reinforced by Longstreet's corps was confident, and early opened the battle. The regiment was moved to the left and front. The enemy made repeated charges and as often were repulsed. Major General Thomas, in his official report of these charges, says: "The enemy attacked Johnson, Palmer, and Reynolds with fierceness which was continued at least two hours, making assault after assault with fresh troops, which was met by our troops with a most determined coolness and deliberation. Having exhausted his utmost energies to dislodge us, he apparently fell back entirely from our front, and we were not disturbed again till towards night." About four o'clock the enemy made a desperate effort and succeeded in forcing the lines back on the right and left of Reynolds' division, where, from the front and both flanks, the enemy poured their missiles of death. General Reynolds and other officers thought the entire division would have to surrender, and as evidence of their fears took off their shoulderstraps to conceal their rank. At this moment General Thomas, the "Rock of Chickamauga," ran the gauntlet and ordered a "change of front to the left on the enemy's flank, and get out, if possible" Like a statue he coolly sat on his horse, witnessed the execution of his order and then galloped back. The charge was a success. Many prisoners and a battery of artillery were captured. The latter could not be brought off. General Thomas further reports:

At 5.30 P. M. I started to see General Reynolds, and in passing through an open woods bordering the State road, I was cautioned by a couple of soldiers, who had been to hunt water, that there was a large rebel force in these woods, drawn up in line, and advancing toward me. Just at this time I called to General Reynolds and directed him to change the head of his column to the left and form a line perpendicular to the State road, his right resting on the road and to charge the enemy who were then in his immediate front. This movement was made with the utmost promptitude. Turchin threw his brigade upon the rebel force, routing and driving them in utter confusion. In this splendid advance more than two hundred prisoners were captured and sent to the rear. Turchin's brigade after driving the enemy a mile and a half was reassembled, and took its position on the ridge road with Robinson and Willich.

The day closed with seventy dead officers and men of the Thirty-sixth regiment lying in those woods. The night was spent in withdrawing to Rossville, next day (twenty-first) held the gap through the ridge covering Chattanooga. The twenty-second of September fell back into Chattanooga, and with the rest of the army vigorously set about fortifying. From this time to the first of November the army was in a state of siege on half rations. Early during the siege lost a dozen men on a reconnoissance. October 26th, Turchin's and Hayen's brigades were elected to take Brown's Ferry below Lookout mountain and thus cooperate with General Hooker in relieving the beleaguered army. This was successfully accomplished by selecting experienced boatmen from the Thirty-sixth and Ninety-second regiments. Quietly in the darkness of night they floated down in pontoons past the rebel pickets, landing and storming the heights at the ferry. Hooker's arrival brought the first sound crackers and meat the regiment had had for a month. Parched corn had been the only good diet that could be had. The regiment returned to Chattanooga in a few days. Hooker holding the ferry and starting from it on his famous charge up Lookout mountain.

November 25th, on the extreme left of the Fourteenth corps and army, the Thirty-sixth and Ninety-second, side by side, with the battle cry of "Chickamauga," charged Mission Ridge. The miles in length of the charging line of the blue, dotted here and there with the soldier's pride—his country's flag—was an inspiring sight, though the belching line of cannon and musketry from the enemy on the crest told fearfully on that column. The crest was reached, the breastworks taken—in many instances by a hand-to-hand fight. The regiment captured two pieces of artillery and many prisoners. Generals Grant and Thomas having followed closely, were cheered by the men as they passed by. The regiment lost in this charge eighty-three of its brave members. The following day pursued the enemy to Ringgold, Georgia, after which it returned to its tents in Chattanooga. Thus ended what commenced in the forests of Chickamauga and might be termed a continuation of the same battle.

As soon as possible the regiment made coffins and went out to Chickamauga (eight miles) to bring in its dead; only thirty-seven could be recognized, however—they having been covered with a shovelfull of earth when they fell. The rest had been gathered promiscuously with others and buried in rows, with only earth enough to partially cover them; near the widow Glen's house were long rows of the dead of both armies.

How the Nation's destroyers gloated over their temporary success at Chickamauga, while like vultures they looked down from Mission ridge and Lookout mountain, on its defenders! The men of the Thirty-sixth killed in these battles now rest in a lot selected by their comrades in the beautiful National cemetery at Chattanooga.

In February, 1864, the regiment reenlisted, and March 10th started for home on veteran furlough. At Cincinnati they separated for thirty days. At the expiration of that time were ordered to General Crook at Charlestown, West Virginia—he having been sent there to take command of the Third division, department of West Virginia. On reaching Charlestown the regiment was assigned to the First brigade, commanded by Colonel R. B. Hayes.

May 1st General Crook with his division started on a raid to the Virginia & Tennessee railroad. Several attempts on it had been made, but had failed. The march lay via Falls of Kanawha, Raleigh and Princeton. Had a slight skirmish at Princeton, and a few miles further on found the enemy in strong position at Cloyd's farm. Their position was at once charged and a severe engagement ensued, which resulted in driving the enemy from their works, capturing two pieces of artillery and mortally wounding and capturing the notorious rebel General Jenkins. Being reenforced, they made a stand a mile to the rear of their first position, but were easily routed. They retreated through Dublin depot and across New river. At the depot a large amount of wagons and other quartermaster and commissary stores were captured. Destroyed all that were not available, and burned the railroad bridge. This severed the railroad connection of Richmond with the Tennessee rebel forces.

Being so far from the base of his supplies General Crook was obliged to return—over Salt Pond mountain, through Union to Meadow Bluffs. Near Union Lyman Perrin, from Rainbow, Washington county, was shot dead in the road by a bushwhacker.

On reaching Meadow Bluffs orders were received to join General Hunter in the Shenandoah valley. As soon as the bare and foot-sore men could be cared for, and the expedition otherwise fitted up, the march began. It lay over old familiar ground in part—through Lewisburgh, White and Warm sulphur springs, and Goshen. At the latter place, a bridge spanning Calf Pasture river was burned and the railroad track destroyed nearly to Cravesville, where the mountain was crossed and a junction effected with General Hunter at Staunton. The march had been opposed by "Mudwall" Jackson, with a small force, which caused but little delay. June 10th the National forces left Staunton for Lynchburgh, skirmishing most of the way. "Mudwall" Jackson retreating across the North river into Lexington. After firing the bridge he took courage and with the help of the students at the military institute delivered himself of a brisk little fight. He soon gave way.

On entering Lexington, by order of General Hunter, the military institute and ex-Governor Letcher's house were burned. The loss of the Thirty-sixth was three killed and five wounded. From Lexington the army moved by way of Buchanan, thence across the Blue Ridge, between the Peaks of Otter, to Liberty. From this place bridges were burned and the railroad destroyed to within a short distance of Lynchburgh. At the old stone church, on the Liberty pike, the rebels were encountered and driven inside their fortifications. Night coming on, operations were suspended. By morning, June 18th, affairs had assumed a different aspect. The rebel General Early had arrived from Richmond with a heavy force, and at daylight opened with his artillery. It was evident that a greater than "Mudwall" was at hand. Heavy skirmishing was kept up by the infantry till about noon, when the Union force was most furiously assailed, but stood its ground, and in turn drove the enemy back within their works. General Hunter decided to withdraw, but affected to keep up appearances till after dark. The Thirty-sixth was deployed in front of the enemy, and an occasional shot delivered, giving time for the troops to get well under way; then quietly withdrawing, briskly marched until the rear of the column was reached. Then commenced one of the hardest marches of the war. Supplies were nearly exhausted, and foraging had to be resorted to, with an active enemy hanging on the rear. The retreat was continued via Liberty, Buford's Gap, Salem, Newcastle, Sweet and White Sulphur Springs, Lewisburgh, and Meadow Bluffs, to Charleston, on the Kanawha. Chapters might be written of the sufferings of the soldiers, marching from within hearing of the guns at Richmond across all the mountain ranges to the Ohio river. Many men, exhausted, fell out, and never were heard of again. Night and day without sleep or rest, it was march, march—that or starvation. During the last nine days the average was twenty miles per day. From June 27th to July 10th the starving, worn-out army rested—ate, slept, and was reclothed. They then embarked for Parkersburgh, en route east, General Crook having been ordered with his command east, to repel General Early in his invasion of Maryland. They reached Martinsburgh, by railroad, July 15th; thence marched to Halltown, near Harper's Ferry. General Crook was at Snicker's Gap, having followed and driven General Early across to the west side of the Shenandoah. Colonel Hayes' brigade (the Twenty-third and Thirty-sixth regiments) was ordered to form a junction with General Crook. They found the enemy in full force, and no possibility of communicating. After heavy skirmishing the little command found itself entirely surrounded by two divisions of the enemy's cavalry, and fought its way out towards Harper's Ferry. The Thirty-sixth lost three men killed and four wounded. July 22nd they joined General Crook at Winchester.

Two days later a battle was fought at Kernstown, three miles above Winchester, in which the Union troops were forced to retire, the enemy getting in on the flank in overwhelming numbers. The fighting continued till nine o'clock at night. The regiment lost in killed and wounded one hundred and twenty-seven men and officers. The army moved next day towards Martinsburgh, the enemy pursuing closely. At Martinsburgh the rebel cavalry charged into town, when General Crook turned on them and drove them back, capturing a few prisoners. The Thirty-sixth had two men wounded. Under cover of this feint General Crook moved on quietly that night to a ford over the Potomac, at Williamsport, and marched down to Harper's Ferry. The enemy's cavalry having passed through Maryland into Pennsylvania, General Crook's division was ordered to intercept them, and moved up through Middletown. That day, July 28th, the regiment suffered terribly with the heat. Many, including its colonel, were stricken with sunstroke. Hearing that the enemy had burned Chambersburgh and gone back, General Crook turned back to Harper's Ferry.

August 7th General Sheridan took command of the army, having added to it the Sixth corps, and followed the Confederate forces up to Cedar creek, but at once fell back to Halltown, followed by General Early, reenforced from Lee's army. August 23d the enemy attacked early in the morning but did not follow it up. Colonel Hayes' brigade (Twenty-third and Thirty-sixth Ohio and Fifth West Virginia), sallied out, and drove in the enemy's skirmishers, capturing a number. August 26th another sortie was made; in this they were successful in capturing a number of officers and men, all from Kershaw's division.

Nothing more of interest occurred until September 3d. General Crook with his troops reached Berryville, halted, and were in the act of making coffee when rapid firing was heard in the direction of a regiment that had been sent forward on picket. At once the regiment started on the double-quick, but did not reach them till they were being driven back on the run, closely followed by the enemy. Taking advantage of a little embankment the regiment lay down, concealed until our pickets passed through. The enemy came on until within a few rods, when the men, with fixed bayonets, rose up and rushed forward to meet them, firing as they ran. The enemy was driven back on his main force and behind his artillery. Taking cover behind rocks and trees, firing was kept up till late in the night. General Sheridan not wishing to bring on a general engagement here the brigade was withdrawn. Captured a number of prisoners. The regiment's loss was twenty-five men. Captain J. C. Selby, a brave and true soldier, was mortally wounded.

Much marching and counter-marching was gone through with up to September 19th. The Nineteenth corps having come up, General Sheridan attacked General Early in his fortified position in front of Winchester, across the Opequan creek. The Sixth and Nineteenth corps were ordered to attack the enemy in front. General Crook's forces were held in reserve, but were soon ordered to the right of the line and to fall upon the enemy's left flank. On reaching that point Colonel Hayes' brigade was formed in the first line and moved to the attack. The enemy discovering this movement turned their artillery upon it with vigor. The brigade hurried forward and soon came upon an impassable swamp, and were moved by the right flank a short distance where fording was possible. The enemy's skirmishers were driven in. A short delay ensued until all the forces could come up, when a rush was made—the enemy was doubled up and back and completely routed. General Crook's little command of about four thousand now became the front, and pursued the fleeing rebels. Passing many pieces of artillery, seven battle-flags were captured, the blue coats and the "gray backs" mingling together. A large number of prisoners were left to the rear. The pursuit continued through and beyond Winchester, till dark. The regiment's loss was thirty-five in killed and wounded. In this battle the division commander was wounded and Colonel R. B. Hayes assumed command; Colonel H. F. Devol of the brigade; Lieutenant Colonel Adney of the regiment. Following the enemy up the valley they found him, September 22d, in position at Fisher's Hill, his right resting against Massanutten mountain, his left at the foot of North mountain—a very strong position. As at Opequan, the Sixth and Nineteenth corps confronted the enemy.

General Crook with his command wended his way, through gulch and brush, by the flank, to the foot and up the side of North mountain, unperceived by the enemy. When well on their flank, overlooking them, he halted, his orders were to "quietly move down on the enemy till within range, then raise the yell and go for them."

At the command, "Forward!" the men broke in utter disorder, and like an avalanche, and yelling like demons, fell upon the enemy. Piece after piece of their artillery was abandoned. The Union forces not being able to overtake them, they fled on up the valley. Four men of the regiment were wounded. The regiment followed the fugitive army to Harrisonburgh. Soon after, the army fell back to Cedar creek. The creek crosses at right angles to the valley from the foot of Massanutten mountain to North mountain. On the lower bank of this creek the army took up its position. The Nineteenth corps on the right, the Sixth corps in the centre, army of western Virginia (General Crook's command), on the left—Major General Wright, the ranking officer, in command of the entire force. After this disposition General Sheridan left for Washington. General Early, reenforced, came down and confronted the National forces, and from Massanutten mountain could overlook the entire line, and from that point planned his attack. Early in the morning of the eighteenth, the entire rebel infantry was moved down the stream to a ford, which, by neglect of General Wright, was not properly guarded, and captured the picket without alarm. After crossing their forces, under cover of darkness and a dense fog, about 4 o'clock on the morning of the nineteenth they attacked Colonel Thoburn (First division, which was to the left and front), with a heavy force, completely surprising him, capturing a battery, and putting to flight the entire division. The main force of the enemy, at the same time, in double column, moved partly to the rear of Hayes' (Second) division. At the first firing at the front, tents were struck, all packed, and lines were formed as the First division men came back. It was now light enough to see the enemy in large force. The Second division command firing and falling back held the enemy in check till General Crook's headquarters train was out of the way. Captain Beir, General Crook's adjutant general, and Colonel Thoburn were killed at this point. We were still forced back by weight of numbers and overlapping.

A little further back in some woods the First brigade turned and charged the enemy, who had extended his line, driving that part of the line back which had the effect to check the pursuit and gave time for the reforming of the entire line at a new position about one and a half miles from the camps. Skirmishers were thrown forward. The enemy was contented with throwing an occasional shell and plundering the deserted camps. The men of the regiment were furiously angry, and eager to wipe out the stain of the morning.

In this new line the Second division was on the left and near the Winchester pike. About ten o'clock General Sheridan came galloping up the pike, having heard the firing. He stopped in rear of the Thirty-sixth regiment, dismounted, and heard from General Crook the story of the morning. Remounting, he rode along the line to the right and was cheered, all feeling that now there was an efficient head over all. Coming back he again dismounted and lay down among the weeds in consultation with General Crook—sent aides directing the formation of the Nineteenth corps which had not been engaged in the morning. They reported all in position, then he sent orders to be in readiness to move forward. General Custer, commanding cavalry, was posted on the right of the infantry. About half-past 2 P. M. the entire line advanced and drove the enemy at every point. As the rebels could not cross their forces rapidly over the ford many were captured, and the cavalry swinging round in their rear took many more. These, with forty-nine pieces of artillery and most of the enemy's train, were the trophies of the last battle in which the Thirty-sixth regiment participated, and the finale of General Jubal Early's army. The regiment's loss in this battle was thirty. The dead of the morning were stripped of their clothing. The regiment remained in the valley at and above Winchester. Marched to Martinsburgh, in a cold rain, and January 1, 1865, embarked on railroad trains for Cumberland. In that ride, lasting most of two days and nights, the men suffered greatly from cold. While at Cumberland was consolidated with the Thirty-fourth Ohio, retaining its number, Thirty-sixth. In April was sent back to Winchester and thence to Staunton, the object being to head off any of the rebel forces which might flee that way out of Richmond. At Winchester, April 15th, the news of the assassination of President Lincoln was received, and this was perhaps the saddest day in the experience of the regiment. Then soldier looked at soldier in silent wonder. It was truly the hush of death. The colors were draped, which emblem of respect never was removed. The regiment was at Staunton when General Lee surrendered and the Confederacy collapsed. In June was ordered back to Cumberland and thence to Wheeling. Perceiving there was no more need for soldiers in the field they made application at once to be mustered out. This took place at Wheeling, West Virginia, July 27th; went to Columbus, Ohio, were paid off and disbanded August 1, 1865.

To the above account of the Thirty-sixth regiment by General H. F. Devol, which is briefly and modestly put considering the value of the service rendered, we take pleasure in adding two farewell addresses:

HEADQUARTERS SECOND BRIGADE, FIRST DIVISION, }
DEPARTMENT WEST VIRGINIA, }
NEW CREEK, WEST VIRGINIA, April 6, 1865.

To the officers and men of the First brigade, First division, Department West Virginia:

It is with very great regret that I have been compelled to part with the officers and men of the First brigade. With many of you I have been associated in the service almost four years; with three of the regiments of the brigade more than two years, and with all the regiments during the memorable campaign of 1864, the battle of Cloyd Mountain, the burning of New River bridge, and the night march over Salt Pond mountain under General Crook in May, the days and nights of marching, fighting and starving on the Lynchburgh raid in June, the defeat at Winchester and the retreat on the twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth of July, the skirmishing, marching and counter-marching in the Shenandoah valley in August, the bloody and brilliant victories in September, the night battle of Berryville, the turning of the enemy's left at Sheridan's battle of Winchester, the avalanche that swept down North mountain upon the rebel stronghold at Fisher's Hill, the final conflict in October, the surprise and defeat of the morning and the victory of the evening at Cedar Creek. These and a thousand other events and scenes in the campaign form part of our common recollections which we are not likely ever to forget. As long as they are remembered we shall be reminded of each other, and of the friendly and agreeable relations which so long existed between us. It is very gratifying to me that I was allowed to serve with you until we received together the tidings of the great victory which ends the Rebellion. Whatever may be your future, I shall not cease to feel a lively interest in everything which concerns your welfare and your reputation. Under the able and gallant officer who succeeds me—under whom we have served together with so much satisfaction—I am confident that your future will be worthy of your past. As an organization and as individuals, you have my most fervent wishes for your happiness and success.

R. B. HAYES,
Brigadier General.

The above address was accompanied by the following:

NEW CREEK, VIRGINIA, fifteenth April, 1865.

DEAR COLONEL:—I hope to see the Thirty-sixth again before I quit the service, but I have thought proper to send you a good-bye which you will oblige me by having read to your regiment on dress parade when convenient.

Sincerely,

R. B. HAYES.

Colonel H. F. Devol, Thirty-sixth Ohio veteran volunteers.

HEADQUARTERS THIRTY-SIXTH OHIO
VETERANS VOLUNTEER INFANTRY,
COLUMBUS, OHIO, July 30, 1865. }

Officers and Soldiers of the Thirty-sixth:

The time has come when we will have to part; some of us never to meet again. I cannot sever the connection that has bound us together for four long and bloody years without expressing to you my high appreciation of your valor and patriotism, manifested on many a hard contested field; and I assure you that the feeling I entertain for you is more than common friendship. I love you for your patriotism, your manly devotion to principle, and the stern resolution you have ever exhibited through victory and defeat, and especially for the heroic conduct that characterized you during the memorable campaign of Lynchburg, and many similar scenes. Your country owes you a debt of gratitude which it never can repay, and but few can appreciate. And when, by your determination to sustain the integrity of your distracted country, you reenlisted as veterans, you did that which challenged the admiration of the world, and won the crowning glory of you life.

I would have you feel a just pride for the hard-earned but glorious reputation which you now enjoy; and I would conjure you, by all that is held dear, never to do aught that would sully your fair fame. And when our connection as comrades in arms is severed, as it soon will be, I would have you often think of that dear old flag, under which, and for which, we all have fought, and entertain towards each other that friendly feeling which has ever characterized our past relations.

Many of our comrades, who started with us four years ago, to-day fill heroes' graves! And while we mourn their loss, it is a happy thought to know that they did not die in vain, but that our country lives! Let their valorous deeds and heroic example ever be fresh in our memory. I am assured that the soldiers who acted nobly their part in the death struggles at Antietam, South Mountain, Mission Ridge, Cloyd Mountain, and through the arduous campaign in the Shenandoah Valley, and who learned to do and dare under such generals as McClellan, Rosecrans, Grant, Crook, and Sheridan, will be men wherever they are placed, and will clearly demonstrate the fact that fighting soldiers make peaceful citizens.

To command you has been the highest aim of my life, and in parting with you I have the highest regard for all. I shall never cease to take an interest in you future welfare, and you may rest assured that the bond of brotherhood that has existed between us for so long a time may not easily be forgotten.

Comrades, you can go to your homes with the happy consciousness that you have done your duty to your country and yourselves; and when you again assume the privileges and responsibilities of citizenship, be as unflinching in defending the sacred Temple of Liberty with the ballot as you have with the bullet, and all will be well.

May God bless and protect you,

H. F. DEVOL,

Col. and Brev. Brig. Gen'l, U. S. V.

The regiment, during its entire term of service, had a most excellent drum corps. The first half of the time in charge of Chief Musician Ebenezer Corey, the remainder in charge of Chief Musician John Tenney.

If space would permit, an individual mention of every officer would be but justice; each one having an honorable record of patriotic deeds, which were wrought out with great personal sacrifice, not one having the slightest stain. They cherished toward each other throughout only the kindest feelings; no jealousy, no rivalry, or anything that ever marred the fellowship of the true and noble brotherhood.

COMPANIES B AND F, THIRTY-NINTH OHIO VOLUNTEERS.

REGIMENTAL OFFICERS.

Colonel John Groesbeck, mustered August 24, 1861, resigned July 8, 1862; Colonel A. W. Gilbert, July 8, 1862, resigned October 1, 1862;

Colonel Edward F. Noyes, October 1, 1862, honorably discharged April 22, 1865; Colonel Daniel Webber, May 18, 1865, mustered out with regiment; Lieutenant Colonel A. W. Gilbert, July 27, 1861, promoted to colonel July 8, 1862; Lieutenant Colonel Edward F. Noyes, July 8, 1862, promoted to colonel October 1, 1862; Lieutenant Colonel Henry T. McDowell, October 1, 1862, mustered out; Lieutenant Colonel Daniel Webber, February 10, 1865, promoted to colonel; Lieutenant Colonel William C. Buck, May 18, 1865, mustered out as captain May 18, 1865; Lieutenant Colonel Henry A. Babbitt, June 6, 1865, mustered out with regiment; Major Edward F. Noyes, July 27, 1861, promoted to lieutenant colonel; Major Henry T. McDowell, July 8, 1862, promoted to lieutenant colonel; Major William H. Lathrop, October 1, 1862, colonel Third Alabama colored regiment April 20, 1864; Major John S. Jenkins, April 25, 1864, mustered; Major Daniel Webber, January 11, 1865, promoted to lieutenant colonel; Major Henry A. Babbitt, May 18, 1865, promoted to lieutenant colonel; Major George T. Rice, June 6, 1865, mustered out with regiment; Surgeon Oliver W. Nixon, August 20, 1861, resigned May 31, 1862; Surgeon Thomas W. McArthur, May 31, 1862, resigned September 3, 1862; Surgeon John A. Follett, September 3, 1862, mustered out with regiment; Assistant Surgeon Thomas W. McArthur, August 20, 1861, promoted to surgeon; Assistant Surgeon Christian Forrester, May 31, 1862, promoted to surgeon September 3, 1862; Assistant Surgeon Pierre S. Starr, December 13, 1862, mustered out with regiment; Assistant Surgeon Lionel J. Smith, September 5, 1862; Assistant Surgeon William J. Andrews, May 18, 1865, mustered out with regiment; Chaplain Benjamin W. Childaw, August 20, 1861, resigned April 9, 1862.

COMPANY OFFICERS FROM WASHINGTON COUNTY.

Captain John C. Fell, mustered July 31, 1861, resigned April 12, 1862; Captain Jacob Koenig, July 31, 1861, died; Captain William H. Pittinger, May 18, 1862, mustered out with regiment; Captain Ethan O. Hurd, July 3, 1862, resigned March 3, 1864; Captain William C. Buck, May 9, 1864, promoted to lieutenant colonel; Captain George T. Rice, January 11, 1862, promoted to major; Captain William H. Mintun, January 11, 1862, mustered out with regiment; Captain William Benze, January 11, 1862, mustered out; First Lieutenant William Edgerton, July 31, 1861, resigned June 25, 1862; First Lieutenant Ethan O. Hurd, July 31, 1861, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant Henry W. Sheppard, February 8, 1862, resigned June 10, 1862; First Lieutenant William C. Buck, June 25, 1862, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant August Kropp, July 3, 1862, resigned April 1, 1864; First Lieutenant George T. Rice, May 9, 1864, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant Ely Steen, January 11, 1865, mustered out with regiment; First Lieutenant Alexander McTaggart, February 10, 1865, resigned June 20, 1865; First Lieutenant William Snodgrass, May 18, 1865, discharged July 1, 1865; First Lieutenant Frank Fortman, July 20, 1862, resigned September 15, 1862; First Lieutenant William Benze, May 25, 1862, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant William H. Pittinger, January 11, 1865, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant Barney Shults, February 10, 1865, mustered out with regiment; Second Lieutenant Henry W. Sheppard, July 31, 1861, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant William C. Buck, March 19, 1862, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant George T. Rice, June 25, 1862, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Alexander McTaggart, July 11, 1865, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant William Snodgrass, February 14, 1865, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Daniel Otterbein, May 18, 1865, mustered out with regiment; Second Lieutenant Buell Congdon, May 18, 1865; Second Lieutenant Charles Miller, July 31, 1861, resigned June 16, 1862; Second Lieutenant Frank Fortman, July 18, 1862, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant William Benze, June 20, 1863, promoted to first lieutenant. Second Lieutenant Barney Shultz, July 11, 1865, promoted to first lieutenant.

The regimental organization was perfected August 16, 1861, at Camp Dennison, Ohio; ordered to St. Louis, Missouri, where they arrived August 19th; moved up the North Missouri railroad September 7th. September 12th, the regiment was divided, companies A, B, E, I and K, going toward St. Joseph. This detachment remained in northern Missouri until February, 1862. Companies A and I marched from St. Joseph to Liberty in pursuit of the enemy and back to St. Joseph, in September, then moved by rail to Chillicothe, when they rejoined B, E and K. These five companies marched from Chillicothe to Macon City, thence to St. Joseph and Chillicothe and back to Macon City and St. Joseph, at which latter place they arrived December 4, 1861. On the fifth of December they marched under Brigadier General Prentiss toward the Missouri river, reaching it at Lexington; proceeded to Carrolton and returned to Utica December 8, 1861. December 20th, moved to Palmyra, Missouri, and remained there until the middle of February, 1862, when the detachment moved by rail to St. Louis. Companies C, D, F, G and H, moved from Utica, Missouri, as part of the command of Brigadier General Sturgess to the relief of Lexington, which place was then besieged by the enemy under General Price. Arrived in sight of Lexington September 19th, but finding it impossible to cross the river, and having no artillery, the relieving force diverged and marched to Liberty, when they embarked on steamers for Kansas City, Missouri, October 15th, still under General Sturgess, took up line of march for Springfield, Missouri, by way of Osceola, Bolivar and Greenfield. Arrived at Springfield November 1st, having marched on that day thirty-nine miles, to reenforce General Fremont's grand army, which was reported to be in the presence of the enemy. On the ninth of November marched towards the Missouri river, reaching Sedalia by way of Warsaw November 16th, and by December 18th, reached Syracuse. February 2, 1862, took up line of march for St. Louis, by way of Boonville, Columbia, Fulton and St. Charles, and arrived at St. Louis February 19, 1862, when the entire regiment was reunited.

The regiment embarked on steamer February 22d, and arrived at Commerce, Missouri, on the twenty-fourth, and at New Madrid March 3d, when the regiment formed a part of Groesbeck's brigade, Stanley's division of General Pope's army of the Mississippi. During the next ten days made several reconnoissances and took part in the siege of New Madrid, March 13th and 14th. Assisted in the capture of the place March 14th, crossed the Mississippi April 7th, and on the 8th, in conjunction with other troops, captured five thousand and five hundred prisoners at Tiptonville, being the rebel force from Island No. 10. On same day marched to Island No. 10, and on the ninth returned to New Madrid. April 13th embarked on steamer to go down the river, arrived near Fort Pillow on the fifteenth, started for Pittsburgh Landing on the seventeenth, where the command arrived on the twenty-third, and disembarked. During the siege of Corinth from April 23d to May 29th, the regiment made many reconnoissances and was frequently engaged in skirmishes with the enemy. On the thirtieth they advanced upon the rebel works, found them deserted, and the Thirty-ninth was the first regiment to enter the entrenchments. For several days they pursued the rebels, and on the twelfth of June returned to Clear creek, four miles south of Corinth, and went into camp, where the regiment was armed with the Whitney rifle with sabre bayonet. August 20th, marched to Iuka under General Rosecrans and returned on September 12th. On September 14th the movement against General Price, who had occupied Iuka, began, and on the nineteenth they were engaged in the battle of Iuka, which was a bloody contest, resulting in a defeat to the enemy. They pursued the rebel forces several days and then turned back and reached Corinth October 3rd. The Thirty-ninth, in the dispositions for the great battle impending at that point, was stationed near Fort Robinet. After dark the Ohio brigade, which consisted of the Twenty-seventh, Thirty-ninth, Forty-third and Sixty-third Ohio regiments, marched to relieve one of the brigades of General Davie's division, which had been resisting the enemy's advance in front. The Ohio brigade was ordered to occupy the high ground near battery Robinet. Near the crest was formed the line of battle. Directly on the right of the earthwork covering the battery and stretching across the Chewalla road, stood the men of the Sixty-third, next came the Twenty-seventh and farther still to the right was the Thirty-ninth regiment. On the left of the battery facing to the left and nearly at right angles with the main line, rested the Forty-third.*

The locality above mentioned was the scene of the desperate charge of October 4th, in which the Twenty-seventh, and especially the Sixty-third regiment, lost heavily, the Thirty-ninth escaping with slight loss, and the enemy were terribly punished and routed. The Thirty-ninth followed in pursuit of Van Dorn and Price for four days, and on October 12th returned to Corinth, where they remained until November 2d, and marched southward to a point five miles south of Oxford, Mississippi. On December 18th they moved by rail to Jackson, Tennessee, to reenforce General Sullivan, who was hard pressed by General Forrest's command. They then, on December 20th, moved toward the Tennessee river, and took part in the battle of Parker's Cross Roads, defeating Forrest there on December 31st. General Fuller says of this engagement, which was so overshadowed by the great battle of Stone River, in progress at the same time, that it never received adequate notice:

Colonel Dunham, of Indiana, was sent ahead with a brigade to intercept Forrest's march at Parker's Cross Roads, and the Ohio brigade was to follow the next morning. At four o'clock we started, and marched until daylight, when a halt was made for breakfast. That over, we moved on, and soon the sound of cannon in our front advised us that Forrest was attacking Dunham's brigade, and then began a struggle in which legs told. Within an hour and a half they marched seven miles without a halt, with ranks well closed; and when a hill was reached whence Forrest's men and guns were seen, the Ohio brigade formed in line of battle on the double-quick, and went down for them with such good will that every rebel gun unlimbered and in action was ours in five minutes, and Forrest's forces were galloping away—not all, however, for many had dismounted in the fight, and their horses left in the rear were captured and their riders surrendered. Six guns, four hundred horses, and three hundred and sixty officers and men were captured. This was quite an achievement, for Forrest was not beaten every day.

January 8, 1863, the regiment returned to Corinth, having marched over two hundred miles in three weeks, without Government rations, transportation, or ambulances. The regiment remained at Corinth until April

*From address of General John W. Fuller at the reunion of the Ohio brigade at Columbus, Ohio, October 3, 1878, further extracts from which will be found in the history of the Sixty-third regiment.

20th, when it moved with the expedition under General Dodge to the Tuscumbia valley, for the purpose of keeping the rebels busy in that direction while another expedition cut the railroads in the rear of General Bragg's army. General Dodge was confronted by the rebel forces under Forrest and Roddy, and on the twenty-eighth the regiment was engaged in the battle near Tuscumbia, defeating the rebels. They then marched sixteen miles beyond Tuscumbia, returned to Corinth May 2nd, and marched to Memphis, Tennessee, on May 10th. Here the regiment was allowed to rest and recuperate. General Fuller says:

When Grant directed everything at Memphis to come to him at Vicksburgh, the Ohio brigade was ordered to march and garrison the former city. This was your single "soft spot" of the war. Excepting this, your lot was always at the front; but here for some months you lounged in camp, guarded the gardens, flirted with the ladies, and seldom missed a "good square meal."

The regiment up to this time had lost, in killed and wounded and discharged, since its organization, about three hundred men, and had recruited about two hundred, and had an aggregate of eight hundred and thirty ready for duty.

The regiment remained in Memphis until October 18th, when they went to Prospect, Tennessee, marching a distance of two hundred and fifty miles, and arriving there November 13th. Here they lay encamped until the twenty-seventh of December, when the regiment reenlisted as veterans, and returned home on furlough for thirty days. "The measured tread of an army, keeping step, is heard; and that wondrous scene unfolds, which the whole world beholds—the marshalling of the veteran hosts! The soldiers of the ranks stand forth! 'Muster us again! for all the war muster us in!' From that patriotic hour was the doom of the Rebellion sealed."*

The Thirty-ninth regiment furnished more veterans than any other Ohio regiment. The Ohio brigade stood as follows: Thirty-ninth, five hundred and thirty-four men; Sixty-third, four hundred and fifty-five; Forty-third, four hundred and thirty-six; and the Twenty-seventh, four hundred and thirty-seven men.

At the expiration of the furlough the regiment returned to its former camp at Prospect, Tennessee, and from thence they moved on Decatur, Alabama. The town was captured by a night movement. The brigade was embarked above in seventy boats, which, with muffled oars, silently stole down until opposite, when, by the left flank, they were soon on shore, up the bank, and in line. The rebels, after exchanging a few shots, retired, completely surprised and defeated.

On May 1, 1864, the regiment marched to join General Sherman's grand army at Chattanooga. Here the great Atlanta campaign was commenced. Meeting the enemy at Resaca, the Thirty-ninth was, on May 13th, 14th, and 15th, in the front line of battle driving the rebels to their trenches with a loss of two men.

At Dallas, Georgia, on the twenty-seventh, they again met the enemy, driving him from his position, in which engagement the loss by the regiment was severe. The rebel army was next encountered at the base of Kennesaw mountain. Heavy skirmishing began on the thirteenth of June, in which the Thirty-ninth was constantly engaged during the several days' fighting, losing severely in killed and wounded. The rebels were finally compelled to leave their stronghold.

On July 4th the enemy was again encountered at Ruff's Mills, when the Thirty-ninth, together with the Twenty-seventh, made a gallant charge on the enemy's works, driving them out in confusion, and not giving them time to remove their dead and wounded, and capturing quite a number of prisoners. This engagement is known also by the name of Nicojack Creek. The colonel of the regiment, E. F. Noyes, lost a foot in this action and never joined the regiment afterwards.* Company B lost four severely wounded.

The rebels retreated, and the National army pursued until they were finally driven into their devoted city, Atlanta, around which scenes of terrible slaughter were soon to be enacted.

On July 22, 1864, the regiment together with the Twenty-seventh Ohio was ordered to a responsible position in the line of battle of that memorable day, and they held it.

"The men were directed to unsling knapsacks, fix bayonets, and lie down on the crest of the ridge, where the line was formed, for protection from the fire of the enemy which came from the wood in front. The Second division had formed a line conforming in the main to that of the Twenty-seventh and Thirty-ninth, on a parallel ridge to the left of the Thirty-ninth, but separated from that regiment by a deep transverse ravine. The enemy charged the Second division within a few minutes and were repulsed.

"Immediately afterward his line of battle came out of the timber in front of the Thirty-ninth and Twenty-seventh regiments, advancing in plain view and within easy range, when individual men of both regiments raised to their feet and taking deliberate aim discharged their pieces. No order could keep them down with such an opportunity to use their muskets effectually. In less time than it takes to relate it, both regiments were on their feet discharging their pieces with rapidity and telling effect on the foe; yet on he came until the Thirty-ninth and Twenty-seventh charged him in turn, driving him from the field into the wood. Meanwhile another body of the enemy in line of battle came out of the wood to the right of the Twenty-seventh, bearing down on its flank and rear. General Fuller directed that the three right companies of the regiment be retired to face this second assault. This was done, but it soon became evident that a change of front to the rear of the entire line was necessary. This change was made under a hot fire. In executing this movement, necessarily made with celerity and under trying conditions, in the face of a defiant and rapidly advancing foe, the Twenty-seventh became somewhat disordered; and my thanks are due to General

* General Fuller's address before the Ohio brigade.

* He is, at this writing, Minister to France.

Fuller for his timely assistance in forming the new line. He grasped the colors of the Twenty-seventh and with them designated the ground he wished the new line to occupy. The line was promptly formed there; several volleys fired by the Twenty-seventh and Thirty-ninth Ohio regiments, Eighteenth Missouri and Sixty-fourth Illinois (the latter two regiments until then in reserve), followed by a charge again drove the enemy from the field. The line now laid down facing the wood which was on its right flank in the beginning of the battle, under a raking fire from the timber for an hour or more, when the enemy retreated and the greatest battle of the campaign was over. This was a stand up open field fight, with only such protection as the muskets and bayonets afforded."*

This stubborn resistance in this part of the field saved the left wing of Sherman's army from defeat; the old Thirty-ninth and Twenty-seventh stood as an impenetrable wall in front of the enemy, not giving an inch of ground and repelling several distinct charges by the rebels. Our artillery, supported by the Ohio brigade, poured into the rebel columns closed en masse, their deadly fire, musketry, grape, and canister, causing them to melt away like dew before the morning sun, leaving the National forces the victors of the field. The Thirty-ninth lost one hundred and forty-four killed and wounded.

The regiment then moved to the west side of Atlanta, forming the right wing, where on the twenty-eighth of July another severe battle was fought in which the Thirty-ninth participated, repulsing the enemy with great loss. Thus almost every day the regiment was engaged in skirmishing until the final evacuation of the city, which occurred on the second of September, 1864, and in the meantime they marched to Jonesborough fifteen miles south of Atlanta, destroying ten miles of the Montgomery railroad while on the way. At the latter place we again met the enemy in force and repulsed him with great loss, driving him so far south as Lovejoy's Station. In all these movements the Thirty-ninth performed a conspicuous part. They then returned to Atlanta, where they enjoyed a rest of about thirty days. In the meantime Hood, with his army, had got in our rear, destroying our communications with Chattanooga and investing our stronghold at Allatoona Pass. General Corse commanded at that point and had one thousand nine hundred and forty-four men, the rebel general, French, many times that number. The rebels came on in full force and charged the devoted garrison, but were driven back with the loss of hundreds, still assault after assault was delivered with same result, while the Twenty-third corps, under General J. D. Cox, were hastening to the rescue, and flags conveying from peak to peak, the message from General Sherman to General Corse to "hold the fort," and "that he was coming with reinforcements." Sherman on learning that Corse was there, exclaimed, "He will hold out! I know the man!" and he did hold out, though seven hundred and seven (more than a third) of his men had fallen, when the enemy desisted, leaving two hundred and thirty-one dead and four hundred and eleven prisoners and eight hundred muskets on the field.

The Thirty-ninth was in the front during the pursuit of Hood, being the first regiment in the Ohio brigade commanded by General J. W. Fuller.

The rebels were driven across the Tennessee to be left to the tender mercies of General George H. Thomas, while Sherman made all haste to get ready for his "march to the sea." The regiment now no longer in the Ohio brigade, but in the First division of the Seventeenth Army corps, on the fifteenth of November, took up its line of march with that corps, down to the sea, with Sherman. They destroyed the railroads as they went, meeting with but little opposition until they arrived in front of Savannah on the ninth of December, making a distance of three hundred and fifty miles from Atlanta. Here they found the rebels strongly fortified, with Hardee in his last ditch. After opening communication with the sea by way of the St. Catharine sound, taking Fort McAllister on the way, and having several days' hard fighting around the city of Savannah, in all of which the Thirty-ninth participated, the rebels evacuated the city on the twenty-first of December, and it was immediately occupied by the National army.

About the middle of January, 1865, the Thirty-ninth embarked with other troops on transports, and went to Beaufort, South Carolina, and assisted in driving the rebels from their stronghold at Pocotaligo Station twenty-five miles northwest from Beaufort.

On the first of February the Thirty-ninth, with the other forces of the grand army, took up its line of march through the Carolinas, wading swamps and fighting the enemy from place to place. On the fourth of February they engaged the enemy at Revers bridge, repulsing him with severe loss, the Thirty-ninth losing two killed and three wounded.

Continuing the march they struck the Augusta & Charleston railroad at Midway station, moving on that road to Columbia, thence north to Waynesborough, thence east to Cheraw, driving the enemy before them and capturing at that point a large amount of ammunition and artillery, thence marched to Fayetteville, North Carolina, thence to Bentonville, where a severe battle was fought March 21st, in which the First division, Seventeenth army corps, was hotly engaged, the Thirty-ninth being in the centre of the brigade on the right of the line of battle. They firmly held their ground, while those on the right and left gave way, leaving both flanks exposed to a raking fire. The brigade finally formed in the shape of a horse shoe and succeeded in repulsing the enemy. The brigade then moved to a stronger position, lay on their arms all night and in the morning were ready to resume the fight, but the enemy was gone. The next day they moved to Goldsborough. Our loss in this engagement was twenty-three killed and wounded.

Here they rested until April 10th, when they resumed the line of march toward Raleigh, and arrived there on the fifteenth and went into camp two miles west of the city, enjoying a few days of rest. We then joined in the pursuit of the rebel forces under General Johnston. After marching fifteen miles a proposal was received by *Address of General M. Churchill, late Colonel of the Twenty-seventh regiment, at the reunion of the Ohio brigade.

General Sherman to surrender the rebel forces, which was finally consummated, and we again returned to Raleigh. We then marched to Richmond, the late rebel capital, a distance of one hundred and eighty miles, in seven days, and from there to Washington city.

After participating in the grand review of all the armies by President Lincoln, the heads of departments, diplomatic corps, and a large number of distinguished officers of the army and navy, and an immense throng of rejoicing citizens, the Thirty-ninth moved to Louisville, Kentucky, where it was mustered out of the United States service on July 9, 1865, the war being over.

Engagements in which the Thirty-ninth regiment participated:

New Madrid, Missouri, March 7, 10, and 13, 1862; Island No. 10, April 8, 1862; Farmington, Mississippi, May 8 and 9, 1862; Corinth, Mississippi, May 28 and 29, 1862; Iuka, Mississippi, September 19, 1862; Parkers Cross Roads, Tennessee, December 31, 1864; Resaca, Georgia, May 13 and 14, 1864; Dallas, Georgia, May 31, 1864; Kennesaw Mountain, Georgia, June 18, 23, 26, and 27, 1864; Ruffs Mills, Georgia, July 4, 1864; Atlanta, Georgia, July 22, 29 and 30, 1864; Savannah, Georgia, December 10, 1864; Rivers Bridge, South Carolina, February 4, 1865; Bentonville, North Carolina, March 21, 1865.

The Thirty-ninth regiment marched three thousand five hundred and twenty-one miles, by rail two thousand six hundred and eighty miles, by steamboat two thousand four hundred and five miles, total, eight thousand six hundred and six miles.

SIXTY-THIRD OHIO VOLUNTEER INFANTRY.

REGIMENTAL OFFICERS.

Colonel John W. Sprague, mustered January 23, 1862, promoted to brigadier general volunteers; Colonel Charles E. Brown, June 6, 1865, on detached duty at muster out of regiment; Lieutenant Colonel William E. Gilmore, October 17, 1861, resigned July 17, 1862; Lieutenant Colonel Alexander L. Haskin, July 17, 1862; Lieutenant Colonel J. Hunter Odlin, March 20, 1863; Lieutenant Colonel Charles E. Brown, March 20, 1863, promoted to colonel; Lieutenant Colonel Oscar L. Jackson, June 6, 1865, mustered out with regiment as major; Major Alexander L. Haskins, October 1, 1861, promoted, and honorably discharged March 20, 1863; Major J. Hunter Odlin, October 1, 1862, resigned January 3, 1863; Major John W. Fouts, January 1, 1863, mustered out; Major Oscar L. Jackson, January 28, 1865, promoted to lieutenant colonel; Surgeon Isaac L. Crane, October 7, 1861, resigned January 28, 1863; Surgeon Arthur D. Monahan, January 28, 1863, mustered out July 21, 1865; Assistant Surgeon Arthur D. Monahan, November 7, 1861, promoted to surgeon; Assistant Surgeon J. O. Marsh, August 21, 1862, resigned October 2, 1862; Assistant Surgeon John B. McDell, March 11, 1863, resigned May 31, 1865; Chaplain B. S. Fry, February 13, 1862, mustered out September 27, 1864, at expiration of term.

COMPANY OFFICERS.

Captain John W. Fouts, October 28, 1861, promoted to major; Captain Christopher E. Smith, October 26, 1861, resigned December 22, 1862; Captain Rodner K. Shaw, December 20, 1861, resigned August 30, 1862; Captain Charles J. Titus, December 20, 1861, resigned June 18, 1862; Captain O. W. Pollock, June 18, 1862, mustered out with regiment; Captain George Wightman, August 11, 1862, discharged October 19, 1864; Captain Winslow L. Bay, January 1, 1863, mustered out with regiment; Captain A. C. Fenner, October 4, 1864, mustered out with regiment; Captain George B. Bartlett, November 12, 1864, mustered out with regiment; Captain M. A. Stewart, November 12, 1864, declined promotion; Captain Madison Hoon, June 28, 1865, mustered out with regiment; First Lieutenant Wesley J. Tucker, October 28, 1861, resigned June 18, 1862; First Lieutenant Henry S.

Burt, December 20, 1861, detailed on staff duty; First Lieutenant O. W. Pollock, December 26, 1861, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant Louis Schmidt, February 13, 1862, resigned August 24, 1864; First Lieutenant Richard B. Cheatham, June 18, 1862, died July 18, 1863; First Lieutenant A. C. Tenner, August 11, 1862, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant George B. Bartlett, July 18, 1863, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant A. J. Howard, August 11, 1864, declined promotion; First Lieutenant M. A. Stewart, September 26, 1864, returned commission, mustered out; First Lieutenant Angus McDonald, September 26, 1864, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant Wallace S. Roach, September 26, 1864, returned commission; First Lieutenant Madison Hoon, October 4, 1864, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant Alexander H. Brill, January 20, 1865, mustered out with regiment; First Lieutenant Wallace C. Bay, January 20, 1865, resigned May 23, 1865; Second Lieutenant Robert Booth, October 1, 1861, resigned June 28, 1862; Second Lieutenant Benjamin Knight, November 12, 1861, resigned September 3, 1862; Second Lieutenant Lewis L. Grubb, February 13, 1862, resigned May 26, 1862; Second Lieutenant George B. Bartlett, May 26, 1862, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Winslow L. Bay, January 30, 1862, promoted to captain; Second Lieutenant A. J. Howard, January 1, 1863, honorably discharged November 9, 1864; Second Lieutenant M. A. Stewart, January 1, 1863, mustered out; Second Lieutenant Angus McDonald, July 18, 1863, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Wallace S. Roach, June 30, 1863, mustered out; Second Lieutenant Alexander H. Brill, November 12, 1864, promoted to first lieutenant.

THE SIXTY-THIRD OHIO VOLUNTEER INFANTRY.

The Sixty-third Ohio volunteer infantry was formed by the consolidation of a battalion of six companies raised at Camp Worthington, Chillicothe, with a battalion of four companies raised at Camp Putnam, Marietta.* It was originally intended for two regiments—the Twenty-second, to be raised under the direction of, and to be commanded by, Colonel William E. Gilmore, and the Sixty-third, to be raised under the direction of, and to be commanded by, Colonel William Craig, then quartermaster in charge at Marietta. In December, 1861, the call for troops to be sent to the front became so pressing that the order for consolidation came, and the two battalions were united; the Twenty-second furnishing companies A, B, E, H, I, and K; and the Sixty-third furnishing four companies raised in Washington county—company C, commanded by Captain Christopher E. Smith; company B, commanded by Captain John W. Fouts; company F, commanded by Captain Charles J. Titus; and company G, commanded by Captain Rodney K. Shaw. The command of the regiment was given to Colonel Craig; William E. Gilmore was made lieutenant colonel, and Alexander L. Haskins major.

On the twenty-first of December, 1861, the regiment removed to Camp Dennison; and on the twenty-seventh of the same month it returned to Marietta, and encamped at Camp Tupper.

On the twenty-third day of January, 1862, Colonel Craig resigned, and the command of the regiment was given to Colonel John W. Sprague, formerly a captain in the Seventh Ohio. Colonel Sprague immediately took command, and proceeded to fit his regiment to enter the field by perfecting its drill and discipline.

On the eighteenth day of February, 1862, Colonel Sprague with his regiment was ordered to the field, and to report at Paducah, Kentucky. The regiment left

*By this consolidation it became practicable to transfer, and by order of the war department, the Thirteenth Missouri regiment, composed mostly of Ohio men and officers, was transferred to the credit of Ohio, and became the Twenty-second Ohio volunteer infantry.

Marietta late in the evening of the eighteenth; six companies under the command of Colonel Sprague, on the steamer Bostona, No. 2, and four companies under command of Major Haskins, on the steamer T. J. Rattin. Marietta gave one of the best proofs of her sympathy and interest for the success of the Union cause by turning out en masse at the landing to witness their departure. On Saturday the twenty-second of February, the command reached Paducah and reported for orders. Having been armed and drilled in Camp Marietta, it was ordered to proceed to Commerce, Missouri, and report to General Pope, then organizing the army of the Mississippi at that point. The regiment reached Commerce on Sunday morning, the twenty-third of February, being the second regiment to arrive at the rendezvous. It immediately debarked, and encamped and occupied the cemetery on the high ground in the rear of the town. Later in the day it was joined by the Twenty-seventh, Thirty-ninth, and Forty-third Ohio volunteer infantry, its companions in the organization known as the Ohio brigade. These four regiments were brigaded together, and were made the First brigade in the First division of the army of the Mississippi. General Schuyler Hamilton commanded the division one day; the command was then given to General David S. Stanley, one of Ohio's brigadier generals.

From the twenty-third to the twenty-seventh of February the army was actually employed in the collection of stores, and the organization of the divisions. On the morning of the twenty-eighth the line of march was taken up for New Madrid, the Ohio brigade taking the advance. The army arrived in sight of New Madrid on the third day of March, and at two o'clock in the afternoon of that day the Sixth-third was first brought into action. It moved forward in line of battle with the same steadiness and precision that it would in review. Its first experience gave it the morale of veterans. For three hours it remained in its trying position, exposed to the artillery fire of the two forts and a fleet of six gunboats, without the opportunity of using their arms. Late in the afternoon the army retired out of range, and went into camp. The day had been a cold raw March day, and in the afternoon it began to snow. En route the army had been restrained from using fences, or in any manner foraging. The cold and exposure brought from headquarters the order to take the top rail, for campfires. In a short time the boys were comfortable around the blazing campfires, and in the morning it was found the army "was not fenced in."

The Sixty-third shared in all the fights in and around New Madrid previous to its capture. In the reconnaissance on the seventh of March it took an exposed position, and for a short time the upper fort had its range, and made its situation uncomfortable, fortunately without casualty.

On the thirteenth of March the Ohio brigade was made the infantry support of the siege batteries. The Sixty-third on the right, the Thirty-ninth on the left, well up to the batteries, and the Twenty-seventh and Forty-third in reserve. The troops were exposed to a constant artillery fire from the dawn until sunset, when the cannonading ceased. The troops remained in the trenches at night, exposed to a most terrific thunderstorm, without shelter or fires, the ground flooded with water. The dawn revealed the fact that the enemy had abandoned the forts, and retreated during the darkness.

The Ohio brigade was complimented in general orders for its gallantry, and was awarded the privilege to first enter and plant their banners on the captured forts. On the evening of the eighteenth day of March the Sixty-third was detailed to haul one of the heavy siege guns from the forts at New Madrid to Point Pleasant, fourteen miles below, and opposite Tiptonville in Tennessee. This arduous labor was performed between dark and daylight, the regiment dragging its heavy load over roads impassable for teams. The next morning the rebel fleet were surprised to find a battery opposite Tiptonville, their only line of communication with their garrison at Island Ten.* This severe labor and its attendant exposure permanently disabled many men.† The regiment returned to camp, and with the army awaited the action of the engineers in removing the obstructions from the bayou, for the passage of the gunboat fleet, and the transports.

On the morning of the seventh of April, 1862, the regiment with Stanley's and Paine's divisions of the army of the Mississippi, embarked on the transports to cross the Mississippi river, and were transported to the Tennessee shore, opposite the lower port.‡ The expedition took up its line of march down the Mississippi for Tiptonville, to intercept the enemy, if they should attempt to retreat. The route lay through muddy corn and wheat fields, with occasionally a strip of woods, having no semblance of roads. The marching was tedious, frequent halts were necessary, as the feet would gather more of Tennessee mud than a man was able to carry. Night came upon them in the fields, and they were compelled to bivouac in the field, and without campfires. The march was resumed at daybreak, and it reached Tiptonville in time to witness the surrender of the army that had garrisoned Island Ten, which had abandoned the forts, and attempted to escape by Tiptonville and the river. The expedition had been successful in intercepting and capturing them. The sixty-third proceeded immediately to Island Ten and occupied the enemy's abandoned quarters for the night. The next morning the regiment returned on the transports to New Madrid and occupied its old quarters. It had borne a conspicuous part in all of the work of the army of the Mississippi, resulting in the capture of all of the forts on the Mississippi above Fort Pillow.*

* The first casualty in the Sixty-third occurred March 24th, the carelessness of a companion wounding Elisha Roberts mortally and George W. Essex seriously.

† James W. Nye served during the New Madrid campaign with the Sixty-third as acting quartermaster, and was present on the field during all the battles at that point, although never having been mustered; his name does not appear on the rolls.

‡ The embarkation of the Ohio brigade on the expedition is illustrated in the second volume of Ohio in the War, page 253. The Sixty-third is upon the transport crossing the river. The Thirty-ninth are in the act of embarking at the upper fort, the last of the battalion ready to move on the transport when the picture was taken and the gunboat with steam up ready for action, abreast the upper fort.

On the thirteenth day of April, 1862, the regiment embarked on the transport Silver Wave, and moved with the army of the Mississippi to Osceola, Arkansas, and thence to Fort Pillow, and was present during the bombardment of that fort. On the seventeenth day of April, 1862, the army of the Mississippi, having received orders to reinforce the army of Tennessee, under Halleck, in front of Corinth, proceeded up the Mississippi and Tennessee rivers on the transports. On the twenty-third of April the Sixty-third landed at Hamburg, Tennessee, four miles above the battle-ground of Shiloh. Stanley's division was posted on the left flank of the army, moving to the capture of Corinth, and during all the movement for its capture, the Sixty-third held its position, as the flanking regiment. It actively participated in all the reconnoissances and engagements in front of Corinth, including those at Monterey and Farmington. When the enemy moved out of Corinth on the thirtieth day of May, the Sixty-third moved out of the trenches in immediate pursuit of the retreating army. The Thirty-ninth Ohio, of our brigade, being the first to enter the rebel works, and Wallace Bruce, of Washington county, being the first to mount the works. The Sixty-third was kept in pursuit of Price's wing of the retreating army, six companies under Major Haskins proceeding to the Tuscumbia river on the Jacinto road, when it found the bridges burned, and was then recalled, and proceeded with the main body of the army in pursuit of Beauregard's army, to Boonville, the Ohio brigade having the advance of the infantry in this movement. † From Boonville, where the pursuit was abandoned, the regiment proceeded to Camp Clear Creek, near Corinth, and remained in camp at Clear Creek, Bear Creek, Iuka, and Burnsville.

On the seventeenth day of September, with Stanley's division, it participated in the battle of Iuka. After a tedious and forced march it came upon the enemy at the beginning of dusk, immediately formed in line of battle, advanced, and opened "that steady fire that always distinguished it in action." It was just getting well into its work when darkness put an end to the fighting, and the two armies bivouacked upon the field. The pickets of the two armies were posted so near as to be able to communicate by ordinary conversation; and pickets of the Ohio brigade were so far advanced as to cover the captured guns of Niel's Eleventh Ohio battery, which the rebels had been unable to remove. The morning's dawn revealed an abandoned rebel camp, and Niel's battery was restored to its gallant owners. An active pursuit was taken up, and from that time until the third of October, 1862, when it entered Corinth, the Sixty-third was with Rosecrans' army, beating the bush to find and engage the enemy.

The regiment took a most active and honorable part in the battle of Corinth on the third and fourth of October, 1862, and it there proved itself worthy of a place in the history of a county named after the father of our country, to know that she was well and ably represented by an organization performing its whole duty in every great contest during the war, that upon the group of colors of her regiments and batteries are found the names of every great battle of the war. In the battle of Corinth the Sixty-third did great service, and won for itself a place beside the Eighteenth, Thirty-sixth, Thirty-ninth, Seventy-seventh, and Ninety-second, Buell's and Huntington's batteries, and the First, Seventh and Ninth cavalry. The Ohio brigade took so important a part in the battle of Corinth, which would probably have been lost but for their terrific fight, that it deserves to be described at length. We here copy the admirable description of General John W. Fuller, read at the brigade reunion on the sixteenth anniversary of the battle:

On the morning of October 3d, just sixteen years ago to-day, the enemy attacked the division of General Davies at the outer line of works, the line constructed by the rebels when Sidney Johnson and Beauregard held possession of the town. Davies had been ordered there to retard the enemy's advance, until Rosy should be ready to let Van Dorn come in. Van Dorn's superior strength enabled him to drive Davies from this line, but Davies' men fought stubbornly, and fell back over that two or three miles so slowly, that it was near night when they approached the outskirts of the town, and when reinforcements enabled Davies to stop the enemy's advance. After dark the Ohio brigade marched to relieve one of the brigades of Davies' division, and was ordered to occupy the high ground near battery Robinet. Near the crest was formed the line of battle. Directly on the right of the earthwork covering the battery, and stretching across the Chewalla road, stood the men of the Sixty-third; next came the Twenty-seventh, and farther still to the right was the Thirty-ninth regiment. On the left of the battery, facing to the left, and nearly at right angles with the main line, rested the Forty-third.

Let us go back through the intervening years, and in fancy place ourselves on the spot then occupied, and look again over that field which has since been famous. Before you, for three hundred yards, lie in confusion the few trees which have been felled to form a partial abattis. Beyond this stands the forest, and through both, leads, without obstruction, the road to Chewalla. To the right of the Thirty-ninth the line of battle is broken for three hundred yards, by an impassable swamp, beyond which we see the rising ground occupied by several brigades of our infantry, and on the extreme right, perhaps a mile away, the earthwork called Fort Richardson. Turning to look over your right shoulder, you may see what transpires in the streets of Corinth. Without changing your position you may, by looking over the other shoulder, see a part of the division of General McKean, and the redoubt called Battery Phillips, which form the left of Rosecrans' line of battle. If you come to a right about, you see directly in rear the cut through the hill where lies the Memphis railroad, and just over this, on still higher ground, stands Fort Williams, with a twenty pounder Parrot looking out of each embrasure. Your own batteries, company F, of Second United States, and company C, of First Michigan artillery, are ready for action on the high ground abreast of Fort Williams; all apparently so near, that but for their elevated position you might look down the cannons' throats. Here you waited during the long hours of the night of October 3d, and here you fought on the morning of the fourth.

The removal of Davies' skirmish line, which by some mistake was not made known to us, permitted the enemy to advance so closely that, although hidden by the darkness, you could hear him planting his guns in the edge of the forest, not more than three hundred yards in our front; and during the night the commander of that battery (I think from New Orleans) reconnoitering the ground between his guns and your line, was quietly captured, mounted though he was, by Captain (since General) Brown, of the Sixty-third Ohio.

*The first slave ever manumitted under the order of President Lincoln, to manumit slaves escaping from the rebel armies to the Union lines, was a body servant of General Jeff Thompson, who came to the lines of the Sixty-third at New Madrid and was manumitted by order of General David S. Stanley. The manumitted contraband was afterward taken to Ohio by General Sprague.

†During the time of the Sixty-third's service before Corinth the Eighth Wisconsin regiment was attached to Stanley's division, and the eagle, Old Abe, was a companion in arms of the boys of the Ohio brigade.

It was a night of suspense and anxiety to all. We knew that General Hackleman had been killed, and we had seen General Oglesby carried to the rear, with a wound we supposed was mortal. Hundreds more, wounded during the day's fight, had been borne to the hospitals, and the men of Davies' division, who had fought against great odds all day had been slowly driven back, seemed well nigh disheartened. You knew you had to meet an enemy not only strong and resolute, but who was also flushed with what he thought a victory. Hence you listened with anxiety to those sounds of preparation, so plainly heard from the hill, where, lying down without sleep, you waited for the assault. It seems strange, in view of the rapid and thorough mode of entrenching afterward acquired, that no attempt was made to fortify, especially since we now know how much superior the enemy was in numbers. But we had not then learned the use of spades.

With the earliest dawn of day, the rebel battery in front opens its fire. What a magnificent display! Nothing you had ever seen looked like the flashes of those guns! No rockets ever scattered fire like the bursting of those shells! Not long, however, for as soon as there is light enough to aim, the twenty-pounder Parrots in Fort Williams suddenly belch forth and make the place occupied by the rebel battery so hot that it is hurriedly withdrawn. Yet not all, for one gun has been abandoned, and some venturesome boys of the Sixty-third Ohio, with others of the First United States infantry, run forward, and pull it into our lines by hand.* Then came fierce fighting between the skirmishers. The enemy had the cover of the woods, while our men crept from log to log, in the endeavor to gain the better cover of the forest. Reinforcements to our skirmishers enabled them, after two hours' fighting to drive the rebels back, and gave the shelter sought; but not far off, the conformation of the ground was peculiarly fortunate for the enemy. He could lie on the crest of a series of ridges and sweep everything in his front, scarcely exposing a man to view. Behind these ridges he was massing his men for the assault.

About ten or eleven o'clock, our attention is diverted from the fierce skirmish in our immediate front by the advance of General Price's divisions, which are moving out of the woods to our right front, and marching upon the troops and fort which form the right of Rosecrans' line of battle. A splendid sight is that, as one rebel brigade after another moves in fine style over the ground which our position overlooks so plainly. The attack is fierce, and we soon are shocked to see our line give way and retire into the very town. We notice, too, some of our batteries drawn out of position and rapidly pulled to the rear. The guns of Fort Williams, and of our own batteries directly in our rear, are all turned to the right, and an enfilading fire sweeps through the rebel hosts with an effect very plainly visible; but, though disordered somewhat, they move on; fresh troops pour out of the woods, and we see the rebels rushing over the works on our right, and pouring into Corinth itself. A rolling fire is heard in the streets, and soon after the rebels begin to retire. They stand awhile at the works they had captured, but our boys are coming to the front again from the town. At this juncture, some regiments of Hamilton's division, not previously engaged, are thrown forward on the extreme right, where, as finely aligned as if on parade, they are pouring a stream of lead into the rebel ranks. A little later, we say to each other, most joyously, "Our boys are driving them back again."

But a fiercer fire than ever opens on our own skirmish line, and a constant hum of bullets tells us that our turn is coming now; and it proves to be the rebel centre moving for the main attack upon the place we occupy. Looking through the trees before us, we plainly see the rebel banners and their attacking columns advancing. The Forty-third changes front forward on its right company, and the Eleventh Missouri is rapidly brought forward and held in reserve, just behind the Sixty-third Ohio. Our skirmishers are driven back pell mell upon the line of battle; the artillery with us in Robinet, and the guns which play over our heads from the rear are firing rapidly, and some of your officers are running along the line ordering you to "Get down, and lie low, until they are close upon us." In another minute the head of a rebel column, coming along the Chewalla road, is seen near by, heading straight for the Sixty-third and Battery Robinet. Now you rise to your feet, and pour into the enemy that steady fire which fills the road with his dead, and seems to cause a halt; for, though the rear of his column moves steadily on, the head of it comes no nearer, but appears to melt away. But the enemy is firing too. Along the whole length of the Sixty-third, and portions of the Twenty-seventh and Forty-third, officers and men are falling fast.

Some scenes here witnessed, though almost as brief as if revealed by a flash of lightning, are stamped indelibly upon our memories. Just where the Sixty-third adjoins the Twenty-seventh, three men go down together. One, in the front rank, is lifting his arms high in the air and slowly sinking down. The man behind, and covering the first, drops as if a thunderbolt had struck him; while another turns around, and with a look of agony upon his face, and trying to walk to the rear, moves but a step and falls. Captain McFadden, of the Sixty-third, shouts out his first command in battle and is dead! Lieutenant Webb, of the Twenty-seventh, endeavors to repeat the order to "fire low," and while his mouth is opened wide, a bullet enters. He throws up his hands, and falling on his face is still forever! But the men not hit, heed nothing; they fire incessantly, and their faces black with powder, make noticeable their flashing eyes and set teeth, so that they look like demons.

A minute later the column in the Chewalla road has disappeared, but a strong force a little farther to the west, is approaching the left of Robinet, and is making sad havoc in the ranks of the Forty-third. This regiment has hardly finished its manœuvre of changing front, obstructed as is the field with logs and brush, and exposed moreover to a flank fire from the Chewalla road. A glance in their direction reveals a startling picture! Colonel Kirby Smith, commander of the regiment, is down, rider and horse together. Some men now raise him up; his face falls over towards us, and we see his cheek is red with blood. Lieutenant Heyl, the adjutant, trying to keep his saddle, clutches his horse's mane, but gradually loses grip, and before a comrade with outstretched arms can reach him, he is on the ground. A dozen more along the line drop in that instant, and the enemy's fire, from front and flank, is so severe that for a moment a rout is feared; but only for a moment, for Swayne here takes command of the regiment and is steadying the line, and General Stanley, who rode over to the right when he thought that all the fighting was to be done there, gallops back in the nick of time to help. His coming at that critical moment seemed like the arrival of reinforcements. And now this regiment takes sudden vengeance for its colonel's fall; for they drive back with great slaughter, the force which approaches to the left of Robinet, and shoot every rebel who shows his head above the parapet or tries to climb through the embrasures of the battery, when the final effort is made very soon thereafter, to carry the work by storm.

While the Forty-third is thus engaged, Colonel Rogers, commanding the Texan brigade, rides out from the woods, and with his troops moves along the Chewalla road heading for the battery and the Sixty-third. Another moment, his horse is shot and he is coming along the road on foot. His leading color-sergeant falls, when Rogers, picking up the colors, continues to advance with flag in hand. A cloud of rebel skirmishers on either side of the road are firing heavily on the Sixty-third and left wing of the Twenty-seventh, until forty-eight per cent. of the men of the former regiment are killed or wounded, and the line is so much thinned that Colonel Sprague and I, standing behind, can look right through it, and distinctly see the advancing rebels, now close at hand.

I shall always recollect how well Sprague looked at that eventful moment. Tall, and commanding in appearance, with sword in one hand and pistol in the other, he stood as a painter likes to portray an officer in battle. I shall remember, too, looking at the face of the rebel Colonel Rogers, when not distant more than thirty yards, and noting the peculiar expression it bore. He looked neither to the right nor left, neither at his own men nor at mine; but with eyes partly closed, like one in a hail-storm, was marching slowly and steadily upon us; and there flashed through my mind this question, "Is he stupid with drink, or is he simply resolved to calmly meet a fate which he foresees?" Before there was time to answer to myself the question, the rebel column in the road seemed to gain some tremendous impetus from the rear, for it suddenly rushed on like a great wave, threatening to sweep into the gap which had been shot through the Sixty-third, and to carry the redoubt by storm. The supreme moment had now come; and I turned to give the signal to the Eleventh Missouri, in reserve, and close behind. The leader of this regiment, perhaps ten minutes earlier, had received his orders; they had been sung out over the heads of his men, so that every soldier in the ranks knew what was wanted, and there was no need to repeat them now. "Forward!" shouted the major, as the regiment sprang up, and I had to run to the right to let them pass. With a short quick step, and alignment perfect, they filled up the gap which the enemy's fire had made, charging the rebel column on the head. The Twenty-seventh, under Spaulding, which had lost heavily, yet still was full of fight, joined by the plucky remnant of the Sixty-third, rushed forward at the same moment, falling the column obliquely on its left flank, when in an instant the whole scene changed. Rogers, with many of his men, lay dead before us, and those who were not prisoners, were flying back to the woods.* One moment, the rebels seemed to be swarming over us in thousands, our own lines looked thin and weak, we seemed threatened with destruction; the next, most of the living of the foremost rebels were our prisoners, a few hundreds, apparently, were running to the forest, while our boys seemed to have swelled into many thousands.

*Company's B and G.

In the melee this banner of the enemy [pointing to a captured flag displayed in rear of the speaker], was captured by a private of the Twenty-seventh Ohio, Orrin B. Gould, of company G, who I am glad to see is here to-night. But there was one red flag, I think the banner briefly borne by Rogers, which escaped us as by a miracle. Some bold Texan had picked it up almost from beneath our feet, and throwing the staff across his shoulders, ran in a zig-zag manner for the woods. He dodged behind a log a moment here, then behind a stump there; he was fired at by twenty men or more, and once, whether hit or not, tumbled headlong when striding a fallen tree. Yet he escaped with the banner after all; and as he passed over the ridge out of our sight, some of our boys who had missed him, gave him the cheer that was due a hero.

An incident may here be mentioned of the Forty-third. When the rebels made their final effort to break through our lines, Lieutenant Robinet, of the battery, severely wounded in the head, fell senseless under one of his guns. At this, most of his men ran to the rear. A moment later, some of the men of company A, of the Forty-third, entered the battery, and aided the few brave fellows who had stood their ground, to man the guns. The enemy was now retreating, and, in the excitement, a little drummer passed directly before the battery and jumped upon a log to see the rebels run. A piece had just been sighted and "ready, fire," followed before the little fellow was discovered. When the smoke cleared up, we saw that both his legs were torn away. Somehow there seemed a sting in the recollection that men of his own regiment had fired this shot. And now came Colonel Noyes, of the Thirty-ninth, who was so far to the right that his men could only get an oblique fire, asking permission to bring his regiment to the Chewalla road, where they could take a hand when the next assault should come. Two minutes later, the regiment was across the road, but the battle was over.

That thrill of ecstasy which victory brings, was here intensified by an act of the commanding general. Rosecrans had lost his temper when the troops attacked by Price had temporarily given way, and had hardly time to become appeased by their subsequent good conduct. Still nursing his wrath, and having seen Van Dorn had met with a different reception at the hands of this brigade, he was disposed to extol the men who fought near Robinet, at the expense of those who had fallen back. So riding to the crest we occupied and pointing to the right, he said: "I have just come from a part of the field where some of our troops retreated like old women; but now I know, not only from what I heard and what I saw from a distance, but also from these piles, of dead along your front, that I am in the presence of brave men! So brave that I take my hat off in your presence, and thank you, in our country's name, for your great valor!" No soldier who heard these words will be likely to forget them, nor the appearance of Rosecrans as he addressed us, hat in hand.

The Sixty-third entered the fight with two hundred and seventy-five men. It held its line stubbornly during the whole fight, and lost six officers and one hundred and thirty-four men, killed and wounded. After the battle, the surviving half of the regiment joined in the pursuit of Van Dorn to Ripley, where the pursuit was abandoned and the regiment returned to Corinth. It remained in camp until the second of November, when it proceeded to join Grant's army. On the route it was reenforced by a battalion of the One Hundred and Twelfth Ohio, which had been consolidated with it, and its depleted ranks filled up. On the eleventh of December it went into camp at Oxford, Mississippi. Late in the evening of the sixteenth of December, the Ohio brigade received orders to proceed to the rear and protect the lines of communication of the army, from the attacks of Van Dorn, and Forrest's cavalry. On the seventeenth of December it moved by rail to Jackson, Tennessee. Ten days were spent in marching and counter-marching, to intercept the enemy. On the twenty-seventh the regiment joined the command of General Sullivan. On the thirtieth of December Colonel Dunham with his brigade was sent to intercept Forrest at Parker's Cross Roads, and the Ohio brigade had orders to follow in the morning.

* At the time the Eleventh Missouri came up, a clean gap had been shot away between the two wings of the Sixty-third, and eighteen men joined in the charge at the left of the Eleventh Missouri, and one hundred and twenty-seven between the Eleventh Missouri and the Twenty-seventh Ohio, and at the close of the charge the Sixty-third was the most advanced of the line and was requested to all back and align with the Eleventh Missouri and the Twenty-seventh Ohio.

On December 31, 1862, at 4 o'clock A. M., the Ohio brigade moved out of its camp and marched until daylight, when it made a short halt for breakfast. Soon it is again on the move, in hunt of the raiders. Then the sound of cannon revealed to them that Forrest and Dunham are engaged, and that they were needed in the fight. In a moment the orders were given, "Unslung knapsacks!" and the road for a mile, occupied by the brigade, was strewn with knapsacks. "Brigade forward, double quick, march!" Then began a march that was worthy of the name. The old brigade went to the front to the music of the battle, on its muscle. It went for the purpose of getting there before the battle was over—and it made its legs tell.

Within an hour and a half it marched seven miles without a halt, with the ranks well closed and at a sight of the enemy deployed in line of battle on the double-quick, and within five minutes it had put Forrest's force to flight, captured six guns, four hundred horses, and three hundred and fifty men.

This record presents one of the best contests made by an infantry against a cavalry force during the war, and fitly rounded up the service of the Ohio brigade for the year 1862. The regiment pursued Forrest's retreating force to the Tennessee river, and then marched back to Corinth over rough, frozen roads, without supplies, but subsisting upon forage gathered on the route. It arrived at Corinth on the ninth of January, and went into winter quarters. Their knapsacks had been gathered and brought into camp by train, and the scene when the soldiers reclaimed their effects was ludicrous beyond description.

When General Grant moved to Vicksburgh the Sixty-third was ordered with the brigade to garrison Memphis, and proceeded there May 16, 1863, and remained there until the eighteenth of October, 1863. This was the only garrison duty done by the Ohio brigade during the war. At the latter date, it left Memphis to join the forces moving to the relief of the army of the Cumberland. On the thirteenth of November it arrived at Prospect, Tennessee. At that place, on January 2, 1864, the regiment reenlisted as veterans, and returned to their homes in Ohio on furlough. The regiment reassembled at Columbus, Ohio, February 18th, and from that point returned to Prospect, Tennessee. Early in the spring the Ohio brigade crossed the Tennessee river, and dispersed the rebel force at Decatur, Alabama. At that point it remained until it moved to join in the Atlanta campaign.

In the Atlanta campaign the Sixty-third participated in the battle of Resaca, companies A, C, and H, deployed as skirmishers, were among the first troops to reach the river at that place. On the sixteenth of May, 1864, it crossed Oostenaula, and participated in the actions at Adairsville and in and about Dallas. It sustained an important part in all the movements to dislodge the enemy from Kennesaw mountain. After the evacuation of Marietta, Georgia, the Sixty-third, with Sprague's brigade, was the extreme left of the army; on the twentieth of July moved to Decatur, Georgia, and had charge of the baggage train of the army of the Tennessee, and the twenty-first it rested quietly in Decatur, without incident to disturb it. At noon on July 22d, when the battle of that date was at its height,* Wheeler's cavalry with several batteries of artillery made a furious attack on Sprague's brigade, intending to capture it and the train. In this fight that slender brigade had a hand-to-hand contest for three hours with a superior force of rebel cavalry, and succeeded in holding its ground and safely removing the train. The regiment lost heavily in officers and men. For his gallantry and the faithful work of his men in this fight, Colonel Sprague was made brigadier general, and Lieutenant Colonel Charles F. Brown and Captain, afterwards Lieutenant Colonel, Oscar L. Jackson were brevetted brigadier generals for gallantry in battle, and the regiment was complimented by special order for its gallantry. In this battle General Brown lost his leg while at the head of the regiment, and his adjutant, Fowler, was killed. After the fall of Atlanta the regiment was in the battle of Jonesborough. At the close of the Atlanta campaign, the Sixty-third joined in Sherman's march to the sea, sharing in all the dangers and privations of that campaign. It was engaged in the action at Oliver station, and participated in all the movements resulting in the capture of Savannah. It was at the front, and on the tenth of December, 1864, it charged across the Ogeechee canal, under a heavy infantry and artillery fire, and obtained a lodgment on the Savannah side. The ground having been secured, the men stacked arms by running bayonets in the ground, removed their clothing and wrung it, and moved on to the fight; the enemy keeping up their artillery fire in the meantime. The Sixty-third entered the city of Savannah on the Twenty-first of December, and remained in and around Savannah until the first of February, 1865. At that date it moved northward, on the line of the Salkahatchee river, and on the third of February it was ordered to and made a gallant assault upon the fort at Rivers Bridges, which it was unable to reach by reason of the intervening river and swamps. At this point it remained in line of battle twenty-four hours, in water and ice from knee to waist deep, holding the enemy engaged in the fort until another force made a detour, crossed the river and turned the fort, when it was abandoned. It then proceeded northward and entered Columbia, South Carolina, on the seventeenth day of February. It continued its march with the army in a northeasterly direction, through the Carolinas; and it participated in the battle of Bentonville, the last battle of the war, and sustained its well earned reputation. On the thirty-first day of March the regiment had a lively skirmish with the enemy. The Sixty-third had shared, and born a conspicuous part in all the great campaigns of the west, in Sherman's march to the sea, and in his campaign through the Carolinas. After the surrender of Johnston it proceeded northward from Raleigh by Petersburg, Richmond and Fredericksburgh to Alexandria. Thus after sharing all the campaigns of the west, it had the privilege as a victor of marching over the battle-grounds of the east, where all the great campaigns of the army of the Potomac were fought—and in its marches it had tramped the whole battle-ground of the war. It had fought in the lines with the infantry, and hand-to-hand successfully with the Forrest and Wheeler cavalry.

At Washington it took part in the great review, the grandest spectacle that the world ever witnessed—a veteran army in triumph, passing their country's capital, bearing their torn and battle-scarred banners, the emblems of a free and united country, eager to lay down their arms, to follow the advice and example of Washington, and pursue the avocations of peace. From Washington the regiment proceeded by railroad to Parkersburgh, West Virginia, and thence by boat to Louisville, Kentucky, where it was mustered out on the eighth day of July, A. D. 1865. It was commanded successively by Colonel John W. Sprague, Charles E. Brown, Major John W. Fouts and Captain (afterwards Lieutenant-Colonel) O. L. Jackson. Its colonel was made major-general by brevet, and Colonels Brown and Jackson brigadier generals by brevet for gallantry in action. Of the colonels of the Ohio brigade, J. L. Kirby Smith was killed, and Noyes, Swayne and Brown each lost a leg. Of its officers that became colonels of other regiments one officer deserves special mention. Surgeon Arthur B. Monahan was always conspicuous for his humane, gallant and soldierly bearing. Whenever his regiment was in action, Surgeon Monahan was at the front, and the unfortunate wounded received immediate care and attention. Thus was many a life saved by his untiring devotion.

The Sixty-third is proud that it was one of the regiments of a brigade that tramped the farthest of any in the army—a brigade that never turned its back to the enemy. It is proud of its battle flag* and colors, and their staves bearing the names of New Madrid, Island Ten, Farrington, Corinth, Iuka, Hatchie, Parker's Cross Roads, Decatur, Alabama, Resaca, Dallas, Kennesaw Mountain, Marietta, Decatur, Georgia, Siege of Atlanta, Jonesborough, Savannah, Rivers Bridges, and Bentonville,† Raleigh.

*Of the battle flag of the Sixty-third that was once composed of the beautiful blue silk, with a silk embroidered eagle with spread wings, there remains but the fringe that adorned it when new, and about one foot square of the flag, near the spear point of the staff. The colors, torn and rent, still bear the names of their first battles (the latter ones being inscribed on the staff), and are stained with the blood of one of the color bearers.

†The Sixty-third in the Atlanta, Savannah and Carolina campaigns belonged to the first division of the Seventeenth army corps, army of the Tennessee. Its corps badge is an arrow legend "swift and certain."

*It was in this battle that McPherson fell, near the Thirty-ninth Ohio, in the lines of the Ohio brigade.

COMPANY F, SEVENTY-THIRD OHIO VOLUNTEERS.

REGIMENTAL OFFICERS.

Colonel Orland Smith, mustered October 3, 1861, resigned February 17, 1864; Colonel Richard Long, February 17, 1864, resigned June 27, 1864; Colonel Samuel H. Hurst, July 13, 1864, not mustered, appointed colonel by brevet March 13, 1865; Lieutenant colonel Jacob Hyer, October 3, 1861, resigned June 21, 1862, brigadier general by brevet March 13, 1865; Lieutenant Colonel Richard Long, June 21, 1862, promoted to colonel; Lieutenant Colonel Samuel H. Hurst, February 17, 1864, promoted to colonel; Lieutenant Colonel Thomas W. Higgins, July 13, 1864, mustered out as major; Major Richard Long, December 20, 1861, promoted to lieutenant colonel; Major Samuel H. Hurst, June 21, 1862, promoted to lieutenant colonel; Major Thomas W. Higgins, November 5, 1862, promoted to lieutenant colonel; Major Thomas Lucas, July 13, 1864, resigned as captain September 11, 1864; Major Abishai Downing, July 17, 1865, mustered out as captain; Surgeon Jonas P. Safford, October 26, 1861, dismissed February 18, 1863; Surgeon Isaac N. Hines, December 31, 1862, mustered out at expiration of term; Surgeon John C. Preston, February 1, 1865, mustered out with regiment; Assistant Surgeon Isaac N. Hines, October 26, 1861, promoted to surgeon February 1, 1863; Assistant Surgeon James Segaford, August 15, 1862, resigned October 24, 1862; Assistant Surgeon William Richardson, March 18, 1863, resigned June 27, 1864; Assistant Surgeon John C. Preston, March 19, 1863, promoted to surgeon; Assistant Surgeon Smith D. Steer, February 1, 1865, mustered out with regiment; Chaplain Joseph Hill, March 13, 1862, resigned December 17, 1862; Chaplain James R. Stilwell, June 20, 1865; Adjutant Frederick C. Smith, December 26, 1861, died April 25, 1862; Adjutant John Spence, March 1, 1863, resigned May 16, 1864; Adjutant John B. Smith, June 1, 1865, mustered out with regiment; Quartermaster William D. Wesson, October 22, 1861, commissary of subsistence July 17, 1862; Quartermaster Robert M. Rodgers, November 20, 1862, resigned November 5, 1863; Quartermaster William H. Eckman, May 11, 1864, resigned March 30, 1865; Quartermaster James Earl, March 27, 1865, served full term.

OFFICERS OF COMPANY F.

Captain Thomas Lucas, November 20, 1861, promoted to major; Captain George M. Doherty, January 1, 1863, died July 13, 1863; First Lieutenant Charles W. Stone, July 1, 1863, resigned July 5, 1864; First Lieutenant George M. Doherty, November 20, 1861, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant John Burke, March 28, 1865, served full term; First Lieutenant James Ross, May 1, 1865, served full term; Second Lieutenant John Mitchell, November 20, 1861, resigned December 23, 1862; Second Lieutenant Charles W. Stone, December 23, 1862, promoted to first lieutenant.

In September, 1861, Captain Orland Smith of the "Chillicothe Greys" was invited to take the colonelcy of a new regiment proposed to be organized, and Jacob Hyer was tendered the lieutenant colonelcy; both accepted, and the new organization became the gallant Seventy-third Ohio volunteer infantry. Company F of this regiment was raised mainly in old Washington county by Captain Thomas Lucas, and lacking sufficient men to raise it to the maximum number, he took the company to Chillicothe, where they were joined by a fragmentary company under George M. Doherty, who became first lieutenant, and John Mitchell, second lieutenant.

The other companies came from Ross, Highland, Pickaway, Jackson, Pike, and Athens counties. It is needless in the space allotted us to go into separate history of company F. Its history is so closely identified with that of the glorious old Seventy-third—that what we shall say of the regiment will include the company.

Few regiments had the fortune to participate in so many and so desperate engagements as this regiment. Starting as they did so early in the war and drifting almost at once into the great army of the Potomac, they soon became familiar with great armies, great battles and great commanders. Company F, was organized November 20, 1861, at Camp Logan near Chillicothe, and January 24, 1862, the regiment was ordered to West Virginia. Arriving at Fetterman, they there met the Fifty-fifth, Seventy-fifth, and Eighty-second Ohio regiments, also just entering active service. On the third of February, the Seventy-third and Fifty-fifth Ohio moved to New Creek, where they found three regiments of Virginia infantry, a battery and a detachment of cavalry. They engaged the enemy at Moorfield for the first time, February 13th and 14th, driving him out, and were then ordered to Clarksburgh, where they remained a month, when they went to Weston, where they remained three weeks, and then were ordered to cross the mountains and join Milroy, who took up a position at McDowell, near Bull Pasture river, where, on May 8th, was fought the battle of McDowell, in which the Union forces were outnumbered and compelled to retreat.

General Fremont soon took command of the "Army of the Mountains," and the Seventy-third joined its fortunes to that army at Franklin. On May 25th, General Fremont's army left for the Shenandoah valley to engage "Stonewall" Jackson, who was driving General Banks' army down the valley. Then followed the battle of Cross Keys, the retreat of the enemy and the return of Fremont to Strasburgh and finally to Middletown, where the regiment had a chance to rest and recuperate. While here Fremont was superseded by Siegel, and the "Army of the Mountains" became the First corps army of Virginia. General Schenck was placed in command of the division, and Colonel N. C. McLean of the Seventy-fifth Ohio became commander of the brigade to which the Seventy-third was assigned, including the Fifty-fifth, Seventy-third, Seventy-fifth and Twenty-fifth Ohio regiments. On the seventh of July, they were in motion, and crossed the Blue Ridge, encamping on the eastern side at Sperryville. At the battle of Cedar Mountain, July 9th, the Seventy-third came up in the night, went into position in line of battle and awaited the dawn of day, to join in the engagement, but the enemy did not wait for them. August 24th, at the battle of Freeman's Ford, the Seventy-third supported the principal battery engaged in that famous artillery duel. At the second battle of Bull Run, August 28th and 29th the Seventy-third took a prominent part, going into the engagement with three hundred and twelve men and losing one hundred and forty-four killed and wounded, besides twenty prisoners, leaving one hundred and forty-eight for duty.

At the battle of Fredericksburgh, the regiment was held in reserve and did not participate. In January, 1863, they were again on the war path, this time with "Burnside stuck in the mud" in his memorable "mud march" on Fredericksburgh and masterly retreat.

General O. O. Howard now took command of the First corps, superseding General Siegel at his own request, and the corps name was changed to Eleventh corps army of the Potomac. General Barlow succeeded Colonel Smith in the command of the brigade. General Hooker now effected a thorough reorganization of the entire army, and armed and equipped them thoroughly. The work occupied the months of February, March and April, and the army of the Potomac, one hundred thousand strong at that time seemed capable of sweeping everything before it.

Eng<sup>d</sup> by A. H. Ritchie

Jewett Palmer

Then came the battle of Chancellorsville, May 2d, and the disheartening "fall back" across the Rappahannock. Then the race between Lee and Hooker for the north, Lee seeking to out-march and distance Hooker, and the latter bent on heading him off. Meanwhile Mead superseded Hooker, and on July 2d the two great armies confronted each other at Gettysburg, in which three days of tremendous engagements the Seventy-third lost half its number, among the rest Lieutenant G. M. Doherty, of company F. The regiment, with the rest of the victorious army now returned to Virginia.

September 24th the Eleventh and Twelfth corps were ordered to Bridgeport, Alabama, to reenforce the army of the Tennessee, and the whole force of twenty thousand men was transferred by rail in five days, arriving September 30th. They then marched up the Tennessee and joined General Thomas near Brown's Ferry. On October 27th, at about midnight the enemy made an attack on General Geary and the Twelfth corps at Wauhatchie, Tennessee, and the Seventy-third with the division was ordered to their support. The Seventy-third and Thirty-third Massachusetts regiments being in advance, and coming onto the rebels charged up a steep and difficult hill, and upon arriving at the top were received with a deadly fire; but nothing daunted, they fixed bayonets and charged, driving the enemy in confusion from their entrenched position, breaking the rebel line, and compelling the entire attacking force to retire from Geary's position. Indeed, as soon as the Seventy-third Ohio and Thirty-third Massachusetts opened their fire the rebel fire on Geary's line fell off. The conduct of the Seventy-third on this occasion was characterized in the official dispatches of General Grant as "one of the most daring feats of arms of the war."

In the battle of Mission Ridge the Seventy-third formed a part of General O. O. Howard's corps that was pushed out on the left to make a junction with Sherman, and took position on the banks of the Chickamauga, on Sherman's extreme left. Meanwhile Thomas and Hooker had made their famous charge and captured the ridge. On January 4th the regiment went home on veteran furlough.

Upon its return the Seventy-third regiment was assigned to the Third brigade (Wood's), Third division (Butterfield's), and Twentieth corps (Hooper's) army of the Cumberland. The Seventy-third took part in the great Atlanta campaign, and in the battle of Resaca so acquitted itself as to be complimented by the division commander for brilliant conduct.

In the battle of New Hope Church, they occupied the extreme left, and, though in an exposed position and suffering severely, held their position until nightfall, losing three officers and seventy-two men in killed and wounded.

Around Kennesaw Mountain the Seventy-third was in several severe engagements, losing heavily; in front of Marietta, Georgia, sixteen, and in another engagement nineteen men in killed and wounded. On June 20th, they engaged in the battle of Peach Tree Creek, losing eighteen men. The rebels were now hotly besieged in Atlanta, and the Seventy-third was constantly under fire and in the front line of works. Upon the evacuation, two companies of the Seventy-third, forming part of a reconnaissance, were the first troops to enter the city. In this campaign of one hundred and twenty days, the regiment had been under fire one hundred and three days, and lost two hundred and ten men and eight officers out of less than three hundred and fifty.

On November 15th, they started with Sherman on his memorable "March to the Sea," being in the Twentieth corps, under General Williams, and, in the left wing, commanded by General Slocum. The regiment reached Savannah without firing a shot.

January 2, 1865, the regiment crossed the Savannah into South Carolina, and entered upon its last campaign. At the battle of Averysborough the Seventy-third engaged the enemy, losing fifteen wounded.

On Sunday, March 19th, they took part in the battle of Bentonville, the last engagement of the war, losing five men killed, and four officers and twenty-one men wounded.

After the march to Washington and the grand review, the Seventy-third was sent to Louisville, and on July 20th was mustered out, and returning to Camp Dennison, Ohio, was there finally paid off and discharged July 24th, after a service of three years and eight months.

It was always in actual service, never at posts or guarding communications. It marched several thousand miles, participated in twenty battles, not to speak of numerous skirmishes. On three occasions, in connection with its brigade, its behavior in battle decided the fortunes of the day. Its discipline and drill were uniformly the subject of remark in its brigade and division. As proof of its gallantry and services, out of a little more than twelve hundred members, including recruits, two hundred and eighty-five sleep beneath the sod, and five hundred and sixty-eight are now bearing about the scars of honorable combat, many of them crippled for life.<sup>1</sup>

CASUALTIES.

Killed in battle, 95; died of wounds, 61; died of disease, etc., 129; dead of the regiment, 285; wounded, not fatally, 568.

SEVENTY-SEVENTH OHIO VOLUNTEER INFANTRY.

REGIMENTAL OFFICERS.

Colonel Jesse Hildebrand, mustered October 5, 1861, died April 18, 1863; Colonel William B. Mason, April 18, 1863, mustered out December 31, 1864; Colonel William E. Stevens*, March 7, 1866, mustered out as lieutenant colonel; Lieutenant Colonel Wills De Hassell, October 5, 1861, dismissed February 16, 1864; Lieutenant Colonel William E. Stevens, March 19, 1864, promoted to colonel; Lieutenant Colonel Charles H. Morris*, March 7, 1866, mustered out as captain; Major Benjamin D. Fearing, December 17, 1861, appointed lieutenant colonel Ninety-second Ohio volunteer infantry, August 26, 1862; Major William B. Mason, August 26, 1862, promoted to colonel; Major Louis E. Sisson, March 19, 1864, mustered out December 10, 1864; Major Charles H. Morris, November 14, 1865, promoted to lieutenant colonel; Major Robert E. Smithson, March 7, 1866, mustered out as captain; Surgeon James W. Warfield,† February 3, 1862, honorably discharged May 15, 1864; Surgeon Andrew Wall,§ August 11, 1864, mustered out with regiment; Assistant Surgeon Pardon Cook, October 29, 1861, died August 31, 1863; Assistant Surgeon Andrew Wall, September 8, 1862, promoted to surgeon; Assistant Surgeon Yearsley H. Jones, September 17, 1864, mustered out December 31, 1864; Chaplain William Pearce, January 4, 1862, resigned August 31, 1862; Chaplain James T. Holliday, July 13, 1864, mustered out December 31, 1864.

<sup>1</sup> Ohio in the War.

COMPANY OFFICERS.

Captain William E. Stevens, company A, November 23, 1861, promoted to major; Captain William B. Mason, B, December 2, 1861, promoted to major; Captain Louis E. Sisson, C, December 10, 1861, promoted to major; Captain Enoch W. Blasdel, D, December 12, 1861, resigned February 25, 1863; Captain Andrew Smith, † E, December 12, 1861, resigned February 5, 1863; Captain James H. Lutgen, ‡ F, December 31, 1861, resigned March 16, 1864; Captain Andrew W. McCormick, G, December 31, 1861, brevet lieutenant colonel mustered out March 12, 1865; Captain Richard Fouraker, H, December 31, 1861, resigned September 2, 1862; Captain William P. Robinson, I, December 31, 1861, mustered out December 27, 1864; Captain Albert Chandler, K, January 4, 1862, mustered out January 3, 1865; Captain Isaac B. Kinkead, K, April 8, 1862, mustered out April 18, 1863; Captain Robert H. McKittrick, B, August 26, 1862, mustered out August 27, 1865; Captain Thomas Ross, H, September 2, 1862, dismissed March 29, 1864; Captain Thomas Garrett, † E, February 6, 1863, mustered out December 12, 1864; Captain Samuel S. McNaughton, D, February 25, 1863, mustered out January 16, 1865; Captain Charles H. Morris, A, April 18, 1863, promoted to major; Captain Thomas Mitchell, H, March 19, 1864, resigned December 9, 1864; Captain William H. Fisher, K, March 29, 1865, mustered out as first lieutenant March 5, 1865; Captain William W. Scott, C, March 29, 1865, resigned December 1, 1865; Captain Robert E. Smithson, E, March 29, 1865, promoted to major; Captain Samuel Fulton,* F, March 29, 1865, mustered out with regiment; Captain Robert H. Flemming, D, March 29, 1865, mustered out with regiment; Captain Henry L. Pugh, B, September 29, 1865, mustered out with regiment; Captain John L. McIntyre, E, November 14, 1865, mustered out with regiment as first lieutenant; Captain Leonard A. Marlow, C, December 30, 1865, mustered out with regiment; Captain Gordon B. West, E, March 7, 1866, mustered out as first lieutenant and regimental quartermaster; First Lieutenant Harvey Anderson,* A, November 23, 1861, resigned February 13, 1863; First Lieutenant Robert H. McKittrick, B, December 2, 1861, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant Thomas Mitchell, C, December 2, 1861, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant John Henricle, D, December 2, 1861, resigned September 20, 1862; First Lieutenant Thomas Garrett, E, December 2, 1861, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant Hershel B. White, ‡ F, December 2, 1861, discharged October 21, 1862; First Lieutenant Samuel S. McNaughton, G, December 2, 1861, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant William W. Scott, H, December 2, 1861, discharged August 31, 1862; First Lieutenant Horatio W. Mason, H, January 4, 1862, resigned March 6, 1862; First Lieutenant William West, regimental quartermaster, October 15, 1861, resigned June 5, 1862; First Lieutenant Thomas J. Cochran, adjutant, November 25, 1861, resigned October 6, 1862; First Lieutenant William H. Fisher, F, March 6, 1862, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant Thomas Ross H, March 27, 1862, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant Edgar B. Pearce, regimental quartermaster, June 5, 1862, mustered out December 31, 1864; First Lieutenant David F. Jones, B, August 26, 1862, mustered out December 10, 1864; First Lieutenant William P. Richner,* D, September 20, 1862, mustered out December 11, 1864; First Lieutenant Marion N. Burris, adjutant, October 6, 1862, resigned July 15, 1863; First Lieutenant Edward R. Moore, D, August 31, 1862, discharged August 1, 1863; First Lieutenant Hanson Criswell, † E, August 2, 1862, resigned June 26, 1863; First Lieutenant David A. Henery, F, October 31, 1862, resigned December 9, 1864; First Lieutenant William W. Scott, I, February 5, 1863, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant Charles A. Morris, A, February 13, 1863, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant Robert E. Smithson, G, February 25, 1863, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant Samuel Fulton, A, April 18, 1863, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant Charles J. Eagles, B, March 19, 1864, resigned December 9, 1864; First Lieutenant Henry L. Pugh, F, March 19, 1864, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant Robert H. Flemming, D, August 1, 1863, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant Nathan B. Smith, K, March 19, 1864, resigned as second lieutenant July 7, 1865, not mustered as first lieutenant; First Lieutenant John L. McIntyre, E, March 29, 1865, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant Leonard A. Marlow, C, March 29, 1865, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant Gordon B. West, G, March 29, 1865, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant Robert C. Berry, H, March 29, 1865, mustered out June 28, 1865; First Lieutenant Augustus McCarty, F, March 29, 1865, never mustered as lieutenant; First Lieutenant William W. Burris, C, March 29, 1865, mustered out with regiment; First Lieutenant Joseph M. Mitchell, A, March 29, 1865, mustered out with regiment; First Lieutenant William M. Atkinson, B, March 29, 1865, mustered out with regiment; First Lieutenant Benjamin T. Hill,* September 29, 1865, mustered out with regiment as first lieutenant and adjutant; First Lieutenant Henry H. Dye, November 14, 1865, resigned October 10, 1865, as second lieutenant; First Lieutenant William A. Day, E, November 16, 1865, mustered out with regiment as second lieutenant; First Lieutenant John Smith, ‡ K, December 30, 1865, mustered out with regiment as second lieutenant; First Lieutenant Thomas Wiseman, C, December 30, 1865, mustered out with regiment; First Lieutenant James P. Daugherty, March 7, 1866, mustered out with regiment as second lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Joseph J. Steenrod,* A, November 23, 1861, killed April 8, 1862; Second Lieutenant David F. Jones, B, December 2, 1861, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Marion N. Burris, C, December 10, 1861, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Edward R. Moore, D, December 12, 1861, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Hanson Criswell, † E, December 12, 1861, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Oliphant S. Thomas,* G, December 10, 1861, died May 31, 1862; Second Lieutenant David A. Henery, ‡ F, December 21, 1861, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Levi J. Fouraker, H, December 31, 1861, discharged October 21, 1863; Second Lieutenant Henry Hobletzell, † I, December 31, 1861, dismissed January 8, 1863; Second Lieutenant William H. Fisher, ‡ K, November 5, 1861, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Robert B. Griggs, K, March 6, 1862, discharged August 5, 1862; Second Lieutenant Charles H. Morris, A, April 8, 1862, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Thomas R. Campbell, B, August 26, 1862, died September 25, 1862; Second Lieutenant Robert E. Smithson, G, May 31, 1862, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Charles J. Eagler, B, August 26, 1862, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Jesse Hildebrand, jr., H, October 21, 1862, resigned January 23, 1864; Second Lieutenant Henry L. Pugh, F, August 26, 1862, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Nathan B. Smith, ‡ K, October 21, 1862, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Gordon B. West, G, February 11, 1863, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant John L. McIntyre, † G, January 1, 1863, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Jesse S. Province, I, May 1, 1862, mustered out December 27, 1864; Second Lieutenant Isaac B. Kinkead, K, November 1, 1862, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Samuel Fulton, A, February 13, 1863, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Robert H. Flemming, D, February 25, 1863, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Leonard A. Marlow, C, January 1, 1863, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Robert C. Berry, A, April 18, 1863, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant William E. Smithson, B, November 1, 1863, mustered out December 11, 1864; Second Lieutenant Benjamin T. Hill, adjutant, March 29, 1865, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Henry H. Dye, H, March 29, 1865, resigned October 10, 1865; Second Lieutenant William A. Day, E, March 29, 1865, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant John Smith, March 29, 1865, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Thomas Wiseman, C, May 31, 1865, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Joseph M. Mitchell, E, March 29, 1865, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant William W. Burris, A, June 29, 1865, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Henry H. Clindenst, September 29, 1865, never mustered; Second Lieutenant Gamaliel J. Lund, B, November 14, 1865, mustered out with regiment as sergeant; Second Lieutenant Jeremiah Fish, † November 14, 1865, mustered out with regiment as sergeant; Second Lieutenant James P. Daugherty, November 14, 1865, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant William H. Hose, November 14, 1862, mustered out with regiment; Second Lieutenant William H. Hanson, G, November 16, 1865, mustered out with regiment as sergeant; Second Lieutenant Christopher Black,* December 30, 1865, mustered out with regiment as sergeant; Second Lieutenant William H. Bingman, ‡ March 7, 1866, mustered out with regiment as sergeant.

Early in September, 1861, the quota of Ohio being full at the time, Governor F. Pierpont, of Virginia, commissioned Jesse Hildebrand, of Marietta, Ohio, colonel, and Wills DeHass, of Wheeling, lieutenant colonel, to raise a regiment along the Ohio river for the United States service. It was soon manifest that the men composing the regiment would be nearly all recruited in Ohio, and as the Government would now accept them, Governor Dennison proposed to Colonel Officers not from Washington county are marked: * Monroe, † Belmont, ‡ Morgan, † West Virginia, § Cambridge, Ohio.

Hildebrand to enter the Ohio service, which proposition was accepted, and the organization was made the Seventy-seventh regiment of Ohio infantry. Recruiting officers were appointed October 10th, and the place of rendezvous was Camp Tupper, Marietta. With the exception of company A from Monroe county, company E from Belmont county, and company F from Morgan county, all the companies of the regiment were almost entirely composed of Washington county men—there being some recruits from Monroe and Noble counties in several of them.

By the last of December the regiment was full and many men recruited for it were transferred to the Sixty-third Ohio infantry. On the ninth of January, 1862, the Seventy-seventh left Marietta for camp Dennison, where the regiment was engaged in drilling until the seventeenth of February, when it was ordered to Cincinnati, and at once embarked on transports for Paducah, Kentucky, for service on the Tennessee. Landing at Paducah on the twentieth, it was assigned to General W. T. Sherman's division. After drilling and doing guard duty without arms till the ninth of March, it was armed and brigaded with the Fifty-third and Fifty-seventh Ohio and Fifth cavalry regiments, and embarked on transports for Pittsburgh Landing and other points on the Tennessee. Colonel Hildebrand being in command of the brigade, and Lieutenant Colonel DeHass absent, the regiment was under command of Major Benjamin D. Fearing. The regiment joined in the expedition to cut the enemy's communications by destroying the Memphis & Charleston railroad, and landed at the mouth of Yellow creek March 14th; but the heavy rains and the position of the enemy rendering this impracticable, the expedition returned next day and disembarked at Pittsburgh Landing on the sixteenth. On the seventeenth it marched under General Sherman to near Monterey, in the direction of Corinth, where the enemy was in heavy force, and returning went into camp at Shiloh Church on the eighteenth. Still other reconnoissances towards Purdy and Corinth were made, and on the first of April the regiment moved with the division, by transports, to Eastport, Mississippi, driving the enemy from Eastport towards Iuka. After its return to Shiloh, the Third brigade, of which this regiment was a part, was encamped on the left of the Corinth road, the right of the brigade resting on the Church.

The Seventy-seventh camped on the left of the Corinth road, its right resting on Shiloh church, which was used for regimental headquarters. On Friday evening, April 4th, Captain Mason's company, B, was on picket near the Lee house, in front of Shiloh church, and plainly heard beating of drums a short distance south. They wondered whether our troops were moving towards Corinth. When daylight came they discovered that the birds, rabbits, and squirrels were coming towards them and passing through the guard line, being too much frightened to notice the pickets, thus showing that a large body was near on the south. Captain Mason at once established a few new vidette posts at favorable points of observation, and before noon a squad of gray-coated cavalry passed along the ridge, about seventy-five yards distant, several of them firing at the vidette. About two o'clock large bodies of cavalry were seen approaching the Union line, and filing off to the right, keeping under cover as much as possible. Soon after, column after column of infantry arrived at the same point, filing off to the right and left, taking up their position in line of battle. Several pieces of artillery also went into position on the ridge, just at the edge of the open field. Captain Mason, believing this display of the enemy worthy of reporting, sent Sergeant C. J. Eagler, now of Macksburgh, to inform Colonel Hildebrand just what had transpired, and then report back to the picket line. The sergeant promptly obeyed the order, and Colonel Hildebrand, brigade commander, says he at once went to division headquarters and repeated the report the captain had sent him, word for word. General Sherman ridiculed the idea of such a force being seen, and ordered the messenger arrested. In obedience to this order the colonel sent Captain Stevens, with a portion of his command, to arrest Eagler for bringing false and scary news from the front. On learning the object of his arrival, Captain Mason said to Captain Stevens: "You have not men enough to take Eagler; he has simply obeyed my orders, which he swore to do when he enlisted. Go back to headquarters and have the order changed to my arrest, for I am responsible, and have sent in the facts, as all on duty here know."

Captain Stevens returned, reporting the facts as related. Soon after, Colonel Hildebrand, with part of his staff, came out to the picket line, and, after saluting, said: "Captain Mason, what does all this mean?" He replied: "General, it means the enemy are directly in our front. Do you wish to see them? If so, ride to that little opening to the right, and about two rods in advance." He and his staff did so, accompanied by the captain, who pointed out the enemy, whom the colonel could see without the aid of a field-glass, when Colonel Hildebrand exclaimed: "My God! General Sherman has been deceived, for he told us to-day there was no enemy this side of Corinth, except some reconnoitring parties." He returned to camp, and took the precaution of doubling his picket line by detailing companies C and G, Captains Sisson and McCormick, to relieve company B, at dusk, Saturday evening. He also reported to General Sherman that he had been to the picket line, and it was true that the enemy were in our front in force, with the appearance of a determination to attack.

Notwithstanding these facts, orders were received near midnight, by company commanders of the Seventy-seventh, "Form your companies on the color-line at day-break in the morning, move to the old drill-ground, and drill one hour before breakfast." Captain Mason, receiving this order with the rest, and knowing that Colonel Hildebrand knew the facts above related, went to him, and after talking a few minutes, casually asked who originated the order for regimental drill in the morning. Colonel Hildebrand picked up a paper from his desk and observed: "This is the order of General Sherman, but we know it will be a different drill on the morrow than any of us has ever seen." That order has always been a mystery to the Seventy-seventh.

Before daylight a battalion under Major Powell passed through our picket lines, reconnoitring, and at once became engaged with the enemy's advance. An orderly was sent by Captain McCormick to brigade headquarters with a report of this fact, and the officers in command of the pickets received orders to hold their ground as long as possible, and if hard pressed to fall back slowly, which orders were strictly obeyed, the pickets becoming engaged at daybreak. This was probably the first time Ohio troops were engaged with the enemy at Shiloh, it being in fact the opening day of that bloody contest.

At daylight the regiment was on its way to the drill-ground, but after having gone a few hundred yards, was overtaken by an orderly and ordered back, to breakfast and fall into line immediately. It returned, but before breakfast was over the orders were: "Seventy-seventh, fall into line, quick! Company B will move to the front, deploy as skirmishers, and move forward to the Lee house." The regiment formed, and the skirmishers advanced rapidly across the bridge, about fifty yards in front, and were ordered by the captain to deploy to the right. In a few minutes they were directly under fire of the enemy, and many were shot down—among the first killed being that noble soldier, George A. Booth, of Marietta.

On the night of April 5th, companies C and G, under Captains Sisson and McCormick, relieved company B, Captain Mason, on the picket line. When the pickets were changed that evening, the enemy was so near that his outposts could easily be seen by our men. General Sherman had, the night before, ordered that on the morning of the sixth of April the Seventy-seventh regiment should be posted covering the open field to the right of the Lee house, near the advance picket line. In the morning it was found impossible to reach that position, as the enemy had forced the pickets to fall back, so that the skirmish line of the regiment met them between the Lee house and the creek which ran in front of the camp. The pickets were reenforced by the skirmishers, and the brigade formed in line of battle between the church and the creek, covering the road to Corinth. Here the battle opened soon after sunrise by a heavy fire of musketry on both sides, assisted on the Union side by Taylor's Chicago battery. The enemy had also artillery engaged at this point. The line of the enemy as they came down the western slope could be distinctly marked in the woods by the glitter of their polished muskets in the sunlight, and the fire was most deadly from the ponderous French rifled muskets with which the Seventy-seventh was armed. This position was held, with one slight change, for about two hours, and the valley was strewn thickly with the enemy's dead, while our losses were also heavy. After a bloody conflict of some hours, the left of the brigade was turned, and the Seventy-seventh changed position so that its left rested on the old church.

Writers of history give it the credit, in connection with the Fifty-seventh and a part of the Fifty-third, of holding the enemy so long in check at this point as to enable Sherman to save the fortunes of the day.

It was here that Colonel E. C. Dawes, a Washington county soldier, then adjutant of the Fifty-third (in connection with Captain, afterwards Colonel W. S. Jones), distinguished himself by rallying a part of his regiment and fighting bravely. The overwhelming numbers of the enemy sweeping around the left rendered it necessary, as the day advanced, after many hours of gallant fighting, for the brigade to again change to the ridge further north, contesting the ground with the foe, step by step, and losing brave men by the score. Each chosen position was, in its turn, assaulted and carried by the enemy till about the middle of the afternoon, when the line was formed and held till the conflict of the day closed with the dusk of evening.

On the morning of the seventh the regiment was promptly in line, waiting orders to move to the attack, but as General Buell's army had arrived and joined General Grant's forces, these fresh troops led the advance; and before noon the enemy were in full retreat without the Seventy-seventh being actively engaged that day—though being in supporting distance of the advance line the regiment was only a part of the time under fire. By the middle of the afternoon it occupied its old camp at the church.

*On Tuesday morning, April 8th, General Sherman's division moved out the Corinth road in pursuit of the retreating enemy. General Breckenridge's division of Hardee's corps, with Forrest's brigade of Confederate cavalry, covered the enemy's retreat. A battalion of cavalry having reported to General Sherman that "the woods was full of rebs," he asked Colonel Hildebrand to halt his brigade and send a regiment forward and "clean out the woods." Colonel Hildebrand selected his own regiment whose position was in the rear of the brigade. The regiment moved promptly forward, and in a few minutes its skirmishers were engaged with the enemy. Coming forward into line and to a halt, a sharp fire was opened upon the cavalry brigade in its front, which proved to be Wirt Adams' Mississippians, Forrest's Kentucky cavalry, and the Texas rangers. In a few moments it was seen that the cavalry were about to charge, and bayonets were fixed to receive them. On they came with dashing impetuosity, discharging their double-barreled shotguns as they came, thus killing and wounding enough to thin out our short line of battle. When within a rod or two of our line they halted and emptied their revolvers on our gallant men, while still out of reach of their bayonets. Then a dash was made to make prisoners of the survivors, which was partly successful, as Captain McCormick (having his right arm broken by a gunshot), Captain Chandler, Lieutenant Criswell, and about thirty-five men were captured—several others of them being badly wounded. But for the timely order of Colonel Hildebrand bringing the Fifty-third and Fifty-seventh Ohio regiments to the rescue, the most of the regiment, and with it General Sherman, would have been made prisoners. The general had so much faith in the regiment, and appeared to doubt the report of his cavalry so much, that he felt sure of the success of the movement, and was almost abreast of the regiment when this powerful brigade of the enemy's best cavalry charged down upon its thinned ranks.

*On the night of the seventh a large part of the regiment did picket duty all night in the rain, Lieutenant Joseph J. Steenrod being in command of the pickets. There were three alarms during the night so the men got no rest. Captain Stevens having been wounded, was unable to go on the expedition on the morning of the eighth, so Lieutenant Steenrod was in command of company A and was killed in battle. He was a noble officer.

Among those killed in the battle on Sunday were non-commissioned officers George A. Booth, Lorain Burris, Jacob R. Batten, George A. Cavanaugh, John Cline, John P. Calvert, James Flemming, Benjamin M. Kimberly and John Sanford. Lieutenant O. S. Thomas was mortally wounded, and died May 31, 1862; and Sergeant Major G. B. West was wounded.

So great had been our loss in the first day's fight in killed and wounded, and by disease in camp, that the regiment took but about two hundred and ten men into this battle at Fallen Timbers," as it is sometimes called, about sixty-five of whom it there lost. Among those killed here were Lieutenant Joseph Steenrod, Andrew J. Duvall, William L. Porterfield, John H. Kepburn, James M. Baker, Percival Nott, Daniel Sipple, Lyman Wyss, and Royal A. Wright, non-commissioned officers, with eighteen privates. Lieutenants Fisher, Fouraker, Garrett, White and Thomas Mitchell, were wounded.

The regiment lost in the battles of Shiloh, including the fight of Tuesday, one officer and fifty men killed, seven officers and one hundred and ten men mounted, besides several reported missing in action—now almost certainly known to sleep on this bloody field in unmarked graves. Its loss was, with two or three exceptions, the largest of any regiment in the army. Three officers and fifty-three men were captured, the privates being paroled in a few days and the officers held till October, when they were paroled and soon exchanged.

Colonel Jesse Hildebrand, himself a gallant officer, in his report as brigade commander, says: "With regard to the officers and men who participated in the affair at Fallen Timbers, and at Shiloh, I am happy to bear testimony to the fidelity, bravery and devotion of all. Major B. D. Fearing, who was in immediate command of the Seventy-seventh Ohio volunteer infantry, was cool and brave, and acquitted himself with as much skill as an old officer of larger experience, and was not excelled by any other field officer who came under my observation." He also spoke of Captains Chandler and McCormick as meritorious officers—the latter being since brevetted major for "meritorious services in the battle of Shiloh." Captain Mason, also, was distinguished for the part he took in these three days' fight.

General Sherman, in published orders, speaks in high terms of praise regarding the firmness in which the Seventy-seventh held the position at Shiloh church against such fearful odds, and credited with saving from capture the Chicago artillery. He has since said much more in commendation of these gallant heroes, which it is hoped he will put into form for preservation in history.

After the battle and up to the capture of Corinth, May 30th, the Seventy-seventh took a prominent part in the siege, being often under fire, and all the time engaged in building works and otherwise aiding to capture the place by regular approaches. It advanced in pursuit of the retreating enemy as far as Chewalla, and during June and until July 21st, it was on expeditions to Holly Springs, Mississippi, Moscow, Macon, Lagrange, Tennessee, and other places. July 21st, it reached Memphis, where the men did guard duty till August 27th, when the regiment was ordered to Alton, Illinois, to guard prisoners of war and recruit its thinned ranks—relieving General Sherman's old regiment, the Thirteenth United States infantry.

Being recruited up to a minimum the regiment was ordered to join General F. Steele's expedition for the capture of Little Rock and other places in Arkansas, leaving on the thirty-first of July, 1863, for Helena, where it landed August 5th. It was here brigaded with the Forty-third Indiana and Thirty-sixth Iowa, as the Third brigade of the Third division of the Arkansas expedition, and marched on the eleventh for the State capital. The men were in fine condition, and endured the arduous march with commendable spirit. They exhibited the true spirit of tried soldiers in the various brushes with the enemy on the way. Halting a brief period at Clarendon and Duval's Bluffs, the army marched, on the first of September, across Grand Prairie without water, through a broiling hot sun in which many of the men were sun-struck, inflicting incurable if not fatal injuries, reaching Brownsville in the evening. On the fourth of September, the regiment made a feint on the enemy's position at Bayou Meteor, accompanied by a few pieces of artillery, shelling them from their position and returning to Brownsville. On this march the commanding officer of the regiment, Colonel William B. Mason, met with a serious accident; his horse becoming entangled in fallen telegraph wires, was unmanageable, and the colonel being thrown off with great force, received injuries which would ordinarily prove fatal, but a good constitution and the skill and care of Surgeon Wall enabled him to live through them.

On the tenth of September the army drove the enemy from Little Rock and entered the capital, where the whole army encamped till December. The forces of Generals Fagan, Marmaduke, Shelby, and others, were hovering in the vicinity and awaiting an opportunity to make an assault, and if possible retake the place. General Steele had the railroad repaired from Duval's Bluffs to Little Rock, and officers and men of the Seventy-seventh were detailed to run it, as well as to guard saw-mills in the vicinity while lumber was cut to build winter quarters. In this way, and in scouting the country, guarding supply trains to Pine Bluffs, and conducting court martial business, the officers and men were employed till December 20th, when almost all the men fit for military duty reenlisted as veteran volunteers—a movement towards reenlisting having begun in the regiment as early as October. On the 23d of December, the regiment started to Columbus, Ohio, where it arrived

January 10, 1864, and on the twenty-second of January, the men were mustered as veterans and furloughed for thirty days. Colonel Mason, Captain McCormick, Captain Morris and Lieutenant Fisher, were appointed recruiting officers, and when the regiment reached Camp Dennison, the rendezvous, to start for the field, it had about two hundred recruits in its ranks.

Reaching its rendezvous February 26th, the regiment left, March 1st, for Little Rock, where it arrived on the seventeenth. It was ordered to march with General Steele's expedition, and left on the twenty-third for Shreveport, Louisiana, to cooperate with Banks' Red River expedition. At Spoonville, April 2d, a skirmish took place, but the regiment lost no men. At Okalona, on the third, it was again under fire, having a prominent position and bearing itself creditably while aiding Colonel Goetz to drive a battery from its position. At Elkin's Ford, on the sixth, it next met and assisted in driving the foe, as it did again at Prairie de Ann on the thirteenth. The army was attacked at Moscow on the thirteenth, but there was not much fighting. Arriving at Camden on the sixteenth, and driving out the enemy, it was learned from telegrams captured that General Banks' Red River expedition had been defeated. Our troops had started from Little Rock with only half rations of hard bread and quarter rations of pork, and had been long out of meat, subsisting partly on the country. General Clayton had started a supply train from Pine Bluffs to meet Steele's forces at Camden, but it did not arrive on time, and there was much suffering for food. After its arrival, General Steele ordered the thoroughly effective men of the brigade, except the guards at headquarters and at two mills that were grinding corn and the pickets of the division (which consisted of portions of the Seventy-seventh Ohio, Forty-third Indiana, and Thirty-sixth Iowa), to escort the empty wagon train back to Pine Bluffs, and on the twenty-third it crossed the Washita river on pontoon bridges and left Camden. Colonel Drake, of the Thirty-sixth Iowa, commanded the brigade, and Captain McCormick was elected by Colonel W. B. Mason as the senior officer present to command that portion of the Seventy-seventh that was detailed. About two hundred of the First Indiana and Seventh Missouri cavalry and a section of the Second Missouri battery accompanied the train. On the twenty-fifth of April this little force, guarding about two hundred and fifty wagons, found in battle array over six thousand mounted rebels at Marks' Mills, forty-five miles from Camden and about the same distance from Pine Bluffs. The enemy had taken another route from Camden and struck on our flank at this junction. The train was passing from Bayou Moro through woodlands over a narrow road, so it was stretched out some five miles long. In this condition it was not difficult for the enemy to divide the regiments at the cross-roads and attack them in detail. This was done, and their heavy force surrounded and captured the two other regiments, after a sharp fight. Hearing the battle open several miles ahead, while they were guarding the rear of the train, the commander of the detailed portion of the Seventy-seventh moved his command forward on the double-quick, passing wagons and pieces of artillery mired in the swampy Moro bottoms. Moving as rapidly as possible the entire distance, and coming up almost breathless to Marks' Mills, the detachment of the Seventy-seventh arrived only in time to find that their comrades had been captured, and that they must fight the battle alone. The entire force of the enemy, except a few hundreds left guarding the prisoners, now confronted the gallant Ohio boys. Quickly throwing out skirmishers to protect the flanks, Captain McCormick at once formed his command in line of battle, in a good position, and endeavored to protect the remaining half of the train. For more than an hour longer was the enemy held at bay by this little band of about three hundred men, amidst a hotly contested conflict of arms. Twice was General Cabell's brigade in front of our noble boys driven back, causing the brigade commander to ask them if they were "going to let that little handful whip them." Meantime, Adjutant Flemming and Quartermaster Fisher, who had been sent out to the cross-roads to see if there was any danger of being flanked, reported that there was a heavy body of troops on the right, and another to the left and rear, threatening to surround the little Union band. These proved to be the brigades of General Dockery and General Shelby. Notwithstanding these fearful odds, the Seventy-seventh boys and their commander were unwilling to give up the conflict, but continued to pour well directed shots into the heavy lines of the enemy, defying the leaden hail which stormed around them. After keeping up this unequal contest for about two hours, the brave boys found their ammunition exhausted and themselves entirely surrounded and prisoners of war. The Union losses in this battle were two hundred and fifty killed and wounded, and about one thousand prisoners, the wagons also falling into the hands of the enemy. The enemy's losses in killed and wounded were much heavier, owing to the fact that the battle was in a piece of woodland, where they were unable to see how small a force they were fighting. Believing General Steele had reenforced the train guard, they were unwilling to make a dash to surround them at once, lest they should meet with a decided repulse; and advancing slowly in heavy lines, they formed a good target for the Ohio boys, who caused them to remark (when they found how few of our men they had been fighting), that they were "a dear lot of prisoners."

The enemy's loss was estimated at a thousand, killed and wounded. Three hundred and eighteen members of the Seventy-seventh, including eleven officers, became prisoners of war. They were marched, without stopping to eat or sleep, and almost without drink, sixty miles to the Washita river, before they were allowed an hour's rest. The commander of the guard apologized for this, and showed one of our officers the order of General Fagan, requiring him to cross the Washita before resting, lest General Steele should rescue the prisoners.

Captain McCormick was given the rank of brevet lieutenant colonel "for gallantry in the battle of Marks' Mills," and their commander says Captain McKittrick and Lieutenants Fulton, Scott, Marlow, Flemming, Mc-Intire, David A. Henry, R. E. Smithson, Province, and N. B. Smith, also deserve well of this country for their part in the battle. They were all captured, as well as Lieutenants Atkinson, J. M. Mitchell, John Smith, Dye, Lund, Day and Black, afterwards commissioned, all of whom fought bravely.

General Steele, finding that the Banks expedition had met with disastrous defeat, was compelled to abandon Camden. Leaving the place in the night, by a pontoon bridge and a new road he had made, the enemy (which now far outnumbered his force) did not learn of his movements so as to overtake him till he reached the Saline river, at Jenkins' Ferry. Here, on the thirtieth of April, those of the Seventy-seventh who had not been at Marks' Mills (having been left at Camden because they were on picket and other guard duty), or not thoroughly equipped, or not fit for duty, were, with the rest of Steele's forces, engaged in a bloody battle. Fortunately the enemy was repulsed, and with heavy loss. In this encounter the Seventy-seventh lost, in killed and wounded, about half the number engaged, and a few were made prisoners. Part of the time they fought in water knee deep, the river being out of its banks. Those captured by the enemy at Marks' Mills, and at Jenkins' Ferry, were soon after marched about two hundred miles south, and confined for ten months in a military prison at Camp Ford, near Tyler, Texas, where thirty-eight of them died from starvation, exposure, and disease, and one, John Calvert, was shot dead, in a brutal manner, by a rebel guard, for getting too close "the dead line" when going for water.

Captain McCormick and Lieutenants Flemming, Scott, and Smithson, of the Seventy-seventh, and three men not of the regiment, escaped from the military prison one dark evening about the last of August, and started north, travelling by night with only the stars for a guide. Scott and Smithson travelled about a hundred miles and were retaken near Red river. The others marched about sixty miles towards the Union lines, but unfortunately the watch-dogs on a plantation got scent of them, and next morning two packs of blood-hounds, with squads of rebel cavalry, were on their track. After a tiresome chase through the tangled woods they were run down by the blood-hounds, and brought to bay. As orders were posted at the prison before they left that all prisoners who might escape should be shot if overtaken, the situation was considered one of peril. However, the enemy evidently took care to count the cost of such a course, as assurances were given by the cavalry that no harm should be done them if they would surrender. Being taken to Gilmore, a squad of fierce rebels, who probably never saw an army Union soldier, plied them with numerous insulting questions, which were answered in plain language without much care for the feelings of the doughty questioners. So they charged Captain McCormick with "treason to the State of Texas," and threatened to hang him for his pointed replies. The real soldiers of the guard seemed to relish the answers made to those who would insult an unarmed and defenceless prisoner, and they were restrained and advised to cease questioning if they could not endure the responses. The prisoners were returned to Camp Ford a few days after, where they awaited another opportunity to escape, finally made unnecessary by the arrival of the paroling officers so long and anxiously looked for in vain. On being paroled the survivors marched to Shreveport, Louisiana, about one hundred miles, where they were placed on transports and conveyed to the mouth of Red river, and there delivered into the Union lines February 25, 1865, except Lieutenants Flemming, Fulton, and Atkinson, who were held in Texas till the end of the war for attempting to escape.

After being clothed and paid, and given a thirty days' furlough, these exchanged prisoners returned to the regiment in April.

On the expiration of the term of service, of the few original member who did not become veterans, and of those enlisted in 1862, and therefore could not reenlist, they were mustered out in 1864.

This left the command too small to maintain its organization as a regiment, and it was consolidated into a battalion of six companies, commanded by Colonel Stevens.

On the fifth of February, 1865, the battalion left Little Rock with General Steele for the Gulf department, and was at Fort Morgan, Alabama, when the paroled prisoners were released, and were near Mobile when they joined it. It was engaged in operations around Mobile, Fort Spanish, Blakely, McIntosh Bluffs, and other points in Alabama, in which Colonel Stevens and the boys won golden opinions, until June 1, 1865, when it took transports across the Gulf of Mexico for the Rio Grande, and remained on duty at Brazos and Clarksville, and then, from August 1, 1865, till March 8, 1866, at Brownsville, Texas, where it was mustered out and started for Columbus, Ohio, where the men were finally paid off and disbanded, March 26, 1866.

Only one of all Ohio's regiments remained longer in the service, and none served the country more faithfully, or suffered more for the cause of the Union.

NINETY-SECOND OHIO VOLUNTEER INFANTRY.

REGIMENTAL OFFICERS.

Colonel Nelson H. Van Vorhes, mustered August 15, 1862, resigned March 22, 1863; Colonel Benjamin D. Fearing, March 22, 1863, mustered out May 19, 1865, on account of wounds; Lieutenant Colonel Benjamin D. Fearing, August 15, 1862, promoted to colonel; Lieutenant Colonel Douglas Putnam, jr., March 22, 1863, honorably discharged April 11, 1864; Lieutenant Colonel John C. Morrow, April 28, 1864, mustered out with regiment; Major Dioclesian A. Smith, August 10, 1862, resigned February 1, 1863; Major Douglas Putnam, jr., February 1, 1863, promoted to lieutenant colonel; Major Elmer Golden, March 22, 1863, resigned December 8, 1863; Major John C. Morrow, December 8, 1863, promoted to lieutenant colonel; Surgeon Josiah D. Cotton, August 19, 1862, mustered out with regiment; Assistant Surgeon N. B. Sisson, August 16, 1862, resigned August 15, 1864; Assistant Surgeon J. D. Howell, August 20, 1862, resigned April 29, 1863; Assistant Surgeon A. M. Beers, August 26, 1864, mustered out with regiment; Chaplain Washington M. Grimes, December 1, 1862, resigned September 9, 1863.

COMPANY OFFICERS FROM WASHINGTON COUNTY.

Captain William Thorniley, mustered July 29, 1862, resigned April 9, 1863; Captain Francis H. Loring, July 30, 1862, mustered out with regiment; Captain Alexander Higgins, July 30, 1862, resigned May 9, 1863; Captain William Beale Whittlesey, June 1, 1863, killed at Mission Ridge November 25, 1863; Captain Hamilton Middleswart, July 20, 1863, mustered out with regiment; Captain James W. Merrill, October 2, 1863, honorably discharged May 24, 1864; Captain Joseph Stephenson, November 25, 1863, mustered out with regiment; Captain Bradley B. Stone, November 18, 1864, mustered out with regiment; First Lieutenant Hamilton Middleswart, July 23, 1862, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant Douglas Putnam, jr., July 25, 1862, promoted to major; First Lieutenant James W. Merrill, July 28, 1862, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant Joseph Stephenson, July 28, 1862, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant David E. Putnam, February 1, 1863, honorably discharged November 24, 1863; First Lieutenant George B. Turner, June 1, 1862, died of wounds December 1, 1863; First Lieutenant Bradley B. Stone, July 20, 1863, promoted to captain; First Lieutenant Reason A. Bull, October 29, 1863, mustered out with regiment; First Lieutenant Charles A. Brown, June 14, 1864, mustered out with regiment; Second Lieutenant William Beale Whittlesey, July 23, 1862, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant Thomas Day, July 26, 1862, resigned February 17, 1863; Second Lieutenant Bradley B. Stone, February 17, 1863, promoted to first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant George B. Turner, May 9, 1863, promoted to first lieutenant.

The Ninety-second Ohio was organized at Marietta, Ohio, during the months of August and September, 1862. It rendezvoused at Camp Marietta, then in command of Colonel William R. Putnam. Nelson H. Van Vorhes, the colonel, reported and assumed command on the first of October, 1862. As an officer of volunteers he had been on active duty at the front since April, 1861, and while the regiment was organizing he was still on duty with General Mitchell in Alabama. Benjamin D. Fearing, the lieutenant colonel, had seen service; was at Manassas as a private, had served on the staff of Generals Slemmer and Crook in Virginia, while serving as adjutant in the Thirty-sixth Ohio volunteer infantry, and evinced soldiership at Shiloh in command of one of the regiments of General Sherman's division. All the officers were gentlemen of experience and courage.

The men were the pick of the district—young, active, quick to learn, eager to do their best at all times, and proud of the good name and character of their regiment. The first service performed was before the colonel, lieutenant colonel or major had reported or the regiment had been mustered. Adjutant Putnam, with companies A, B and D, was ordered to move to Gallipolis, Ohio, and garrison that post at the time the rebels were driving Lightburn out of the Kanawha valley. While there they made two expeditions into Virginia. These companies soon after rejoined, when the regiment, numbering nine hundred and forty-nine, rank and file, was mustered into the United States service, uniformed, and armed with Austrian rifled muskets.

On October 7, 1862, the regiment was ordered to Point Pleasant, West Virginia, and made a part of the brigade of Colonel Gilbert. It took part in the expeditions up the Kanawha under General Cox, before whom the rebels retreated and were finally, after some skirmishing, driven beyond the mountains.

At Gauley Bridge it was transferred to brigade command by General Hugh Ewing and went into winter quarters, building log huts at Loupe creek, a few miles below Kanawha Falls. They were permitted to enjoy these comforts but a short time, when they were ordered to join the brigade of General George Crook and were stationed at Tompkins' farm on New river, which was at that time the outpost of the army of the Kanawha valley.

After the dark days of December, 1862, when the country struggled under the discouragements of Fredericksburgh and the seemingly indecisive battle of Murfreesborough, General Crook's brigade was hurriedly taken by transports to Nashville, Tennessee. The trip occupied over fourteen days and was attended with many hardships on account of the crowded condition of the boats. Remaining at Nashville about three weeks the regiment was ordered to proceed to Carthage, Tennessee. The trip occupied a week, and in no way was it more comfortable than our journey to Nashville. Many of the men were compelled to sleep in the hold, full of foul air, and became impregnated with disease which soon developed itself.

Those two months spent at Carthage will never be forgotten. Daily, for weeks, one or more burial parties fired the last salute over the grave of a comrade as he was committed to mother earth, in a town where no one sympathized with them, and where each grave was counted as taking away one more of their enemies. In less than two months over ninety men were buried.

The colonel, N. H. Van Vorhes was here compelled to resign on account of sickness, and Lieutenant Colonel Fearing was promoted to colonel. Major Smith having resigned, adjutant Putnam, by request of the officers, was made major, and after promotion of Colonel Fearing, was made lieutenant colonel.

Health once restored, the regiment was ordered south of the Cumberland and joined with the brigade the army of the Cumberland at Murfreesborough. The brigade, which was still under the command of General Crooks, was assigned to General Reynolds' division, Fourteenth army corps.

The regiment moved from Murfreesborough on the twenty-fourth of June, 1863, supporting Wilder's mounted infantry—one of the brigades of Reynold's division at Hoover's gap. The enemy were met and driven back, as they were pressing Wilder and attempting to recover the ground he had taken.

The march over the table lands of Tennessee, through a continuous rain—rains twenty-one days in succession—bivouacking nightly in mud so deep and soft as to make it necessary to cut boughs to lie on. Mouldy crackers and musty coffee, wet sugar and some bacon, are pleasant themes for the survivors to dwell upon now.

On Elk river the news of Gettysburgh and Vicksburgh was announced in the evening of July 4th and was hailed by a salute from the combined artillery of the army. Despondent hearts took courage; and with better weather and better supplies and full of hope, the regiment camped at Big Springs, Tennessee, resting and enjoying the change as only tired soldiers can.

While here General John B. Turchin, the old Hungarian soldier, assumed command. His vigorous efforts to secure green corn, blackberries, and fresh vegetables, speedily eradicated all traces of scurvy and disease contracted at Carthage, and put the regiment in good condition, mentally and physically, for active work. They bivouacked by the springs at University Place and foraged in the valleys, moving over the mountains and through Sweden Cowen, stopping long enough to gather the green corn and ripe peaches.

On the second of September the regiment crossed the Tennessee river, at Shell Mound, in flatboats. On the third it led the advance over Sand Mountain, and on the next day moved to Trenton, Georgia. From here the brigade crossed the Lookout ranges, overcoming the seemingly impossible obstacles in so doing, and descending the Coopers gap into McLemoes cove, passed up the valley into Catlett's gap.

While here quite a sharp skirmish occurred, and the regiment held the head of the gap. Skirmishing continued here for parts of two days, and the Ninety-second was busily engaged.

On September 18th a night march was made (one that will never be forgotten by those participating in it) to Chickamauga. The regiment engaged the enemy on that bloody field, under Turchin, on the nineteenth and twentieth, and formed a part of the rear guard that saved the army. On the nineteenth, early in the day, Colonel Fearing was wounded and carried from the field, the command devolving upon Lieutenant Colonel Putnam. Lieutenant Merrill was wounded severely, captured and sent to our lines under a flag of truce.

On Sunday afternoon Turchin's brigade made the charge necessary to open connection with Granger, coming to reenforce General Thomas, who gave the command in person to the Ninety-second to lead the charge, which was made left in front. This charge is described by Van Horn, in his "Army of the Cumberland:"

The charge was made with great vigor, and the enemy was completely routed. Turchin's brigade drove this daring force entirely beyond Baird's left, capturing more than two hundred prisoners. This brigade . . . was posted by General Thomas, on the road leading through the ridge to the Dry Valley roads, to hold the ground, while the troops from the right and left passed by.

In this battle Lieutenant David E. Putnam, adjutant, was wounded and discharged on account of wounds, and George B. Turner, orderly sergeant of company F, was promoted to first lieutenant and made adjutant. Captain John Brown was mortally wounded, and soon after the battle died; also, Lieutenant G. T. Okey received a dangerous shell wound. W. B. Whittlesey, second lieutenant of company F, was promoted to first lieutenant, and on resignation of Captain Thorniley, of the same company, was promoted to captain in June, 1863; hence was in command of his company in this battle.

The regiment returned to Chattanooga, living in dog tents, with cold, wet weather, insufficient rations, etc., yet bore all with patience and fortitude. They made several reconnoissances and were ready for duty on a moment's notice. They formed a part, with Hazen's brigade, of the forlorn hope sent to open connection with General Hooker's armig corps, who were coming to the relief of the beleaguered and nearly starved army. As General Turchin described it: "Chattanooga was surrounded by two lines of fortifications, one built by brave men and one composed of dead mules, starved to death for their country's cause."

A part of the regiment floated past Lookout Mountain in scow boats, and the rest marched across Moccasin

Point, and were ferried over as the boats came down. The movement was so carefully planned, and executed with so much skill, that the enemy was taken completely by surprise, and perfect success crowned the effort. The army was revictualled and reenforced.

About November 20th the preliminary movement for the capture of Mission Ridge commenced. The Ninety-second, with Turchin's brigade, had been for some time expecting orders to assault, being in position for several days. On the afternoon of November 25th, the final assault was made. Captain Middlesworth, of company F, in connection with the skirmishers of the Thirty-sixth and Eleventh Ohio, cleared the rifle pits at the foot of the ridge. The brigade was ordered forward at double quick, and swept every obstacle before it. This charge has often been described. General John C. Breckenridge, who commanded the enemy's lines in front of this brigade, told the writer that the audacity of the attack—the sight of the steadily moving lines, silent but terrible in its advance—so demoralized his men that they became unmanageable, and, at last, gave way, not until there was almost a hand-to-hand encounter near the summit.

About half way up the hill the commanding officer, Lieutenant Colonel Putnam, fell wounded. Soon thereafter Captain Whittlesey was shot through the heart, but said to his men "Go on, I'm killed," and breathed his last. The men went on, sweeping over the top, in company with the Thirty-sixth, while the enemy retreated down the side.

The summit once gained, no rest was found by the breathless and worn column, as a force of the enemy came hastily from the left to reenforce their fleeing comrades. Here, while rallying the men for this assault, Adjutant Turner received his death-wound, being struck in the head by a large minnie ball. He lived for some days, however, but sank away.

By the death of these two young men, Washington county offered up her choicest material, and their funerals (on the same day) will ever be remembered. Both were brave and faithful officers. Lieutenant Townsend, of Athens county, was also killed, who was an excellent officer. The loss of the regiment was, in this assault, thirty-three per cent. of the officers and ten per cent. of the men. They took many prisoners and two guns.

The next day the regiment, under command of Captain Wheeler, started in pursuit of the enemy and returned soon to Chattanooga. Remaining here until February, 1864, when, under command of Captain I. C. Morrow, Major Golden having resigned, Fearing and Putnam both absent from wounds, they started south towards Dallas. They were engaged at Rocky Face Gap, losing heavily, some of the wounded being buried in the woods. From here they moved to Ringgold Gap, doing out-post duty. Here Captain Morrow was promoted to lieutenant colonel vice Putnam mustered out on account of wounds. Colonel Fearing returned in March, and Lieutenant B. B. Stone of company G, who was promoted from orderly sergeant, was made adjutant. The regiment took an active part in that campaign through Dallas. On the twenty-seventh of July, they were in line of Atlanta.

During August and September the regiment was in the neighborhood of Atlanta, taking parts in the charge at Jonesborough, Georgia. On the fourth of October, they broke camp and joined in pursuit of Hood, crossing the Chattahoochie.

At Kingston preparations were made for the march to the sea under Sherman, the sick provided for in hospitals, baggage sent to rear or destroyed, etc. On the sixteenth, they started. This march has been fully described, and no attempt to do so is needed here. They met the enemy at Bentonville, North Carolina, March 21st. Here Colonel Fearing, who was in command of a brigade, having been brevetted brigade general, was severely wounded in the hand, necessitating the amputation of a portion of it. Passing through Goldborough, Durham Station, and Raleigh, North Carolina, they moved onward through Virginia, reaching Washington on May 19th and taking part in the ever memorable grand review of the Twenty-fourth. Having orders to be mustered out of service, it was transported to Columbus, Ohio, and on the nineteenth of June, 1865, the Ninety-second Ohio volunteer infantry ceased to exist.

Their first colors were literally worn and shot into shreds, the second set now in the flag room at Columbus are mute witnesses of their regiment's history as they bear on their folds in letters of gold these names: Hoovers Gap, Chickamauga, Mission Ridge, Rocky Face Atlanta, The March to the Sea, Savannah, and the Carolinas.

THE SILVER GRAYS.

Among the many military organizations of Washington county for home defence, none was more self-sacrificing and patriotic than the one we have now to consider. The Silver Grays were among the very first to step forward and form in martial array at the beginning, and their moral influence in the community was great. Their appearance on parade, marching and going through the manual of arms was inspiring, and if a man had any of the martial spirit in him, the sight of these venerable men keeping step to the music of the Union was sure to arouse it.

Two of the members, William Warren and Junia Jennings, prepared the following account of the company in 1866, and we give it substantially as we find it:

Monday forenoon, April 22, 1861, was the time of the departure of the first company of volunteers from Marietta to aid in putting down the Rebellion, the Union Blues,—over one hundred men—under command of Captain Frank Buell. It was an effecting occasion, such as was never before known in Washington county, and may never be again. Strong men's nerves gave way, and the patriotic tear and firm resolve were seen upon every face. There was a brief speech by George P. Buell, esq., and amid cheers, the firing of cannon, and the waving of flags, the volunteers embarked upon the Muskingum packet from the common in front of the Congregational church, thousands of people being assembled.

The citizens then repaired to the court house and organized a meeting to take into consideration the state of public affairs. Hon. William A. Whittlesey, the mayor of Marietta, being called to the chair, secretaries and committees were appointed. Colonel William West, then in his sixty-sixth year, arose and said:

"Mr. chairman, I hold in my hand a resolution which I wish to offer for the consideration of this meeting. Such is the excitement of the occasion that I am not in the situation to either do justice to myself or the subject I wish to present; therefore, without comment, with the indulgence of the house, I will submit the resolution."

Silence reigned throughout the crowded house, and the colonel, with a voice tremulous with the deep feeling that pervaded all present, read:

"Resolved, That we, the citizens of Washington county, whose ages are sixty years and upwards, for the protection of our homes, our fire-sides, and our country's liberties, form ourselves into a military organization, to be called and known as the Silver Grays, of Washington county."

A hundred earnest voices seconded the motion for its adoption, and it was carried with a unanimous shout, and cheers for the Silver Grays.

A rush was made to be the first to enroll their names. James Dutton, being a little lame, had started first and had his name first down, followed by William Warren, second; Colonel West, third; Thomas Porter, fourth; Junia Jennings, fifth; and so on. Subsequently, men of forty-five years and upwards were enrolled.

It was resolved that each member of the company should supply himself with ammunition. The commissioned officers had red sashes, the rank and file, blue. A uniform was agreed upon, but circumstances did not favor its procurement. They were armed at once. George W. Barker, William Warren, and F. Wheeler were appointed a committee to ask the county commissioners to procure a flag to be raised on the court house.

Through the exciting days of 1862, especially when the rebels pressed upon the border everywhere throughout the whole line, in August and September, the Silver Grays were out in full force and vigor. In the spring of 1863 their guns were taken by authority for use by a company of younger men, and that ended the Silver Grays, who, it is justice to say, did all the duties they were called upon to perform, and did them well. That they would have done excellent duty in repelling invasion, had it ever occurred, there is no doubt. Several of the members were deaf, and these were compelled to watch their comrades' motions to know what order the captain gave. Several used canes.

Their motto as set forth in the first article of their constitution was: "The Union, the Constitution, and the Flag of our Country, for the sustaining of which we pledge out lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor."

ARTICLE 4. The company shall meet for exercise or other duty at such time and place as shall be determined on by the company on Saturday of each week at 2 P. M., provided that the captain or any other commissioned officer of our company is hereby empowered and required in cases of danger or emergency to cause a fire bell to be rung, which shall be a signal for the company to assemble at the court house at a minute's warning.

Colonel William West was first elected captain, but declined; Major George W. Barker was then elected, but his time of service was short. For a time they met every evening, at five o'clock, for drill.

May 11, 1861, three weeks after the first organization, officers were elected by ballot, who continued to the end, as follows:

COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

Captain Daniel P. Bosworth, First Lieutenant Charles J. Sheppard, Second lieutenant Rufus E. Harte.

NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

First Sergeant Junia Jennings, Second Sergeant Thomas Porter, Third Sergeant Frederick Buck, Fourth Sergeant Hugh Brenan.

PRIVATEs.

James Dutton, William Warren, Colonel William West, Isaac C. Fuller, Daniel Protsman, E. W. T. Clark, Lemuel Grimes, Montgomery Sayre, John Skipton, Jacob Middleswart, Joel Deming, William A. Whittlesey, James Brown, John M. Slocumb, Theodore Scott, G. W. Barker, Isaac Maxon, John Goodinan, Levi Bartlett, Joseph E. Hall, Robert T. Miller, J. W. L. Brown, L. J. P. Putnam, Henry Armstrong, W. C. McCarty, John Mills, Joseph Jones, J. L. Reckard, T. P. Harshberger, D. R. Sniffen, T. J. Westgate, Isaac Kidd, John Test, James McLeod, D. Stevens, F. A. Wheeler, H. H. Wheatley, John Miles, Lewis Leonhart, John Eaton, James H. Dye, George Payne, L. M. Parker, Merritt Judd, John Armstrong, J. J. Parker, Hugh Hill, Austin Edgerton, John Marshall, Hugh Clancey, Matthew Wylie, J. J. Preston, Barker Devol, James Dunn, George Greenwood, J. H. Nye, Owen Franks, Philo Doan, A. M. Shanklin, Calvin Hildreth, William Scott, R. D. Hollister, Elisha Allen, Graydon Medlicott, Robert Johnson, George Stanley, James B. Matthews, Stephen Alcock, John Richards, J. J. Hollister, A. L. Guitteau, B. F. Stone, D. Atkinson, David Wright, John R. Tucker, J. M. Eels, Lucius Brigham, S. P. Hildreth, J. B. Dyar, James Ferguson, William P. Skinner, Rosswill Tumey, Charles Sullivan, A. Woodruff, Warren Wilcox, John Stricker, John Lehnhart, Joseph H. Steward, Wylls Hall, Shadrach Wood, Silas Slocumb, Jacob Snyder, E. Eveleigh, J. Pfeiffer, William Wylie, Colonel Augustus Stone, Nathaniel Holden, Jacob Lauder, David Cline, Austin Berkley, Amos Dye.—Total, one hundred and seven.

THE "PONY SECTION."

During the war Marietta was prolific in fifers and drummers. The first to enter the service were those who joined the Eighteenth Ohio volunteer militia, in the three months' service.

Ebenezer Corey and Louis Fourgeres were the musicians of company B, the old Union Blues. After the Eighteenth entered Virginia they were distributed along the Baltimore & Ohio railroad as guards. Ebenezer Corey was appointed drum major of the Eighteenth June 6, 1861, and soon went to Marietta to recruit a martial band.

This resulted in the enlistment of nine young men, most of whom knew nothing of the use of fife or drum, but who became quick learners. On June 17, 1861, they started for Virginia, learning the notes on the way. They were—Charles Holden, George K. Jenvey, William Jenvey, John Tenney, Henry Langley, Frank R. Brenan, Fred Regnier, James Judd, and Henry Corey, and others, among whom were Manly Warren, Louis Fourgeres, and Stephen Mass, from Washington county; they made the "Pony Section," so called from their size and age.

At Bridgeport they drilled and practiced—result a few tunes and sunburnt ears. They then went to Clarksburgh, still training for the war, when they, with the whole regiment, were transferred to Oakland, and made a fruitless march over the mountains under General Hill, after General Garnett's rebel forces. As the time of the regiment had expired, one hot July day they came back to Marietta and awaited patiently their discharge, with hardly a taste of hard service.

Their martial strains awoke many responsive chords in the hearts of the patriotic people, and the band was invited to take a trip up the Muskingum to Zanesville. Every courtesy was shown them along the route, and they awakened the valley by their ringing music. At Zanesville and Beverly they were treated with especial favor.

On their discharge five enlisted in Buell's battery; three with the major in the Thirty-sixth Ohio volunteer infantry, in a fine band, which timed the steps of many brave ones in their march to duty and victory; one went into Huntington's battery, and one in the Second West Virginia cavalry. All did brave duty through the war. One of whom died in the service—Charles A. Holden. Such was the "Pony Section."

ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-EIGHTH OHIO NATIONAL GUARDS.

REGIMENTAL OFFICERS.

Colonel Thomas W. Moore, mustered May 18, 1864, Washington county; Lieutenant Colonel Isaac B. Kinkead, May 18, 1864, Washington county; Major William L. Edmiston, May 18, 1864, Vinton county; Adjutant Thomas Day, May 18, 1864, Washington county; Quartermaster Allen R. Darrow, May 18, 1864 Washington county; Surgeon William Beebe, May 18, 1864, Washington county; Assistant Surgeon Benjamin F. Culver, May 18, 1864, Washington County; Drum Major Darius Towsley, May 18, 1864; Washington county.

COMPANY OFFICERS.

Captain Samuel S. Knowles, company A, mustered May 17, 1864, Washington county; Captain John P. Sanford, B, May 17, 1864, Washington county; Captain Joseph J. McDowell, C, May 17, 1864, Vinton county; Captain William F. Dawson, D, May 17, 1864, Washington county; Captain Isaiah H. McCormick, E, May 17, 1864, Vinton county; Captain George B. Turner, F, May 18, 1864, Washington county; Captain Joseph M. McIlhinney, G, May 18, 1864, Washington county; Captain John Mitchell, H, May 17, 1864, Washington county; Captain David J. Richards, I, May 17, 1864, Washington county; First Lieutenant Wallace Wolcott, K, May 17, 1864, Washington county; First Lieutenant Charles B. Gates, A, May 17, 1864 died May 31, 1864, at Harper's Ferry, Maryland; First Lieutenant William W. West, B, May 17, 1864, Washington county; First Lieutenant Harson P. Ambrose, C, May 17, 1864, Vinton county; First Lieutenant John Randolph, D, May 17, 1864, Washington county; First Lieutenant Nathaniel Murphy, E, May 17, 1864, Vinton county; First Lieutenant Leonidas P. Pond, F, May 17, 1864, Washington county; First Lieutenant Augustus Leonard, G, May 18, 1864, Washington county; First Lieutenant Austin L. Curtis, H, May 18, 1864, Washington county; First Lieutenant W. L. Woodford, I, May 17, 1864, Washington county; First Lieutenant A. S. Bailey, K, May 17, 1864, Washington county; Second Lieutenant Smith J. Dutton, A, May 17, 1864, Washington county; Second Lieutenant William H. Jennings, B, May 17, 1864, Washington county; Second Lieutenant Robert S. Barnhill, C, May 17, 1864, Vinton county; Second Lieutenant Benjamin Arnold, D, May 17, 1864, Washington county; Second Lieutenant Samuel G. Scott, E, May 17, 1864, Vinton county, died at Bermuda Hundred; Second Lieutenant Benjamin F. Robinson, F, May 17, 1864, Washington county; Second Lieutenant John C. Wood, G, May 18, 1864, Washington county; Second Lieutenant Alexander H. Browning, H, May 17, 1864, Washington county; Second Lieutenant Robert Alexander, K, May 17, 1864, Washington county.

ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-EIGHTH OHIO VOLUNTEER INFANTRY, OHIO NATIONAL GUARDS.

In response to the call of Governor Brough the Forty-sixth regiment, Ohio National guards, numbering six hundred and fifty-four men of Washington county, reported for duty at Marietta on the second day of May, 1864. Subsequently the Ninety-sixth battalion, of Vinton county, was consolidated with the Forty-sixth regiment, forming the One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, Ohio volunteer infantry. The regiment was mustered into the service on the seventeenth and eighteenth of May. The officers were all Washington county men, except Major Edmiston and Captains McDowell and McCormick. The colonel had been a captain in the Thirty-sixth Ohio; the lieutenant colonel had been a lieutenant in the Seventy-seventh Ohio; and the major had been a captain in the Eighteenth Ohio. Several of the line officers, also, had been in the service, and nearly the whole regiment had been tried, briefly but laboriously, during the Morgan raid of the previous year. Company A, in particular, had been called out repeatedly, and on two or three occasions had been sent to Virginia, when the border was threatened. An unusual proportion of the men in this company were students of Marietta college and merchants, and it is worthy of remark that during one hundred and thirty-six days' service it was the only company in the regiment that did not lose a man by sickness.

On the twenty-third of May the regiment left Marietta for the field. Scarcely had the train passed out of sight of the town when an accident occurred to it, on the Union branch of the Marietta & Cincinnati railroad, by which Jeremiah Stuckey, of company A, was killed. John H. McKimm, of Athens county, and Alexander S.

Nugent, of Franklin, Pennsylvania, students in the preparatory department of Marietta college, who were accompanying their friends in the regiment to Parkersburgh, were killed. William Hildebrand, William Flemming, and First Lieutenant Gates were seriously injured. Lieutenant Gates went forward with the regiment, but he had received such internal injuries that, coupled with pneumonia, it resulted in his death on the thirty-first, six days after the regiment had arrived at Harper's Ferry. This accident, together with the subsequent death of Lieutenant Gates, cast a gloom over the regiment and throughout the community from which its members had been gathered. Although the youngest officer, and one of the youngest men in the regiment, no one was more generally known and more universally beloved than Charles Beman Gates. The various testimonials of affection and regret from the college societies with which he was connected, and from the officers of his regiment, are evidences of the high esteem in which this youthful, Christian patriot was held by his associates.

After remaining about two days at Harper's Ferry, the regiment moved to Washington, and on the ninth of June left that city for White House, on the Pamunkey. On the eleventh it left White House, arrived at Bermuda Hundred on the twelfth, and on the thirteenth went into General Butler's intrenchments at the front. On the sixteenth seven companies, under command of Lieutenant Colonel Kinkaid, left Bermuda Hundred for City Point. On the ninth of August, by the explosion of an ordnance boat at City Point, three men of the regiment were killed—S. E. Graham, of company H, Joseph H. Smith, of company D, and Joseph D. Clarke, of company A. Young Clarke was only about seventeen years old, was a member of the preparatory department in Marietta college, and was the oldest son of Colonel Melvin Clarke, of the Thirty-sixth Ohio, who was instantly killed while gallantly leading his regiment at the battle of Antietam, September, 1862. Sire and son, both instantly killed in their country's service, are buried side by side in the Marietta Mound cemetery. The total loss of the regiment by death was forty. On the twenty-ninth of August the One Hundred and Forty-eighth Ohio left City Point, and arrived at Marietta on the fifth of September. On the thirteenth a public dinner was given to the regiment by the citizens of the county, and on the fourteenth it was mustered out of the service.*

THE WAR EDITORS.

Any account of the eventful period of the war for the Union would be incomplete without some notice of the war editors of Washington county, the men who stood by the administration of Abraham Lincoln and encouraged the people at home and the soldiers in the field with brave words and patriotic sentiments.

T. L. Andrews was editor of the Marietta Intelligencer during the first year, and did much towards sustaining a healthy public policy. A. W. McCormick was the editor of the Marietta Republican at the beginning and so continued up to late in the fall of 1861, when he raised a company and went into the Seventy-seventh regiment. E. Winchester edited the Home News, and his local column was always a mine of interest both to soldiers and citizens. In June, 1862, R. M. Stimson purchased and combined the Home News and Intelligence and christened the new paper the Marietta Register.

All these editors did good work for the cause of the Union. Although Mr. McCormick differed in politics from the administration, yet he stood by the Union, and soon threw down the pen and took up the sword for his country. To Mr. Stimson, however, we are indebted for steady, unflinching support, and for work that told in the county. His proprietorship of the Marietta Register spanned the halcyon days of the Republican party in Washington county, which service the people have shown their appreciation of by twice sending him to the State senate.

BIOGRAPHIES OF OFFICERS OF THE WAR OF THE REBELLION.

DON CARLOS BUELL,

majorgeneral and commander of one of the principal Union armies in the War of the Rebellion, son of Salmon D. and Eliza Buell, was born March 23, 1818, on a farm owned by his grandfather, Judge Salmon Buell, which has since become the site of the town of Lowell, on the Muskingum river twelve miles above Marietta. He was named after an uncle, Don Carlos Buell, a young lawyer of Ithica, New York, who entered the volunteer service as a captain of artillery, and died in the Canada frontier, in the War of 1812. The lines of his progenitors on both sides come together again in the sixth preceding generation in the person of Samuel Buell born at Windsor, Connecticut, September 2, 1641. Judge Salmon Buell, on the grandfather's side, a lawyer by profession, was born in New York in 1764, served at the age of sixteen in the Revolutionary war, and became a senator and judge of the court of appeals of New York. He moved to Marietta about the year 1816, and in 1824 to Hamilton county, where he died in 1828. Captain Timothy Buell, the grandfather on the mother's side, was born in Connecticut in 1768, moved to Marietta in 1789, and died on his farm three miles above that place in 1837. He served in the War of 1812, represented Washington county in the legislature, and was sheriff of the county several years.

Soon after the death of his father, which occurred in August, 1823, the subject of this sketch was taken under the care of his uncle, George P. Buell, esq., of Lawrenceburgh, Indiana; and with an intermission of about five years passed in Marietta under the roof of his stepfather, George W. Dunley, esq., he remained with his relations at Lawrenceburgh until 1837, when he was appointed to a cadetship at West Point. He was graduated and commissioned in the army in 1841, and served in the Florida war and in the west until the Mexican war. He served through that war from the beginning to the end; participating in the battles of Ralo Alto, Resacca de la Ralma, Monterey, the siege of Vera Cruz, and the battles of Contreras and Cherubusco, and received the brevet of captain and major. He was severely wounded in the battle of Cherubusco. The following record of his grades up to 1850 is taken from Gardner's Military Dictionary, published in that year:

* From Ohio in the War.

Don Carlos Buell, cadet in 1837; second lieutenant Third infantry first of July, 1841; first lieutenant June, 1846; brevet captain for gallant and meritorious conduct in the several conflicts at Monterey, Mexico, twenty-third of September, 1846; distinguished in battle of Cerro Gordo; brevet major for gallant and meritorious conduct in the battles of Contreras and Cherubusco, twentieth August, 1847, and severely wounded in the latter; assistant adjutant general, January, 1848.

He was on duty in Washington in 1848, and subsequently, up to the war of the Rebellion, served as assistant adjutant general at various department headquarters, in the east, west, south, and on the Pacific, and in the war department at Washington. In December, 1860, he was sent by Mr. Floyd, Secretary of War, to Charleston, South Carolina, with verbal instructions for Major Robert Anderson, who was in command of the Government troops in the harbor, under the critical circumstances which the movement of secession had already created. After inspecting the forts, and making some suggestions with reference to their preparation for defence, he communicated verbally to Major Anderson the instructions he had received, and then a written memorandum of them, foreseeing the responsibility which coming events were likely to throw upon that officer. This memorandum, which is published in the Robinson record, has a historical interest, since it contains the authority upon which Major Anderson took the decisive step of abandoning Fort Moultrie, and concentrating his command in Fort Sumter.

Memorandum of verbal instructions to Major Anderson, First artillery, commanding Fort Moultrie, South Carolina:

FORT MOULTRIE, SOUTH CAROLINA, }
December 11, 1860. }

You are aware of the great anxiety of the Secretary of War that a collision of the troops with the people of this State shall be avoided, and of his studied determination to pursue a course with reference to the military force and forts in this harbor which shall guard against such a collision. He has, therefore, carefully abstained from increasing the force at this point, or taking any measures which might add to the present excited state of the public mind, or which would throw any doubt on the confidence he feels that South Carolina will not attempt, by violence, to obtain possession of the public works, or interfere with their occupancy.

But as the counsel and acts of rash and impulsive persons may possibly disappoint these expectations of the Government, he deems it proper that you should be prepared with instructions to meet so unhappy a contingency. He has, therefore, directed me, verbally, to give you such instructions.

You are carefully to avoid every act which would needlessly tend to provoke aggression; and for that reason you are not, without evident and imminent necessity, to take up any position which could be construed into the assumption of a hostile attitude. But you are to hold possession of the forts in this harbor, and if attacked you are to defend yourself to the last extremity.

The smallness of your force will not permit you, perhaps, to occupy more than one of the three forts, but an attack on, or attempt to take possession of, any one of them, will be regarded as an act of hostility, and you may then put you command into either of them which you may deem most proper to increase its power of resistance.

You are also authorized to take similar steps whenever you have tangible evidence of a design to proceed to a hostile act.

D. C. BUELL,
Assistant Adjutant General.

The commencement of the civil war found General Buell a lieutenant colonel, and a little later colonel, and the third officer in rank in the adjutant general's department of the regular army. He was under orders for duty on the Pacific coast in April, 1861, and sailed for San Francisco a few days after the firing on Fort Sumter. He was commissioned a brigadier general and recalled to Washington in August. In September and October he organized and disciplined a division in the army of the Potomac, and, on the twelfth of November was assigned to the command of the "Department of the Ohio, composed of the States of Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, that portion of Kentucky east of the Cumberland river, and the State of Tennessee, with headquarters at Louisville, Kentucky." Next to the department of the Potomac this was regarded the most important command in the contest which was then opening. The condition of affairs in Kentucky was thought to be extremely critical. One-third of the State was in the possession of the rebel forces, under whose protection a provisional government was inaugurated at Russellville; while further invasion was threatened from East Tennessee by Zollicoffer through Cumberland Gap, and by Humphrey Marshall from Virginia through Pound Gap. It was affirmed that the Union element was confined in a great part to the old men, and that the mass of the young men were on the eve of joining the rebel ranks; and many persons believed that a strong and prudent hand was required to preserve the State from a condition of practical, if not avowed revolt. The Government had in the State a new and imperfectly organized force of about twenty-five thousand men, while General Sherman, who had recently relieved General Anderson in the command, reported to the war department that the occasion demanded two hundred thousand men. Under these circumstances General Buell assumed command at Louisville on the fifteenth of November, relieving General Sherman, and entered upon the task before him. That task was to gather in the raw regiments that were forming in the different States of his department; organize, equip, and discipline an army; maintain the supremacy of the Union; control the secession element, and give confidence to the loyal citizens of Kentucky; expel from its borders the armed forces of the Confederacy, and carry the arms and authority of the Government into the States in rebellion. Those who fail to keep in mind the general state of confusion and excitement which pervaded the country at that time, the passion and energy of the insurrection, the magnitude of the physical obstacles to be overcome, the total lack of military training and experience among the people, and the scarcity of available officers for the various staff functions, will not appreciate the difficulty of the work to be performed, or do justice to the services of that early period of the war, in comparison with those of a later date, when the military arm of the Government had by practice grown strong and skilful, and the power and confidence of the confederacy had received its first fatal shock. The army which General Buell then formed and put into the field, called the army of the Ohio, afterwards the army of the Cumberland, was the largest of the original army organizations except the army of the Potomac, and it assumed from the first an efficiency and esprit de corps which gave it a marked prominence in the subsequent events of the war.

While the work of organization was going on, the aggressive attitude of the enemy had to be counteracted, and, as is usual under such circumstances, the temper of the southern people and the enthusiasm of revolution gave to their troops a sort of efficiency which had to be offset by the steadier methods of discipline in the northern armies. The main Confederate line at Bowling Green under Albert Sidney Johnson, menaced Louisville, and its partisan cavalry, rendered exceptionally efficient for such service by the personal qualities of the material, and operating in a hot, unfriendly population, produced results which were altogether out of proportion to its numerical strength. To repel an invasion in northeastern Kentucky under General Humphrey Marshall, a brigade was organized and placed under the command of General Garfield, then colonel of the Forty-second Ohio infantry, who defeated Marshall in several engagements, and drove him out of the State.

The following are the instructions under which General Garfield acted, and the general orders commending his success:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE OHIO, }
LOUISVILLE, December 17, 1862. }

Colonel James A. Garfield, Forty-second Ohio Regiment, Commanding Brigade,

SIR: The brigade organized under your command is intended to operate against the rebel force threatening, and indeed actually committing, depredations in Kentucky, through the valley of the Big Sandy.

The actual force of the enemy, from the best information I can gather, does not probably exceed two thousand or two thousand and five hundred, though rumor places it as high as seven thousand. You can better ascertain the true state of the case when you get on the ground.

You are apprised of the position of the troops placed under your command. Go first to Lexington and Paris, and place the Fortieth Ohio regiment in such position as will best give a moral support to the people in the counties on the route to Prestonburgh and Piketon, and oppose any further advance of the enemy on that route. Then proceed with the least possible delay to the mouth of the Big Sandy and move with the force in that vicinity up that river and drive the enemy back, or cut him off. Having done that, Piketon will probably be the best position for you to occupy to guard against further incursions.

Artillery will be of but little if any service to you in that country. If the enemy have any it will encumber and weaken them rather than strengthen them.

Your supplies must mainly be taken up the river; and it ought to be done as soon as possible, while the navigation is open. Purchase what you can in the country through which you operate. Send your requisitions to these headquarters for funds and ordnance stores, and to the quartermaster and commissary at Cincinnati for other supplies.

The conversations I have had with you will suggest more details than can be given here. Report frequently and fully upon all matters concerning your command.

Very respectfully your obedient servant.

D. C. BUELL,
Brigadier General Commanding.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE OHIO, }
LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY, January 20, 1862. }

General Orders No. 4a.]

The general commanding takes occasion to thank Colonel Garfield and his troops for their successful campaign against the rebel force under General Marshall on the Big Sandy, and their gallant conduct in battle. They have overcome formidable difficulties in the character of the country, the condition of the roads, and the inclemency of the season; and, without artillery, have in several engagements, terminating with the battle on Middle Creek on the eleventh inst., driven the enemy from his entrenched positions, and forced him back into the mountains with the loss of a large amount of baggage and stores, and many of his men killed or captured.

These services have called into action the highest qualities of a soldier--fortitude, perseverance, courage.

By command of GENERAL BUELL.

JAMES B. FRY, A. A. G., Chief of Staff.

In December, the confederate general, George B. Crittenden, recently assigned to the command of General Zollicoffer's column, crossed the Cumberland river nearly opposite Somerset, fortified himself at Mill Spring, and threatened central Kentucky. On the thirty-first of December General George H. Thomas was sent with his division, to attack him. The battle of Mill Spring, with a signal victory to the Union arms, was the result of this expedition. Various other expeditions and operations of minor importance, were also executed.

The following are the principal instructions and orders relating to this expedition:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE OHIO, }
LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY, December 29, 1861. }

General:

I send you a sketch of the country about Somerset, which shows more of the roads than your maps. We conversed about the advance on Zollicoffer through Columbia, and if you remember my idea it is hardly necessary to add anything on the subject. It is for you to move against his left and endeavor to cut him off from his bridge, while Schoepf, with whom of course you will communicate, attacks in front. The maps will indicate the proper moves for that object. The result should be at least a severe blow to him, or a hasty flight across the river. But to expect the former, the movement should be made rapidly and secretly, and the blow should be vigorous and decided. There should be no delay after your arrival. It would be better not to have undertaken it if it should result in confining an additional force merely to watching the enemy.

Take such portion of the cavalry from Columbia as you think necessary. Draw all the supplies you can from the country, and move as light as possible.

Having accomplished the object, be ready to move promptly in any direction, but wait until you hear from me, unless circumstances should require you to move without delay, as I may want you to proceed from there to the other matter about which we have conversed.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. C. BUELL.

GEORGE H. THOMAS,

Brigadier general commanding First division, Lebanon.

HEADQUARTERS FIRST DIVISION DEPARTMENT OF THE OHIO, }
CAMP NEAR WEBB'S CROSS ROADS, KENTUCKY, }
January 13, 1862. }

Brigadier General D. C. Buell, commanding department of the Ohio, Louisville, Kentucky.

GENERAL: After two days of the hardest work I have reached this place, sixteen miles from Columbia, with the advance brigade of my division. The provision and ammunition train with a portion of one brigade is still in the rear, and will probably not reach here to-night. The road which has been represented as good, is the worst I ever saw, and the recent rains have made it one continuous quagmire from Columbia to this place. We are still seventeen miles from the position of the enemy by the shortest road, viz: that across the headwaters of Wolf creek, leaving Harrison to the left. This road is represented by my scouts as much worse than the roads the command has already passed over. It is next to impossible to procure either forage or subsistence in the country, and entirely impracticable to haul over this road at this season of the year. It is therefore necessary to do one of two things, either to go to Jamestown and eventually down the river to Burkesville, thereby cutting off all communication between Mill Spring and Nashville by the river, or work our way by this road to Somerset and join General Schoepf. We can never get supplies in any other way. Should my division proceed on to Somerset, it would be impossible to get down the river by the road on this side during the winter, and as Schoepf's force is sufficient to keep the enemy in check, I would respectfully suggest that the troops now with me proceed at once to Jamestown and eventually to Burkesville, from which point their services can be made available in any operations in the direction of Bowling Green.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEORGE H. THOMAS,
Brigadier General U. S. V., commanding.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE OHIO, }
LOUISVILLE, January 17, 1862. }

Brigadier General G. H. Thomas, commanding First Division.

GENERAL: I have received your letter of the thirteenth, from Webb's Cross Roads. You will, before this time, have received my letter of the same date, sent with your messenger. I hope that letter will have determined your action. It is not sufficient to hold Zollicoffer in check. He must be captured or dispersed. I think the situation offers the opportunity of affecting the former. If you consider your force insufficient, telegraph me from Somerset. The lines have been extended to that place. It will not be desirable to march your command to Somerset, but rather take a position in front of the enemy, so as to draw your supplies from Somerset, and be in convenient position to move down upon him. I am assured that you can get an abundance of forage from the country in the direction of Liberty. If you can buy meal, don't haul flour. It is not necessary to subsist your command, but it is not necessary that the established rations shall be exactly followed.

I am aware that the roads are in a horrible condition. They must be improved. The only way to do that effectually, when trains are to pass over them several times, is to corduroy or puncheon them, sixteen feet wide. I have given orders for this to be done on the Danville and Somerset roads. General Schoepf sends a regiment on that duty from Somerset, and General Wood, with three regiments, is to do the same from Danville. See that it is pushed forward energetically from Somerset. It ought to be completed in a few days.

Take some means of informing yourself constantly of the movements of the enemy, and apprise me daily by telegraph.

You could not march to Burkesville, and it is not desirable that you should be there.

Very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

D. C. BUELL,
Brigadier General Commanding.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF OHIO, }
LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY, January 23, 1862. }

General Orders No. 46.]

The general commanding has the gratification of announcing the achievement of an important victory, on the nineteenth inst., at Mill Spring, by the troops under General Thomas, over the rebel forces, some twelve thousand strong, under General George B. Crittenden and General Zollicoffer.

The defeat of the enemy was thorough and complete, and his loss in killed and wounded was great. Night alone, under cover of which his troops crossed the river from their entrenched camp and dispersed, prevented the capture of his entire force. Fourteen or more pieces of artillery, some fifteen hundred horses and mules, his entire camp equipage, together with wagons, arms, ammunition, and other stores to a large amount, fell into our hands.

The general has been charged by the general in chief to convey his thanks to General Thomas and his troops for their brilliant victory. No task could be more grateful to him, seconded as it is by his own cordial approbation of their conduct.

By command of BRIGADIER GENERAL BUELL.

JAMES B. FRY, A. A. G., Chief of Staff.

The subject of a general plan of campaign to be executed as soon as the necessary force was prepared, received the early attention of the new commander, and in a letter, written twelve days after his arrival in Louisville, he submitted to the general-in-chief, General McClellan, his views on that subject. The same plan was, a little later, proposed to General Halleck, who commanded the adjoining department—Missouri. The main confederate force in the west, under the command of General Albert Sidney Johnston, with headquarters at Bowling Green, Kentucky, occupied Bowling Green, fortified behind Barren river. Fort Donelson, on the Cumberland; Fort Henry, on the Tennessee, and Columbus, on the Mississippi. General Buell's plans proposed that Halleck, with a land and naval force, should attack the centre of this line on the Cumberland and Tennessee, while we attacked or turned Bowling Green and moved directly on Nashville. This plan, substantially, was at length executed, though without the concert which, would perhaps, have given better results. General Halleck was not prepared to cooperate when invited, and finally moved without concert, having no idea of further progress than the capture of Fort Henry. But the prompt reinforcements, amounting first and last to twenty-four regiments, with artillery, sent by Buell to the river expedition, and his movement upon Bowling Green and Nashville, brought about a more complete and extended success than Halleck contemplated.

The authorship of the general plan of these operations has been the subject of considerable discussion, though it is difficult to see how there should be any doubt about the matter. It has been claimed by General Grant for himself, and General Sherman claimed it for General Halleck; the letter on which Grant's claim is based was dated the twenty-ninth of January, and only proposed to capture Forts Henry and Donelson, and the official records show that the subject was not broached by Halleck before the twentieth of January. The following are the letters in which the plan was proposed to Generals McClellan and Halleck, by General Buell, on the twenty-seventh of November and third of January respectively:

LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY, November 27, 1861.

MY DEAR GENERAL:—I have not written you very frequently because I could not write definitely, and because such, perhaps exaggerated, importance do I attach to secrecy in these matters, that I have hesitated to put my own thoughts to paper, and I now ask you to keep them to yourself. It is certainly possible that in the end you may have to observe how far the consummation will have fallen short of my plans.

I hope you have not supposed that the introduction of the reinforcements through this point has had any reference to a defence of Louisville. That has not entered my mind at all. I assume that to be safe in any event. I do not place high estimate on Buckner's force at Bowling Green, and I have no such thought as that he will attempt to advance. His position is purely defensive, and he will be quite content if he can maintain that. I have, therefore, thought of no such thing as fortifying Louisville. Sherman threw up a little work at the mouth of Salt river. It may have been judicious when he did it. I have not seen the necessity of it since, though it does no harm.

If you will look carefully at the map you will see that Louisville affords the best base that can be taken for land operations from the north upon any part of Tennessee. The railroad to Lebanon curves around to the northeast behind Salt river, giving, besides the Nashville railroad, three good pike roads, which converge to a point of easy communication for three columns about Glasgow—one by the mouth of Salt river, coming into the railroad at Elizabethtown, one by Bardstown and New Haven, and coming into the direct pike road to Gallatin and Nashville, and one by Lebanon, Shepherdsville, and Greensburg into the same road, while Lebanon junction, New Haven, and Lebanon form convenient points for the departure of as many columns. Lebanon also affords a point of departure for a column on East Tennessee as short as any route; for wagon transportation as short as the route from Cincinnati by Lexington, and shorter and less attended with delay by railroad. Nothing could be more convenient. This point has the further advantage of bringing everything under my eye. I could know nothing of what would be done from a base at Cincinnati. These advantages will not fail to impress themselves upon you without going more into detail.

And now for a plan of campaign. Up to the organization of columns behind Salt river, all the plans I have in view at present concur. Beyond that they diverge, and may be stated briefly thus: First, to establish a sufficient force before Bowling Green to hold Buckner there, while a column moves into East Tennessee by Somerset, and the route we had in view; second, to hold him in check while a column moves rapidly past him on Nashville by the turnpike via Gallatin; and third, holding him in check at Bowling Green and throwing in columns on both the Somerset and Nashville routes. The choice of these must depend on circumstances, which may vary in the meantime, or which may not now be clearly perceived. In conjunction with either of these should be the movement of the flotilla columns up the Tennessee and Cumberland, so as at least to land and winter near the State line, and cut off communication between Bowling Green and Columbus, and, perhaps run directly into Nashville. A strong demonstration should, at the same time, be made on Columbus by the Mississippi. The details of all this, such as the destruction of railroads, so as to cut off communication, and a thousand other details, I do not go into, nor is it necessary. You can imagine them all.

All this, I hope, you will at least say looks plausible; more than that, I hope it is reasonable, and believe it is practicable though I would not like you to forget that circumstances not fully foreseen may mar it in part. For the water movements, means are necessary which I have not the control of; that is, gunboats and transports. The troops which you promise from Missouri could be used for the purpose, and ought to move at my signal. I should take the troops from Paducah for one of them, and replace them by those which probably would not be as well disciplined and equipped.

Thus far I have studiously avoided any movements which to the enemy would have the appearance of activity or method. The points occupied are pretty much the same as when I arrived, except that a regiment has now and then been moved into position, and Thomas has gradually been closing in upon Lebanon. I shall in a couple of days, at most, complete the matter of organizing brigades and divisions as the troops come in, and begin to get them into position. We are now "lying around somewhat loose," and I shall not care much if some of our fragments have to look sharply after themselves. We are at the mouth of Salt river, Elizabethtown, Nolin, Columbia, Campbellsville, at the points on the Lebanon railroad, Somerset, London, Crab Orchard, and Dick Robinson, and on the lower Green river. The latter force is composed mostly of Kentucky regiments, half organized. I shall probably keep them to make a demonstration on Russellville and Hopkinsville at the proper time. We have occasional stampedes at the outposts, but I do not allow myself to be much troubled about them. Such an one we have now on the lower Green river, where Breckenridge is said to be advancing with eight thousand men. He may have two thousand five hundred or three thousand. Another at Somerset, where Zollicoffer is said to be crossing with ten thousand. He may have four or five thousand, and he may cross a regiment or two.

As the troops come they go into camp five miles from the city, under Mitchell, who is attentive and subordinate, and where they replenish their worn out clothes and outfit and go to drilling. Nelson has been in camp a day, and, I am informed, has already got into a difficulty with Mitchell; and, if I am rightly informed, has behaved very absurdly. As he is a veteran, some allowance must be made for him.

There are at Indianapolis seven regiments ready for service, but demoralized by the proximity of friends and the want of discipline and instruction. I propose to form them into a reserve and camp of instruction at Bardstown, which is a convenient place in many respects. I can make no use of them in an advance. The Kentucky regiments are only partially organized, and can be but little used at present.

If I were to go into my affairs, I should have the appearance of complaining over difficulties. I am greatly in need of general and staff officers. My own staff force is entirely insufficient, but I have no means of augmenting it with advantage. As for myself I should pay a very high compliment, if I hoped to come up to the expectations which you first formed. I am afraid I shall have to ask a little patience.

Very truly, yours,

D. C. BUELL.

MAJOR GENERAL GEORGE B. MCCLELLAN,
Commanding United States army.

LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY, December 10, 1861.

MY DEAR GENERAL:—As I informed you by telegraph, I received your letters on the third and fifth. I have by no means been unmindful of your wishes in regard to East Tennessee, and I think I can both appreciate and write in your sympathy for a people who have shown so much constancy. That constancy will still sustain them until the hour of deliverance. I have no fear of their being crushed. The allegiance of such people to hated rulers, even if it could be enforced for the moment, will only make them the more determined and ready to resist when the hour of rescue comes.

The organization of the division at Lebanon has been with special reference to the object which you have so much at heart, though, fortunately, it is one which suits all contingencies that can arise. I shall hasten its preparation with all the energy and industry I can bring to bear. The plans which I have in view embrace that fully; but the details and the final determination—while there is yet time to watch the progress of circumstances which might affect our plans vitally—I think I should lack that ordinary discretion by which I hope to retain your confidence, if I did not reserve. When the preparation of that division is complete, which I hope will be very soon, if I then see reasons why it should be merged into the general line of operations, I will give you the reasons and you shall be the judge of them; and, if you do not see force in them, I assure you I will pursue your views with as much zeal and hopefulness, and, perhaps, more energy than if I entirely concurred in them. You do not know me well yet if you think I cannot do this. And now for the other side of the field. I feel more anxiety about it than any other, because I have less control over the means that ought to bear on it, and have less knowledge of their details if I had the control. I do not know well—scarcely at all—the description and capacity of the gunboats and transports that are to be used, and I do not know anything about the quality of the troops and officers. I have not seen Smith for seven years, and am afraid to judge him. I have never rated him as highly as some men. The expedition requires nothing more, as matters now stand, than ordinary nerve and good judgment, and ability to command men. The troops ought, of course, to be the best we can command. The object is not to fight great battles and storm impregnable fortifications, but, by demonstrations and manœuvring, to prevent the enemy from concentrating his scattered forces. In doing this, it must be expected there will be some fighting; it may be pretty good fighting. I suppose that ten thousand men, with two batteries, would not be too great an estimate for each of the rivers, if the enemy should do all that he probably can do. The precise manner of conducting expeditions depends so much on local knowledge that I can hardly venture on its details; but, at least, the expeditions should go as rapidly as possible to the nearest point where the road crosses the peninsula: that is, to Dover and Fort Henry. And the first thing then to be done is to destroy the bridges and ferries; then act momentarily on the defensive, unless the weakness of the enemy or a trepidation in his force should give a good opportunity to attack. I think the first serious opposition will be found at Fort Henry, and at an island battery four or five miles below Dover; but my information is not very complete as to the strength of these works. It would be probably necessary to stop there. Fort Henry is said by civilians to be strong. I cannot learn yet the number of guns. There have been some seven thousand troops there. We will probably find that number there. It is about six miles below the railroad bridge. I should not expect to meet any considerable force at Dover, but, perhaps, seven or eight thousand at Clarksville, where they are fortifying. If they succeed in getting out of Bowling Green, which, I believe, they will try to do as soon as they see us advancing, unless their force and armament are increased, of course the number at Clarksville may be expected to be greater.

The demonstration on Columbus and the Mississippi should, at least, be on such a scale that it can be converted into a real attack if they detach anything; better still, if it can attack in any event.

You must be patient if you find my letter vague and unsatisfactory. I have had to satisfy a deputation acting under a joint resolution of the legislature, that it was hardly necessary or expedient at this time to appoint a certain person "provost marshal, with all proper power, and giving to him such military force as he may deem essential for a prompt and proper enforcement and execution of the laws, and a suppression of all lawless and marauding excursions into northeastern Kentucky." I believe I succeeded pretty well, and perhaps after that I ought not to have attempted a coherent letter. Your own judgment will satisfy its deficiencies. Please have Rosecrans take care of his revolted subjects along the Big Sandy. We are established at Mumfordsville. Truly yours,

D. C. BUELL.

MAJOR GENERAL GEORGE B. MCCLELLAN,
Commanding United States army.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE OHIO, }
LOUISVILLE, January 3, 1862. }

GENERAL: I received your dispatch, and, with more delay than I meant, proceed to the subject of it in compliance with your request, and, I may add, also at the wish of the President.

I do not underrate the difficulties in Missouri, and I think it is not extravagant to say that the great power of the rebellion in the west is arrayed on a front the planks of which are Columbus and Bowling Green, and the centre about where the railroad between these points crosses the Tennessee and Cumberland rivers. Including Nashville and the fortified points below, it is, I have no doubt, within bounds to estimate their force on that line at eighty thousand men; including a column about Somerset, Kentucky, in rear of their right flank, it is more.

Of this force, forty thousand may be set down as at Bowling Green; twenty thousand at Columbus, though you doubtless have more information on that point than I have; and twenty thousand at the centre. Considering the railroad facilities which enable the enemy to concentrate in a few hours on any single point of this front, you will at once see the importance of a combined attack on its centre and flanks, or at least of demonstrations which may be converted into real attacks, and fully occupy the enemy on the whole front. It is probable that you may have given the subject, as far as Columbus and the Centre are concerned, more attention than I have. With reference to the former, at least, I can make no more than the general suggestion already expressed, that it should be fully occupied.

The attack upon the centre should be made by two gunboat expeditions, with, I should say, twenty thousand men on the two rivers. They should, of course, be organized with reference to the depth of the water in the rivers; and whether they should be of equal or unequal strength, would depend upon that and other considerations, and can hardly be determined until the moment of departure. The mode of attack must depend upon the strength of the enemy at the several points and the features of the localities. It will be of the first importance to break the railroad communication, and, if possible, that should be done by columns moving rapidly to the bridges over the Cumberland and the Tennessee. The former, probably, would not be reached as first, being some thirty-one miles above the first principal battery that I know of at Dover. The other is eighteen miles above Fort Henry—the first I know of on the Tennessee. If the expedition should not be strong enough to do the work alone, they should establish themselves firmly at the nearest possible point, and remain at least until they ascertained that reinforcements from my column or some other source would not reach them. By uniting they could establish themselves permanently under the protection of the gunboats.

I say this much rather to lay the subject before you, than to propose any definite plan for your side. Whatever is done should be done speedily, within a few days. The work will become more difficult every day. Please let me hear from you at once.

Very truly, yours,

D. C. BUELL,

Brigadier General Commanding.

GENERAL H. W. HALLECK,

Commanding Department of the Missouri.

The events happened in this order: The gunboats under Commodore Foot, supported by a land force under General Grant, captured Fort Henry, February 6th; Grant and the navy, with the reinforcements which Buell had sent, appeared before Fort Donelson February 12th and 14th; Buell's force appeared before Bowling Green, commenced crossing and demonstrating towards Nashville, February 14th, Johnston having, on his approach, burnt the bridges and retired to Nashville. Fort Donelson surrendered to Grant, February 16th, and on the approach of Buell, Johnston burnt the bridges over the Cumberland, and retired south from Nashville, which Buell occupied February 25.

The following order, issued on this occasion, is not so interesting for the announcement of the mere fact of occupation, as for the policy which it avowed in the prosecution of the war:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE OHIO, }
NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE, February 26, 1862. }

General Order No. 13a.]

The General Commanding congratulates his troops that it has been their privilege to restore the national banner to the capital of Tennessee. He believes that thousands of hearts in every part of the State will swell with joy to see that honored flag reinstated in a position from which it was removed in the excitement and folly of an evil hour; that the voice of her own people will soon proclaim its welcome, and that their manhood and patriotism will protect and perpetuate it.

The general does not deem it necessary, though the occasion is a fit one, to remind his troops of the rule of conduct they have hitherto observed and are still to pursue. We are in arms, not for the purpose of invading the rights of our fellow countrymen anywhere, but to maintain the integrity of the Union, and protect the constitution under which its people have been prosperous and happy. We cannot, therefore, look with indifference on any conduct which is designed to give aid and comfort to those who are endeavoring to defeat these objects; but the action to be taken in such cases rests with certain authorized persons, and is not to be assumed by individual officers or soldiers. Peaceable citizens are not to be molested in their persons or property. Any wrongs to either are to be promptly corrected and the offenders brought to punishment. To this end all persons are desired to make complaint to the immediate commander of officers or soldiers so offending, and if justice be not done promptly, then to the next commander, and so on until the wrong is redressed. If the necessities of the public service should require the use of private property for public purposes, fair compensation is to be allowed. No such appropriation of private property is to be made except by the authority of the highest commander present, and any other officer or soldier who shall presume to exercise such privilege shall be brought to trial. Soldiers are forbidden to enter the residences or grounds of citizens on any plea without authority.

No arrests are to be made without the authority of the commanding general, except in case of actual offence against the authority of the Government; and in all such cases the fact and circumstances will immediately be reported in writing to headquarters through the intermediate commanders.

The general reminds his officers that the most frequent depredations are those which are committed by worthless characters who straggle from the ranks on the plea of being unable to march; and where the inability really exists, it will be found in most instances that the soldier has overloaded himself with useless and unauthorized articles. The orders already published on this subject must be enforced.

The condition and behavior of a corps are sure indications of the efficiency and fitness of its officers. If any regiment shall be found to disregard that propriety of conduct which belongs to soldiers as well as citizens, they must not expect to occupy the posts of honor, but may rest assured that they will be placed in positions where they cannot bring shame on their comrades and the cause they are engaged in. The Government supplies with liberality all the wants of the soldier. The occasional deprivations and hardships incident to rapid marches must be borne with patience and fortitude. Any officer who neglects to provide properly for his troops, or separates himself from them to seek his own comfort, will be held to a rigid accountability.

By command of General Buell.

JAMES B. FRY, A. A. G., Chief of Staff.

The confederate forces concentrated south of the Tennessee river, under the command of Albert Sidney Johnston, after the evacuation of Nashville, and Buell's command, for military operations, was, on the twelfth of March, merged into that of Halleck. After sending a division under General O. M. Mitchel to occupy north Alabama, organizing a division under General G. W. Morgan to operate from Kentucky against Cumberland Gap, and leaving a suitable force at Nashville and other places on his lines of communication, Buell marched in the latter part of March with five divisions, about thirty-seven thousand men, to form a junction with the forces of Halleck on the Tennessee river. He arrived at Savannah, the place appointed for the junction, with his leading division the evening before the battle of Shiloh, or Pittsburgh Landing. When the battle opened the following morning, he ordered forward the division (Nelson's) already arrived, sent instructions to the rear divisions to press on by forced march, and in person went to the river on a steamer to the field of battle. The head of his column, under Nelson, arrived in time to repel an attack which the confederates made immediately at the landing, to which the troops of Grant had been driven back at the close of the first day. Three of his divisions came up that night, a fourth the following day, and at daylight on the seventh the enemy was attacked, and by four o'clock in the evening, driven from the field. General Lew Wallace's fresh division, and such other fragments of Grant's army as retained any organization from the disaster of the previous day, took part in the battle of the seventh. The confederates fell back to Corinth, which they fortified, and from which they were forced to retire May 30th, by the combined armies under Halleck. The army of the Ohio, under Buell, occupied the centre in this advance.

After the retreat of the confederates from Corinth, Buell with his army was again detailed to operate against East Tennessee. He moved into north Alabama with four divisions (twenty-five thousand men), making (June 31st) his headquarters temporarily at Huntsville, while repairing the railroads to his base of supplies at Louisville, three hundred miles distant. His remaining division, under General Thomas, arrived July 31st. The movement from the first was delayed by the orders of Halleck, requiring him to repair and guard the Memphis & Charleston railroad east of Corinth.

In the meantime the confederate forces in East Tennessee were reenforced by General Bragg, with the bulk of the Corinth army, making an aggregate force of not less than sixty thousand men, which by the twenty-eighth of July was available for prompt concentration at Chattanooga or elsewhere in East Tennessee. Its superior cavalry force operated with great effect upon the long lines of the Union army, breaking up the railroads and cutting off its supplies.

The effort to defeat these partisan operations by combining light infantry with the totally insufficient Union cavalry, and by local guards, was unsuccessful, and on the tenth of August the confederate cavalry under Forrest and Morgan, effectually severed the line of supplies of the Union army by an extensive destruction of the railroad north of Nashville.

About the same time the whole confederate force in East Tennessee assumed the offensive. General Kirby Smith, starting from Knoxville, passed the mountains to the left of Cumberland Gap, which the division under General G. W. Morgan had occupied and fortified in time.

Upon hearing of Smith's movement Buell dispatched General Nelson with a few experienced officers and two batteries of artillery to organize such troops as could be got together in Kentucky to repel Smith's invasion. Smith encountered Nelson's force, composed of raw troops, at Richmond, defeated it (August 30th) and advanced into central Kentucky, threatening Louisville and Cincinnati.

Simultaneously with Smith's advance Bragg crossed the Tennessee river at and near Chattanooga with the bulk of his army, threatening middle Tennessee and Nashville. The Union army, which occupied various points for repairing the roads and with a view to the forward movement for which it had been preparing, was immediately put in readiness for concentration.

McCook, with his own and Crittenden's divisions, was ordered from the mouth of Battle creek up the Sequatchy valley to watch and oppose the enemy's advance, and when pressed, to fall back for concentration on the road to McMinnville. He advanced a short distance and returned, supposing that the enemy had already anticipated him on the McMinnville road. This supposition proved to be incorrect, and it threw the army out of position for efficient observation, gave an erroneous impression of the rate of the enemy's progress, and kept the army a week about McMinnville awaiting his approach, of which at the end of that time there was yet no intelligence. The army was now reduced to ten days' supplies, and assuming Nashville to be the enemy's first objective point, it was necessary to put the army in a position which would enable it best to oppose that design and at the same time reopen its communication with Louisville. Orders were therefore given on the thirtieth of August for concentrating at Murfreesborough on the fifth of September. Pending this movement the head of Bragg's column crossed the mountain and appeared at Sparta on the second of September, and instead of turning towards Nashville, moved towards the Cumberland river, which it crossed at Carthage and Gainsborough. This change in the anticipated route of the enemy caused the movement of the Union army upon Nashville, and the sending of a division for the protection of Bowling Green, where some supplies had been gathered; and on learning that the bulk of the confederate army was marching in the same direction, Buell started with the army of the Ohio in pursuit, after leaving a suitable force to hold Nashville, which he had previously commenced to fortify. The enemy halted involuntarily at Glasgow, but continued his march to Mumfordsville, where a Federal force of about four thousand men, with artillery, strongly fortified, but heedlessly exposed to such a danger by the authority at Louisville, not then under Buell's command, surrendered to Bragg on the seventeenth without resistance. There was skirmishing between the two armies and preparations for battle at Mumfordsville, but on the twenty-first the confederate army, followed closely by the Union army, moved towards Louisville until near Elizabethtown, when it turned off toward Bardstown. That deflection indicated a speedy junction of Bragg and Kirby Smith, and perhaps an attack on Louisville, where a force of raw troops was gathering. Instead, therefore, of turning off to continue the pursuit, Buell marched directly on to Louisville, where his rear division arrived on the night of the twenty-ninth.

The new regiments were immediately incorporated into the old organizations, and on the first of October the army moved against the enemy, who then occupied Bardstown and Frankfort. The news of this advance brought to a hurried conclusion the ceremonies of inaugurating a State governor at Frankfort, in which Bragg was at the moment engaged. Sharp skirmishing occurred in both lines, the confederates retiring for concentration until the Bardstown column reached Perryville, where, October 8th, a severe but indecisive battle, lasting until night, was fought between portions of the two armies. The Union army moved forward at six o'clock next morning to renew the battle, but the confederates had withdrawn. There was further concentration on both sides and manoeuvring for battle, but on the twelfth Bragg commenced to retreat on Cumberland Gap. He was followed, and his rear guard engaged at various points as far as London, when seeing no prospect of further advantage, Buell, October 17th, discontinued the pursuit, and directed his army by way of Glasgow and Bowling Green upon Murfreesborough, in anticipation of Bragg's movement against middle Tennessee and Nashville. Pending this movement, October 30th, the army being then in the vicinity of Glasgow and Bowling Green, he turned over the command to General Rosecrans, in obedience to news from Washington. Previously, September 29th, while at Louisville, he had been ordered to relinquish the command to General Thomas, but the order was countermanded at the request of Thomas and others.

In reporting, October 16th, the movement he had determined upon, he added:

While I shall proceed with these dispositions, deeming them to be proper for the public interest, it is meet that I should say that the present time is, perhaps, as convenient as any for making any change that may be thought desirable in the command of this army.

He was thanked by the department for the service rendered, but there immediately arose some disagreement between him and the department as to the plan of further operations. He, however, adhered to his views, and continued the movement which he had announced, and, as stated, surrendered his command pending its execution.

In November a court of inquiry was ordered to investigate his operations during the summer and fall. The court was in session more than five months, and much oral and documentary evidence was taken; but the proceedings were never published, and when called for some years afterwards by Congress, the voluminous record was found to have disappeared from the archives of the War department. Twice after the inquiry General Buell was offered commands under his juniors, Sherman and Camby, but declined. He was then mustered out of the volunteer service May 23, 1864, and on the first of June resigned his commission in the regular army. In 1865 he took part in coal and iron interest in Kentucky, where he now (1881) resides.

In this sketch nothing has been attempted but a brief outline of the more prominent facts, omitting many important details, and all discussion of the actual or relative value of General Buell's services as a commander during the Rebellion. The fact is not to be ignored that perhaps no high officer in the war was the subject of so much party criticism as he during the last six months of his command. Though in his own mind repelling the injustice of this criticism, he has not seen proper to make much public protest against it, and it does not come within the scope of this sketch to analyze facts for the purpose of pointing out how much of the harsh judgment was bestowed without discernment or justice, how much was due to a state of the public mind, which, it must be confessed, was often disposed to regard passionate, or at least practical partizanship, as an element of patriotic duty, and how much to the machinations of hostile ambitions and personal resentment. It does not appear that the War department shared fully in the disapprobation to which a portion of the public press gave loud expression, but it yielded to a popular clamor, or rather to the dictation of political and personal influences which first shaped the popular prejudice, and then derived strength and reward from its support. It may, however, be proper to say in the direction of impartial criticism, that in reviewing the operations of the army under General Buell in the summer and fall of 1862, and comparing them with similar operations of other dates and other commanders on the same and other fields, it is impossible not to be impressed by the contrast in the popular feeling with reference to the different periods. These contrasts indicate, perhaps, a more politic conformity of the later commanders to the popular idea of the war, and fortunately, also to a more patient appreciation by the popular judgment of the obstacles to be overcome.

The following is the order with which General Buell relinquished the command of the army:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE OHIO, }
LOUISVILLE, KY., October 30, 1862. }

General Orders, No. 150.

In obedience to orders from the headquarters of the army, Major-General Buell relinquishes the command of the district and Army of the Ohio to Major-General W. S. Rosecrans.

It is impossible for the general without feelings of regard and a warm interest in their future success, to part with troops whom he has been the instrument of converting for the most part from raw levies into a powerful army, honored by common consent for its discipline and efficient organization, for its esprit de corps, and for victories unqualified by a single reverse; and whose fortunes he has followed for a twelve month over a field of operations embracing considerable portions of our States, through difficulties and dangers which its fortitude and courage have mastered without accident or failure. It has recently, by a rapid march of some five hundred miles with limited subsistence, often with an inadequate supply of water, returned to Kentucky and driven from her borders a powerful army; and having reestablished its communications is now well on its way to meet the enemy at other points. The occasion is not convenient for recounting its services during the past twelve months, but the army may safely recur to them with pride. If anything has not been accomplished which was practicable within the sphere of its duty, the general cheerfully holds himself responsible for the failure.

The general reflects with pride that the army under his command has for the most part been free from petty jealousies and intrigues—that it has neither indulged in vain boasting, nor tarnished its high character by bickerings and low criminations. It will enhance his gratification if it shall carry to its new commander—who already has earned its confidence and respect by distinguished service—the same noble qualities which have characterized it since its organization. He will pray that it may be the instrument of speedily restoring the Union to its integrity; and there is no individual in its rank in whose honor and welfare he will not feel a special interest.

By command of Major-General Buell.

JAMES B. FRY, colonel and chief of staff.

GENERAL H. F. DEVOL.

Among the regiments in the late Rebellion to which Washington county contributed her "bravest and best," the gallant Thirty-sixth stands prominent. The history of this regiment is sketched at another place in this volume, but an outline of the life of its worthy colonel will be of interest, both to his military friends and the public.

H. F. Devol, the youngest son of Stephen Devol, jr., was born in Waterford township August 6, 1831. His boyhood was spent in the country school and on his father's farm. At the age of sixteen, a courageous spirit, and a desire for more extended educational advantages led him to seek independence from parental dictation. He then attended Beverly academy for a short time, and two years later made his first trip south in the produce trade. From this time till the opening of the Rebellion Mr. Devol devoted his summers to farming and his winters to flatboating and trade.

He married, May 15, 1856, Adelaide A. Dyer, of Muskingum township, by whom he had two children—Hattie A. and Carroll, who is a graduate of Pennsylvania Military institute, and was, in 1879, appointed by President Hayes lieutenant in the regular army. Mrs. Devol died July 10, 1860.

In the winter of 1860 Mr. Devol witnessed the first overt acts of the important drama in which he became an actor. Being south with a cargo of produce he experienced some of the inconveniences of that disturbed period. The spirit of secession was aroused, and northern merchants became objects of hatred. Their boats were not permitted to land at many places, while at others obstructions were thrown in the way of sales and collections. Mr. Devol, however, did not suffer serious financial loss, but his experience aroused him to action on returning home. He had been a witness of secession. It was in store for him to take a part in the bloodiest acts of the tragedy then opening, and eventually to stand in the line of triumphant soldiery with a full share of military glory.

When the first call for volunteers for the three years' service was made, Mr. Devol set to work to enlisting a company, from Waterford, Adams and Muskingum townships. It was the intention to enroll this company in the Thirtieth Ohio volunteer infantry, then being formed at Cincinnati. Mr. Devol had acted without a commission and without direction, and borne all the expenses out of his own pocket. When the company met at Lowell for organization, Colonel Melvin Clarke appeared with a commission to organize a new regiment, and informed Captain Devol that Colonel Groesbeck's regiment (Thirtieth Ohio volunteer infantry) was full. Captain Devol enlisted his men in the new regiment, and when the quota was full they were properly enrolled as "company A."

The company was reported August 1, 1861, and Mr. Devol was commissioned captain August 13th. From the time of being mustered in until peace illuminated their blood-stained bayonets, the Thirty-sixth was in active, efficient, and dangerous service, and during all that period Mr. Devol was with his men—with them both in camp and battlefield. He was promoted to the rank of major, September 7, 1862; to lieutenant colonel September 16, 1862, and to the colonelcy, for valuable and valiant conduct on the field of Chickamauga, October 13, 1862. In this battle Colonel Devol took a conspicuous and important part. When the battle opened Colonel

Jones was in command of the regiment and General Turchin of the brigade. In the afternoon the brigade was thrown in front of the enemy's centre. At a critical moment the advance line was driven back and Turchin's brigade, consisting of the Thirty-sixth and Ninety-second Ohio and Fourteenth Kentucky, was brought in face of a hot fire. To retreat would be disastrous. Brave boys were falling fast, and Lieutenant Colonel Devol, impatient for an order, grasped the situation, assumed command, and ordered a charge. A moment later positions were changed. The rebel ranks were broken and the brave brigade, encouraged by the bold movement of their temporary commander, followed close in pursuit for a distance of more than three hundred yards, when a retreat was ordered. They passed back through the gap in the enemy's line which this bold charge had brought to a halt, and given the Union troops time to reorganize on that day. Colonel Devol proved his soldierly instincts. Colonel Jones had been mortally wounded, and the brigade commander was not at his post. It was left for a lieutenant colonel to give the command which materially effected the fortunes of that celebrated battle. General Thomas and General Reynolds heartily complimented his soldierly conduct.

At Berryville an incident occurred which exemplifies his bravery. The brigade was ordered by General Hayes, then in command, to lie down to escape a destructive fire of the enemy. But in disobedience to the protestations of their soldiers, General Hayes and Colonel Devol remained standing at their posts where they could watch changing movements.

Colonel Devol was always found with his regiment and, indeed, was in one more engagement than his regiment. His rank during the greater period of the war was that of colonel, but on several occasions he was thrown in command of a brigade. This was the case at Cedar Creek, when General Hayes' brigade was under his command. At this battle the army of West Virginia, under command of General Crook, to which this brigade belonged, was held as a flanking column. But General Devol, in the excitement of progressing battle, lost his place, and was not a little surprised to find himself urging on with characteristic energy a strange command, engaged in the thickest of the fight. This is an episode of the war which General Hayes delights to tell. Few officers can claim the honor of having been in as many fights as their command, but Cedar Creek places the colonel of the Thirty-sixth one ahead of his regiment. Colonel Devol was brevetted brigadier general July 20, 1865.

During the war he had the singular good fortune to escape with only two slight wounds, and his robust body suffered but little from disease. He enjoyed the friendship and cordial respect of his associates in office and his men. He was always jealous of the fame of his regiment and always ready to protect its standing.

When the time for which the Thirty-sixth enlisted had expired General Devol was found ready to reengage in the service of the Union, and the regiment cheerfully went with him.

At the conclusion of hostilities in 1865 the rank and file of our volunteer soldiery felt that they had accomplished that for which they suffered the pains and dangers of war, and were anxious to return to their families and farms. High salaried officers were accused of selfishly detaining the troops; but General Devol was entirely free from any accusation in this regard. Through his management and influence the regiment with which he went into the service and in which he had a warm interest was one of the first Ohio regiments mustered out of the service.

The war over, he returned to Waterford, and in 1866 he purchased the mercantile establishment of Charles Bowen, where he has since devoted himself closely to business. He has never had an ambition for political preferment, but is by no means indifferent to the duties of citizenship. His political creed was enunciated in his farewell address to the Thirty-sixth, when he said:

Comrades, you can go to your homes with the happy consciousness that you have done your duty to your country and yourselves; and when you again resume the privileges and responsibilities of citizenship, be as unflinching in defending the sacred Temple of Liberty with the ballot as you have been with the bullet, and all will be well.

He was appointed by General Hayes, while governor of Ohio, one of the trustees of Athens asylum for the insane. The relations between the President and himself have been the most cordial since their acquaintance in the Rebellion.

General Devol is a leading member of the Beverly Presbyterian church, is superintendent of the Sunday-school, and a valuable supporter of religious and moral movements in the community. He has acquired a handsome competence, and uses it liberally both in public improvements and in answering the prayers of multiplied charities. General Devol married, April 3, 1867, Harriet E. Bowen, by whom he had four children, George H., Mary B., Florence W., and Ermine B.

GENERAL RUFUS R. DAWES.

The year 1861 found Rufus R. Dawes in Jeneau county, Wisconsin. He had graduated with the class of 1860 at Marietta college, and like many young men who strike out from home at that period, had gone to the west which offered newer and broader fields of advancement. Born July 4, 1838, he was then in his twenty-third year. Upon the beginning of hostilities, he at once raised a company. This was in April, 1861. He was chosen captain and commissioned May 3, 1861. The company was composed principally of lumbermen and farmers, and was known as "The Lemonier Minute Men." The company became "K," of the Sixth Wisconsin volunteer infantry.

They were mustered into the United States service at Madison, Wisconsin, July 16, 1861, for three years, and went at once to Washington, D. C. They were kept in camp of instructions during the winter of 1861-2. In the spring of 1862 they were with General McDowell, attached to the "pendulum division" oscillating between Fredericksburgh and Catlett's Station, while General McClellan was enacting the tragedy of the Peninsula campaign. On July 1, 1862, Captain Dawes was promoted to major of the regiment.

On the morning of August 21, 1865, commenced the battle of the Rappahannock. Major Dawes' regiment was engaged three days supporting artillery and skirmishing at the fords. Captain Frank Buell was killed a short distance to their right at Freeman's Ford.

The battle of Gainesville was fought on the evening of August 28th. His brigade and a New York and Pennsylvania regiment engaged, at short musket range, Ewell's division of Stonewall Jackson's army. These six regiments suffered a loss of twelve hundred killed and wounded in forty-five minutes firing. Our troops held their ground. This was conceded to have been one of the most desperate struggles against large odds that occurred during the war.

In the second battle of Bull Run his regiment was hotly engaged, and suffered a severe loss. They left the field in perfect line before the enemy and the regiment formed the basis of two new alignments of the corps to check the advancing enemy. They left the field at 10 o'clock, P. M., covering the retreat of the entire army.

At the battle of South Mountain, Major Dawes commanded the left wing of his regiment which formed part of the assaulting column. They lost ninety killed and wounded out of four hundred engaged. General McClellan pronounced the brigade, for their admirable conduct on this occasion, equal to the best troops of any army in the world.

In the battle of Antietam he commanded the regiment during most of the battle, and took two hundred and eighty-six officers and men into action, of whom one hundred and fifty-two were killed or wounded. The flag staff of the regiment was struck while in Major Dawes' hands—all of the color guards having been disabled, it became necessary for him to carry the colors to maintain his organization.

At the battle of Fredericksburgh his regiment was engaged on the left of the line of General Franklin's grand division. Loss not severe. In Burnside's mud march his regiment took part, suffering severely from cold, rain, mud and hunger. Major Dawes was promoted to lieutenant colonel, March 24, 1863.

At the battle of Fitzhugh's Crossing, April 29, 1863, the Sixth Wisconsin and Twenty-fourth Michigan, under command of Lieutenant Colonel Dawes, were selected by General John F. Reynolds to force a crossing of the Rappahannock below Fredericksburgh. They rowed across the river in pontoon boats under musketry fire from the enemy's rifle pits; charged up a precipitous bank, captured the rifle pits and two hundred prisoners. General Reynolds pronounced it the most gallant dash he ever witnessed. Lieutenant Colonel Dawes was slightly wounded in the hand in this action.

In the battle of Chancellorsville his regiment participated, but was not heavily engaged, and covered the retreat of the army, crossing the last at the United States ford.

At the battle of Gettysburgh, Lieutenant Colonel Dawes commanded the regiment, and was engaged on the first of July. He charged upon and captured officers, men and battle flag of the Second Mississippi rebel regiment. In this charge he lost two hundred men killed and wounded, of four hundred and fifty in the line. General Doubleday, commanding the corps, in his official report, uses the following language as to the engagement:

The moment was a critical one, involving the defeat, perhaps the utter route of our forces. I immediately sent for one of Meredith's regiments, the Sixth Wisconsin, a gallant body of men, whom I knew could be relied upon. Forming them rapidly perpendicular to the line of battle, on the enemy's flank, I directed them to attack immediately. Lieutenant Colonel Dawes, their commander, ordered a charge, which was gallantly executed. The enemy made a hurried attempt to change front to meet the attack, and flung his troops into a railroad cut for safety. . . . The cut was carried at the point of the bayonet, and two regiments of Davis' (rebel) brigade taken prisoners.

Of the retreat through Gettysburgh the general says:

The Sixth Wisconsin marched through the streets in a body, stopping from time to time to return the fire of the enemy, and giving hearty cheers for the good old cause and the Sixth Wisconsin volunteers.

He says further:

The commander of the regiment, Lieutenant Colonel R. R. Dawes, proved himself one of the ablest officers on the field.

Brigadier General Solomon Meredith wrote to the governor of Wisconsin:

The Sixth Wisconsin was temporarily detached from my command, and although they met a superior force, yet they captured an entire regiment of the enemy. I can pay these gallant men no higher tribute than to testify, as I here do, that on this, as upon all other occasions, Lieutenant Colonel Dawes, his officers and men, fully sustained the honor of your State.

Second day.—Lieutenant Colonel Dawes, when arriving at Culp's Hill, began at once the construction of rifle pits, without orders. This example, promptly followed on the right, undoubtedly saved a defeat there. The enemy carried the rifle pits on Culp's Hill, on the right of the Sixth Wisconsin, about 8 P. M. Lieutenant Colonel Dawes charged upon and dislodged the Tenth Virginia (rebel) regiment, and repossessed the works in his own front. The line of pits was on the slope of the hill. They charged from the summit with an irresistible momentum, rolling the enemy down the hill before them.

Third day.—The Sixth Wisconsin was not heavily engaged, but from its position on Culp's Hill, overlooked the whole field of battle.

Battle of Mine Run.—Took part in the engagement, but were not heavily engaged.

In the battles of the Wilderness—first day—his regiment was desperately engaged on the morning of May 5th. They advanced upon the enemy through woods, brush, and swamps, driving them along their own front; but the assaulting column had exposed their flank, and not being properly supported, the enemy suddenly attacked them in flank and rear, and the corps (Fifth) was thrown into confusion and forced back. The fighting in the swamps and brush was entirely with muskets and bayonets, and owing to the intermingling of hostile lines in thick underbrush, it was terribly fierce and bloody.

On the second day the Sixth Wisconsin was moved to the right, to the relief of the Second corps, and was ordered to attack the enemy early in the morning of the sixth. Accordingly, at daylight they moved out to the assault. Then ensued one of the most deadly musketry struggles of the war. Hill's corps was forced back two miles, when suddenly Longstreet's corps came into action, and at 10 o'clock A. M. the National line was forced back as far as Spottsylvania Court House road. May 6, 1864, Lieutenant Colonel Dawes assumed permanent command of the regiment.

After the terrible fighting of the two days above mentioned, they skirmished all day of the seventh, and marched all that night toward Spottsylvania Court House.

Battle of Laurel Hill or Tod's Tavern.—About 10 o'clock A. M. of the eighth they encountered General Hood's division of Longstreet's corps, and immediately gave battle, attacking them and driving them back to the summit of a low range of hills with slopes covered with thick underbrush. At this point the Union advance was checked and forced back with some loss. Colonel Dawes formed his regiment as a basis of a new alignment of the division, upon which they immediately entrenched. The enemy advanced about 12 o'clock M., and were easily repulsed. The two lines now confronted each other for several days, skirmishing heavily, at short range. On the tenth the Sixth Wisconsin, with other troops, made an unsuccessful charge on the enemy, who was now strongly entrenched. All day of the eleventh was taken up in heavy skirmishing.

In the battle of May 12th Colonel Dawes' regiment was, with other troops, engaged in two desperate and unsuccessful assaults on the enemy's position, in columns five lines deep, the slaughter being simply horrible. The leaves took fire from burning wads, and the wounded between the lines were burned to death under the eyes of their comrades, who were powerless to aid them. The impracticability of carrying this strongly entrenched position by assault, with a column broken by scrambling through thick laurel brush, was so clearly demonstrated on the ninth that some of the bravest soldiers fell on their faces, crying: "That's played out; you can't shove us into that slaughter pen again."

Battle of Spottsylvania Court House.—Immediately after this they marched on the double-quick five miles to the left, where General Hancock had carried the enemy's line. A bitter struggle had been raging all day between the enemy and troops of the Sixth army corps for the possession of a salient called by newspaper correspondents "The Angle of Death." The Sixth Wisconsin, with four other regiments, was selected by General Russell (afterwards killed at Fisher's Hill) as a forlorn hope to assault this salient. Fortunately, General Hancock countermanded the order. The ground in front of this work was wet and boggy, and the tramp of forty thousand feet had rendered it a mortar-bed of mud. In this mud were hundreds of dead soldiers. Here they formed their line with orders to pour a continued fire into the enemy's works, and here, throughout the whole night of May 12th, they worked at loading and firing. Morning disclosed the enemy falling back before troops who came to the relief of the Sixth Wisconsin and the four other regiments above mentioned. The men, utterly exhausted with fighting and marching so long sustained, sank down in the mud, many using the dead bodies of their comrades for pillows, and caught their first sleep for thirty-six hours. Words cannot be readily found to fitly describe the extreme hardship of this service. All night of the thirteenth they marched, wading creeks waist deep, flanking the works they had failed to take by assault. They went into position directly before Spottsylvania Court House, the morning of the fourteenth, the troops being so much scattered by the hard night's march that General Grant's order to assault could not be obeyed.

Battle of Jericho Ford.—In the pursuit of General Lee, the Fifth corps, having the advance, pushed across the North Anna river at Jericho Ford, and was immediately attacked by General A. P. Hill's rebel corps. Half of the Fifth corps had not crossed, and those that were over, including Colonel Dawes' regiment, were not in position. But it was the first open field fight since crossing the Rapidan, and the boys gloried in the chance of getting twice their number of the enemy on an open field. They, accordingly, within fifteen minutes, drove them into their works. This brilliant affair was highly complimented by General Grant in general orders.

On the twenty-ninth Colonel Dawes' regiment was engaged in a heavy skirmish, demonstrating against the enemy's entrenched position near Hanover Junction.

Battle of Bethesda Church.—The advance division of the Fifth corps was attacked near this church, thirteen miles from Richmond, and after a short and spirited action the enemy was completely beaten. Colonel Dawes commanded during this engagement the Sixth Wisconsin, Seventh Wisconsin, and Nineteenth Indiana regiments.

Battle of Cold Harbor.—The Union army had now pushed on in pursuit of the enemy to within nine miles of Richmond, where they were found strongly entrenched. Three days of heavy skirmishing ensued but no direct assault was made along Colonel Dawes' front, but the regiment nevertheless lost severely.

In the battle of Petersburg June 18th, Colonel Dawes' regiment was engaged in an unsuccessful assault on the entrenchments, losing severely, and holding their line nearer the enemy's works than any other corps of the army. For two weeks they lived in holes in the ground, from which to raise a head in daylight was almost certain death.

Mine Explosion.—After the explosion of the mine, Colonel Dawes' regiment was sent forward to drive the enemy's skirmishers in front of the Sixth corps and suffered some loss.

Colonel Dawes was commissioned colonel July 5, 1864. He was mustered out August 10, 1864, by reason of expiration of term of service; having served three years and something over three months. Colonel Dawes was the only man of his regiment who passed through all of the above engagements without serious injury. He never was a day in hospital, and never was absent from his regiment when in battle or skirmish.

Colonel Dawes was commissioned brigadier general by brevet March 13, 1865, for meritorious services during the war.

He was married January 18, 1864, to Miss Mary B. Gates, daughter of Beman Gates, of Marietta.

In this brief sketch we have endeavored to give the military services of one of Washington county's most distinguished soldiers. Of the civil career of General Dawes we have not space to speak, further than to say that he was the popular candidate of the Republican party for representative in Congress from this (fifteenth) district at the October election in 1880, and was elected by a handsome majority.

COLONEL JESSE HILDEBRAND.

Jesse Hildebrand was of German extraction, his ancestry coming to this country sometime between the years 1700 and 1730. He was born in Pennsylvania, near the New York State line, on the twenty-second day of May, 1800, and was the first white child born in that portion of the State, the so-called "Corn" or "Planter" Indians then occupying the soil. His mother being an invalid, the child was placed in the care of an Indian woman, who tenderly cared for him, and became so attached to her charge that she was loth to give him up when the mother's health again permitted her to take charge of him. When he was about two years of age his parents sold the farm and removed to near Pittsburgh, but only remained there a short time when they pushed on farther west, finally arriving at Marietta, Ohio, where they found their future home. His parents both lived to an advanced age.

Our subject early in life developed a strong predilection for a military life, and would have entered the regular army had it not been for his love for, and care of, his mother. He was noted as a "drummer boy," and when about eighteen became drum major of the regiment at Marietta. He was a personal friend of President Jackson, who commissioned him an officer of militia. He was for many years a brigadier general of militia, and subsequently became major general. General Hildebrand always had a fine staff completely uniformed and equipped during this period of his military career.

Colonel Hildebrand, although a Democrat, believed thoroughly in the supremacy of the National to State authority, and in the hour of the Nation's peril did not hesitate as to his duty. In October, 1861, he began to raise the Seventy-seventh regiment for the active service of his country. He was appointed and commissioned its colonel, and in January, 1862, he left Marietta in command of a full regiment, and was soon at the front. The brigade of which he was in command, met the first outset of the enemy at Shiloh, and in that action distinguished himself for gallantry and courage, and for his persevering efforts in rallying his men in the face of disaster. General Sherman, who witnessed Colonel Hildebrand's conduct on this occasion, enthusiastically declared him to be the bravest man he ever knew. He afterwards endured a severe march through Tennessee and north Mississippi, finally arriving at Memphis. His regiment had become sadly reduced by battle and disease, and in August, 1862, was detailed for service at the military prison, Alton, Illinois, Colonel Hildebrand becoming commandant of the post, where he remained until his death. The unusual hardship and exposure to which he had been subject while in the field finally resulted in pneumonia, and at 2:30 o'clock P. M., Saturday, April, 1863, the brave soldier passed away.

The news of his death caused universal sorrow here in Marietta where he was so well and favorably known. A committee of arrangements for his funeral was appointed, consisting of Mayor Whittlesey, George M. Woodbridge, John Marshall, Henry Fearing, L. W. Reppert, I. R. Waters, J. B. Hovey, and Major William B. Mason, Seventy-seventh Ohio volunteer infantry, and appropriate resolutions to the memory of the deceased were adopted. The funeral services were held at the Putnam Street church, and the remains were followed to Mound cemetery, under military escort, by his family, the clergymen, members of his staff when general, members of the Seventy-seventh regiment present and a large concourse of citizens.

When the news of Colonel Hildebrand's death reached General Sherman, he sent his widow the following letter of condolence, which contains the highest testimonial to Colonel Hildebrand's worth as a soldier and a man:

HEADQUARTERS FIFTEENTH ARMY CORPS, NEAR VICKSBURG,
May 2, 1863.

Mrs. Colonel Hildebrand, Marietta, Ohio,

DEAR MADAM: You must feel that the kindly relations which existed between Colonel Hildebrand and myself will warrant my tender of deep and heartfelt sympathy with the family he has left to mourn his absence. Colonel Hildebrand served under my immediate command during the eventful campaign from the time we left Paducah until we reached the Mississippi at Memphis. That was one of the most successful epochs in the war, and you and your children will have cause to treasure the memory of the part your husband took in it. At Memphis the Seventy-seventh was detached from me, but it was understood that it was to return, and I have several letters from the colonel of his hope soon to take the field, but his Maker has called him away, and we are left to mourn his absence. I could recall many little scenes of our camp life to illustrate the honest, fearless character of Colonel Hildebrand, the interest he took in his men, always with them doing his duty like a brave soldier, as he was, never complaining, never talking of turning back. He was not the man to dream of peace until it should be won fairly and honestly. But I will, if I live, at some future time see his family and children, and tell them of their father, and of things that will make them proud of his name, and stimulate them to equal him in his pure and excellent character.

Accept the assurance of my heartfelt sympathy in your deep affliction, and believe me

Your friend,
W. T. SHERMAN,
Major General.

In civil life Colonel Hildebrand was widely known. For a number of years he was a mail contractor and owned the stage line between Marietta and Zanesville. In October, 1850, he was elected sheriff of Washington county and served two years.

Colonel Hildebrand was married in 1826 to Mrs. S. Perkins Fowler, and was the father of seven children. Eliza, the eldest, now Mrs. Henry E. Marks, resides in Washington, D. C. Her husband entered the service in the late war as lieutenant from that district. Arius Gilead, the second, died in Washington in 1876, and is buried in the Congressional cemetery in that city; Elodionnas, the third, died in infancy; W. W., the fourth, entered the service as a private, but while on his way to the front was injured by a railroad accident and brought home to Marietta injured for life; Francis Isabel, the fifth, resides at the old home; Anna Maria, the sixth, died in childhood; Cynthia E., the youngest, now Mrs. Henry J. Bradford, is in the Government employ at Dalton, Massachusetts. Her husband was a naval officer and served all through the war. He died in the service September 16, 1873, at the age of thirty-five. In one of the naval expeditions up the Savannah river Mr. Bradford was the officer on shipboard who volunteered to go into the interior with a flag of truce and in some engagement saw all of his brother officers disappear before the enemy's fire, leaving no trace of their presence on shipboard but their own blood.

COLONEL MELVIN CLARKE.

Melvin Clarke was born at Ashfield, Massachusetts, November 15, 1818. His father was a farmer near Northampton. His mother was a descendant of one of the Mayflower emigrants, and a sister of Gilbert Alden, who died a few years since in Salem, township of this (Washington) county, where he settled about twenty-five years ago.

Of the early years of Colonel Clarke's history little has been learned for the purposes of this sketch, except that his advantages for education were limited to those afforded by a New England common school, with perhaps a few months training at an academy. His subsequent attainments show that these were well improved. He came to Marietta in the fall of 1838, when about twenty years of age, and was engaged, for the two succeeding winters in teaching at Newport in this county, and for the next two years he assisted Rev. Mr. Hawks in a select school at Parkersburgh, Virginia. He also taught for a short time in Kentucky. During the period of his employment as a teacher he was also engaged in the study of the law, under the instruction of the late Arius Nye, of Marietta.

Colonel Clarke was admitted to the bar in 1843 and began the practice of his profession at McConnelsville. On the twenty-first of May, 1844, he married Dorcas Dana (daughter of William Dana, of Newport), who died at McConnelsville in the spring of 1852, leaving one son, Joseph Dana Clarke, who, like his father, entered the service of his country in the late war, and was killed by the explosion of ammunition at City Point, August 9, 1864, in the nineteenth year of his age. He was a young man of good promise, the recollection of whose life and character is a pleasure and satisfaction to his friends.

In the fall of 1852 Colonel Clarke removed to Marietta and began what afterwards proved to be a large practice at the bar of Washington county with the Hon. Thomas W. Ewart, under the firm name of Clarke & Ewart. He continued the practice of his profession here until his entrance into the army in 1861.

On the twenty-sixth of August, 1854, Colonel Clarke was married to Sophia Browning, who survives him, and with their three children resides at Belpre in this county.

When, in April, 1861, this terrible war broke upon the country, the flood of patriotism which swept into the army seventy-five thousand young men, did not carry Colonel Clarke into the ranks. He was not a soldier by nature, and nothing but an imperative sense of duty could take him away from more congenial pursuits, and from those most dear to him. But when it became apparent that the struggle upon which the Nation had entered, was not one of a day, and when, sometime after the second call for troops, it seemed that Washington county was not coming quite up to the rank in the supply of men, Colonel Clarke, finding it necessary to urge others to imperil their lives in the cause, could no longer withhold his own, and said that "he believed it to be his imperative duty to enter the army."

Having, with others, written to the Hon. William P. Cutler, then member of Congress from this district, the following telegram was received:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 23, 1861.

M. Clarke and J. Hildebrand:

Government will probably accept an infantry regiment if ready in fifteen days. Can you raise it? I will bear all incidental expenses of raising it. Answer.

WILLIAM P. CUTLER.

This telegram was the beginning of the Thirty-sixth regiment, Ohio volunteers. Colonel Clarke's commission as lieutenant colonel bears date the thirtieth day of July, 1861. He was mustered into the United States service with the regiment at Marietta.

When the main body of the regiment, under Major Slemmer, marched into Virginia, Colonel Clarke was placed in command of the post at Parkersburgh, which was held by him with a detachment of the Thirty-sixth, consisting of companies C, D, E, and K, and a small number from each of the other companies, with one or two squadrons of the Second Virginia cavalry. He was relieved from this command about the first of October, moved with the detachment of his regiment to Camp Piatt, on the Kanawha, and marched thence to join the other part of the regiment under Colonel Crook at Summerville—his detachment serving as guard to a large train with supplies for the post, and the Enfield rifles which were to rearm the regiment.

During the remainder of the fall Colonel Clarke rendered efficient service in superintending the erection of the drill house in which, through the succeeding winter, the regiment received under Colonel Crook, its first and most effective drill and discipline. He also commanded some of the detachments which were sent out from the post against the guerillas who infested its vicinity.

In April, 1862, he received a short leave of absence, from which he returned just in time to take part in the maiden battle of the regiment at Lewisburgh, May 23d. In August following the regiment, with the greater part of the forces serving in the Kanawha valley, was transferred to General Pope's immediate command in eastern Virginia, and participated (though not in action) in the latter part of the disastrous campaign closing with the battle of Bull Run. It was observed by Colonel Clarke's associates that he shared very largely in the feeling of despondency and gloom which pervaded the army at that time.

Lee's first invasion of Maryland followed, and the army under McClellan was moved back to Washington in pursuit.

At Frederick City, on the twelfth of September, the Kanawha division being in the advance, and the Thirty-sixth regiment upon the skirmish line, Colonel Moore, of the Twenty-eighth Ohio, commanding the First brigade, riding forward into the town with a small body of cavalry and one piece of artillery, was taken prisoner by the evacuating enemy. This advanced Colonel Crook to the command of the brigade, and Colonel Clarke to that of the regiment. The battle of South Mountain followed on the fourteenth, the regiment taking part in the gallant charge made by the Kanawha division early in the day, which drove the rebels from their stronghold at the top of the mountain, a position the importance of which was shown by their desperate but vain assaults to regain it. In the afternoon of that day Colonel Clarke said to a friend that "he believed God had appointed to each his time to die, and that if a man was in the discharge of his duty he would die no sooner in the army than at home." On the evening of the sixteenth he wrote of the bravery of the regiment, and that he was safe and unhurt in the midst of such carnage.

The terrible battle of Antietam followed on the seventeenth. Colonel Clarke fell about 5 o'clock in the afternoon, when our line on the left had nearly reached its most advanced position towards Sharpsburgh, from which we were soon afterwards compelled to retire to the bridge for want of sufficient force.

The casualties in the regiment at Antietam were few owing to the fact that it was not sent down to the bridge (where the greatest part of the loss on the left occurred) until a well directed fire of grape had forced the enemy from his position on the opposite bank of the creek. The Thirty-sixth was not exposed to infantry fire until the advance at 4 o'clock P. M. Other regiments of our brigade, particularly the Eleventh Ohio, lost heavily at the bridge.

It is a remarkable fact that the loss of the Thirty-sixth in officers was light during the war, and that the only officers killed outright on the battle-field were Colonels Clarke and Jones, the former at Antietam and the latter at Chickamauga, though others died from wounds received in action.

The promotion of Colonel Crook to the rank of brigadier general made vacant the colonelcy of the regiment, which was filled by the promotion of Colonel Clarke. Of this, however, he was never informed. His commission was issued and bears date the seventh of September, 1862.

Colonel Clarke's remains were brought to Marietta and buried with military honors in the Mound cemetery, where a monument, erected by the officers of his regiment and brother members of the bar, stands over his grave.

Colonel Clarke was a man of vigorous mind, of very general intelligence, a good thinker, not easy in the expression of his thoughts, but logical in style and forcible in manner, successful, and of high standing as a lawyer. He was a man of very decided opinions, and frank in the expression of them, yet respectful to those who differed from him. There was nothing like deceit in his character. Colonel Clarke was energetic, and, to strangers, had the appearance of austerity in his manner, but, nevertheless, he was kind hearted and generous. He was a valuable citizen, and a brave, Christian soldier. The period of his service in the army was not long, but the record is honorable. Of his gallantry, none, I am sure, of those who saw him fall at Antietam, will doubt. His death was a public sacrifice.

COLONEL EBENEZER B. ANDREWS.

Ebenezer Baldwin Andrews was born at Danbury, Connecticut, April 29, 1821. He was the youngest of six sons of Rev. William Andrews, for many years the pastor of the Congregational church in Danbury. After spending a year at William's college, he entered the sophomore class in Marietta college, and graduated in 1842. Among his fellow students he was a leading man, noted for geniality and humor, and universally popular. After a short time spent in teaching, he pursued a course of theological study at Princeton. In 1846 he became pastor of the Congregational church at Housatonic, Massachusetts, and afterward he was settled over a church in New Britain, Connecticut.

In 1851, coming to Marietta to deliver the address before the alumni at commencement, he made such an impression as an orator and a man of culture, that he was elected to the chair of natural science in Marietta college. Professor Beach, one of his pupils, writes thus:

In his college work, Professor Andrews early became specially interested in geological investigations, and during his stay here the study of geology was made very prominent. His teaching in this department was suggestive and stimulating. His students were sure to think geology a great and living science. During a series of years he conducted his senior classes on exploring expeditions which will not be forgotten by any who participated in them. The writer remembers with much interest the explorations made by the class of 1859, through the wildest parts of Washington county, and which occupied five days. The enthusiasm of the professor, as well as his unfailing good humor and his rich resources of wit and anecdote made it a memorable journey to the young men who followed him.

When in 1861, we were plunged into civil war, Prof. Andrews was appointed major of the Thirty-first Ohio regiment. He secured a release from his college duties, and engaged in the service of his country. He served with his regiment in West Virginia and on the Potomac, and, after Antietam, was made its colonel. His military life is best set forth in the following extracts from communications from those who served with him, and were familiar with his career as an army officer.

General B. D. Fearing, who was the first adjutant of the Thirty-sixth Ohio, says:

Few are familiar with the embarrassments that surrounded those entrusted with the recruiting and organizing of infantry during the late civil war. Briefly, they may be summed up thus. The public had to be stimulated to the point of encouraging enlistment. Constant thought and labor were required to foster the effort made to popularize enlistments. Extended correspondence had to be carried on with the military committees of the different counties in the district, with the officers recruiting for the regiment, and with many of the families of the men enlisted. As the companies arrived at the camp of instruction, all their wants, and there were not a few, had to be provided for without any delay. As the companies arrived at the camp in detachments under the recruiting officers,—and not infrequently they reached the camp during the night time—it was a very exhausting work to care for them and see that they did not suffer. This Major Andrews did, in the care of the Thirty-sixth regiment, as those friendly to the soldiers, and the military committees of Washington county are prompt to testify. In accordance with the custom in those early war days, the recruiting officers were instructed to have the enlisted men bring nothing to camp with them except what they were willing to abandon, when furnished with the Government outfit. I remember well how much perplexed and embarrassed Colonel William R. Putnam, commandant of the camp of instruction at Marietta, was, when it was reported to him by officers of the companies after the first night in camp, that the men were actually suffering from the chill of the night.

Major Andrews immediately suggested that Colonel Clarke himself should secure from the patriotic citizens of Marietta blankets and comforts to meet the needs of the regiment. This suffering was more particularly in those companies recruited at a distance, and whose friends could not easily reach them. It was fortunate for the regiment that Major Andrews was so situated that he could give his undivided thought and time to the care of the soldiers.

Colonel Clarke was a veteran practitioner at the bar. He had upon his hands the ordinary business of the lawyer as well as the care of several estates, and his time was necessarily occupied day and night in putting his affairs in order for the long absence of the war. While his advice was always at the command of his fellow officers, yet the vexations and great responsibilities following the sudden gathering of a thousand men just from the farm into the confinement of a camp, had to be met directly by Major Andrews. Every soldier had a thousand and one questions that must be answered each hour of the day, in those early times, before they felt the discipline of camp life, and before the regimental commander was relieved by the company officers, who had themselves to assume their position between the soldier and the commander of the regiment. Major Anderson was preeminently qualified to do all this work.

The following incident, from the same communication, shows the self-sacrificing and patriotic spirit of the subject of our sketch:

Information had reached Major Andrews that the regiment would soon be called into active service in West Virginia, by General Rosecrans, for the relief of the town of Spenser, which was in his rear, and for whose relief he had no troops at command. This stimulated Major Andrews to use extraordinary efforts to prepare the regiment as speedily as possible for service. It was determined by the friends of the regiment that, if possible, the services of a regular army officer should be secured to command this splendid body of volunteers. There seemed to be no one at that time that could accomplish this but Major Andrews. His extended reputation as a scientific man, and his acquaintance with the leading men of the State, gave him excellent allies in Washington. Although his services were in great demand in the camp, yet it was decided that he should go to Washington. Availing himself of his personal acquaintance with Secretary Chase to reach President Lincoln, he succeeded in presenting himself, accompanied by Lincoln and Chase, before Secretary Cameron, and, in face of the order that had just been issued, that no more details should be made from the regular army to the volunteers, he secured the assent of Cameron to the detailing of a West Point man to the command of the regiment, if a suitable one could be found. To this zealous work of Major Andrews, at Washington, may without doubt be attributed all the valuable results that followed the appointment of Colonel Crook to the command of the Thirty-sixth regiment.

I am now convinced that this extraordinary effort on the part of Major Andrews was not absolutely essential, since Colonel Clarke had large experience as a teacher, had held official positions in civil life, and was a man of great courage, and of undoubted qualifications for the command of a regiment. The history of the regiment proves also that many of the subordinate officers were possessed of the same qualifications. It would be hard to find two men so unselfish and truly patriotic as Colonel Clarke and Major Andrews showed themselves to be, in thus giving up their own promotion, and in seeking so zealously to discover a man to hold the honorable position, that by right belonged to them."

The following extract is from a letter from General J. D. Cox, who commanded the department of West Virginia during Col. Andrews' service in that State.

"When Colonel Andrews joined my command in 1861, as major of the Thirty-sixth Ohio, I at once saw that he was a cool, brave and conscientious officer, arrogating nothing to himself from his previous standing as an intellectual and scientific man, but determined to learn his new duties with thoroughness and with modesty. As one immediately charged with the enforcement of the ideas of discipline of Colonel Crook, the major's task at the beginning was a hard one. The regiment was, as all volunteer regiments necessarily are, slow in seeing the immense importance of the discipline and drill, which a commandant, taken from the regular army, knew to be the indispensable condition of success, and, in the end, of the well-being of the regiment itself. Much of the ordinary unpopularity of the earlier stages of this instruction and discipline fell on Major Andrews. He did not shrink from it or avoid it. He sought no shelter under apologies; did not shoulder off the burden upon his superiors, but loyally obeyed the injunctions he received, as a faithful subordinate without complaint or criticism. He had faith that in the end, the honesty of his purpose, the usefulness of the discipline, and the good will to the regiment, which dictated it, would all be recognized."

Major Andrews took an honorable part in both the battles last named (South Mountain and Antietam.—Ed.) and by his modest but business-like and steadfast courage and coolness proved that he had in no small degree the characteristics of the true soldier.

The following is from General Crook:

Of Colonel Andrews' army life, so far as I was acquainted with it, I can only speak in terms of highest praise. The readiness with which he adapted himself to the duties of his new position has always been a matter of surprise to me. The value of his services at Summerville, where he was in charge of the construction of the camp, the hygiene of the men, the management of the hospital and the preparation of the food of the soldiers was inestimable, as it relieved me from a responsibility which is one of the most onerous of all the duties devolving upon the commander of an inexperienced regiment. No matter how distasteful or how much at variance with his former experience, every duty committed to him was zealously and skilfully performed to my entire satisfaction. It only remains that I should testify to his courage and gallantry in action. The Thirty-sixth Ohio did heroically and won for me my star, and I need only add that Colonel Andrews always aided by his word and example the reputation for bravery and general good conduct which the regiment so nobly maintained to the end. To his personal efforts was very largely due the organization of the Thirty-sixth, and I feel that I owe him a personal debt of gratitude, as I have understood that it was mainly through Colonel Andrews' efforts that I obtained the command of the regiment of which he was the first major.

At the close of his army life, in 1863, Professor Andrews resumed his position at Marietta college. He had already become known as an eminent geologist, and especially as an authority in the geology of eastern Ohio and West Virginia. In 1869 he resigned his chair in Marietta, to accept the position of assistant geologist in the geological survey of Ohio. To this work he gave several years of assiduous and successful labor, removing from Marietta to the more central position of Lancaster, Ohio. His work upon the coal fields of southeastern Ohio was universally recognized as admirable and thorough, and it widely extended his reputation as a geologist. After the close of the geological survey Professor Andrews continued his residence in Lancaster, giving his attention to the preparation of a text-book on geology, which has proved very acceptable. He also found large employment as a consulting geologist, whose opinions as to the nature and value of the mineral resources of southern Ohio and West Virginia were highly valued.

He died at Lancaster, Ohio, August 14, 1880.

COLONEL JOHN C. PAXTON.

John C. Paxton was born in Gettysburgh, Pennsylvania, February 22, 1824. At the age of ten years he began life for himself, and from that day his generous hand lent assistance to his parents, and a more dutiful and loving son never lived than he. At an early age he came to Ohio and engaged in the mercantile business at Sharon, Noble county, until 1853. In 1845 he was united in marriage to Agnes Greenlee, who was to the end of her life a faithful partner and sympathetic wife.

He removed with his family to Marietta in 1853, and engaged in business pursuits. In 1854, while in the south, he had the misfortune to contract the small-pox, and returning home, the whole family were stricken with the disease which bereft the household of the cherished wife and mother. In 1857 he married for his second wife, Sophia L. Reed, of Lancaster, Pennsylvania, who still survives.

Mr. Paxton's temperament made him restless and imperative. He travelled into every State and territory, and he acquired a knowledge of the resources and society of the entire country. Several years of his mature life were spent in Salt Lake City, where an intimate acquaintance with the practices of Mormonism taught him to hate, with all the bitterness of his intense nature, the execrable doctrines of that peculiar people.

Writers of all periods have united in extolling the valiant deeds of military heroes. The man who enlists his body and soul in the cause of his country is deserving of the highest honor, no matter what his military rank may be. War has not inappropriately been likened to a drama, in which the officers play the leading roles, but the success of the whole depends upon the acting of each character. Another point of likeness is that each role requires its own peculiar actor. The bold and dashing colonel who carries assault to victory is no less deserving of honor than the general in command who has planned the preliminary movements.

It will be necessary to understand the character of Colonel Paxton, and to know the field in which he was ordered to operate, before proceeding to a consideration of his merits as a military man.

He was a man of strong talent, but nervous, impulsive and often erratic. He had a pointed insight into affairs, and his opinions and resolutions, though quickly formed, were usually correct. His wit was pungent and keen; incisive sarcasm gave him peculiar power in controversy. In the social circle he was at his best, vivacious and witty and enjoying a story or a joke exceedingly. His friendship was devoted and true, his hatred intense. A large heart made him generous to a fault, and he was always ready to contribute to the necessities of the unfortunate.

During the crisis of secession in 1860 he was in Louisiana, and was present at the convention when the State was voted out of the Union. He was present when the vote was carried to tear down the old flag then floating over the capitol. His loyal eyes saw the raising of the first rebel flag in Louisiana. When he had seen the banner which he always worshipped torn into shreds and trampled under foot in the streets of Louisiana, he could restrain his impetuous spirit no longer. He hastened north with the determination that nothing which he could do should be left undone in the great contest then at hand.

Colonel Paxton began his military career in the three months' service as quartermaster for the Eighteenth Ohio volunteer infantry. At the expiration of his term of service he returned to Marietta, and in August, 1861, recruited a regiment of cavalry. The history of the movements and services in this regiment will be found at the proper place in this volume. But it will be in place here to notice the difficulties under which Colonel Paxton labored. With an ardent leader and ambitious followers, the Second Virginia cavalry was stationed in the narrow valleys of West Virginia to rout bushwhackers and break up camps of the enemy. No section of country within the whole range of the Rebellion imposes as great physical obstructions to military movements as West Virginia. Considering the conformation of the country, the condition of the roads, and the character of the service, Colonel Paxton is entitled to the highest praise for his persevering, brave and dashing leadership. "He was accused," says General Fearing, "of being rash, but such rashness in a cavalry officer is oftentimes a virtue. The same rashness evinced by an infantry officer would be unpardonable and lead to a court-martial. It was the custom during the early stages of the war for cavalry officers to pre-estimate results and magnify the strength of the enemy. Imagined insurmountable obstacles in the front often caused them to turn back from an assault or an expedition which might easily have been accomplished with small loss. This fact led General Hooker, as late as the battle of Chancellorsville, to make the assertion while enraged at an unsuccessful expedition of cavalry, that the man could not be found who had ever seen a dead cavalryman.

Although Colonel Paxton may not have been a cool, calculating director of movements, he was never found wanting when an opportunity was presented for a bold charge. And when a court or commission was appointed to examine into the qualifications of officers then serving in the valley, Colonel Paxton was the first man ordered before the committee of which Colonel Hayes (since President Hayes) was chairman. Colonel Hayes put the question: "Colonel, suppose you were marching along a flat top mountain with a train, how would you dispose of your troops to protect it?" "Well, answered Colonel Paxton, "I would throw out a squad of men on each side to protect the train in case of an attack." "Well, colonel," said Colonel Hayes, "suppose an attack were made on you when in that position, what command would you give?" Colonel Paxton scratched his head a moment, then said, "I don't know colonel, what command you would give, but I would say, 'Go for them, boys, and give them h—l.'" That ended the examination.

Colonel Paxton's bravery or patriotism was never questioned. General Powell, in a recent letter to Mrs. Downing, his daughter, says:

Permit me to say that, having been intimately acquainted with the decayed from the organization of our regiment, in August, 1861, to the time of his leaving the service, in 1863, he was the idol of his regiment; kind and generous to his command; attentive to their wants, and jealous of their good name as soldiers. No truer or more earnest man ever drew a sword in defence of our National Government than Colonel John C. Paxton.

General Fearing, from whom we have already quoted, says further:

Colonel Paxton had the essential qualifications of a successful officer in his branch of the service. Under different circumstances and surroundings he would have taken rank with Custer, Merritt, Grierson, Hatch, Wilson, Kilpatrick, Torbert, Averill, and a host of other cavalry officers who won renown in the Rebellion. The military friends of Colonel Paxton cannot but regret the circumstance whereby he was not placed in association with trained soldiers, who would have given scope and direction to his splendid fighting qualities.

General J. D. Cox, whose good opinion it is a distinguished honor to have, pays this tribute to him as a man and soldier:

When I think of him he always appears as I knew him in the prime of his early manhood in West Virginia, handsome, dashing, fearless, a bold rider and a daring scout. His patriotic determination to see service in the war for the Union made him enter a West Virginia regiment when Ohio's quota was full, and he gave his whole heart to his work. He was disposed to be impatient of restraint, but for a commander whom he trusted and respected he was ready at any moment to imperil his life. His impetuosity sometimes led him into collision with others, especially if he doubted their earnestness or their enterprise. These were, however, the faults of an excess of zeal, and will appear merits when contrasted with their opposites. He had most of the qualities of a first class cavalry officer, and was never happier than when detailed for some dangerous adventure requiring both intelligence and daring.

Colonel Paxton in going into the war had followed the impulse of his convictions, and as long as he remained in the service was not only the brave soldier who fought for glory but also the devoted patriot who had a heart in the cause. In a letter written to his family, dated "Camp Piatt, Virginia, February 22, 1863," he shows his feeling in regard to the war. This was at a time when the army in the field had reason to be discouraged by the indifference of some of their constituency at home. We quote one paragraph of the letter.

My position is one of great care and responsibility, and I can honestly say I wish it was done. I have seen enough of war in the last twenty months to satisfy both my curiosity and my ambition, but I have not seen enough of this war until I see it closed in favor of our glorious flag and the Union; and I know I but reflect the sentiments of my regiment when I say so. We are all tired and wish to be at home with our families, but not until all is quiet at the front. Then, if traitors (tories is a better word) at home wish our services you may rest assured they shall have the benefit of them.

Colonel Paxton left the service in 1863. When the war had closed he was as heartily in favor of "burying the past" as in 1860 he had been impatient to crush out the Rebellion. He believed that the sooner the north and the south could unite in a fraternal Fourth of July shout of patriotism the better it would be for the whole country. He says in a published letter in 1874:

I never was in sympathy with the organization, the Grand Army of the Republic as organized at the close of the war, nor of its child, "Decoration Day." I believe, from the history of such affairs in other countries, that the sooner the marks of our civil war are obliterated, the better it would be for what we fought for "one whole country." Soldiers' reunions there is no objection to, but my understanding as to the object of Decoration Day was to afford an opportunity for civilians women and children, aided by the clergy and politicians, to pay a formal respect to dead soldiers; living soldiers could stand and look on and feel proud of the respect paid to their dead comrades. It was an innocent proceeding, well adapted for the persons it was intended for, but never was in my opinion that which would create or fire a patriotic people or fighting soldiery. Let the past be gone. I believe the boys in their "little beds" are quite as well off as their living comrades. They are free of the tax, in pains and aches, their comrades in their rear are paying, every step they take, to the present "slow music of the Union."

Colonel Paxton possessed a sound judgment, a strong mind, and remarkable versatility of talent. Had he enjoyed the advantages in early life of a judicious mental training he would undoubtedly have achieved distinction as a writer. He was not a politician in the common acceptance of the term. But he was a man of public spirit favoring every kind of public improvement intended for the development of the country. From what has been written some idea may be formed of the principles and character of our subject. He was one of those peculiar men whom it is impossible to accurately portray with pen. He died at his residence in Marietta, February 28, 1881, of paralysis, after two years of intense suffering.

LIEUTENANT COLONEL ALEXANDER L. HASKINS.

The subject of this sketch was born in Shushan, Washington county, New York, March 18, 1822. He received a liberal school education and was engaged in St. Louis, Missouri, several years before going to Marietta, as teacher, and adopted the profession of civil engineer. He was married on October 6, 1853, to Miss Addie G. Gerken, of Marietta.

When the Marietta & Cincinnati railroad was being constructed, Colonel Haskins was employed as assistant engineer in locating the line, and as engineer in charge of various parts of the work, especially that part laid out between Marietta and Bellaire.

At the beginning of the war he was civil engineer of the city of Marietta, and when the Sixty-third Ohio volunteer infantry was raised he was commissioned major of that regiment. When the regiment went to the field the attainments of Colonel Haskins as an engineer were called into requisition, and he was constantly employed in locating military works, roads, etc.

On July 17, 1862, he was promoted to lieutenant colonel of his regiment. The arduous duties of the camp and field proved more than his health would stand, and he was honorably discharged March 20, 1863, on account of impaired health.

Colonel Haskins followed his profession of civil engineer up to the fall of 1865, when he was elected to the fifty-seventh general assembly as representative from Washington county.

Colonel Haskins was civil engineer of the city of Marietta during the years 1855, 1858, 1859, 1860, and 1861. In January, 1866, while at Logansport, Indiana, on some business connected with a railroad on which he had been engaged as engineer, he was taken suddenly ill and died, January 13, 1866. His widow still resides in Marietta. One son and one daughter are living.

The house of representatives upon the reception of the news of his death passed resolutions regarding the deceased, part of which we give in closing this brief notice of a noble life. The introduction of the resolutions elicited remarks from various members.

Hon. A. L. Curtis, his colleague from this county, and Hon. T. M. Davey, of Lawrence, spoke in terms of high commendation of Colonel Haskins, not only as a soldier but as a man of pure mind, Christian character, and social, genial disposition.

After the preamble, the House passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That this House bear testimony of the high character and integrity of Hon. A. L. Haskins, who won the esteem of his fellow members by his urbane manners and frank courteous bearing.

Resolved, That in the untimely death of A. L. Haskins this house has lost an able and highly esteemed member, and the community a good citizen, whose worth will live in the memory of all who knew him.

Resolved, That in further testimony of respect for the memory of our late colleague and brother, this house do now adjourn.

The house accordingly adjourned.

LIEUTENANT COLONEL EPHRAIM C. DAWES.

Ephraim Cutler Dawes, born May 27, 1840; graduated at Marietta college, June 26, 1861; mustered into service as first lieutenant and adjutant of the Fifty-third Ohio volunteer infantry, September 26, 1861; promoted major January 26, 1863; served under Sherman in his Mississippi campaign, in his march from Big Black to Chattanooga, and in the pursuit of Longstreet across the mountains of East Tennessee in November and December, 1863, without baggage or tents, and subsisting on less than half rations. He participated in Sherman's Georgia campaign; and at Dallas, Georgia, May 28, 1864, he received two wounds, one in the head, and a second, very severe, in the face, a minnie ball carrying away most of the lower jaw. He was brevetted lieutenant colonel and honorably discharged from service on account of his wound, October 31, 1864. He was engaged in the following battles: Pittsburgh Landing (Shiloh), Tennessee, April 6 and 7, 1862; Fallen Timbers, Tennessee, April 8, 1862; Siege of Corinth, Tennessee and Mississippi, May, 1862; Siege of Vicksburgh, Mississippi, June, 1862; Jackson, Mississippi, July 10-16, 1863; Mission Ridge, Tennessee, November 25, 1863; Resaca, Georgia, August 13, 14, 15, 1864; Dallas, Georgia, May 27, 28, 1864.

MAJOR GEORGE T. RICE.

George T. Rice was born December 16, 1823, in Macedon, Wayne county, New York, son of Nathan and Docas Rice. He married Miss Minerva Jane Ripley, daughter of John and Betsey Ripley, of the same place, and in 1852 removed to Marietta, Ohio.

He enlisted as a private in company B, Thirty-ninth regiment, July 22, 1861, was appointed second sergeant and served as such until July 11, 1862, when he was commissioned second lieutenant; he served as such until May 9, 1864, when he was commissioned as first lieutenant company E, January 11, 1865; was commissioned as captain and transferred to command of company C, June 6, 1865; was commissioned as major of the regiment and served as such until the regiment was discharged, July 9, 1865.

Major Rice, at the close of the war, removed from Marietta to Macedon, New York, and afterwards located permanently at Rollin, Michigan, where he now resides, and is engaged in the mercantile business.

CAPTAIN JACOB KOENIG.

Jacob Koenig was born in 1816, in the town of Desloch, dukedom of Hussia, Germany. At the age of twenty-one he joined the army, and was a faithful soldier for six years in company I, infantry, of the dukedom of Hussia, receiving an honorable discharge on April 1, 1842. After being discharged he remained at home about two weeks, when he sailed for the United States, landing in New York city in May, 1842. He was married in New York on May 7, 1843, to Julia A. Maas, born in Mannheim, Bavaria, who had landed in New York about two weeks before him.

While residing in New York city he served in the New York State militia for fourteen years, the first seven as a private, and the last as lieutenant. He came to Marietta in July, 1856. In July, 1861, he organized company F, Thirty ninth Ohio volunteer infantry, and was elected captain of the same.

The newspapers of 1861 published in Marietta, speak of Captain Koenig's company as the "German Rifles." The company was a militia company for a short time prior to enlistment for three years, and after the first vote to go into the service, it was recruited up to the maximum, one hundred men, and left for Camp Colerain, near Cincinnati, all inside of one week. Captain Koenig was a brave soldier, and exceedingly kind to the men in his command. During his term of service he also served as assistant inspector general of the Fifth division, Sixteenth army corps. He died at Memphis, Tennessee, on the twenty-first day of August, 1863, leaving a wife and five children, viz: Jacob, Julia, Caroline, Philip, and William, all of whom are still living.

CAPTAIN JAMES C. SELBY.

Captain James C. Selby was born in Washington county, Ohio, on the third day of December, 1838. His father was Jeremiah J. Selby, a native of New York. The maiden name of his mother was Rosana D. Stone. At the age of four years he lost his father. His mother was his only guardian till after he was fourteen years of age. Having received a good common school education, he followed the occupation of farming, and also that of carpenter.

At the outbreak of the Rebellion he enlisted in the Union army on July 29, 1861, at Lowell, Washington county, Ohio. On August 24, 1861, (at Marietta, Ohio) he was mustered in as second lieutenant of company A, Thirty-sixth Ohio volunteer infantry. A few days after he left with his company and regiment for the field. He was promoted to first lieutenant and assigned to company F, Thirty-sixth Ohio volunteer infantry, March 5, 1862.

At the battle of Antietam, Maryland, while making a charge, a piece of a shell went through his haversack, tearing it to pieces and scattering his hardtack over the ground.

He was promoted to captain and assigned to company K, Thirty-sixth Ohio volunteer infantry, October 30, 1863. (Commissioned October 13, 1863.)

At the battle of Mission Ridge, Tennessee, November 25, 1863, he lost his right arm and was sent to the hospital, where he remained till January, when he went home. In about six weeks he joined his regiment again, and took command of his company even before he was able for duty. He had his sword changed to carry on his right side, and learned to write with his left hand in a few days.

At the battle of Berryville, Virginia, September 3, 1864, he received a gun shot wound in his right thigh, severing the vein and shattering the bone. He remained in the field hospital at Berryville two or three days, and was then removed to the general hospital at Annapolis, Maryland, where he died in ten days after he was wounded. When informed that he must die, he received it with perfect calmness, sent for the chaplain and made the necessary disposition of his property, and asked his nurse to write his lieutenant to make out his monthly returns for him.

In the regiment he was respected as a soldier and gentleman—brave to desperation, generous to a fault, possessed of an iron will, a good moral character, and a kind heart. He was loved and desired to be loved by all his comrades.

CAPTAIN WILLIAM BEALE WHITTLESEY.

William Beale Whittlesey, son of Hon. William A. Whittlesey and Jane H. Whittlesey, of Marietta, Ohio, was born at Marietta, October 2, 1841. Even in boyhood he showed a taste and ambition for military life, and when a young man under age he was made an aid de camp of General Hildebrand in the State militia.

In September, 1857, at the age of seventeen, he entered the freshman class and was graduated in the summer of 1861.

In the fall of 1862 he aided in raising a company, and was commissioned second lieutenant of company F, Ninety-second Ohio volunteer infantry. The regiment remained in Kanawha valley until the first of 1863, when it was ordered to Nashville, and attached to the army of the Cumberland. It afterwards joined the Fourteenth army corps, under that noblest of noble generals, George H. Thomas, and formed one of the many regiments which met Bragg at Chickamauga, September 17 and 18, 1863. As it became evident that a battle was imminent, Whittlesey talked freely of it—wondering how he would stand fire—how he would act, and asked the writer if he felt doing his duty to so state it to his father. He went into that battle and, in his earnestness, unnecessarily exposed himself—taking position in front of his company and directing their fire. He escaped without injury—was commended in the official report of the battle, and afterwards a vacancy occurring was made captain.

The regiment remained in Chattanooga during that fall, and formed part of the forlorn hope under command of General Baldy Smith, by which communication was opened with General Hooker, coming to our relief from Bridgeport. A part went by small flat-boats in the night, passed the enemy's pickets at Lookout mountain, while the remainder marched across the neck and joined them at Brown's Ferry, where a crossing was made, the boats being used to form a pontoon bridge. The army provisioned and reenforced, preparations soon began for the assault of General Bragg, securely posted on Mission Ridge and Lookout Mountain. From the summit of the latter, shells were frequently thrown into our camp from a battery stationed there. It was not many days before the ominous order was issued to prepare three days' cooked rations, and one hundred rounds of ammunition. All soldiers knew its meaning, and were also well aware that no boy's play was before them. Whittlesey made the requisite preparations and then awaited the command to move—making first his will, in which he remembered the Psi Gamma society, of which he was an enthusiastic member when in college. He expressed a wish that if struck by a ball, it might be through the heart. He led his company up that hill—so steep that it was no easy task to climb it when no enemy was on the top; and when near the top, a minnie ball went crashing through his heart. Telling his men to go on, that he was killed, he breathed his last amid the smoke and carnage of that long to be remembered evening.

The cord that bound son to father seemed to possess the qualities of the electric wire; the shock that took the life of the son signalled the father, a thousand miles away. On the next Thanksgiving day, 1863, taking his usual morning walk, Mr. Whittlesey said to a friend: "I feel that there has been a great battle, and Beale is killed." He was advised to dismiss it as a fond father's fancy, and went home. Soon after, seeing another friend coming towards his house, he said: "There comes Mr. P. to tell me of Beale's death"—which was too true—the telegram from Dr. Cotton, the regimental surgeon, sent that morning from Chattanooga, conveyed the sad news—news that made that Thanksgiving day one memorable in more than one family, and among the friends and acquaintances of Whittlesey and Turner. The funerals of both were held the same day some weeks afterwards. The bodies lay in state in Psi Gamma hall for a season. Mr. Whittlesey never seemed to recover from the shock of Beale's death, and soon followed him.

CAPTAIN MADISON HOON.

Captain Hoon, Sixty-third Ohio volunteer infantry, was reared on a farm in Waterford township; volunteered with J. W. Fouts and was mustered into service at the organization of the company at Camp Putnam, in Marietta, Ohio, October 9, 1861, and was appointed corporal; was promoted to sergeant of his company, then to sergeant major of the regiment, then to first lieutenant, and lastly to captain. Captain Hoon served through the war; was mustered out with the regiment at Louisville, Kentucky, July 8, 1865; went to his home, and died of disease the same fall. Captain Hoon gained his promotions by true merit, both in business and as a commander. Sagacious in battle, considerate in camp, he won the confidence of his men and the respect of all who knew him.

CAPTAIN FRANK BUELL.

Frank Buell was born in Adams township, Washington county, Ohio, April 24, 1837, and was killed at the battle of Freeman's Ford, Virginia, August 22, 1862. He was the youngest son of P. B. Buell, a native of New York, and grandson of Judge Salmon Buell. His mother was a native of eastern Virginia, and belonged to one of the oldest and best families of that region. His childhood and boyhood were spent at the farm home. At the age of eighteen he went to Washington, District of Columbia, where he spent a year assisting his brother, George P. Buell, esq., of the National Democratic Review. On his return to Washington he continued the study of the law, which he had commenced while in Washington. He was admitted to practice at the age of twenty, and opened a law office at Marietta, Ohio. He was elected city solicitor of the city of Marietta, and within the first two years of his practice was elected prosecuting attorney of Washington county, which position he resigned to go into the army, at the commencement of the late civil war.

His was one of the first companies in Ohio to offer its services to the governor; was mustered into the Eighteenth regiment Ohio volunteer militia, in the three months' service, at the close of which he recruited a company for the artillery service, known as "Buell's Pierpont Battery," made up largely of Ohio men, but went out as a West Virginia battery, and distinguished itself as one of the best drilled, hardest fighting batteries in the army. It would have gone out as an Ohio battery had Captain Buell received the recognition from his own State to which he felt that he was entitled. But he was not the man to be trifled with, nor to be turned aside in the pursuit of the great object of his patriotism and ambition by those whom accidental authority had placed in his way.

From the time when Captain Buell's battery was ordered to the front, it seems to have been given posts of danger, and was often placed where desperate action was necessary. At the time of his death he was acting lieutenant colonel, and was in command of the reserve artillery under General Sigel, in General Pope's command. Promotion awaited him, had he survived this (to him) fatal eagerness. This unfortunate, but not inglorious campaign of General Pope's resulted in great sacrifice of life. The artillery immediately under command of Captain Buell was covering the retreat of General Pope's arm, and held position on the east bank of the Rappahannock river. It was in this position that he fell. He was on horseback. A shell passed through his horse, killing his horse instantly, and causing his own death a few hours later. Shells had passed under and above him, showing that he—on his light colored horse was a conspicuous mark, in full view of, and at which the enemy was taking deliberate aim. He refused, however, to dismount, or to change his position on the field. This was almost exclusively an artillery fight, was at short range, the river only separating the Federal and Confederate batteries, and is spoken of as one of the most terrible artillery battles of the late war, and in which the Federal batteries triumphed having driven the enemy from position.

If there is such a thing as resignation to death, it must come to the hero who falls in the hour of victory.

It is a remarkable fact that Captain Buell was killed in his mother's native county—Fauquier county, Virginia. Only a few miles from where he fell she was born and spent her early life, leaving there at the age of twenty to find a home in (the then far west) Ohio,—never to return. Fifty years later her youngest son (the subject of this sketch) found his way to that region—not to visit her childhood's home, as a sacred spot, nor to brighten her declining years by his return, but to fall in terrible conflict, and then to rest (for a while) in a soldier's grave.

His remains were reinterred in the family cemetery at the Buell homestead, when the members of his battery who had followed him with the same inspiration with which he had led them, erected to his memory a monument, on which they inscribed the admiration they entertained for him as an officer, and their regard for him as a man.

The impress of genius—a term too often tamely used—is sure in the short but marked life of Frank Buell. The noble man into which he developed was apparent in him as a boy. Almost without the aid of schools he became a scholar, and without the life-long drill he became the thorough and accomplished soldier.

CAPTAIN AUGUSTUS T. WARD.

Augustus T. Ward was born October 11, 1840, in Fearing township, Washington county, Ohio. He was the second son and fourth child of Robert and Lucy M. Ward; the former an English emigrant, the latter a native of the township.

He was brought up on a farm, attending the district school in summer terms until the age of nine, and winter schools until he was sixteen, after which he taught common schools during the winter until 1861.

When the Rebellion broke out in 1861 he was filled with indignation at the insults the flag received from the traitors of the south, but did not enter the army on the first call of President Lincoln, because of his parents strong desire that he should remain at home. After the expiration of the term of the three months troops, and when the second call was made for three hundred thousand men, he felt that his country needed his services, and that he owed her his first duty. Captain Jewett Palmer, jr., (afterward major) was at that time enlisting a company for the Thirty-sixth Ohio infantry, at Lower Salem, of this county, and Ward hastened to enroll his name with the young patriots there assembled. This was on the twelfth day of August, 1861. Captain Palmer marched his company to Camp Putnam, at Marietta, the same evening and reported to Lieutenant Colonel M. Clarke, commanding regiment.

Ward was appointed drummer of his company next day, a position of which he was extremely proud.

He served in that capacity until the first of February, 1862, when he was placed in the ranks of his company by his colonel.

He was immediately appointed second sergeant of his company (G) by Captain Palmer, and served as such until the sixth of April following, when a vacancy occurring in the first sergeantcy, he was appointed to fill that position. The two last appointments were made while the regiment was in barracks at Summerville, West Virginia.

Having served faithfully as first sergeant through Pope's and McClellan's campaigns in the east in August and September, 1862, and for gallantry in the battles of South Mountain and Antietam, he was promoted to second lieutenant (commission dating from the latter engagement), and assigned to duty in company A of the Thirty-sixth regiment, of which J. Gage Barker, of Muskingum, was then captain, and John L. Palmer, of Salem, first lieutenant. He served as second lieutenant through the campaign of Rosecrans to Chattanooga, and under Thomas during the winter of 1863 and 1864, in camp at that place. Remained with the regiment on its reenlistment as veterans, in February, 1864, visiting home then for the first time since his entry into service.

On the expiration of the veteran furlough the regiment was ordered to Charlestown, West Virginia, where he received a commission as first lieutenant, dated April 21, 1864, and assigned to duty in the same company, in which he remained until the thirteenth of January, 1865, when he received his appointment to a captaincy, commission dated December 31, 1864.

While first lieutenant he passed through the raids to the Virginia & Tennessee railroad and to Lynchburgh, under General Hunter, and the memorable campaign of General Sheridan in the Shenandoah valley, fighting his last battle at Cedar Creek, on the nineteenth day of October, 1864.

As captain he was assigned to the command of company F of his regiment, of which company he retained command until the muster out and discharge of the regiment, which took place at Columbus, Ohio, July 31, 1865.

Having served nearly four years honestly and faithfully, and seen the honor of the American flag completely established and the rebellion crushed, he received his discharge with a degree of satisfaction that only an old soldier can feel, and retired from the army with the entire good will of his company.

The following is a list of engagements in which he bore a gallant and honorable part:

Lewisburgh, West Virginia, May 23, 1862; South Mountain, Maryland, September 14, 1862; Antietam, Maryland, September 17, 1862; Hoover's Gap, Tennessee, June 24, 1863; Chickamauga, Georgia, September 19 and 20, 1863; Mission Ridge, Tennessee, November 25, 1863; Cloyd Mountain, Virginia, May 9, 1864; New River Bridge, Virginia, May 10, 1864; Kernstown, Virginia, July 23, 1864; Berryville, Virginia, September 3, 1864; Opequan, September 19, 1864; Fisher's Hill, September 22, 1864; Cedar Creek, October 19, 1864. Besides these he was engaged in eight or ten skirmishes, more or less dangerous and bloody.

After his discharge he returned at once to his farm in his native township.

[In the summer of 1865 the Military committee of Washington county caused a letter to be written to each of the officers in the army from this county, requesting them to give a short account of their life in the service, and the foregoing was written by Captain Ward in response to such letter.]

In the year following the close of the war Mr. Bartmess, the county recorder, having died, Captain Ward was appointed to fill the vacancy. He afterwards engaged in business in Marietta, in which he was very successful.

In 1869 he was married to Kate L. Wakefield, daughter of B. A. Wakefield, of Lawrence county. The following are their children: Charles Augustus, born July 27, 1870; Willia Wakefield, born March 25, 1872.

Captain Ward was compelled to give up business on account of failing health. The disease, doubtless the result of exposure in the service, now made rapid strides, and Captain Ward seeking relief by change of air and medical treatment, went to Green Springs, Ohio, where he died on the thirteenth day of August, 1874.

CAPTAIN ARTHUR D. EELLS.

Arthur D. Eells was born at Unadella, Otsego county, New York, February 6, 1838. He was the son of John Eells, formerly of New Canaan, Connecticut, and a grandson of General John Mead, who served his country through the Revolutionary war. Captain Eells came to Marietta in February, 1859. Soon after the rebellion broke out he commenced recruiting men for the Union army and in August, 1861, took a squad of twenty odd men to Parkersburgh, West Virginia, and continued to recruit men for the Union army until about the twenty-sixth of October, 1861, when the Second Virginia cavalry regiment was organized and he was commissioned captain of company F, the regiment being mostly composed of Ohio men. Soon after the regiment was organized it was sent to Guyandotte, on the Ohio river, and remained there through the winter of 1861-62. In May, 1862, the regiment in part joined General Crook's brigade, at Lewisburgh, West Virginia, and went on the raid through the mountains to White Sulphur Springs, Covington, and Jackson Depot, tearing up the railroad track and doing much damage to the enemy. The march was so rapid that the enemy was entirely taken by surprise and could not gather force sufficient to attack them. General Crook with his little army returned to Lewisburgh. The day previous to the battle of Lewisburgh Captain Eells with a small detail of men was sent out by General Crook on a reconnoitring expedition. On this expedition he came very near being captured, having gone very nearly within the lines of the enemy's pickets. He and his men escaped by strategy, as he personally learned from prisoners captured in the Lewisburgh fight the next day. While at a farmer's house he learned facts that were of sufficient moment to put him on the alert, and in a very careless way gave orders to his men to fall back to the main force, indicating that there was quite a force close at hand. One of the men at the farm house was a rebel soldier in citizen's dress, who at once reported these facts to the enemy, as one of the prisoners told Captain Eells the next day that they thought by letting him go that they would likely capture the main body of men, not supposing that he would venture to come so near their lines with such a small squad of men. Captain Eells and his men after having got a reasonable distance from the enemy made good time in getting back to headquarters with his men, and reached camp at about nine o'clock in the evening of the twenty-second of May and made his report to General Crook giving him valuable information. In the early morning of May 23d General Crook was attacked; the enemy drove in his pickets and the fight commenced. The enemy numbered from twenty-five hundred to three thousand men, and were defeated, losing six men killed, one hundred and seventy-five prisoners and many wounded, four pieces of artillery and a large number of small arms. This was a grand victory for General Crook and his brave little army. In one of Captain Eells' scouting expeditions he came suddenly on a rebel picket armed with a double-barrelled shotgun. The picket fired one barrel of his gun at Eells, who returned the fire with his revolver. The picket dropped his gun and ran into the woods, evidently wounded. Captain Eells captured the gun and brought it home with him. The hardships of army life and the mountain campaigns were more than his health could bear. Some time in June, 1862, he resigned his commission and came back to Marietta. With quiet and rest came better health and renewed strength. In the following August the Government called for a regiment of cavalry for border service, to be known as the River regiment. Captain Eells at once commenced recruiting men for this regiment. In a very few days he reported to the military committee of Washington county that he had a company of one hundred men ready for the service. He went to Columbus and was commissioned as captain of company H, Seventh Ohio volunteer cavalry, August 25, 1862. He was very soon ordered to report with his company at Ripley on the Ohio river above Cincinnati, notwithstanding the regiment was raised for border service. Early in December of the same year the regiment was ordered to the front. They crossed the Ohio river below Maysville into Kentucky, reaching Lexington about the first of January, 1863. While in camp at Lexington Captain Eells was taken sick with typhoid fever and was unable to do any military duty until some time in April following. He joined his regiment at Stanford, Kentucky, and was on duty until the twenty-third of June, 1863. While stationed at Somerset, Kentucky, it became evident to him that he could not stand the hardships of an active army life. It was often remarked by his brother officers that there was not another man in the regiment who would think he was able to do military duty even when he was in his best health. He was full of hope, always cheerful and ready for duty, a good soldier, and every man in the regiment his friend. He greatly desired to live to see the war ended. He never for a moment doubted the final result. On the twenty-eighth of June, 1863, he sent in his resignation and severed his connection with his company and regiment as a comrade and an officer. He came back to Marietta with the hope that rest and good care would again bring him better health and more strength. But not so; the exposures and hardships of an army life had done the work for him—the destroyer's hand was on him—his health gradually failed him. His ambition and cheerful disposition kept him up even to the last, and when death came he was ready for the call and died with the courage of a Christian soldier the thirteenth of September, 1864, and was buried in Mound cemetery at Marietta, Ohio.

CAPTAIN THEODORE E. GREENWOOD.

Captain Theodore Edgerton Greenwood, only son of George Greenwood, esq., and Elizabeth Edgerton Greenwood, was born at Newport, Washington county, Ohio, February 7, 1838. He entered the preparatory department of the Marietta college at the age of sixteen, and entered the freshman class in September, 1855. During his college course he united with the Congregational church at Marietta, and always remained a consistent member. He graduated in the summer of 1859, at the head of his class. At the death of Tutor Washburne he was made tutor and filled that position acceptably for the remainder of the year. He spent part of the following year in the study of the law, but subsequently decided to choose a business career. But the breaking out of the Rebellion spoiled his plans, as it spoiled those of so many ardent young men in 1861. As early as the autumn of 1860, he began to study Scott's Tactics, and in a confidential talk with a college friend, said: "Any observant man can see that we are on the eve of a terrible war between the North and the South, and the man of military knowledge will be the man of power, who can help his country in her hour of need." At the beginning of hostilities young Greenwood did not see his way clear for leaving his parents for the field. He however accepted the position of post quartermaster at Marietta, and in the autumn of the same year was called to a more important position of the same kind at Wheeling, West Virginia.

But he was not satisfied with this kind of service; he believed that he was needed in the field. Accordingly, having at length satisfied the claims of filial duty which had before detained him, he resigned his position, and, in June, 1862, having enlisted in the military service, was appointed on the staff of General Rosecrans, who had become acquainted with him in West Virginia, but was now in command of a portion of the army of the Tennessee. Greenwood started immediately for the field, full of ardor, gratified to be at length where he would have an opportunity to do his part in the great struggle. His letters of that date are full of the spirit of his station. But his service was short; a single summer in the climate of Mississippi cut him down. Weakened by disease, he concealed his condition as much as possible from his general, and in the battle of Iuka, September 19th, he was placed in a position of much danger and responsibility. The line was broken, and Greenwood, by his courage and skill, succeeded in stopping a detachment that was flying before the enemy, and restored order to that part of the line. General Rosecrans testifies that "Captain Greenwood's conduct was admirable." But the exertion and excitement were too great for his strength. On the second day after the battle he was completely prostrated, and was taken in an ambulance to Jacinto, Mississippi, where he rapidly sank, and a week later, on the twenty-seventh of September, 1862, passed away.

CAPTAN JOHN J. JUMPER.

John J. Jumper was born in Manchester township, Morgan county, Ohio, September 6, 1830, son of George and Elizabeth Jumper, who afterwards removed to Washington county. John was married on September 13, 1851, at Reinersville, Morgan county, Ohio, and his widow, Mrs. M. E. Jumper, still lives at Beverly, Ohio. In August, 1861, Captain Jumper raised a company for the three years' service, and after remaining at Camp Putnam, Marietta, until his company was full, he joined the Eighteenth Ohio volunteer infantry at Camp Wool, Athens, Ohio, and his company became F, of that regiment.

While in the army he did good service, and would have continued until the close but for a severe attack of chronic diarrhoea, compelling him to resign, and of which disease he died September 13, 1864, at Beverly, Ohio.

CAPTAIN G. B. BARTLETT.

Captain G. B. Bartlett enlisted with J. W. Fouts at Beverly, and was mustered in and made a corporal at the organization of the company, D, at Marietta, October 9, 1861; was promoted to sergeant, January 1, 1862, and to second lieutenant May 26, 1862, and on the tenth of June started to Ohio on recruiting service, with headquarters at Chillicothe and at Marietta. While returning to his regiment, which was at Corinth, Mississippi, he was detached as acting assistant quartermaster, and acting assistant commissary sergeant of the engineers' department of the army of the Mississippi, and went with Grant on his expedition against Vicksburgh, becoming personally responsible for all the tools and materials used in the construction of the famous canal at that place, served in that capacity three months; then at the earnest request of his colonel, J. W. Sprague, returned to his regiment, and was promoted to first lieutenant July 1, 1863, and to captain November 12, 1864, and transferred to the command of company A, where he served to the close of the war.

LIEUTENANT LEVI J. FOURAKER.

Levi J. Fouraker was born in Morgan county, Ohio, September 8, 1838, where he lived until August, 1852, when he came to Washington county with his parents, and remained with them until April, 1861. He enlisted a few days after the breaking out of the war, in Captain John Henderson's company, K, Eighteenth Ohio three months' regiment, and at the expiration of his term of service volunteered in company H, Seventy-seventh Ohio, Colonel Hildebrand commanding. Upon organizing the company he was elected second lieutenant, and Richard Fouraker, his father, captain of the company. After the regiment landed at Pittsburgh Landing, Tennessee, Lieutenant Fouraker served faithfully on scouting and other duty, until the Seventy-seventh was ordered into camp at Shiloh Church, when Lieutenant Fouraker was placed in command of the first picket guard sent out from that point, which guard was stationed near the place afterwards known as the battle-field of Fallen Timbers.

Lieutenant Fouraker fought with his command through the battle of Shiloh, April 6th and 7th, and was taken prisoner with many others, on the eighth, at the battle of Fallen Timbers, and when a prisoner of war was basely shot by the rebel cavalry and subsequently brought into camp, nearly dead. He stayed in the field hospital a few days, when he was sent to the Cincinnati hospital, and from there to his father's house, where he died of his wounds March 5, 1875, aged thirty-six years.

Lieutenant Fouraker was always jovial, agreeable, and a good companion. He was brave to a fault, and had no enemies. His comrades had learned to love and respect him as a true soldier, when he fell at his post of duty.

ADJUTANT GEORGE B. TURNER.

George Butler Turner was a son of Samuel R. Turner, esq., and Hannah B. Turner, of Marietta, Ohio, and was born at New London, Connecticut, November 13, 1840.

From the age of eight years his home was at Marietta. He graduated at the high school, then finished his preparation for college under a private tutor, entered the freshman class in the fall of 1858, and passed through his course with the highest credit, graduating with the class of 1862. His parents were at the time in the east, and he informed them by letter that he felt it his duty to engage in the great struggle to save the Union, and soon thereafter was enrolled in company F, Ninety-second Ohio volunteer infantry, in which W. Beale Whittlesey was a lieutenant. He was made orderly sergeant of the company, and filled the position very satisfactorily.

Although of seemingly frail constitution and one likely to succumb to the hardships and trials of a soldier's life, yet he seemed to stand it well, so far as I can now remember, being usually in good health, always bright and cheerful. An earnest Christian, he was at all times consistent, yet by no means obtrusive in asserting his faith. His everyday life commended his belief to all those associating with him. In battle he was cool and self-possessed. At Chickamauga, at a critical time, Colonel Fearing and his adjutant were both wounded, and word was brought to the writer, on the right wing, to assume command; Turner, then acting as sergeant major, notified me of it, kindly urging me to keep cool, and all would be well. At this battle the adjutant, D. E. Putnam, was so badly wounded as to render his discharge a necessity, and Turner, who had been promoted, was made adjutant of the regiment as soon as it could be done; in which capacity he acted after the date of that battle, September 18, 1863.

On the afternoon of November 25, 1863, the Ninety-second regiment, with less than four hundred fighting men, formed a part of the column that assaulted and captured Mission Ridge. Turner lived to reach the summit unharmed. The commanding officer of the regiment had been wounded, Whittlesey and other officers killed, and others wounded in the assault, which was a very difficult one, the hill being steep and rough. The summit once reached and the enemy driven over, he assumed command of the shattered line, now three times decimated, in about a half hour and with drawn sword rallied the men about him and led them to aid in repelling a brigade of the enemy who were coming to the assistance of their comrades in our front. He here received his mortal wound, a large minnie ball striking him just behind the ear; no doubt he was facing the men urging them forward at the time.

Everything was done that could be, but his wound was mortal. He was evidently expecting death, and while he talked but little, seemed to draw comfort from his pocket testament, opened at the fourteenth and fifteenth chapters of St. John. General Turchin, who commanded the brigade, called, and in speaking of Turner's bravery and ability, offered him a position on his staff, asking him if he would like it. The reply came at once—"I am willing to go and do that in which I can be the most useful." He gradually sank, became delirious, and when it was thought best to remove him to the officers' hospital, gave the writer his hand, saying, "Good bye, colonel, good bye; we will both go home together." He went home that night, living but a few hours afterwards. He died December 1, 1863. Just before going into this last battle he wrote a letter home, to be mailed in case he should be killed, which closed with these words—"If I return not with the victors, think not the sacrifice too great for the interests at stake."

LIEUTENANT TIMOTHY L. CONDIT.

Killed in the battle of Murfreesborough, December 31, 1862.

Timothy L. Condit was born at Cleveland, Ohio, in December, 1837. In 1852 he entered the office of the Marietta Intelligencer as an apprentice. He devoted three years to the mastery of his trade as a printer. During this time spare moments were occupied in diligent preparation for college. He so far succeeded in fitting himself, that, after one year more spent partly in the preparatory department, and partly in working at his trade, he entered college the most thoroughly prepared of any member of his class. This leadership he maintained throughout the course, graduating in 1860, as the valedictorian of that year. Principally by his own labor as a printer, he secured the money to pay his way through college. The perseverance and force to achieve such marked success against such obstacles, of themselves stamp Condit as a young man of devoted purpose, great industry, and no ordinary ability.

In 1856 he united with the Congregational church at Marietta, and felt called to prepare for the ministry, but before the fall term of the theological seminary began he felt a stronger call to enter the service of his country, and decided to volunteer. In pursuance of this decision, he entered company L, of the First Ohio cavalry, as a private soldier, for three years' service. An educated gentleman, with influential friends in places of authority, he could have had a commission for the asking. Deeming himself unprepared for the responsibility of command, he refused to ask one. Through the camps and campaigns of his regiment, a gallant body of soldiers, Condit faithfully performed his arduous duties, adorning his humble position by maintaining amid all trials, temptations, and sufferings, his Christian profession and gentlemanly bearing. On the twenty-ninth of May, 1862, he was promoted to be second lieutenant in his company.

On the thirty-first of December, 1862, on the battlefield of Murfreesborough, in the thickest of the fight, and at the head of his squadron, Condit was shot dead.

Two companies of his regiment, on duty guarding a wagon train, were suddenly overwhelmed in the fierce onset of the attack by the Confederate army. Said a private soldier who rode with Condit on that day, "When the lieutenant was killed they were all around us; we could not see any way out. The lieutenant said the only way was to charge and then retreat. He rode forward to lead and was killed." To make way for his men to get out Condit died. Arnold Winkelried, when he gathered to his breast the spears of the Austrian phalanx died not a more heroic death.

His body was recovered from the battlefield, and now lies buried in the Mound cemetery at Marietta. As a token of appreciation of the character and service of this noble Christian patriot and martyr, the society of the alumni, and his fellow-soldiers of the First Ohio cavalry, placed a monument over his resting place.

LIEUTENANT CHARLES BEMAN GATES.*

Looking back to the dark years when so many homes were made desolate that the whole country seemed to sit in one common bereavement, there yet stand in the memory spots where the shadows rested with unwonted heaviness; where the time and manner in which death came, and the relations of the dead to the living, gave elements of peculiar and overwhelming sadness to the sorrowful stroke.

Lieutenant Gates was the only son of Beman Gates, esquire, and Betsy Shipman Gates, of Marietta. He was born October 30, 1844, and entered Marietta college in 1861.

Already in these early days of the war, his heart and soul were enlisted in his country's cause, and he entered college rather than the army, only because of his extreme youth. In the recruiting camp which was established at Marietta, the officers were drilled regularly by an army officer, and at his request his father obtained permission for him to join in the drill. He joined the force which was organized in Marietta for defence and guard duty, and was present at Buffington, when John Morgan attempted to cross the Ohio at that point. In this kind of duty he became proficient in the manual of arms, and satisfied in part his desire to help his country in her need, while at the same time he continued his studies.

Meantime the war raged on. Victories and defeats alike added to the Nation's dead, and the voice of mourning filled the land. Regiments which went away with full ranks, had come back piecemeal, on crutches, on cots, and in coffins. The day when man enlisted under the inspiration of life and drum had passed away. The dark days of the spring of 1864 had come, and the Government was laboring desperately to recruit the armies which were melted away in the terrible battles of the wilderness campaign.

Young Gates felt that the time had come when he must give himself wholly to his country's service. Friends tried to dissuade him, feeling that to break away in the midst of his education was a sacrifice that was not called for. But he remained firm in his conviction that it was his duty to go, and his parents yielded their consent, feeling that to withhold it would be to crush all manliness in him. He enlisted in the One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, which was formed in response to the call of Governor Brough, was chosen first lieutenant of his company, and was duly commissioned.

On the twenty-third day of May, at 2 o'clock P. M., he left with his regiment for the front by rail, via Parkersburg to Harper's Ferry. When about five miles below Marietta the train was thrown from the track down an embankment; two of his fellow students were killed, and he received severe internal injuries. Unwilling to turn back, he proceeded with his regiment; but his injuries, aggravated by exposure to rain, marching and camping without tents, resulted in his death at Harper's Ferry, May 31, 1864.

Thus he was cut down at the very threshold of the service which he had longed for. He had followed Greenwood and Condit and Whittlesey and Turner to their last resting place, and he entered this service with a full realization of the dangers involved, expressing his readiness to give up his life for his country. The sacrifice was required of him, while the experiences which are dear to the soldier were denied him.

In his college course he developed business rather than professional qualities. He was especially devoted to the more practical branches of study. He was greatly attached to his literary society, and took an active part in the frequent debates upon the questions which were then absorbing the public mind. He read more for information than amusement, and his essays which were often upon some political subject showed quick perception, penetration and sound judgment. With his fellow students he was universally popular. He was thoroughly unselfish, generous, often to his own detriment, as he frequently permitted his own record to suffer, through a desire to serve others. Through all his intercourse with his fellows, there ran a thoughtful regard for the feelings of others, and a fine, delicate sense of honor which won for him the warm affection and esteem of a large circle of friends, both in his own and the other college classes.

There were few residents of Marietta, old or young, to whom his bright intelligent face was not familiar; and his pleasant, respectful ways and frank, hearty friendliness had endeared him to all. He was devoid of all affectation, and slow to manifest the deeper feelings of his heart, yet no one who was intimate with him could fail to see that a deep reverence and affection for his parents was the strongest sentiment of his nature; so strong that it held him firmly from the temptations to which his sociable, funloving disposition rendered him peculiarly liable, and became a constant incentive to honorable effort.

He was maturing rapidly and gave every promise that he was passing to a successful and honorable manhood.

His death came with a weight of swift sorrow which words cannot measure or express. A telegram brought to his parents the tidings of his critical condition, and they hastened to Harper's Ferry by the first train, but reached there only to find that he was already dead, and they returned, bringing with them the lifeless form of him who had left them a short week before in the strength and beauty of his early manhood.

In all the sad experiences of the war, perhaps nothing shows more strongly the fearful cost at which the country was saved, than cases like this, when an only and tenderly loved son was taken, leaving a sharp sense of bereavement and irreparable loss which the passing years do not lessen, and which even religion can only soften, but can not take away.

LIEUTENANT RICHARD D. MASON.

Lieutenant Richard D. Mason, the subject of this sketch, was born in Adams township, Washington county, son of Adolphus and Betsey B. Mason. He received a common school education.

He was elected second lieutenant of company B, Ninth Ohio cavalry, which rendezvoused at Camp Marietta, and was mustered in at Zanesville January 17, 1863. From Zanesville the company moved to Camp Dennison, where they were armed and equipped. They then proceeded to Kentucky. Lieutenant Mason was with his company during its term of service up to the time of his death, acquitting himself with credit. After the siege of Knoxville, Lieutenant Mason was promoted to first lieutenant, and soon after obtained leave of absence to return home. While at home he was married to Miss Elizabeth Shepard. Returning to his company at Pulaski, Tennessee, he was taken with chronic diarrhea on June 24, 1864. "Thus perished as gallant a young patriot as ever drew sword in defence of his country."

LIEUTENANT RICHARD B. CHEATHAM.

R. B. Cheatham, Sixty-third Ohio volunteer infantry, volunteered with J. W. Fouts, and was mustered in at the organization of the company, October 9, 1861, as first sergeant of the company, served in that capacity with his company up to the twenty-sixth day of May, 1862, when he was promoted to first lieutenant of his company (D), served in that capacity up to the time of his death, in 1864. He died in camp at Memphis, after a two days' illness. Lieutenant Cheatham was a good soldier and an efficient officer, always ready for duty and seldom absent from his company, who deeply regretted his loss.

LIEUTENANT EDGAR P. PEARCE.

Edgar P. Pearce was born in London, England, November 27, 1840. Two years later his father removed with his family to this country, taking up his residence at Cleveland, Ohio; afterwards, in 1848, at Marietta. Here the subject of this sketch grew to manhood, passing through the public schools of the city. Having learned the printers' trade, he worked several years in the office of the Marietta Intelligencer. He then filled a clerical office at the bank of Marietta for some years. In his twenty-first year he enlisted as a private in the Seventy-seventh regiment, and soon after was appointed quartermaster's sergeant of the regiment.

After the battle of Shiloh he was promoted to first lieutenant and assistant quartermaster. He was next detached from the regiment and made brigade quartermaster; and when General Steele was organizing his expedition to join General Banks, Lieutenant Pearce was appointed chief quartermaster of the expedition, which position he filled with distinguished ability. He was always a favorite with his commanding officers, owing to his genial disposition and peculiar talents and ability in the quartermasters' department. When the Seventy-seventh regiment was reduced to battalion, on account of its thinned ranks, a reduction of regimental officers took place, and lieutenant Pearce was honorably discharged, together with others.

He was married on January 26, 1865, to Miss Mary

D. Ewart, eldest daughter of Hon. T. W. Ewart, of Marietta. As a partner in the firm of Pearce & Triem, he pursued the business of druggist for some years, in Marietta. He was the popular cashier of the Caldwell National bank, at Caldwell, Ohio, for several years. In the fall of 1872 he returned to Marietta in failing health, and died of consumption July 7, 1873, aged thirty-two years and seven months, much loved and lamented by a large circle of friends.

SURGEON PARDON COOKE.

Pardon Cooke, jr., was born January 10, 1823, at Parkersburgh, West Virginia, son of Rev. Pardon and Mary Cooke. The family removed to Ohio in September, 1832. In March, 1852, he graduated at the Starling Medical college, Columbus, Ohio.

He was married in November, 1852, to Mary Ellen, eldest daughter of Hon. William Forrest Hunter, of Woodsfield, Ohio, soon after which he settled in Marietta and began the practice of his profession.

He was commissioned as assistant surgeon of Ohio volunteers October 29, 1861, and assigned to duty in General Cox's division, in the Kanawha Valley. In February, 1862, he was assigned to duty as assistant surgeon of the Seventy-seventh regiment, and remained at his post until the time of his death, which occurred October 31, 1863, on a steamer, on the White river, near Duvall's Bluff, Arkansas.

LUTHER HATHAWAY.

In looking over the chapter of a life, especially after it is closed, we can readily see the leading characteristics, ambitions and desires that prompted the course of that life; and in the study of biography the chief benefit is derived from these salient points. We can gather from the field of every life, many flowers, many examples that may stimulate others to noble endeavor. Let us gather only these. Thus far will the general reader be interested and no farther. More than that is for local consumption of friends and relatives. The life before us presents many such points, of which we mention but a few.

First—Devotion to the cause of the country. For a year before the war Mr. Hathaway was in Kentucky, where every business interest would have prompted him either to oppose the Union or remain indifferent, but his letters of that period show that he stood by the Union as it was without equivocation; and upon his return in 1861 he at once enlisted as a private in the United States service. He placed his life in the scale. No higher duty can be discharged, or greater sacrifice made by a citizen than that.

Second—We would mention a pure life. Having been converted in early life he united with the Baptist church, and ever after remained a consistent member thereof.

Third—That which is included in the above—fidelity to domestic relations.

Fourth—A high appreciation of education as a means of development and as the right road to advancement. In one of his last letters to his wife, he tells her that no sacrifices they might make in educating their children would be too great for the end to be attained. His constant effort and solicitude was to bring up and educate his children properly.

Mr. Hathaway learned the trade of carpenter and joiner when a young man, but as he grew older it became his strong desire to own and cultivate land, as he was reared on a farm and such pursuits were more congenial to him. His tastes in this direction led him to take an agricultural journal for many years. He believed the life of a farmer to be the most independent and satisfactory of all; but the strong swirl of American life and the necessities of the hour led him in a different path. The better desire and the better purpose had to give way to the more pressing duties of daily life.

Luther Hathaway was born at Savoy, Berkshire county, Massachusetts, December 31, 1817. He was the youngest son of Nathaniel Gilbert and Vashti (Seymour) Hathaway, and counted among his ancestors on the paternal side, Governor William Bradford and Sir Humphrey Gilbert, the navigator and discoverer.*

His father and mother were both born at Taunton, Bristol county, Massachusetts, from which town they removed to Savoy.

From Berkshire his father removed to Macedon, Wayne county, New York, where Luther and his brothers and sisters received such education as was customary in New England families of those days. He was married August 29, 1842, to Clarissa Louise, daughter of John and Betsey (Elliot) Ripley, at Macedon, New York. The children of this marriage were Seymour Judson, born at Macedon January 27, 1844; and John Gilbert, born at the same place November 24, 1850.

Mr. Hathaway with his family removed to Marietta in the spring of 1853, where he resided until the breaking out of the war, when, upon his return from Danville, Kentucky, he enlisted in company B, Thirty-ninth Ohio volunteer infantry, July 22, 1861. Upon arriving at Camp Colerain, near Cincinnati, he was appointed hospital steward of the regiment. Soon afterwards the Thir-

* To those interested in genealogical matters the following will be of interest. The progenitor of the name came from Devonshire, England, in the year 1635, landing at Barnstable, Bristol county, Massachusetts. In Freetown, Taunton, and Fall River, in the same county, the early families remained for many years. All of the Hathaway name trace their ancestry to the same county, whether spelled Hadaway, Hatheway, or Hathaway. In the published life of Major General Samuel Gilbert Hathaway is the following: "Nathaniel Gilbert, a descendent of Sir Humphrey Gilbert, married Welthia, granddaughter of Governor William Bradford. Their daughter, Welthia Gilbert, married Ebenezer Hathaway, and these were the grandparents of Samuel Gilbert Hathaway. Ezra Chase, a descendant of John Alden, married a Gilbert, and their daughter, Hannah, married Shadrach Hathaway. These were the parents of Samuel Gilbert Hathaway." Colonel Ebenezer Hathaway, above mentioned, was the grandfather of Lemuel Hathaway, whose son was Nathaniel Gilbert Hathaway. During the Revolutionary war many of the Gilberts, and a few of the Hathaways went with the king and were banished, going to New Brunswick; those remaining were true to their country, and their names are found on the rolls of the Revolutionary army, some of the name attaining to positions of honor and trust, both in civil and military life.

Luther Hathaway

ty-ninth left for Missouri, and he accompanied the regiment on all its hard and extended line of march over that State during the winter of 1861-62; having for a messmate and friend the Rev. B. W. Chidlaw, chaplain of the regiment.

After the fall of Island No. 10, a general hospital was organized at New Madrid, Missouri, and Mr. Hathaway was designated to take charge of the same, being detached from the regiment. He so remained detached up to the time of his death.

During the winter of 1862-3 preparations were made for an advance on Vicksburgh, the next rebel stronghold below Island No. 10, and he assisted and superintended the fitting up, at Columbus, Kentucky, of the large Mississippi steamer Nashville for a floating hospital. When completed he was placed in charge. General Grant soon began to concentrate his forces for an advance on Vicksburgh, and when the army and flotilla arrived in front of that city, the Nashville was anchored in the river ready to receive the sick and wounded soldiers.

Before leaving Columbus, Kentucky, Mr. Hathaway's health was in such condition as would have warranted a release from duty, but he stood to his post. While at New Madrid he had been detailed as physician and surgeon to accompany various cavalry expeditions into the enemy's country. This was a position he had an ambition to fill, and he was fast becoming competent to fill it successfully by the study of medicine during his spare hours, and by his varied experience in camp and field. In these expeditions the active life on horseback preserved his usual health and vigor, but when he started south on the Nashville, the confinement and care of the hospital, and the heat and malaria of the southern rivers began to tell upon his health. Upon arriving at Vicksburgh he was in reality unfit for duty, but he still remained at his post. He died April 1st. His remains were embalmed and sent to Marietta. He was buried with Masonic honors in Mound cemetery, April 14, 1863.

The family then removed to Macedon, New York, where Clarissa L. Hathaway, his wife, died December 27, 1863.

His son, S. J. Hathaway, having begun preparation for college at Marietta in the winter of 1863, remained and graduated at Marietta college in 1869.

His son, J. G. Hathaway, after attending the Macedon Centre academy, in Macedon, New York, for several years, returned to Marietta in the spring of 1869, and engaged on the engineer corps then surveying the Cleveland & Marietta railroad until its completion, when he learned the photographer's business with J. D. Cadwallader, esq., at Marietta. He was married, in 1875, to Miss Annetta Morse, and removed to Portsmouth, Ohio, the same year.

Rev. B. W. Chidlaw writes in regard to Mr. Hathaway:

Of Luther Hathaway I have many pleasant memories, and shall ever hold him in high esteem. I first met him at Camp Dennison, near Cincinnati, where the Thirty-ninth Ohio volunteer infantry was organized in July, 1861. He was appointed hospital steward, and I as chaplain was brought into intimate relations with him. He was every way well fitted for the position; humane, kind, skilful, and industrious, like a ministering angel he faithfully served his country in caring for the sick and wounded soldiers. As a Christian I found him a helper in my labors, ever anxious to render my services acceptable and useful to the suffering soldiers in the hospital. He always prepared the way for my ministrations in the gospel and encouraged me in my work and labor of love. As a man I always found him faithful and self-sacrificing in duty, an unflinching friend of his Government and country, ready for service in defence of the Union and the suppression of the Rebellion.

He was a true friend, a sincere Christian, and a man of noble purposes. His death at the post of duty all of his officers and comrades greatly deplored and sincerely mourned.

B. W. CHIDLAW,
Chaplain Thirty-ninth Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

WILLIAM L. PORTERFIELD.

William L. Porterfield was born in Butler county, Pennsylvania, February 8, 1839. At the age of fifteen his family came to Marietta, Ohio. Here he attended school and was graduated from the high school in 1859. He engaged in teaching until the breaking out of the Rebellion. In November, 1861, he enlisted in company B, Seventy-seventh Ohio volunteer infantry, then encamped in Marietta, and was appointed second sergeant of his company. In January, 1862, the regiment was ordered to Cincinnati, and soon after was sent up the Tennessee to Pittsburgh Landing, there to take part in the great battle of Shiloh. Porterfield survived the first two days' heavy fighting, taking a gallant part therein, to be slain on the third day, April 8th, in the memorable charge of the Texan cavalry. He was almost instantly killed by a shot in the neck. His remains were brought to Marietta and interred in Mound cemetery. Thus perished, in his first battle, this young soldier, at the age of twenty-three.

CAPTAIN JACOB CRAM.

Jacob Cram was born at Marietta in August, 1820. He was the son of Jonathan and Sally Dodge Cram. His father was one of the early merchants of Marietta, coming to this county in 1816.

He had two wives: Miss Lethe Devol, and upon her death Miss Caroline V. Blocksom, of Zanesville, Ohio.

At the time of the call for troops to repel the Morgan raid, Mr. Cram raised a company of cavalry and took command of the same July 16, 1863. They were called the Putnam Guards, in honor of Colonel William R. Putnam, and were, with Captain Wood's command, ordered to the fords at Buffingtons island, where Captain Cram's company did good service as scouts. On the night of the eighteenth Captain Cram with others, was taken prisoner, and the same night General Scammon, of the Kanawha division, ordered Wood to abandon his position, which he did, taking his force on board the steamer Starlight, and repairing to Ravenswood. Where Captain Cram was during the battle of the next morning is not known. He was wearing, when the Morgan raid took place, a suit of butternut brown, and wore it at Buffington. After the battle Captain Cram was employed as an aid-de-camp to a Union officer, and his duties in this capacity led him to pass frequently between two Union camps about three quarters of a mile apart. On the morning of July 20th, while thus engaged, he was halted by some Union soldiers, who, from his butternut clothing, mistook him for a rebel, and as he rode on without stopping, they shot him, robbed him, and he was buried where he fell.

Thus fell Captain Cram, who in his anxiety to serve his country, had found death where he had a right to least expect it. He had been in poor health when the raid began, but the invasion of his native State roused him to action, and he resolved to go and help repel the invaders at any cost.

His remains were afterwards removed and reinterred in the Mound cemetery at Marietta. He left a widow and three children.

JOHN ALEXANDER PALMER.

John Alexander Palmer, fourth child of Jewett and Rachel (Campbell) Palmer, was born in Washington county, Ohio, October 19, 1829.

He married Margaret McAfee April 6, 1856, by whom he had two children. His life was passed upon his farm, and his winters usually spent in teaching until the breaking out of the war of the Rebellion. In August, 1861, he enlisted in the company then being recruited in Salem, by his brother Jewett, for the Thirty-sixth Ohio infantry. On the organization of the company he was appointed first sergeant. He entered the field with his regiment, and bore his full share of its hard campaigning and battles. He was promoted to second lieutenant March 20, 1862, and to first lieutenant on the first of September following. Owing to the failure of his health, he resigned his commission on January 18, 1863, and returned home. He died on the twenty-third of the following March, from the effects of exposure in the service. His high character as a Christian and patriot is well known. As a citizen and neighbor he was full of kindly impulses and quiet, good deeds. The organization and prosperous growth of the First Universalist church of Salem, this county, and of Palmer Lodge, of Odd Fellows, of the same place, are very largely due to his influence and earnest, energetic labors.

"His life was gentle; and the elements
So mix'd in him, that nature might stand up,
And say to all the world.—This is a man!"

ROLL OF HONOR—WAR OF 1861 TO 1865.

The following is a list of volunteers in the service of the United States during the war of the Rebellion, compiled from papers of the military committee, Washington county, newspaper lists, assessor's lists 1863 and 1864, lists of deceased soldiers, adjutant general's report, West Virginia, 1864 and 1865, company rolls, so far as they could be obtained, and from personal inquiry. Two persons have spent over six weeks in preparing and correcting the same.*

The roll is as full and accurate as it can be made without great expense and trouble.

It will prove a source of just pride to the people of the county, generally, as well as to the descendants and friends of those whose names are here recorded, and will be a standing challenge to the patriotism of the future to emulate the example of the volunteers of 1861-5.

ADAMS TOWNSHIP.

Allison, James, age 37, volunteer, 1865, Thirty-sixth regiment, company C.

Allison, Stephen, age 25, volunteer, July 20, 1861, three years, Twenty-seventh regiment, company D, corporal, attained rank of captain served four years, mustered out July 20, 1865; reenlisted as a veteran.

Allison, C. M., age 28, volunteer, three years, Ninth cavalry, company B, corporal, died in May, 1865, at Decatur, Alabama, of diarrhoea.

Allison, Lucien, age 33, 1865, Thirty-sixth regiment, company C.

Allison, Levi, Second regiment, company B.

Allison, Robert, age 24, volunteer, October 17, 1862, three years, Ninth cavalry, company B, private, served two and a half years, mustered out July 20, 1865.

Armstrong, Isaac, age 20, volunteer, July 20, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private, served five months, died in service December 9, 1861, at Somerville, Virginia.

Armstrong, William, age 18, volunteer, October 17, 1862, three years, Ninth cavalry, company B; private, served two years and nine months, mustered out July 20, 1865.

Asbeensheet Daniel, age 20, volunteer, October 14, 1862, three years, Ninth cavalry, company B, private, two years and nine months, mustered out July 20, 1865.

Atherton, William H., age 40, substitute, Seventy-eighth regiment, company D; mustered out July 11, 1865.

Augustine, John, age 23, Seventy-eighth regiment, company D, regular.

Augustine, Matt, volunteer, 1865, One Hundred and Seventy-eighth regiment, company D.

Badgeley, Isaac, age 27, Seventy-seventh regiment, company D.

Balch, John, volunteer, October 22, 1863, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private.

Bowman, Ed, age 41, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K, private, served three years, honorably discharged, reenlisted as a veteran.

Bowman, William, age 19, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K, served three years, reenlisted as a veteran.

Brooker, Deemore, Seventy-seventh regiment, company H.

Brooker, Darius, age 16, volunteer, February 1, 1864, three years, Ninth cavalry, company B, private, served eighteen months, mustered out July 20, 1865.

Brooker, Brainard, age 23, volunteer, October 24, 1862, three years, Ninth cavalry, company B, private, served three years, mustered out July 20, 1865, marched with Sherman to the sea, permanently detailed with division and ambulance train.

Brown, George W., age 21, volunteer, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K, died December 25, 1864, reenlisted as a veteran, died at Little Rock, Arkansas.

Brown, Charles, age 32, Thirty-ninth regiment, company D.

Brown, William, age 26, August 8, 1864, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K, served one year and seven months, mustered out March 8, 1866.

Brown, Gartrail, age 52, volunteer, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K, reenlisted as a veteran.

Burtis, John, Seventy-seventh regiment, company H.

Butts, George, Seventy-seventh regiment, company H.

Campton, Peter, Seventy-seventh regiment, company H.

Campton, William, age 23, volunteer, February 1, 1864, three years, Ninth cavalry, company B, private, mustered out July 20, 1865.

Campton, John, age 20, volunteer, February 1, 1864, three years, *Miss Addie Irish and Mrs. Mary M. Hathaway.

Eng'd by A. H. Ritchie

J. A. Palmer

Ninth cavalry, company B, private, served one year and five months, mustered out July 20, 1865.

Cutherwood, William, age 30, volunteer, October 17, 1862, three years, Ninth cavalry, company B, attained rank of quartermaster sergeant, discharged for disability May, 1864, reduced to ranks after eighteen months of service.

Chandler, Albert, age 39, volunteer, September, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K, captain, served three years, mustered out January 4, 1865, taken prisoner April 8, 1862.

Chapman, Rector, age 23, volunteer, October 17, 1862, three years, Ninth cavalry, company B, teamster, served two years and nine months, mustered out July 20, 1865.

Cheesman, William E., volunteer, Seventy-seventh regiment, companies K and A; reenlisted as a veteran.

Clay, Timothy, age 40, volunteer, October 15, 1862, three years, Ninth cavalry, company B, private, served two years and nine months, mustered out July 20, 1865, teamster.

Clay, Orange, age 44, volunteer, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K, reenlisted as a veteran.

Coffee, Adoniram, age 18, volunteer, October 21, 1862, three years, Ninth cavalry, company B, private.

Coffeen, H. T. C., age 24, Sixty-sixth regiment, discharged July 15, 1865.

Cobb, Joseph, age 20, 1863, Sixty-third regiment, company F, mustered out July 8, 1865.

Cobb, Isaiah, age 31, 1865, Sixty-third regiment, company F, private.

Coles, Isaac, age 21, volunteer, Sixty-third regiment, company F.

Cowee, F. P., age 27, volunteer, February 15, 1864, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, served one year and four months, honorably discharged June 5, 1865, on account of wound.

Cowen, Reuben.

Crane, William G., age 21, volunteer, October 28, 1862, three years, Ninth cavalry, company B, sergeant, served two years and nine months, mustered out July 20, 1865.

Crane, Charles C., age 44, United States navy, mustered out, gunboat.

Davis, Paul W., Seventy-seventh regiment, company K, reenlisted as a veteran.

Davis, William S., age 23, volunteer, July 20, 1861, three years, Twenty-seventh regiment, company D, private, attained rank of corporal, served four years, mustered out July 20, 1865, transferred to gunboat service September, 1864, reenlisted as a veteran.

Davis, George S., age 20, volunteer, October 25, 1865, three years, Ninth cavalry, company B, private, honorably discharged, 1865, for physical disability.

Davis, Frederick, age 22, volunteer, October 17, 1862, three years, Sixty-ninth regiment, company B, private, served three years, mustered out July 20, 1865, discharged for physical disability, recovered and reentered service.

Davis, Edmond, age 25, volunteer, July 29, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private, deserted, sentenced to lose wages, imprisoned, but subsequent bravery reinstated him in honorable standing.

Davis, Hugh A., age 32, volunteer, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K., reenlisted as a veteran.

Davis, Squire D., Seventy-seventh regiment, company K., deserter.

Davis, Dudley, age 35, volunteer, three years, Ninth cavalry, company B, corporal, attained rank of sergeant, discharged at close of war, transferred to navy.

Davis, Andrew J., age 21, volunteer, October 18, 1862, three years, Ninth cavalry, company B, private, served two years and nine months, mustered out July 20, 1865.

Davis, Brown A., age 37, volunteer, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K, died April 8, 1862, killed at Fallen Timber.

Davis, Daniel W., age 41, volunteer, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K.

Devol, Luther, age 17, volunteer, January, 1863, three years, Ninth cavalry, company B, private, served one year and six months, mustered out July 20, 1865, reenlisted as a veteran.

Denwell, Martin, volunteer, 1865, Thirty-sixth regiment, company H.

Devol, J. Herry, age 33, volunteer, February 1, 1862, three years, One Hundred and Ninety-third regiment, company E, corporal, served three years, mustered out August 4, 1865.

Dobbin, John, age 36, volunteer, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K, died April 13, 1862, mortally wounded at Fallen Timber, near Shiloh, Tennessee, April 8, 1862.

Dobbin, William, age 22, volunteer, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K, reenlisted as a veteran.

Dobbin, Isaac, age 45, volunteer, October, 1862, for three years, Ninth regiment, cavalry, company B, farrier, served two years and nine months, mustered out July 20, 1865, company blacksmith.

Dobbins, Henry, fall of 1864, One Hundred and Eighty-fourth regiment, company D, private, mustered out September 20, 1865.

Dobbins, William.

Driscoll, Stukely, age 42, volunteer, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K, private, served three years, reenlisted as a veteran.

Driscoll, George B., volunteer, 1865, One Hundred and Seventy-fourth regiment, company D, mustered out June 28, 1865.

Driscoll, Merritt, volunteer, 1865, One Hundred and Seventy-fourth regiment, company D, mustered out June 28, 1865.

Drum, Lewis, 1861, served three months.

Drum, Jacob, age 47, volunteer, November 22, 1861, for three years; First artillery, company K, private, served three years, mustered out January 16, 1865.

Flagg, William, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K.

Farmer, Thomas, age 46, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K, served three years, honorably discharged.

Farmer, John, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K, served two years, honorably discharged for disability.

Grant, Daniel L., age 34, volunteer, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K, died July, 1862, of fever.

Grant, Jefferson, age 24, volunteer, 1865, Thirty-sixth regiment, company H.

Grimes, Peter, age 22, Ninth regiment, cavalry, company B.

Griggs, Wallace, age 24, volunteer, August, 1863, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company F, corporal, died at Carthage, Tennessee, April 29, 1864, of typhoid fever.

Griggs, Robert, age 20, volunteer, three months, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B, October 17, 1862, three years, Ninth regiment, cavalry, company B, private.

Griggs, Charles A., age 17, volunteer, July 29, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private, reenlisted as a veteran.

Hall, Josiah W., age 44, discharged, then entered invalid corps, finally missing.

Hall, George W., age 19, Seventy-seventh regiment, company H.

Hall, John, Ninety-second regiment, company F.

Hall, Elijah, age 17, Seventy-seventh regiment, company H.

Hall, Dudley, age 53, Seventy-seventh regiment, company H, honorably discharged for physical disability.

Hanson, Finley, age 43, drafted, Ninth regiment, cavalry, company B, discharged before leaving camp, homesick.

Haynes, John, age 38, volunteer, 1865, One Hundred and Eighty-sixth regiment, company E.

Henager, Herman, volunteer, Sixty-third regiment, company G, mustered out July 8, 1865.

Henager, William H., volunteer, October 28, 1862, three years, Ninth cavalry, company B, private, honorably discharged.

Henager, Charles, volunteer, 1865, One Hundred and Seventy-fourth regiment, company H, discharged in 1865 as no longer wanted, detailed as dispatch carrier, died of wounds received in battle, September 1, 1873.

Hiltabiddle, William, Sixty-third regiment, company F.

Hoover, W. H., volunteer, 1865, Seventy-seventh regiment, company H.

Hoover, D. T., substitute volunteer, 1865, Eighteenth regiment, company C.

Hoover, Andrew, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K, died October 4, 1863.

Hoover, Aaron, age 51, Seventy-seventh regiment, company H, reenlisted as a veteran.

Hughey, James L., age 24, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G.

Hughey, Andrew, volunteer, three years, Thirtieth regiment, blacksmith, served three years, mustered out, reenlisted as a veteran.

Humiston, Jason, age 24, drafted, Seventy-seventh regiment, died in service at Alton.

Hutcheson, John, age 21, volunteer, January 17, 1862, three years, Ninth cavalry, company B, corporal.

Hutcheson, Edward, age 23, volunteer, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K, died in hospital in Alton, Illinois.

Huzzy, D. J.

Jenne, Stephen, age 18, volunteer, August 12, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company H, corporal.

Judd, Chauncey, age 21, volunteer, Ninety-second regiment, company F, mustered out June 10, 1865.

Judd, Lewis, Thirty-sixth regiment, company H, mustered out July 27, 1865.

Keith, Peter B., age 26, volunteer, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K, died November, 1862, captured at Fallen Timber, paroled, died in hospital at Washington, D. C., of hardships while a prisoner.

Kirkpatrick, Ralph, age 39, volunteer, One Hundred and Eighty-second regiment, company C, private, died July 13, 1865, Camp Chase, Ohio.

Kimberly, Benjamin, age 46, volunteer, Seventy-seventh regiment, company H, died April 6, 1862, killed at Shiloh.

Kile, Samuel C., age 19, October 17, 1862, three years, Ninth cavalry, company B, private, corporal, served three years, mustered out July 20, 1865.

Kile, Oliver W., age 21, volunteer, October 17, 1862, three years, Ninth cavalry, company B, corporal, attained the rank of fourth sergeant, served two years and nine months, mustered out July 20, 1865.

Landsittle, Jacob, Thirty-ninth regiment, company F, musician.

Langly, Marion A., Seventeenth regiment, company H.

Lewis, Otis, age 20, Sixty-third regiment, died.

Lewis, Stephen B., age 43, volunteer, December 8, 1861, three years, First light artillery, company K, artificer, served three years, mustered out January 16, 1865.

Living, John, age 19, volunteer, July 29, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private, served three years, died January 18, 1864, killed at battle of Cedar creek.

Long, George, age 21, volunteer, July 29, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private, captured at Winchester in 1864, reenlisted as a veteran.

Long, James, age 18, volunteer, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K.

Lucas, George W., age 27, volunteer, October 18, 1862, three years, Ninth cavalry, company B, corporal, served two years and nine months, mustered out July 20, 1865, teamster.

Lucas, Isaac, age 25, Sixty-third regiment, company G, died April, 1862, mortally wounded.

Longley, Marion A, age 17, volunteer, February 10, 1864, Seventeenth regiment, company H, captain.

Mason, William B., age 37, volunteer, June 15, 1861, three years, Seventy-first regiment, company D, captain, served four months, resigned October 12, 1861.

Mason, William W., age 20, volunteer, three years, Sixty-third regiment, company D, died May 30, 1862, died at Corinth, Mississippi.

Mason, R. D., age 27, volunteer, October 9, 1862, three years, Sixty-ninth regiment, company B, second lieutenant, attained the rank of first lieutenant, served one year and nine months, died June 24, 1864, at Pulaski, Tennessee.

Mason, Horatio, volunteer, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A.

Mason, Elijah J., age 18, volunteer, First artillery, company C, mustered out.

Mason, Jacob, aged 34, Sixty-third regiment, company F, mustered out July 8, 1865, discharged for physical disability, entered again February 11, 1865.

Mason, Oscar, age 24, volunteer, three years, Sixty-third regiment, company D, served one year, honorably discharged on account of physical disability.

Mason, Reuben S., age 27, volunteer, three years, Sixty-third regiment, companies D and F, lieutenant, transferred to Fifty-fifth colored infantry.

McAtee, Samuel M., age 17, volunteer, three years, Sixty-third regiment, company F, mustered out July 8, 1865, reenlisted as a veteran.

McAtee, Francis, volunteer, July 29, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private, served four years, mustered out July 27, 1865, reenlisted as a veteran.

McCarty, Christopher, volunteer, 1865, One Hundred and Seventy-fourth regiment, company B.

McCarty, Lucien, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company E, private, mustered out June 10, 1865.

McCurdy, Joshua, age 43, volunteer, Ninety-second regiment, company E, private, died April 23, 1863, at Carthage, Tennessee.

McHugh, John, age 26, 1865, One Hundred and Eighty-fourth regiment, company D.

McKenny, James, jr., age 35, volunteer, Seventy-seventh regiment, company H.

Merriam, William S., age 18, volunteer, October 22, 1862, three years, Ninth cavalry, company B, corporal, attained captain, served two years and nine months, mustered out, July 20, 1865, in general hospital at Springfield, Illinois, part of time for sore eyes.

Miller, Charles, Thirty-ninth regiment.

Miller, Thomas, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K.

Moore, Aaron, age 53, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K.

Moore, Zedick J., age 24, volunteer, One Hundred and Seventy-eighth regiment, company F, private, died March 7, 1865, at Arlington Heights.

Moore, P. R., age 35, volunteer, Thirtieth regiment, company C.

Morris, William, age 27, volunteer, Seventy-seventh regiment, company H, died 1863, of small-pox.

Morris, John, age 17, Ninth cavalry, company B, transferred to the Tenth in January, 1862.

Morris, Allen, age 18, volunteer, July 29, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private, reenlisted as a veteran.

Nott, Percival, age 48, volunteer, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company H, private, died April 8, 1862, mortally wounded at Pittsburgh Landing, April 8, 1862.

Nott, William, age 16, Seventy-eighth regiment, company H.

Nott, Benjamin, age 46, volunteer, July 29, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private, served three years, mustered out in 1864.

Olney, Orin, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K.

Otis, Harrison G., age 26, volunteer, reenlisted June, 1864, Twelfth and Twenty-third regiments, company H, lieutenant, attained captain, mustered out July 26, 1865, wounded in Winchester, July, 1864.

Owen, Alexander D., age 18, volunteer, First cavalry, company M.

Owen Daniel, age 36, volunteer, September 28, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private, served three years, mustered out 1864, lost his speech by severe cold in his third year of service.

Owen, James D., age 22, volunteer, First Light artillery, company K, served ten months, honorably discharged on account of physical disability.

Owen, Oscar F., age 19, volunteer, July 29, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private, served three years, mustered out in 1864.

Owen, Vincent B., age 20, volunteer, July 20, 1861, three years, Twenty-seventh regiment, company B, private, served three years, mustered out July, 1864, wounded seventeen days before time expired.

Owen, Sylvester D., volunteer, First regiment, company C.

Owen, W. D., aged 28, volunteer, Ninth cavalry, private, died April, 1864, at Pulaski, Tennessee, of diarrhea.

Palmer, Henry, age 17, volunteer, Thirty-sixth regiment, company C.

Palmer, William, age 17, volunteer, October 15, 1862, three years, Ninth cavalry, company B, private, served two years and eight months, mustered out July 20, 1865, sick during first year, afterwards performed duty.

Penwell, Martin, Thirty-sixth regiment, company H.

Perkins, Albert, volunteer, Sixty-third regiment, company F, honorably discharged on account of disability, arm broken below elbow.

Perkins, John, age 33, Sixty-third regiment.

Plummer, Robert L., age 38, volunteer, November 15, 1861, three years, First artillery, company K, sergeant, served three years and two months, mustered out January 16, 1865.

Porter, Hardy, age 30, volunteer, winter of 1864-65, Thirty-sixth regiment, company H.

Pratt, Davis, age 17, volunteer, January 9, 1863, three years, Ninth cavalry, company B, private, served two years and a half, mustered out July 20, 1865.

Ripley, Hiram, age 18, volunteer, July 29, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private, served two years and four months, died November 28, 1862, wounded at Mission Ridge, died four days later.

Roach, W. S., age 18, volunteer, October 14, 1861, three years, Sixty-third regiment, company F, sergeant, attained second lieutenant, served three years and four months, mustered out July 8, 1865, slight wound at Coal Run.

Roach, William W., age 20, One Hundred and Eighty-sixth regiment, company E.

Roach, Lyman, age 18, First artillery, company K, captured near Savannah, October 12, 1864, confined at Florence, South Carolina, starved till nearly insane, paroled in three months, and mustered out in June, 1865.

Rollin, Edward, age 39, 1865, Thirty-sixth regiment, company C.

Rose, James, Eighteenth regiment, company D.
 Rose, Thompson, age 19, Sixty-third regiment, company F, died July 22, 1864, reenlisted as a veteran, killed at Decatur, answered first call.

Rose, Isaiah, age 20, volunteer, Sixty-third regiment, company F.
 Ross, Nathaniel, age 20, volunteer, April 28, 1861, three years, First artillery, company K, private, attained corporal, served three years, mustered out in 1864, captured the first time at Decatur, Georgia, July 22, 1864, and twice afterwards wounded while returning to Union line, answered first call.

Ross, William, age 19, volunteer, July 29, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private, served three years, mustered out July 27, 1864, reenlisted as a veteran.

Ross, Russell D., age 17, volunteer, September 28, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private, served three months, died December, 1861, at Somersville, West Virginia, of typhoid fever, a good soldier.

Ross, Daniel N., age 21, Second Virginia cavalry, company E.
 Ross, Sampson? Sixty-third.

Rummer, Perley, age 19, volunteer, Sixty-third regiment, company F, mustered out July 8, 1865.

Rummer, W. J., age 36, volunteer, 1865, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private, mustered out July 27, 1865.

Sayles, Burgess A., Seventy-seventh regiment, company K, died October 2, 1862, of fever, buried at National cemetery, Little Rock, Arkansas.

Severance, Church B., age 22, volunteer, July 29, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private, served nine months, honorably discharged July 25, 1862, on account of physical disability.

Severance, Arthur, age 34, volunteer, 1865, Thirty-sixth regiment, company C.

Shattuch, Benjamin, volunteer, 1865, Thirty-sixth regiment, company E.

Shinn, Alexander.

Shaw, Charles, age 19, died.

Shinn, Alfred C., age seventeen, volunteer, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K, died January 5, 1862, typhoid fever, Corinth, Mississippi.

Shinn, Samuel D., age 18, volunteer, Seventy-seventh regiment company K, died June 1, 1862, wounded and taken at Fallen Timber, died at Huntsville, Alabama, prisoner for two months.

Shivers, George, age 23, volunteer, three years and three months, Seventy-seventh regiment, company H, reenlisted as a veteran, injured by a shell and afterwards made insane by heavy cannonading.

Shockley, Henry, age 19, volunteer, July 29, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private, reenlisted as a veteran.

Shockley, N. D., age 48, volunteer, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K, private, died August 9, 1862, captured at Fallen Timber April 8, 1862, died a prisoner.

Shockley, William, age 17, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company F, private, died February 4, 1863, taken sick in service, was brought home and died.

Simons, Orrin, age 40, volunteer, 1865, Thirty-sixth regiment, company C.

Simons, O. H., age 18, First artillery, company C.

Skinard, Ed. age 25, Thirty-sixth regiment, company C.

Smith, Charles, age 42, volunteer, Ninety-second regiment, company H, slightly wounded in hand.

Spear, James T., age 22, volunteer, July 29, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private, detailed for an Indiana battery, wounded once.

Spear, Gideon, age 20, volunteer, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company D, mustered out July 27, 1865, reenlisted as a veteran.

Spears, Ivan, Thirty-sixth regiment, company D, killed at Chickamauga.

Spooner, Daniel, age 22, Ninth cavalry, company B, sergeant, mustered out at expiration of service, July 20, 1865.

Spooner, Isaac, age 24, volunteer, three years, Ninety-second regiment, hospital steward, served three years, discharged.

Sprague, Daniel F., age 21, volunteer, First artillery, company H, mustered out.

Sprague, H. O., age 20, August 8, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company H, sergeant, served one year, died April 16, 1863, at Carthage, Tennessee, in service, of great service in disciplining troops.

Stackhouse, Franklin, volunteer, Ninety-second regiment, company D, wounded at Buzzard's Roost, in hospital one year, died at Chattanooga from chills and fever.

Stackhouse, John, age 48, volunteer, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company H, private, served two years, died.

Stackhouse, W. W., volunteer, fall 1864, One Hundred and Eighty-fourth regiment, company D, private, mustered out September 20, 1865.

Steed, Abraham, age 20, volunteer, January, 1864, three years, Ninth cavalry, company B, private, served eighteen months, mustered out July 20, 1865.

Steed, John, age 22, volunteer, July 29, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private, reenlisted as a veteran.

Stewart, John V., volunteer, 1865, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, answered first call for seventy-five thousand, and was captured at Harper's Ferry.

Striker, John, age 19, volunteer, Ninth cavalry, company B, mustered out July 20, 1865, served full term, well throughout service.

Thayer, James E., volunteer, 1864, Seventy-seventh regiment, company H.

Thayer, Ephraim, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B.

Votial, James, age 30, volunteer, 1865, One Hundred and Eighty-sixth regiment, company L.

Waller, Thomas, volunteer, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K, died April 8, 1862, mortally wounded at Fallen Timber.

Ward, Isaac, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B, deserted before leaving Camp Tupper, influenced by disloyal friends.

Ward, Morris, age 17, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K.

Ward, W. G., age 35, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B.

Weatherby, William, age 26, January 1, 1862, three years, First artillery, company K, private, served three years, mustered out 1865.

Williamson, John, age 35, volunteer, November 6, 1862, three years, Ninth cavalry, company B, captain, attained rank of major, served one year and nine months, resigned July 28, 1864, an account of physical disability, at Chattanooga.

Williams, Jesse, age 28, volunteer, 1864, One Hundred and Seventy-sixth regiment, company I.

Williams, J. W., volunteer, Twelfth cavalry, company D, reenlisted as a veteran.

Wilson, Benjamin, age 19, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K.

Wilson, William, age 37, volunteer, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K, reenlisted as a veteran.

Wilson, George W., age 34, volunteer, January 16, 1864, three years, First artillery, company K, private, served one year and six months, mustered out July 31, 1865.

Wilson, John, age 16, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K.

Wilford, Charles, Seventh cavalry.

Wright, Josiah, age 23, volunteer, September 12, 1862, three years, Seventeenth cavalry, company H, served three years, mustered out July 4, 1865.

Wright, Amos, age 23, volunteer, November 19, 1861, three years, Second Virginia cavalry, company F, corporal, served three years and seven months, mustered out June 30, 1865, reenlisted as a veteran.

Zollars, Zephaniah, volunteer, Eighteenth regiment, honorably discharged on account of disability.

Zollars, James, age 23, volunteer, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private, reenlisted as a veteran.

Rose, Sanfron, Sixty-third regiment.

RECAPITULATION.

|   |    |
|---|----|
| De Beck's battery.....  | 8  |
| First artillery.....  | 2  |
| Huntington's battery.....   | 1  |
| Ninth Ohio cavalry.....   | 38 |
| Seventh Ohio cavalry.....   | 2  |
| Second Virginia cavalry.....                                      | 2  |
| One each in First and Twelfth Ohio cavalry.....                   | 2  |
| Seventy-seventh Ohio.....   | 59 |
| Thirty-sixth Ohio.....  | 39 |
| Sixty-third Ohio.....   | 20 |
| Ninety-second Ohio.....   | 12 |
| One Hundred and Seventy-fourth Ohio.....                          | 5  |
| Eighteenth Ohio (three years).....                                | 3  |
| Eighteenth Ohio (three months).....                               | 2  |
| Twenty-seventh Ohio.....  | 3  |
| Thirty-ninth Ohio.....  | 3  |
| One Hundred and Eighty-fourth Ohio.....                           | 3  |
| One Hundred and Eighty-sixth Ohio.....                            | 3  |
| Seventeenth and Seventy-eighth Ohio, two each.....                | 4  |
| One each in First, Twelfth, Twenty-third, Second, Thirtieth, Sev- |    | enty-first, Sixty-sixth, One Hundred and Seventy-sixth, One Hundred and Seventy-eighth, One Hundred and eighty-second, and One Hundred and Ninety-third, United States navy, not designated, eight, in all. . . . . 20

Total number soldiers. . . . . 227
Died. . . . . 31

AURELIUS TOWNSHIP.

Allen, Alexander J., volunteered October 9, 1862, Ninth cavalry, company B, private, attained rank of first lieutenant, served two years and nine months, mustered out July 20, 1865.

Allen, James, age 20, volunteer, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company G, private, served three years, mustered out, captured at Chickamauga, and in rebel prison seventeen months.

Alban, William, age 18, volunteer, February 10, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G, private, served two months, died April, 1864, of chronic diarrhoea.

Atkinson, William Monroe, aged twenty, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B, corporal, attained rank of sergeant, served two years six months, mustered out; second enlistment, age 22, volunteer, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B, sergeant, attained rank of first lieutenant, served two years, mustered out March 8, 1866, captured in Marks' Mills, and in rebel prison fourteen months.

Archer, Cornelius, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B.

Barker, William K., age 17, volunteer, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company B, private; veteran enlistment, age 19, volunteer, 1864, Thirty-sixth regiment, company E, private, mustered out July, 1865.

Barker, Levi Tuttle, age 16, volunteer, February, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B, private, captured at Marks' Mills, and ten months in rebel prison.

Barnes, William E., age 37, volunteer, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company H, bugler, served three years, mustered out June 10, 1865.

Barnes, Owen, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B, veteran enlistment, volunteer, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B.

Barnes, William L., volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B.

Barnes, William Wilson, volunteer, 1864, one year, One Hundred and Seventy-sixth regiment.

Betz, Charles, First cavalry, company L.

Brown, William James, age 22, volunteer, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, companies E and D, private; served three years, mustered out 1864.

Carmical, James, age 32, volunteer, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company H, private, attained rank of sergeant; second enlistment, volunteer, three years, One Hundred and Ninth United States colored infantry, second lieutenant.

Burton, William, age 30, volunteer, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, companies A and H, private, attained rank of fifer, served three years, mustered out in 1864.

Copeland, John, age 35, volunteer, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company D, sergeant, died 1863, from wounds received at Chickamauga.

Davidson, John, age 19, volunteer, December, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G, private; veteran enlistment, volunteer, February, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, companies G and E, private.

Davidson, William, age 20, volunteer, August, 1864, Seventy-seventh regiment, companies G and E, private, served eight months, died March 23, 1865.

Davis, Brown, age 20, Seventy-seventh regiment, company H.

Dearth, Nehemiah H., age 21, volunteer, 1862, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B, private, served two years; veteran enlistment, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B, private, served one year six months, died July 19, 1865, of chronic diarrhoea, at Clarksville.

Delong, Jones, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B.

Dille, James L., age 20, volunteer, October 17, 1861, three years, Sixty-third regiment, company G, drummer, served two years, mustered out July 15, 1865; veteran enlistment, age 22, volunteer, December, 1863, three years, Sixty-third regiment, company G, drummer, served two years, six months, lost right leg above the knee at battle of Rice's Station, April 6, 1865.

Dille, Clinton, age 22, volunteer, December, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B, private, died 1862, from the effects of a wound in the head and shoulders.

Dille, Richard H., age 17, volunteer, 1861, three years, Sixty-third regiment, company G, drummer, served two years; veteran enlistment, age 19, volunteer, December, 1863, three years, Sixty-third regiment, company G, drummer, served two years six months, mustered out in 1865, was drum major during part of this service.

Dille, Joseph, one year, One Hundred and Seventy-fourth regiment, company D.

Gerrez, Didier, age 17, volunteer, August, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private.

Gerrez, Lafayette, age 19, volunteer, December, 1862, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private.

Gilmore, John T., six months, One Hundred and Twenty-ninth regiment, company F.

Grant, John H., age 21, volunteer, Forty-second regiment, company D, private, died September, 1863, of typhoid fever.

Grass, Adam, Thirty-sixth regiment, company G.

Groselas, Jacob, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F.

Grubb, James D., age 20, volunteer, July, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private, attained rank of corporal.

Hall, Justus W., age 18, substitute, May 15, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, private, served three and one-half months, died August 29, 1864, of chronic diarrhoea, interred at home.

Hanson, William, age 21, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G, sergeant; veteran enlistment, February, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G, sergeant.

Harper, William, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B.

Hess, Christian, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K.

Hess, Jacob, Thirty-ninth regiment, company F.

Hess, Justin, Fourth cavalry, company K.

Harvey, William, age 37, volunteer, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company H, private, served three years, mustered out June 10, 1865.

Hilton, James W., age 18, volunteer, December, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B, private, died in 1864, in prison, at Tyler, Texas.

Holland, John Thomas, age 17, volunteer, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company H, private, served three years, mustered out June 10, 1865.

Holland, William Nelson, age 18, volunteer, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company H, private, served three years, mustered out June 10, 1865.

Jackson, Thomas Putnam, age 40, volunteer, July, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private, served two years and six months, honorably discharged January 10, 1864.

Jackson, Andrew, Thirty-sixth regiment, company G.

Jackson James N., Seventh cavalry, company H.

James, John W., One Hundred and Sixteenth regiment, company H.

Johnson, William A., Twenty-fifth regiment.

Linten, George, age 40, volunteer, August, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company G.

Longfellow, Samuel, age 33, volunteer, February, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, companies H and E, private, served one year, died February, 1865.

Lund, Gamiel J., age 16, volunteer, November 15, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B, private, attained rank of lieutenant, served four years and four months, mustered out March 29, 1866, wounded in shoulder at Marks' Mills.

Masters, Zephaniah, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B, private, died February 1, 1863, of chronic diarrhoea.

Littlefield, William, Tenth regiment, company B, died.

Mathews, Samuel B., age 20, volunteer, October 1, 1862, three years, One Hundred Sixteenth regiment, company H, private, attained rank of sergeant, served three years, mustered out in 1865, captured at Winchester and in prison one month, then in hospital five months, transferred to Sixty-second Ohio volunteer infantry.

Matthews, Henry C., age 18, volunteer, August 22, 1862, three years, One Hundred and Sixteenth regiment, company H, private, served three years, mustered out in 1865, lost one foot in a charge at Petersburg, April 2, 1865.

Matthews, James Garnet, age 16, volunteer, August, 1863, six months, Fourth cavalry, company C, private, served seven months, mustered out in 1864; second enlistment, age 17, August, 1864, one year, One Hundred and Seventy-fourth regiment, company D, corporal, mustered out in 1865.

McKee, Samuel, Thirty-sixth regiment, company D.

McMahan, G. W., Seventy-seventh regiment, company G, honorably discharged.

Meredith, John, age 30, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G, private.

Meredith, New, volunteer, Ninety-second regiment, company H, private, died April 4, 1865, of scurvy at Nashville, Tennessee.

Miller, John, age 27, volunteer, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B, private, died October 26, 1864, in Tyler prison, Texas.

Miller Henry, volunteer, 1864, one year, One Hundred and Sixty-fourth regiment, company D.

Monroe, George Alburn, age 20, volunteer, 1863, six months, Fourth cavalry, company C, private, served seven months, mustered out 1864; second enlistment, age 31, substitute, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, private, served five months, mustered out 1864.

Morris, James, age 19, volunteer, February, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B, private, died July 2, 1864, at Tyler, Texas.

Nesselrode, Perley J., volunteer, July 29, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private, served two years and four months died November 25, 1863, at Mission Ridge.

Nesselrode, R. H., July 29, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private, served two years and four months, honorably discharged December 10, 1863, for disability.

Parker, Isaac, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B.

Ogle, Willard, Ninety-second regiment, company H.

Peaker, Joseph, Seventh cavalry, company H.

Peaker, Peter, Seventh cavalry, company H.

Peaker, John, Seventh cavalry, company H.

Peaker, Charles, Sixty-third regiment, company G.

Pierce, J., Sixty-third regiment, company G, killed September 20, 1863.

Perkins, Charles, age 19, July, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private, served three years, mustered out 1864, believed to have been captured.

Perkins, William Burris, age 17, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B, private, killed April 3, 1862.

Reed, Erastus, age 35, volunteer, August, 1861, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company H, served three years, mustered out June 1, 1865.

Roads, William, volunteer, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company G.

Rodgers, I. H., Seventy-seventh regiment, company B.

Shafer, John, age 28, volunteer, July 29, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private, served one year and six months, honorably discharged January 4, 1863, shot through both legs above knees at Lewisburgh, Virginia.

Shafer, James R., age 20, volunteer, 1862, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private, served two years; veteran enlistment, age 22, volunteer, 1864, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private, served one year and six months, mustered out July 27, 1865.

Smith, George W., Ninety-second regiment, company H.

Shafer, Albert D., age 18, July 29, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private, served two and a half years; veteran enlistment, age 20, 1864, three years, private, served one and a half years, mustered out July 27, 1865.

Smith, James W., age 19, volunteer, January 21, 1864, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company H, private.

Smithson, Robert Emmet, age 30, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G, private; veteran enlistment, age 32, volunteer, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, companies G and E, private, attained rank of captain, mustered out March 7, 1866.

Smithson, H. N., Seventy-seventh regiment, company B, died 1863.

Smithson, William, age 24, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B.

Smithson, Richard C., age 21, volunteer, August 2, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment company H, sergeant, served three years, mustered out June 10, 1865.

Smith, Horatio Nelson, age 17, volunteer, November 14, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B, private, served one year, died October 7, 1863.

Still, Chester T., age 24, volunteer, June 10, 1861, three years, Twenty-fifth regiment, company I, private, attained rank of blacksmith, served three years, mustered out in 1864.

Still, John F., age 23, three years, Thirtieth regiment, company K, private, served nine months; second enlistment, volunteer, August 1, 1861, three years, Thirtieth regiment, company K, blacksmith, served two years, mustered out in 1865.

Smith, Jonathan, Ninety-second regiment, company A.

Still, Martin Luther, age 20, volunteer, 1862, Thirty-sixth regiment, company G, private, attained rank of sergeant, served three years, mustered out in January, 1865.

Stone, David, Thirty-sixth regiment, company G.

Taylor, William, volunteer, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company H.

Timberlake, Thomas, Twenty-fifth regiment, company I.

Tilton, Benjamin, One Hundred and Sixteenth regiment.

Unger, Andrew, age 23, volunteer, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company H, private, mustered out June 16, 1865.

Unger, Jeremiah, age 21, volunteer, July 29, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private, served two and one-half years; veteran enlistment, age 23, volunteer, 1864, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, corporal, attained rank of sergeant, served one and a half years, mustered out July 27, 1865, never sick in service.

Vertican, F. W., First cavalry.

Vanfleet, Garrett, Seventy-seventh regiment, company F.

Vaughn, Ira, age 21, substitute, May 2, 1865, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, private, served three months, died August 4, 1864, and buried under another man's name.

Waller, Thomas J., volunteer, 1863, six months, One Hundred and Twenty-ninth regiment, company F, private.

Walter, Isaac, Ninety-second regiment, company H.

Walter, Warren Norton, age 39, volunteer, 1861, for three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company G, private, served three years, mustered out in 1864.

Walter, Jay Clark, age 30, volunteer, August 11, 1861, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company H, blacksmith, served three years, mustered out June 10, 1865.

Walter, Seth Eugene, age 23, volunteer, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company H, private, served two years, died November 13, 1864.

Ward, Thomas, Fourth cavalry, company C.

Ward, James, age 24, volunteer, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company H, private, died April 1, 1863.

Ward, Isaac, age 21, volunteer, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company H, private, attained rank of corporal, served three years, mustered June 10, 1865.

Ward, Stephen, age 21, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B, private, deserted before regiment left Marietta.

Weekly, Thomas, Thirty-sixth regiment, company G.

West, William Milton, age 16, volunteer, August 4, 1863, six months, One Hundred and Twenty-ninth regiment, company F, private, mustered out in 1864; second enlistment, age 17, volunteer, September 14, 1864, one year, One Hundred and Seventy-sixth regiment, company G, private, served nine months, mustered out June 19, 1865.

Waters, Zephaniah, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B.

Walford, John, age 24, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B, private, died April 6, 1862, killed at Battle of Shiloh.

Wolford, Isaac, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B.

Woster, Jacob, volunteer, July, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private; veteran enlistment, volunteer, 1864, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private.

West, William N., One Hundred and Twenty-ninth regiment, company F.

Yoho, Job, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B.

Zollars, Nathan.

Zollars, Frederick, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company A.

RECAPITULATION.

|   |    |
|---|----|
| Seventh Ohio cavalry.....   | 4  |
| Fourth Ohio cavalry.....  | 3  |
| First Ohio cavalry.....   | 2  |
| And one each in Fourth Ohio independent battalion cavalry and Ninth Ohio cavalry..... | 2  |
| Seventy-seventh Ohio.....   | 37 |
| Thirty-sixth Ohio.....  | 30 |
| Ninety-second Ohio.....   | 20 |
| One Hundred and Forty-eighth Ohio.....  | 4  |
| One Hundred and Twenty-ninth Ohio.....  | 4  |

|  |     |
|--|-----|
| One Hundred and Sixteenth Ohio.....  | 4   |
| Twenty-fifth Ohio.....   | 3   |
| Sixty-third Ohio.....  | 3   |
| One Hundred and Seventy-fourth Ohio.....   | 2   |
| One Hundred and Seventy-sixth Ohio.....  | 2   |
| And one each in Tenth Ohio, Thirtieth Ohio, Thirty-ninth Ohio,Forty-second Ohio, One Hundred and Ninth colored UnitedStates infantry, One Hundred and Sixty-fourth Ohio..... | 6   |
| Total of soldiers.....   | 126 |
| Died.....  | 20  |

BARLOW TOWNSHIP.

Alexander, Henry, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, private, served four months, mustered out September 14, 1864.

Austin, Lemuel, age 20, volunteer, April, 1864, Twenty-seventh colored regiment, company I.

Austin, Salathiel, age 17, volunteer, Twenty-seventh colored regiment, company I.

Butler, Charles W., volunteer, Fifth colored regiment; company I, killed.

Butler, Henry, volunteer, Fifth colored regiment, company I.

Breckenridge, Hugh, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, private, served four months, mustered out September 14, 1864.

Breckenridge, Andrew, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, private, served four months, mustered out September 14, 1864.

Bartlett, James, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, private, served four months, mustered out September 14, 1864.

Bartlett, John, age 17, volunteer, November 4, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company D, private, served four years, mustered out July 27, 1865, reenlisted as a veteran, wounded at Shiloh.

Beach, Alfred P., age 19, volunteer, August, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, attained the rank of corporal, served four years, mustered out July 27, 1865, reenlisted as a veteran, and was wounded at Shenandoah.

Beach, Cydnor T., age 20, volunteer, February 25, 1864, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, served one year and five months, mustered out July 27, 1865.

Rall, James W., age 27, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, private, served four months, mustered out September 14, 1864.

Calvert, John P., minister, age 28, volunteer, November 1, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K, first sergeant, served five months, died April 7, 1862, mortally wounded at Shiloh April 6th.

Clark, John, volunteer, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private.

Chapman, Ezra A., age 32, volunteer, August 8, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, served three years, mustered out September 3, 1864, detailed for messenger service.

Chapman, Hiel, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, corporal, served four months, mustered out September 14, 1864.

Clay, Nicholas, volunteer, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, served two and one-half years, honorably discharged for disability.

Carlin, James P., age 18, volunteer, November 17, 1862, three years, One Hundred and Twenty-fifth regiment, company E, private, served two years, honorably discharged November 17, 1864, wounded at Mission Ridge November 25, 1863, finally discharged for disability.

Conly, Hugh, age 38, volunteer, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, served three years, mustered out 1864, wounded at Lewisburgh, Virginia.

Coop, Benjamin F., age 28, volunteer, November 4, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company D, private, served two years, died September 8, 1863, from wound received at Shiloh.

Cooksey, Townsend, company C, corporal.

Cunningham, Francis M., age 17, volunteer, September, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, served five months, died February 24, 1862.

Daniels, Charles W., age 18, volunteer, August 1, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, served three years, mustered out September, 1864.

Deming, Henry, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, private, served four months, mustered out September 14, 1864.

Dunbar, Warren K., age 20, volunteer, November 30, 1861, three years, Fifty-third regiment, company H, private, served one year, died October 11, 1862, died at Memphis.

Dustin, John, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, sergeant, served four months, mustered out September 14, 1864.

Dunsmoor, Harvey, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, private, served four months, mustered out September 14, 1864.

Dunsmore, Perley, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, corporal, served four months, mustered out September 14, 1864.

Danley, Joel M., age 24, volunteer, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private, died May 20, 1863, of pneumonia, at Carthage, Tennessee.

Evans, Simeon, age 48, volunteer, August 26, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, served one year and four months, honorably discharged December 24, 1862, for disability in early service in West Virginia.

Evans, David E., age 25, volunteer, September 27, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, served two years, honorably discharged September, 1863, for disability, died three weeks after reaching home.

Evans, Charles E., volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, private, served four months, mustered out September 14, 1864.

Ferguson, H. C., Eighteenth regiment, company K.

Fleming, Robert H., age 18, volunteer, November, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company D, private, attained rank of captain, served four years and four months, mustered out March 8, 1866, wounded at Shiloh, captured at Marks' Mills, and in prison for thirteen months, detailed as clerk for colonel of regiment.

Fleming, James, age 21, volunteer, November, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company D, private, attained rank of orderly sergeant, served five months, died April 6, 1862, killed at Shiloh.

Gates, David, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, private, served four months, mustered out September 14, 1864.

Gooding, George, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, flier, discharged, wounded at Harper's Ferry.

Gooding, Harvey, age 16, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, private, served four months, mustered out September 14, 1864.

Gooding, Franklin, age 19, volunteer, July 3, 1861, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company B, private, served one year, honorably discharged in 1862 for disability.

Green, Dan P., May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company I, private, served four months, mustered out September 14, 1864.

Green, Henry, age 20, volunteer, August, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, attained rank of corporal, served four years, mustered out July 27, 1865, reenlisted as a veteran.

Greenlees, Andrew, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, private, served four months, mustered out September 14, 1864.

Graham, Robert, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private.

Gould, James, age 20, volunteer, November 5, 1861, for three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company D, private, attained sergeant, enlisted with the regiment.

Haddow, James, age 34, volunteer, August 1, 1861, for three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, first sergeant, attained captain, served four years, mustered out July 27, 1865, in all active service of the regiment, wounded at Kerntown July 24, 1864, and reenlisted as a veteran.

Harvey, David, aged 22, volunteer, October 28, 1861, for three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company D, first sergeant, served one year and two months, died January 28, 1863; discharged for disability, died at Barlow April 24, 1863.

Harvey, Robert, aged 19, volunteer, August 1, 1861, for three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, attained first sergeant, served three years, died May 29, 1864, killed at Cloyd's Mountain, Virginia, and buried near the field by his comrades.

Harvey, Andrew, volunteer, May, 1864, for one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, private, mustered out September 14, 1864.

Harvey, Samuel W., aged 21, volunteer, August, 1861, for three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, attained rank of first lieutenant, served four years, mustered out July 27, 1865, reenlisted as a veteran, wounded at Lewisburgh in 1862, and at Opequan in 1864.

Harvey, William, aged 16, volunteer, September, 1861, for three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, served three years, honorably discharged October 5, 1864; sick three months, wounded and taken at Chickamauga September 12, 1863, paroled after twelve days, exchanged May 23, 1864, in hospital nine months.

Harvey, S. Fletcher, volunteer, May, 1864, for one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, private, discharged September 25, 1864, reenlisted as a veteran, detailed for picket and post duty.

Henry, Julius, May, 1864, for one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F.

Hill, George W., aged 23, volunteer, October, 1862, for nine months, Sixty-second regiment, company I, private, honorably discharged November, 1862; slightly wounded when charging a bayonet.

Hoffman, Samuel H., aged 18, volunteer, September 27, 1861, for three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, served three years, mustered out October 26, 1864, served as mounted orderly with General Turchin for nine months.

Hoffman, John W., aged 19, volunteer, April 22, 1861, for three months, Eighteenth regiment, company K, private, attained first sergeant, served two years, died April 27, 1863; reenlisted, was sick but joined before recovering, died at Nashville, Tennessee, of typhoid fever.

Hoffman, David S., aged 22, volunteer, August 6, 1861, for three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, served three, mustered out September 7, 1864. He was detailed often as regimental carpenter, recruiting service, as commissary sergeant and as clerk of commissary of subsistence.

Hoffman, Richard A., aged 17, volunteer, August 1, 1861, for three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, clerk, attained quartermaster sergeant, served three years and nine months, discharged May 8, 1865, while out on duty taken by enemy June, 1864, while being taken to Andersonville jumped from train, and reached our lines July 20th, afterward served as citizen's clerk in quartermaster department in Sherman's army.

Hoffman, William W., volunteer, May, 1864, for one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, sergeant, died August 16, 1864.

Hoffman, Francis A., volunteer, May, 1864, for one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, private, mustered out September 14, 1864, served on detail duty as orderly, on mail boat from Fort Monroe to Bermuda, Kansas.

Hoisington, George, aged 30, volunteer, August 1, 1861, for three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, served three years, discharged August 28, 1864, was in all the chief engagements of his regiment, wounded at Mission Ridge in ankle, six months in hospital.

Jones, John, jr., aged 39, volunteer, October 14, 1861, for three years, First light artillery, company H, served one year and five months, died May 29, 1863; was struck by three balls at Chancellorsville May 2, 1863, taken by rebels and exchanged, and died of amputation of leg.

Jones, Jacob, volunteer, May, 1864, for one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, private.

Kinkhead, George W., aged 18, volunteer, October 14, 1862, for three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K, private, three years, captured at Mark's Mills April 25, 1864, was held with regiment for ten months, after furlough of thirty days rejoined regiment.

Kinkhead, Isaac B., aged 25, volunteer, October 8, 1861, for three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K, orderly sergeant, attained lieutenant colonel, mustered out May 14, 1862, at Shiloh was appointed captain in place of Captain Chandler, supposed to be dead, on his return he was mustered out and put on detached service till June 17, 1863.

Kinkhead, David N., aged 24, volunteer, February, 1864, Seventy-seventh regiment, company D, private, served nine months, died November, 1864, taken prisoner at Mark's Mills but escaped, reported killed on a foraging expedition in Arkansas.

Kinkhead, John P., aged 21, volunteer, July 7, 1863, Second heavy artillery, company K, artificer.

Lamb, William A., aged 47, volunteer, September, 1864, for one year, Sixth Virginia infantry, company D, private, served nine months; honorably discharged June 10, 1865; served on post duty among the guerillas in West Virginia.

Lamb, Leonidas G., aged 22, volunteered February 13, 1865, One Hundred and Eighty-sixth regiment, company G, served seven months, discharged September 25, 1865, on post duty at Bermuda Hundred, Virginia.

Lamb, William F., May, 1864, for one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, died July 31, 1864.

Lawton, Ezra J., aged 21, volunteer, August 1, 1861, for three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, attained first sergeant, served nine months, died April 19, 1862, was promised a commission as lieutenant, but attacked by pneumonia and died at Summersville.

Lawton, Richard G., volunteer, May, 1864, for one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, wardmaster, served four months, mustered out September 14, 1864.

Lawton, Arthur, aged 35, volunteer, August, 1861, for three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, hospital nurse, served three years, honorably discharged September, 1864; discharged for disability incurred by camp disease.

Lawton, Isaiah B., aged 24, volunteer, August, 1862, for three years, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private, attained surgeon's clerk, served two years and six months, honorably discharged February 27, 1864; discharged at Chattanooga for disability.

Love, Charles W., age 20, volunteer, August 1, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, served three years, discharged September, 1864.

Lewis, William H., age 28, volunteer, August 8, 1864, Twenty-seventh regiment, United States colored infantry, company K, private, served one year, discharged September 7, 1865.

Lockmiller, James, volunteer, October 14, 1861, three years, First light artillery, company H, died of camp fever.

Lewis, Charles, age 26, volunteer, August 10, 1864, Twenty-seventh regiment, United States colored infantry, company D, private, served one year and four months, died December 13, 1865.

Lukins, Eli B., age 34, volunteer, January, 1861, Eighteenth regiment, colored infantry, company B, private, served four years and six months, discharged July 1, 1865.

Male, Aaron, age 25, volunteer, August 11, 1864, Fifth regiment, company F, private, died in 1865, at Columbus, Ohio.

McMain, James I., age 18, volunteer, February 27, 1864, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, discharged March 17, 1865, in hospital most of the time, never in active service, discharged for disability.

McGachy, William H., volunteer, One Hundred and Twenty-fifth regiment, company E, private, wounded at Chattanooga.

Morris, Benajah, age 25, volunteer, August 13, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private, served two years and nine months, discharged May 12, 1865.

Miller, Stephen O., age 13, volunteer, three months, Thirteenth regiment, private, captured at Harper's Ferry and paroled.

Morrow, Joseph William, age 27, volunteer, February 4, 1862, Sixty-third regiment, company H, private, discharged October 4, 1863, as disabled.

Miller, William K., age 21, volunteer, July 21, 1861, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company B, private, attained the rank of corporal, served four years, discharged July 9, 1865.

Miller, Josiah, age 26, volunteer, March, 1864, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, served one year, discharged July 28, 1865.

Miller, Hiram H., age 15, volunteer, November, 1861, three years, First artillery, company H, private, attained the rank of fife major, reenlisted in 1862.

Miller, Isaac, age 49, volunteer, November, 1861, three years, First artillery, company H, private, served nine months, died September 1, 1863.

Morris, George M., volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, private, honorably discharged, was sick at Bermuda with brain fever and paralysis and brought home.

Morris, Joseph P., May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, private.

Morris, John W., age 18, volunteer, October 23, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company D, private, served one year and five months, honorably discharged March 12, 1863, for disability, was wounded at Shiloh, April 6, 1862, died July 1, 1864, at Camden, Arkansas.

Moore, Frank A., volunteer, February 15, 1865, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, served five months, mustered out July 27, 1865.

Morris, William H., age 23, volunteer, August 1, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, attained the rank of first sergeant, served four years, mustered out July 27, 1865, in active service throughout the period, reenlisted as a veteran.

McClure, Thomas J., age 24, volunteer, 1861, three months, Second regiment, private, served three months, on guard duty.

McCarty, Thomas, age 29, volunteer, August, 1862, three years Ninety-second regiment, company G, private, served nine months, died June 1, 1863.

Merrill, James W., age 30, volunteer, July 28, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company G, first lieutenant, attained the rank of captain, served one year and ten months, honorably discharged May 24, 1864, on account of wounds received in the service, wounded and taken prisoner at Chickamauga, September 20, 1863, parolled and exchanged September 29th, and made captain.

Murchy, John, Ninety-second regiment, company G, died January, 1862, of pneumonia, at Nashville.

McKibben, William A., volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company B, orderly, discharged.

Norris, Adam, age 23, volunteer, August 20, 1864, one year, One Hundredth regiment, United States colored infantry, private, served one year, discharged September 15, 1865, first served on commissary and hospital duty, afterwards on the field.

Ormiston, Alexander, volunteer, October 12, 1861, three years, Sixty-third regiment, company G, corporal, served four years, discharged July, 1865.

Ormiston, Isaac A., volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, private, served four months, mustered out September 14, 1864.

Ormiston, James F., volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, private, served four months, mustered out September 14, 1864.

Parsons, William, age 33, volunteer, August 1, 1864, three years, Twenty-seventh regiment, United States colored infantry, company B, corporal, served one year, discharged September 7, 1865.

Payne, Darius, age 18, volunteer, April 23, 1861, three months, Eighteenth regiment, company K, sergeant, attained the rank of first sergeant, served four years, discharged October 18, 1865, reenlisted in September, 1862, in company C, One Hundred and Twenty-fifth regiment, Ohio volunteer infantry, as sergeant, was wounded twice.

Preston, Daniel L., age 21, volunteer, August 1, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, served three years, discharged September 5, 1864, wounded twice.

Palmer, I. F., volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, private, served four months, discharged September 14, 1864.

Phillips, Thomas G., age 29, volunteer, August 15, 1861, three years, Eighteenth regiment, company F, private, honorably discharged July 18, 1862, for physical disability, reenlisted August 19, 1864, one year, One Hundred and Eighty-second regiment, company C, corporal, attained the rank of sergeant, discharged July 7, 1865.

Pond, L. P., volunteer, May, 1864, One hundred and forty-eighth regiment, company F, first lieutenant, served four months, mustered out September 14, 1864, sick, sent to Port Dennison, then transferred to veteran corps.

Proctor, Joseph H., age 23, volunteer, August 15, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private, served three years, discharged July, 1865.

Rigg, John C., Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private.

Pugh, J. L., volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One hundred and forty-eighth regiment, company F, served four months, discharged September 14, 1864.

Rogers, S. H., Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private.

Richards, Henry S., age 20, volunteer, November 5, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company D, private, attained the rank of sergeant, reenlisted as a veteran.

Robinson, Joseph, Sixty-third regiment, company F, private, died July 20, 1863, chronic diarrhœa.

Richards, Luman D., age 19, volunteer, February 15, 1864, Seventy-seventh regiment, company D, private.

Robinson, Benjamin, volunteer, October, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, honorably discharged May 23, 1863, wounded and captured at Chickamauga, parolled and exchanged in May, 1864, wounded and captured at Winchester, July 24th, parolled and exchanged, discharged.

Saylor, Solomon, age 18, volunteer, September 13, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, served three years, discharged October 25, 1864.

Saylor, Edward, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, mustered out July 27, 1865, never wounded, but in all the engagements with his regiment.

Saylor, Jacob, age 16, volunteer, November 30, 1861, three years,

Fifty-third regiment, company II, private, served four years, mustered out August 16, 1865.

Smith, David, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventh cavalry, company H, private, served three years, died July 8, 1864, captured at Chickamauga, September 20, 1863, and taken to Andersonville prison, where he died.

Scott, Henry, volunteer, Fifth cavalry, company I, corporal, died April 7, 1865, died in hospital in North Carolina.

Tiffany, Alfonzo, volunteer, August, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, second lieutenant, attained the rank of first lieutenant, served two years, resigned 1863.

Turner, George B., volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, captain, served four months, discharged September 14, 1864, discharged at close of term, reenlisted in company F, Thirty-sixth Ohio volunteer infantry, and served till mustered out with regiment.

Turner, Duncan, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, private, served four months, mustered out September 14, 1864.

Turner, David, volunteer, 1863, nine months, First Virginia cavalry, private, served nine months, discharged 1864.

Tompkins, A. W., volunteer, May, 1861, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, private, served four months, mustered out September 14, 1864.

Vincent, Cyrus E., age 18, volunteer, June 15, 1863, One Hundred and Twenty-ninth regiment, company A, private, died October 29, 1863, died of lung fever at Cumberland Gap, Maryland.

Tuttle, James, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, private, served four months, mustered out September 14, 1864.

Vanvaley, John W., age 18, volunteer, March 18, 1865, Eighteenth regiment, company I, private, detailed on post duty.

Vincent, Anselem, age 30, volunteer, August, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, discharged January 14, 1863, discharged on account of disability, enlisted again in 1864 and served till discharged with regiment.

Vincent, John C., age 20, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, first sergeant, served four months, discharged September 14, 1864.

Vanvaley, Joseph S., volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, corporal, served four months, discharged September 14, 1864.

Vincent, O. B., volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, private, served four months, discharged September 14, 1864, detailed for telegraph service.

Young, John R., age 25, volunteer, October 11, 1862, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company H, sergeant, served three years, discharged October 14, 1865, wounded and captured at Marks' Mills, April 25, 1864, parolled, exchanged, and after six months' disablement resumed duty.

Young, George, volunteer, Seventy-seventh regiment, company H.

Wilson, Alexander, Sixty-third regiment, company G.

Wilson, Martin, Sixty-third regiment, company G.

RECAPITULATION.

|   |    |
|---|----|
| Huntington's battery.....   | 5  |
| Battery K, Second Huntington artillery.....   | 1  |
| One each in Fourth Virginia cavalry, Seventh Ohio, and Thirteenth Ohio.....   | 3  |
| One Hundred and Forty-eighth Ohio National Guard.....   | 38 |
| Thirty-sixth Ohio.....  | 33 |
| Seventy-seventh Ohio.....   | 15 |
| Ninety-second Ohio.....   | 9  |
| Sixty-third Ohio.....   | 5  |
| Fifth colored infantry.....   | 5  |
| Eighteenth Ohio (three years).....  | 3  |
| Eighteenth Ohio (three months).....   | 3  |
| Twenty-seventh United States colored infantry.....  | 5  |
| Thirty-ninth Ohio.....  | 2  |
| One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Ohio.....  | 2  |
| Fifty-third Ohio.....   | 2  |
| One each in Second Ohio infantry, Twelfth Ohio, Sixth Virginia infantry, Sixty-second Ohio, One Hundredth United States colored infantry, One Hundred and Twenty-ninth Ohio, One Hundred and Eighty-second Ohio, One Hundred and Eighty-sixth Ohio, in all..... | 8  |

Total number soldiers..... 137
Died..... 21

BELPRE TOWNSHIP.

Allen, Davis C., volunteer, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company G, sergeant, in battles of Chattanooga, Mission Ridge, and Lookout Mountain.

Allen, Harvey G., volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, served four months, discharged, September 14, 1864.

Allen, Loring P.

Barkley, Samuel W., age 18, volunteer, January, 1862, Seventy-third regiment, company F, corporal, served two years, died May 22, 1864, fought at Chancellorsville, Gettysburgh, Lookout Valley, and Resaca, where he was mortally wounded May 15th.

Barrows, James K., volunteer, discharged.

Armstrong, Alexander H., age 22, volunteer, September 26, 1864, One Hundred and Eighty-third regiment, company D, second lieutenant, died May 8, 1865, from exposure while in camp.

Batten, Lewis M., volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, served four months, discharged September 14, 1864.

Barcus, James M., volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, served four months, discharged September 14, 1864.

Berry, William, First light artillery, company H.

Bellows, Benjamin T., volunteer, private, honorably discharged May 31, 1865.

Bellows, Orrin M., age 22, volunteer, August, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private, served six months, died February 26, 1863, of brain fever.

Bellows, Abram M., age 16, volunteer, February 22, 1865, Ninety-first regiment, company B, private.

Bodkin, William Wallace, age 17, volunteer, October 30, 1861, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, discharged May 30, 1864, wounded at Gettysburgh very severely, and reenlisted as a veteran in 1865.

Bodkins, Charles, age 43, volunteer, August 15, 1862, Seventh cavalry regiment, company I, private, served one year and eight months, died April 7, 1864, captured at Rogersville, Tennessee, taken to Belle Isle, removed sick to hospital at Richmond where he died.

Breckenridge, D. M., volunteer, May 18, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, attained rank of adjutant's clerk, served four months, discharged September 14, 1864.

Breckenridge, Charles D., volunteer, May 18, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, served four months, discharged September 14, 1864, disabled and not on duty, but reenlisted with One Hundred and Seventy-ninth regiment, company H, September 28, 1864, and was discharged with regiment.

Blow, John H., volunteer, Ninety-second regiment, private, attained rank of corporal, discharged January 28, 1865.

Blough, Rufus, volunteer, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, died July 7, 1864, of camp disease and measles.

Berry, James B., age 38, volunteer, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, discharged September 14, 1864.

Bellows, Avery S., age 24, volunteer, August 9, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private, served one year and four months, discharged December 19, 1863, sick for ten months, discharged for disability.

Brown, John A., age 29, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, orderly sergeant, served four months, discharged September 14, 1864.

Cox, Jefferson, Seventh cavalry, company I.

Campbell, Charles H., age 40, volunteer, May 16, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, corporal, served four months, discharged September 14, 1864.

Campbell, Theodore W., age 20, volunteer, May 18, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, four months, discharged September 14, 1864.

Clark, John, age 23, volunteer, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, died August, 1862, from a gunshot wound received at the battle of Bull Run.

Campbell, Curran, volunteer, August 4, 1862, private, injured by accident June 9, 1863, remained in hospital till August 14th.

Chick, John C., One Hundred and Sixteenth regiment, company I.

Clark, John J., age 31, volunteer, August, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private, three years, discharged June 29, 1865, in March, 1864, was transferred to company H, veteran reserve corps, wounded at Fort Stephens, District Columbia, July 12, 1864.

Clark, Jacob, Seventy-third regiment, company F, killed in action at Cross Keys.

Cole, William R., age 19, volunteer, July 27, 1861, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company K, private, served one year, discharged October 14, 1862, for disability.

Coleman, Alfred, Thirty-ninth regiment, company K.

Curtis, Henry C., volunteer, May 18, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private.

Curtis, Columbus B., age 30, volunteer, May 18, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, sergeant, four months, discharged September 14, 1864.

Curtis, A. S., age 34, volunteer, May 18, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, first lieutenant, four months, discharged September 18, 1864.

Dalzell, James, age 24, August 4, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private, served three years, captured at Carthage, Tennessee, March 8, 1863, taken to Libby prison, parolled and exchanged in June, and discharged with regiment June, 1865.

Davis, J. T., age 18, volunteer, May 18, 1864, for one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, served four months, discharged September 14, 1864, sick most of the time and out, returned and was discharged with his company.

Davidson, Eli, age 34, volunteer, May 18, 1864, served one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, corporal, died 1865, taken sick at City Point, remained in hospital till two weeks after the regiment's discharge, and returned home.

Deeble, Charles H., age 17, volunteer, March 4, 1864, Seventy-third regiment, company F, musician, attained the rank of orderly, served one year and four months, discharged July 20, 1865, was in all the battles of his regiment after his enlistment, and discharged with it.

Deeble, Joseph, age 42, volunteer, May 18, 1862, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, wagon-master, served four months, discharged September 14, 1864, died October 8, 1864.

Dexter, John L., age 27, volunteer, August 2, 1861, Thirty-ninth regiment, company K, private, served three years and two months, discharged July, 1865, neither sick, wounded or captured during service.

Dexter, Francis, age 25, volunteer, May 18, 1862, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, discharged August, 1864, sick but not wounded or captured during service.

Dustin, Charles E., age 49, volunteer, 1862, Seventy-third regiment, company D, private, served three weeks, died 1862, killed at Bull Run three weeks after enlistment, had previously served in the Florida war.

Eskey, Samuel S., age 31, volunteer, May 18, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, served four months, died September, 1864.

Fletcher, Amasa S., age 19, volunteer, August, 1862, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private, served two years and nine months, discharged May 19, 1865, wounded at Atlanta, Georgia, and disabled for several months.

Flowers, Counree O., age 24, volunteer, August 25, 1862, three years, Seventh cavalry, company I, attained the rank of orderly, served three years, mustered out July 4, 1865.

Fish, David, Seventy-third regiment, company F, died 1862.

Flowers, George, age 25, volunteer, March 7, 1865, One Hundred and Ninety-sixth regiment, company F, private, discharged March 13, 1865, sick and discharged from hospital.

Fletcher, John V., age 19, volunteer, August, 1861, Thirty-ninth regiment, company B, private, honorably discharged, discharged at close of term and reenlisted in the Thirty-ninth Ohio volunteer infantry.

Forbes, Leander, Seventh cavalry, company H, died March 5, 1863.

Fletcher, Henry H., age 15, volunteer, September, 1861, Ninth Virginia regiment, company D, adjutant, attained the rank of orderly, honorably discharged, discharged at close of term and reenlisted in the Fourth Ohio volunteer infantry.

Frost, Charles, Ninth Virginia regiment, company K.

Foster, William, age 24, volunteer, 1862, three years, Seventy-fifth regiment, company D, private, discharged December, 1864.

Frazer, Amos, Seventy-fifth regiment, company D.

Gilchrist, Daniel N., age 19, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, served four months, discharged September, 1864.

Gilchrist, James H., age 20, volunteer, August 2, 1862, One Hundred and Sixteenth regiment, company I, private.

Galbraith, John, age 18, volunteer, November 7, 1862, Seventy-third regiment, company D, private, served two years and eight months, discharged July 26, 1865.

Galbraith, Archibald, age 21, volunteer, November, 1861, Eleventh Virginia regiment, company D, private, served seven months, discharged June, 1862, after his discharge reenlisted in company K, Second Ohio heavy artillery.

Galbraith, James, age 20, volunteer, August, 1862, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private, served three years, discharged 1865, captured at Chickamauga September 20, 1863, imprisoned in Belle Isle, Libby, Andersonville, Danville, Charleston and Florence prisons, exchanged March 4, 1865, sick for seven weeks, then sent home and discharged.

Green, James M., age 23, volunteer, August, 1861, Thirty-ninth regiment, company K, corporal, attained the rank of sergeant, discharged, sick first with typhoid fever and camp disease, and then in active service, discharged and reenlisted as a veteran September 28, 1864, in company H, One Hundred and Seventy-ninth regiment, and discharged with company June 17, 1865.

Green, Andrew J.

Hall, John D., age 29, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, died 1864, taken with measles and died a few weeks after enlistment.

Hall, James, age 20, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, died 1864, died in hospital at Bermuda Hundred.

Hall, Jeremiah, age 22, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, died 1864, died of measles in hospital at Point of Rocks.

Haze, Truman, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, died 1864, taken sick at City Point and died in hospital at Washington after discharge of regiment.

Hitchcock, Myson K., volunteer, 1862, One Hundred and Sixteenth regiment, company B, corporal, attained the rank of chief of orderly, died May 22, 1865, mortally wounded at Petersburg.

Hutchinson, John, Ninety-second regiment, company G.

Hunter, George, age 41, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, died July 1, 1864, taken sick and left in hospital partially recovering, rejoined his regiment, again taken sick and died.

Horton, D. B., Third Iowa cavalry, company I.

Henderson, Warren, age 59, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, died August 27, 1864, taken sick at City Point and died in hospital at Fort-ress Monroe.

Johnston, Valentine E., age 46, volunteer, November 7, 1862, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, discharged May 18, 1865, became disabled by rheumatism and blindness in October, 1864, discharged for disability.

Johnston, Joseph W., age 20, volunteer, November 11, 1861, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, attained the rank of color corporal, mustered out July 20, 1865, wounded twice.

Johnston, James P., age 23, volunteer, August 8, 1862, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, served three years, mustered out January 20, 1865.

Kirkpatrick, Henry, age 19, volunteer, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, attained the rank of corporal, died August 27, 1863.

Kirkpatrick, T. M., age 20, volunteer, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, died September 5, 1862, of wounds at Alexandria, Virginia.

Kirkpatrick, C. B., volunteer, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, sergeant, discharged in 1862 for disability.

Lockwood, Hugh, age 22, volunteer, February, 1865, Fifth Kentucky cavalry, private, honorably discharged May, 1865, for disability.

Loring, Franklin, volunteer, July, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company G, captain, served three years, mustered out July 10, 1865.

Loring, Corwin, age 21, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, served four months, mustered out September 14, 1864.

Loring, Corwin H., Forty-seventh Iowa regiment, private, died in 1863 at Helena, Arkansas.

Lyle, George, volunteer, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private.

McCullough, H., Thirty-ninth regiment, company K.

McFarland, S. R. W., age 22, volunteer, August 29, 1862, three years, Seventh cavalry, company H, private, attained the rank of corporal, served three years, mustered out July, 1865, wounded near Pulaski, Tennessee.

Menzie, Rufus C., age 43, volunteer, August, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private, served two years and ten months, mustered out June 10, 1865.

Mitstead, Isaac, Second Virginia regiment, company K.

Mitchell, John, Seventy-third regiment, company F.

Mosel, James, Ninety-second regiment, company G.

Moore, Amstead, Seventy-fifth regiment, company I.

Newport, J. Ross, volunteer, September 1, 1862, three years, Seventh cavalry, company H, sergeant, served one year and three months, died December 11, 1863, mortally wounded at Morristown, December 10th.

Noland, George W., age 29, volunteer, May, 1864, One Hundred and Twenty-second regiment, company B, private, served ten months, mustered out July 30, 1865.

O'Neil, Ezra H., age 21, volunteer, November 18, 1861, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, attained the rank of orderly sergeant, served two years and three months, honorably discharged February, 1864, severely wounded at Gettysburgh.

Powell, Jesse, age 20, volunteer, August, 1864, had been a slave, enlisted in a colored regiment in Columbus.

Plumley, William, age 33, drafted, died in 1863 before he got in a regiment.

Plumley, J.

Reid, James, volunteer, January, 1864, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, served one year and five months, honorably discharged June, 1865, for disability.

Rutherford, Jacob, age 28, volunteer, navy, ensign, resigned June 20, 1865.

Rutherford, Josiah S., age 23, volunteer, September 25, 1862, three years, Seventh cavalry, company H, private, served two years and ten months, mustered out July, 1865.

Robinson, William, age 20, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, served four months, mustered out September 14, 1864, reenlistment, February, 1865, Thirty-sixth regiment, company H., private, served six months, mustered out July 27, 1865.

Shipe, Isaac N., volunteer, December 31, 1861, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, served three years, mustered out in 1864, reenlistment, volunteer, 1864, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, served seven months, mustered out July 20, 1865, wounded at Cross Keys, December 9, 1864, captured and in prison for three months at Florence, South Carolina, paroled March, 1865.

Shipe, John A., volunteer, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, wounded at Bull Run, fell back, and never since seen or heard from.

Stone, George G., age 20, volunteer, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, died July 25, 1863, of softening of the brain.

Stone, Edward D., age 22, volunteer, August 10, 1861, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company K, private, attained rank of orderly sergeant, served four years, mustered out July 9, 1865.

Stone, Charles W., age 22, volunteer, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, attained rank of second lieutenant, resigned July 5, 1864.

Stone, John M., age 22, volunteer, June, 1861, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company K, corporal, attained rank of quartermaster clerk, served three years, mustered out in 1864.

Stone, Bradley P., age 21, volunteer, August, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company G, sergeant, attained rank of captain, served three years, mustered out June 10, 1865.

Stone, Bolivar S., age 38, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, died July 17, 1864.

Stone, Augustus D., age 28, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, mustered out September 14, 1864.

Stone, Franklin, age 26, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private.

Stoneman, Philip, age 19, volunteer, August 2, 1861, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company K, private, served three years, died July 22, 1864, killed at Atlanta.

Stoneman, William.

Shram, Henry, age 21, volunteer, 1861, three years, artillery, died July 4, 1863.

Stage, Andrew, Seventh cavalry, company H.

Starling, Marion, age 16, volunteer, March, 1864, One Hundred and Sixteenth regiment, company I, private.

Shaw, Jacob H., age 20, volunteer, August, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company G, corporal, attained rank of orderly sergeant, served three years, mustered out June 10, 1865, and wounded at Mission Ridge November 25, 1864.

Sweezy, Francis M., age 17, volunteer, November 7, 1862, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company H, private, attained rank of corporal, served two and two-thirds years, mustered out July, 1865, captured at Gettysburgh August 21, 1863, taken to Belle Isle, and parolled.

Sweezy, John L., age 17, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, four months, mustered out September 14, 1864, second enlistment, February 9, 1865, Sixth Virginia regiment, private, mustered out June 10, 1865.

Shire, William, Seventy-fifth regiment, company I.

Swan, Samuel B., age 19, volunteer, August 4, 1862, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private, attained corporal, served three years, discharged June 19, 1865.

Swan, David R., age 19, volunteer, February, 1865, One Hundred and Ninety-first regiment, company B, private.

Sloter, Michael F., age 30, volunteer, August 11, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private, served three years, discharged June 10, 1865, was sick and detailed as nurse in hospital, never in action.

Schoonover, Augustus D, volunteer, September 12, 1862, three years, Seventh cavalry, company I, private, served three years, mustered out July 4, 1865.

Schoonover, Walter H., age 23, volunteer, September 12, 1862, three years, Seventh cavalry, company I, corporal, served three years, mustered out July 4, 1865.

Schoonover, Jacob F., age 20, volunteer, February 22, 1865, One Hundred and Ninety-first regiment, company B, private, attained sergeant.

Shotwell, Isaac, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, served four months, discharged September, 1864, sick in hospital at return of regiment.

Shotwell, Ezra M., age 19, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-first regiment, company A, private, served four months, discharged September, 1864.

Smith, Arnold, volunteer, Eleventh Virginia regiment, company A, drum major, attained color-bearer.

Smith, S. C. H., Seventh cavalry, company H.

Starr, George W., age 22, volunteer, September 14, 1862, three years, Third Virginia cavalry, company E, private, attained first lieutenant, served three years, mustered out June 30, 1865, detached on various duties.

Stoneman, William, age 16, volunteer, August 2, 1861, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company K, private, killed at Stricker's Gap, Teeters, George W., Ninety-second regiment, company G.

Travis, Ezra, age 18, volunteer, August 15, 1861, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, captured at Atlanta, imprisoned in Andersonville, and at Jackson, Florida, and released April, 1865.

Travis, Lewis, age 19, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, served four months, discharged September, 1864.

Travis, Jacob, age 23, volunteer, August 11, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company F, private, served three years, discharged January 19, 1865, captured at Chickamauga, but escaped.

Travis, William, aged 29, volunteer, August 11, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company F, private, discharged June 19, 1865.

Templar, Austin, volunteer, August 7, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private, served three years, discharged June 19, 1865, wounded at Chickamauga and at Savannah.

Templar, Amos, volunteer.

Thorpe, Martin R., age 18, volunteer, December, 1861, Seventy-fifth regiment, private, attained adjutant, wounded at Chancellorsville, reenlisted as a veteran.

Van Gilden, George H., age 19, volunteer, February, 1864, Thirty-ninth regiment, company K, private, discharged July, 1865.

Watson, John K., age 24, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, served four months, discharged September 14, 1864.

Watson, Daily, age 20, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, served four months, discharged September, 1864, was in hospital at Point of Rocks with measles and camp disease.

Watson, Jacob, age 18, volunteer, August 11, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company F, private, served three years, discharged June 20, 1865, never off duty during enlistment.

Weaver, Hanson, volunteer, January 23, 1862, three years, Sixty-third regiment, company F, private.

Winans, Francis, age 21, volunteer, January 23, 1862, three years, Sixty-third regiment, company F, private, died September, 1862, of diphtheria.

Weaver, William, Twenty-seventh Illinois, company D.

Winans, Benjamin, age 23, volunteer, January 23, 1862, three years, Sixty-third regiment, company F, captured near Atlanta, Georgia, in 1864, and imprisoned, exchanged and reached home in July, 1865, in reduced condition.

Walker, Henry M., volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, served four months, discharged September, 1864.

White, Leander I., Seventy-fifth regiment, company D.

White, Henry L., age 23, volunteer, June 20, 1861, Thirty-ninth regiment, company K, private, served four years, discharged July, 1865, reenlisted in 1863, and was detailed for clerk duty.

White, Arastus H., age 19, volunteer, August 14, 1862, three years, One Hundred and Sixteenth regiment, company B, private, served three years, discharged June 24, 1865, wounded at Hatcher's Run.

White, Sydney P., age 19, volunteer, March 4, 1864, One Hundred and Sixteenth regiment, company B, private, attained orderly, was in thirteen different actions, and was transferred to company B, Sixty-second regiment.

White, William W., age 21, volunteer, November 13, 1861, Seventy-fifth regiment, company D, private, died in hospital May 17, 1864, of intermittent fever, captured at Gettysburgh and exchanged.

Williams, David, age 22, volunteer, May, 1864, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, served four months, discharged September 14, 1864.

Williams, George W., volunteer, May, 1864, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, served four months, discharged September 14, 1864.

William, George W., age 37, drafted September, 1864, one year, Seventeenth regiment, company K, private, discharged 1865.

RECAPITULATION.

|  |     |
|--|-----|
| Huntington's battery.....  | 11  |
| Seventh Ohio cavalry.....  | 3   |
| One each in Third Virginia cavalry, Fifth Kentucky cavalry, and Third Iowa cavalry.....  | 3   |
| One Hundred and Forty-eighth Ohio National guards.....   | 38  |
| Ninety-second Ohio.....  | 22  |
| Seventy-third Ohio.....  | 24  |
| Thirty-ninth Ohio.....   | 12  |
| Seventy-fifth Ohio.....  | 7   |
| One Hundred and Sixteenth Ohio.....  | 6   |
| Sixty-third Ohio.....  | 3   |
| Ninth Virginia infantry.....   | 2   |
| One Hundred and Ninety-first Ohio, and Eleventh Virginia infantry, two each.....   | 4   |
| One each in Second Virginia infantry, Twenty-seventh Illinois, Forty-seventh Iowa, Seventy-first Ohio, Thirty-sixth Ohio, Ninety-first Ohio, One Hundred and Forty-first Ohio, One Hundred and Twenty-second Ohio, One Hundred and Ninety-sixth Ohio, One Hundred and Eighty-third Ohio, and ten not designated..... | 23  |
| Total number of soldiers.....  | 152 |
| Died.....  | 24  |

DECATUR TOWNSHIP.

Agleo, John S., age 16, volunteer, November 13, 1863, One Hundred and Twenty-fifth regiment, company K, private.

Batchelor, Daniel, substitute, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-first regiment, company A, private.

Ballard, Philip A., age 18, volunteer, September 15, 1863, six months, Fourth Virginia cavalry, private, served six months, discharged March 1864, wounded once, captured in 1863 at Winchester and imprisoned at Belle Isle twenty-three days, died December 26, 1864, chronic diarrhoea, reenlistment, volunteer, May 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company D, private, served four months, discharged September, 1864.

Barrows, Bradley P., age 42, volunteer, August 22, 1862, three years, One Hundred and Sixteenth regiment, company I, private, served three years, discharged June 14, 1865.

Broadhead, Francis M., age 27, volunteer, November, 1861, three years, First Virginia cavalry, company E, private, attained rank of quartermaster sergeant, served two years and seven months, died July 1, 1863, killed while scouting just after the battle of Gettysburgh.

Basim, John, Eleventh Indiana light artillery, died October 4, 1864, of pneumonia.

Burk, Henry, age 36, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company D, private, served four months, discharged September, 1864.

Burk, James, age 19, volunteer, August 2, 1861, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company K, served four years, discharged June, 1865, injured while tearing up railroad track at Goldsborough, North Carolina, and discharged for disability.

Burk, Samuel, age 22, volunteer, December 30, 1861, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, served three years and seven months, discharged July 24, 1865.

Burg, George W., age 30, volunteer, 1862, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, served three years, discharged July 16, 1865, captured at McDowell, Virginia, sent to Staunton, Libby, Salisbury and Belle Isle, paroled and exchanged September, 1862, and re-joined his regiment October 3, 1862, wounded, first at Gettysburgh, second, Lookout Mountain, captured at Goldsborough, March, 1865, taken to southern prisons and paroled May 25th, discharged with regiment.

Brandeberry, William C., age 26, volunteer, December 30, 1861, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, served three years and seven months, discharged July 24, 1865.

Brandeberry, John H., age 17, volunteer, November 15, 1863, One Hundred and Twenty-fifth regiment, company K, private, served one year and seven months, discharged June 7, 1865, wounded at Resaca, discharged for disability.

Brooker, Marcellus, age 16, volunteer, December 30, 1861, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, served three years, discharged January 1, 1864, reenlisted, volunteer, January 1, 1864, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, served six months, discharged July 24, 1865, captured twice.

Brooks, James, age 46, volunteer, August 11, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private, served one year, discharged 1863, taken with camp disease and fever, and brought home by his wife.

Beebe, Theodore, age 27, volunteer, August 15, 1862, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, corporal, served three years, discharged July 26, 1865, never sick, wounded or prisoner.

Beebe, Guy, age 22, volunteer, October 11, 1861, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, attained rank of sergeant, served four years, discharged July 26, 1865, never lost a day's duty.

Beebe, James, age 15, volunteer, June 21, 1861, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company K, private, served four years discharged July 19, 1865, wounded at Atlanta, and home sick three months.

Beebe, Fostus, age 16, volunteer, February 16, 1864, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, served one year and five months, discharged July 26, 1865.

Beebe, Charles, age 18, volunteer, June 12, 1861, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company K, private, served four years, discharged July 19, 1865, wounded at Corinth, May 28, 1862.

Blair, Alexander, age 22, volunteer, August, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth, company F, private, served three years, honorably discharged in September, 1864.

Blair, Thomas, age 21, volunteer, October, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, served three months, died January 29, 1862.

Blair, Alvin, age 17, volunteer, August 2, 1861, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company K, private, died in 1862 of measles, at Mowsa.

Bennett, Isaac, age 35, volunteer, August 9, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private, discharged June 21, 1865.

Bennett, William, age 22, volunteer, October 19, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, died in February, 1862, at Summerville, West Virginia, of measles.

Bennett, Gordon, volunteer, August 1, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, served three years, honorably discharged in 1864, slightly wounded at Lewisburgh, Virginia.

Carlin, D. B., Eighteenth regiment, company C, lieutenant.

Chambers, William, age 39, volunteer, February 27, 1865, One Hundred and Eighty-ninth regiment, company F, private.

Chambers, James, age 18, volunteer, July 20, 1861, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company K, private, honorably discharged in 1863; reenlisted December 23, 1863, private, attained rank of hospital steward, served four years, discharged July 9, 1865.

Chambers, Martin V., age 21, volunteer, June 18, 1861, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company K, private, died July 5, 1864, mortally wounded at Kennesaw Mountain, July 4, 1864.

Campbell, James, age 22, volunteer, August 2, 1861, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company K, private, reenlisted in 1863, hospital nurse, served four years, discharged in June, 1865.

Campbell, Luther T., age 17, volunteer, September 12, 1861, three years, Fifty-third regiment, company B, private, served three years, discharged August 11, 1865.

Campbell, Elijah, age 17, volunteer, June 29, 1863, Second heavy artillery, company K, private.

Campbell, William, age 15, volunteer, March, 1864, Fifty-third regiment, company B, private.

Croy, Robert, Ninety-second regiment, company G, sick several times.

Conant, Sanford, age 29, volunteer, August 12, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private, served three years, discharged June, 1865, transferred to veteran reserve corps.

Cutlip, Henry, age 41, volunteer, three years, One Hundred and Seventy-sixth regiment, company I, private, died June 12, 1865, at Chickamauga, Tennessee.

Deasy, Luke, age 21, volunteer, October, 1861, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, served three years, discharged December 31, 1864, wounded at Lookout Mountain.

Ellis, Alexander M., age 21, volunteer, November 16, 1861, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, served eleven months, discharged October 3, 1862, for disability.

Ellis, Albert, age 24, volunteer, September 7, 1861, three years, First cavalry, company N, private, discharged 1865, transferred to veteran reserve corps.

Ellis, Reuben H., volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-first regiment, company G, private, served four months, discharged September, 1864.

Ellis, Ethan G., age 29, volunteer, June 27, 1863, Second heavy artillery, company H, private.

Ellis, John W., age 25, volunteer, August, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private, died March 8, 1863, at Camp Gallatin, cause unknown.

Ellis, James I., volunteer, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company I, private, died July, 1863, at Camp Gallatin, after three months' sickness.

Ellis, Charles C., age 15, volunteer, December 18, 1863, three years, Eighteenth regiment, company A, corporal, wounded at Nashville.

Evans, David, volunteer, Fourth colored infantry, company D, private, died 1864, at Fortress Monroe.

Fairbanks, Cornelius, substitute, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, served four months, mustered out September, 1864.

France, John W., age 19, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, served three years, died May 25, 1864, mortally wounded at Dallas, Georgia, May 25, 1864.

France, George W., age 32, volunteer, August 5, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private, served one year and five months, honorably discharged January 6, 1864.

France, William H., age 25, volunteer, December 18, 1863, One Hundred and Twenty-fifth regiment, company K, private, served one year and four months, discharged April 17, 1865, for disability, wounded near Dallas, Georgia, June 2, 1864.

Frye, James C., age 26, volunteer, September 29, 1864, Seventy-first regiment, company B, private, served nine months, discharged June 12, 1865, sick with camp disease in Tennessee.

Frye, George N., age 21, August, 1861, three years, Eighteenth regiment, company C, private, served six months, died February 3, 1862, in hospital at Louisville.

Fish, S. H., volunteer, December 30, 1861, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, two years and seven months, discharged July 24, 1865.

Gaughan, Anthony, 1861, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company K, private, served three years, discharged, reenlisted, while waiting discharge as a veteran went into Louisville, on a pass and supposed to have died by foul means.

Grimes, Owen, volunteer, December 30, 1861, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company H, private, honorably discharged 1864 for disability.

Giddings, Charles, age 37, volunteer, February 23, 1865, one hundred days, One Hundred and Eighty-ninth regiment, company F, private, discharged May 15, 1865, for disability.

Haynes, Andrew A., age 18, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company D, private, served four months, mustered out September 14, 1864.

Haynes, Austin I., age 18, volunteer, December 30, 1861, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, died May 14, 1862, of measles.

Henderson, Isaac, Fourth regiment, company B.

Howell, Josephus, volunteer, August, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private, three years, discharged June 19, 1865, transferred to veteran reserve corps.

Hicks, Thomas F., age 23, volunteer, December 30, 1861, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, served four years, discharged July, 1865; reenlisted as a veteran.

Johnson, William A., age 17, volunteer, August 1, 1863, six months, Fourth Virginia cavalry, company E, private, served six months, discharged February 6, 1864, from cavalry service; reenlisted May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company D, private, served four months, discharged September, 1864.

Johnson, Worthy A., age 16, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company A, private, served four months, discharged September 14, 1864.

Johnson, Samuel, drafted, One Hundred and Seventy-sixth regiment, company I, and Sixty-fifth regiment, company G, private, died in 1865, captured and supposed to have died in the hands of the rebels.

Johnson, Marion N., volunteer, October 16, 1863, six months, Fourth Virginia cavalry, company E, private, served five months, mustered out March 6, 1864; reenlisted May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company D, private, served four months, discharged September, 1864; reenlisted the third time in company B, One Hundred and Ninety-second regiment.

Johnson, Corwin, volunteer, October 16, 1863, six months, Fourth Virginia cavalry, company E, private, served five months, mustered out May 6, 1864; reenlisted May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company D, private, served four months, discharged September, 1864.

Johnson, William H., age 21, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, served three years and three months, honorably discharged August 31, 1864, wounded at Lookout Mountain in 1863, reenlisted as a veteran.

Jarvis, George P., age 17, volunteer, August 7, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company B, private, served three years, discharged June 19, 1865, sick in Georgia, captured near close of war in Georgia, and taken to Andersonville, was paroled a month after and soon discharged.

King, Wilton, age 19, volunteer, August 26, 1861, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company K, private, attained rank of orderly sergeant, served four years, discharged August 1, 1865, wounded July 4, 1864, reenlisted as a veteran.

King, John, age 24, volunteer, August, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, three years, honorably discharged August, 1864, at expiration of his time.

King, Abel D., volunteer Fourth Virginia cavalry, company E, sergeant, discharged March 6, 1864; reenlisted February 23, 1865, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, served five months, discharged July 27, 1865.

King, William, age 17, volunteer, February 27, 1865, one hundred days, One Hundred and Ninety-fourth regiment, company I, private.

King, Nathan P., age 17, volunteer, June 10, 1864, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company K, private, died June 19, 1864, from wound received at battle of Kennesaw Mountain, June 18, 1864.

Kelly, Samuel, age 21, volunteer, June 22, 1861, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company K, private, served three years, honorably discharged August, 1864.

Lee, Jonathan R., substitute, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-first regiment, company A, private.

Lucas, J. C., Eighteenth Virginia cavalry, company C.

Loraine, Louis J., volunteer, October 16, 1863, six months, Fourth regiment, company E, private, served five months, mustered out March 6, 1864; reenlisted in One Hundred and Ninety-first regiment Ohio National guards, also in One Hundred and Ninety-second regiment, company G, Ohio volunteer infantry.

Lucas, Oliver, Eighteenth regiment, company C.

Meek, Jacob, age 31, volunteer, October, 1861, three years, Eighteenth regiment, company A, private, died in 1863 at Chickamauga.

Meek, Samuel, age 19, volunteer, October, 1861, three years, Eighteenth regiment, private, company A, served three years, honorably discharged, November, 1864, sick with yellow fever and rheumatism, wounded and captured at Stone River, in Atlanta, Montgomery, and Libby prisons, wounded at Chickamauga.

Myers, William, volunteer, One Hundred and Twenty-eighth regiment, served ten months, transferred to One Hundred and Twenty-ninth artillery.

Montgomery, A. H., age 20, volunteer, February 26, 1864, Eighteenth regiment, company A, private.

Marshall, William, age 23, volunteer, October 21, 1861, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, served four years, discharged July 20, 1865, reenlisted as a veteran.

Mellow, Samuel, age 20, volunteer, September 19, 1862, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company B, private, served three years, discharged July 24, 1865, detailed as teamster, wounded.

Moore, William M., age 26, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company D, private, served four months, discharged September 14, 1864.

Miller, Manuel, age 38, drafted, October, 1864, Seventy-first regiment, company B, private, served eight months, mustered out June, 1865.

Moran, Anthony, age 35, volunteer, December 30, 1861, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, served four years, mustered out July 20, 1865, wounded at second Bull Run, reenlisted as a veteran.

McDaniel, Frederick P., age 25, volunteer, December 13, 1861, three years, First Virginia cavalry, company E, private, served seven months, died July 18, 1862, of fever.

McGirr, William P., age 31, volunteer, August 26, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, served three years, honorably discharged September 3, 1864.

Mead, Charles K., volunteer, August 2, 1861, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company K, private, served five months, died January 6, 1862, of camp disease.

Newel, Erastus R., age 36, volunteer, 1862, three years, Fifty-third regiment, company E, private, died June 6, 1863.

Nolan, Zachary, age 17, volunteer, October 19, 1864, Seventy-eighth regiment, company F, private, served nine months, discharged July 11, 1865.

Nolan, Allan, age 19, volunteer, 1862, one year, Eighteenth regiment, company C, private, served one year, honorably discharged in 1863.

Nolan, Enoch, age 25, volunteer, February 14, 1865, One Hundred and Seventy-sixth or One Hundred and Eighty-sixth regiments, company I, private, died April, 1865, of measles.

Nolan, Ryley, age 18, volunteer, October, 1863, six months, Fourth Virginia cavalry, private, served nine months, honorably discharged July, 1864, reenlisted in One Hundred and Eighty-sixth regiment, company I.

Newman, John, December 30, 1861, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, served three years, honorably discharged in 1864.

Norman, Azariah, volunteer, Fifth colored infantry, company G, died.

Norman, Amos, volunteer, Fifth colored infantry, company G, honorably discharged.

O'Neal, William J., age 18, volunteer, August 2, 1861, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company K, corporal, served four years, discharged July, 1865; reenlisted as a veteran.

Parsons, W., age 23, volunteer, 1862, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, served three years, discharged July 24, 1865.

Parsons, Josiah W., age 18, volunteer, 1862, Seventy-third regiment, company F., private, died near Dallas, Georgia.

Parsons, Robert K.

Plan, Trueman E., age 18, volunteer, 1861, Eighteenth regiment, company C, private, served one year, discharged 1862, drafted 1864, Eighteenth regiment, company F, private, discharged July, 1865, both times for disability.

Ritenour, Joseph S., age 25, volunteer, February 16, 1864, Seventy-third regiment, company D, private, one year, wounded at Atlanta, and died of fever, April 23, 1865.

Ridenour, J. R., age 26, volunteer, Seventy-second regiment, company F, Private, died May 1, 1865, of chronic disease.

Romine, Peter, age 27, volunteer, November 4, 1862, three years, Fifty-third regiment company E, private, wounded at Kennesaw Mountain.

Rowland, John W., age 28, volunteer, November 3, 1861, three years, Fifty-third regiment, company E, private, mustered out.

Rowland, James E., age 20, volunteer, February 3, 1864, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, served one year and five months, discharged July 24, 1865.

Ross, James, Seventy-third regiment, company F.

Russel, Emanuel, age 24, volunteer, August 22, 1862, One Hundred and Sixteenth regiment, company I, private, wounded and captured at Staunton, Virginia, imprisoned at Andersonville, discharged June 14, 1865.

Russel, Washington, age 16, volunteer, August 6, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company A, private, attained rank of first sergeant, served three years, discharged June 10, 1865.

Snider, Thomas H., age 22, volunteer, August 31, 1862, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company D, private, two years and eight months, discharged for disability April 18, 1865.

Snider, John W., age 19, volunteer, August 31, 1862, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, transferred to Infantry corps.

Sampson, Thomas E., volunteer, August 22, 1864, Fifth regiment colored infantry, company F, private, wounded at Deep Bottom, near Richmond.

Shrader, William, age 27, volunteer, November 1, 1862, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, captured near Monterey, Virginia, held four months in Libby, Salisbury, and Belle Isle prisons, paroled, honorably discharged.

Smith, William C., age 39, volunteer, February 22, 1864, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company K, private, served one year and five months, wounded before Atlanta, discharged July 9, 1865.

Smith, Alexander F., age 34, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company D, private, served four months, discharged September 14, 1864.

Smith, James F., age 29, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company D, private, killed in an explosion at City Point.

Smith, Joseph A., age 24, volunteer, February 22, 1864, Thirty-ninth regiment, company K, private, served one year and four months, discharged July 9, 1865.

Starling, George, Ninety-second regiment, company G, died.

Storts, Joseph B., age 18, volunteer, February 9, 1864, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, one year and five months, discharged July 26, 1865.

Storts, H. Andrew, age 20, substitute, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, mustered out September, 1864.

Storts, Philander, age 31, volunteer, March 22, 1864, Eighteenth regiment, company F, private, served one year, discharged July 15, 1865.

Tate, John, volunteer, died in hospital June 15, 1865.

Taylor, John W., volunteer, Eighteenth regiment, company B.

Taylor, Benjamin G., age 27, volunteer, August, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private, three years, mustered out June, 1865.

Taylor, William M., volunteer, Eighteenth regiment, company B.

Turrel, William P., age 25, volunteer, August 4, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company F, private, served ten months, discharged June 12, 1863, for disability.

Weakly, Thomas, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company D, private, served four months, discharged September, 1861, reenlisted May, 1865, Thirty-sixth regiment, private, died in 1865.

RECAPITULATION.

|  |    |
|--|----|
| One each in Eleventh Ohio, Independent battery, batteries H and K, Ohio heavy artillery, in all..... | 3  |
| Fourth Virginia cavalry.....   | 7  |
| First Virginia cavalry.....  | 2  |
| First Ohio cavalry.....  | 1  |
| Seventy-third Ohio.....  | 28 |
| Thirty-ninth Ohio.....   | 15 |
| Ninety-second Ohio.....  | 13 |
| One Hundred and Forty-eighth Ohio.....   | 14 |
| Eighteenth Ohio (three years).....   | 13 |
| Thirty-sixth Ohio.....   | 8  |
| Fifty-third Ohio.....  | 5  |

|  |   |
|--|---|
| One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Ohio.....   | 3 |
| One Hundred and Forty-first Ohio.....  | 3 |
| One Hundred and Sixteenth Ohio.....  | 2 |
| Seventy-first Ohio.....  | 2 |
| One Hundred and Eighty-sixth Ohio.....   | 2 |
| Fifth colored regiment.....  | 3 |
| One Hundred and Eighty-ninth Ohio.....   | 2 |
| One Hundred and Seventy-sixth Ohio.....  | 3 |
| One Each in Fourth Ohio, Fourth colored regiment, Seventy-second Ohio, Sixty-fifth Ohio, Seventy-eighth Ohio, One Hundred and Twenty-eighth Ohio, One Hundred and Ninety-fourth Ohio one not designated, in all..... | 7 |

|                               |     |
|-------------------------------|-----|
| Total number of soldiers..... | 136 |
| Died.....                     | 26  |

DUNHAM TOWNSHIP.

Andrew, Thomas A., First Virginia light artillery, company H.

Berry, William E., age 31, volunteer, October 29, 1861, three years, battery H, private, served three years, discharged October 28, 1864, captured and imprisoned at Lynchburgh and Belle Isle.

Beach, Hiram, age 22, volunteer, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, died July, 1862, of typhoid fever.

Basim, David, age 28, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company G, private, discharged September, 1864.

Baker, Manuel, age 30, volunteer, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, died March, 1864, in Andersonville prison pen, of starvation.

Calder, Philip C., age 31, volunteer, September 10, 1862, three years, Eighty-eighth regiment, company B, private, served three years, discharged July 3, 1865.

Cammel, M. M., volunteer, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company F, private, attained the rank of sergeant, died July 16th, of typhoid fever.

Drain, John, age 22, volunteer, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, served four months, discharged September, 1864.

Ellenwood, Dudley H., age 21, volunteer, October 23, 1861, Seventy-seventh regiment, company D, private, discharged June 18, 1862, for disability.

Farley, George, Seventy-third regiment, company F.

Fish, David, age 18, volunteer, December 30, 1861, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, served nine months, died October, 1862, of measles.

Farley, George, jr., Seventy-third regiment, company F.

Frazer, Evan, age 35, volunteer, August, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private, discharged June 10, 1865.

Gorham, Samuel Earl, age 39, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, corporal, killed by explosion at City Point August 9, 1864.

Gorham, Daniel H., age 32, volunteer, December 1, 1861, three years, battery H, corporal, served three years and six months, discharged June 13, 1865, reenlisted as a veteran.

Green, James, Thirty-ninth regiment, company K.

Hollister, A. D., age 20, volunteer, June 18, 1861, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company K, private, served four years, discharged July 9, 1865, wounded at Atlanta, reenlisted as a veteran.

Hall, John, age 24, volunteer, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, died August 9, 1864, at Fortress Monroe, of measles.

Hall, James, age 18, volunteer; three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, died June, 1864, at Point of Rocks, of measles.

Hollister, Austin A., age 17, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company G, private, served four months, discharged September, 1864.

Irwin, William, volunteer, First Virginia light artillery, company H.

Mankin, Rufus M., age 29, volunteer, August 15, 1862, three years, Eighty-eighth regiment, company B, private, served three years, discharged July 3, 1865.

Mankin, Daniel E., age 22, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company K, sergeant, served four months, discharged September, 1864.

Mankin, Francis F., age 42, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, served four months, honorably discharged September, 1864.

Mankin, Ezra, age 23, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company K, private, served four months, discharged September, 1864.

McClure, Dyer G., age 18, volunteer, 1861, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private, died June 19, 1862, mortally wounded at Lewisburgh, Virginia.

McClure, Alonzo, age 18, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company K, private, served four months, discharged September, 1864.

McClure, Henry O., age 23, volunteer, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, private, attained the rank of sergeant, discharged in 1864, at expiration of term.

McGill, John M., age 26, volunteer, 1861, battery H, private, killed at Port Republic, June 9, 1862.

McGill, Hugh, age 25, volunteer, February, 1864, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, attained the rank of corporal, served one year and four months, discharged June 27, 1865.

McGill, William B., age 20, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, discharged September, 1864, sick and returned home by general order of war department.

McKinney, Robert D., age 19, volunteer, August 17, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Seventy-fourth regiment, company E, private, discharged from hospital.

McTaggart, Alexander, age 20, volunteer, August, 1861, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company H, private, attained the rank of lieutenant, wounded at Atlanta, resigned just before the regiment was discharged, reenlisted in 1864, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment.

McTaggart, Neil, age 18, volunteer, January 2, 1862, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company D, private, reenlisted for three years in the same regiment and company, captured at battle of Mark's Mills, imprisoned ten months at Camp Ford.

Mitchell, George B., age 21, volunteer, August 15, 1862, three years, Eighty-eighth regiment, company B, private, discharged July 3, 1865.

Mitchell, Thomas, age 21, volunteer, 1865, private, served four months, mustered out.

Mitchell, David, volunteer, First artillery, company H, private, mustered out.

Mitchell, John, Seventy-third regiment.

Noland, Sylvester, age 25, volunteer, August 8, 1862, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, discharged May, 1865, for disability, wounded at battle of Gettysburgh.

Noland, James A., age 18, volunteer, October 23, 1863, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company K, private, served thirteen months, discharged on account of some flaw in his enlistment papers, reenlisted February 9, 1864, Thirty-second regiment, company B, mustered out July, 1865.

Noland, John, age 18, volunteer, February 15, 1865, Thirty-sixth regiment, company H, private, died July 20, 1865.

Noland, Augustus, age 32, volunteer, February, 1865, One Hundred and Ninety-sixth regiment, company F, private.

Noland, Loring, age 20, volunteer, November, 1861, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, discharged November 1862, from hospital, reenlistment, February 15, 1865, Thirty-sixth regiment, company H, mustered out in 1865.

Noland, Joseph M., age 18, volunteer, October 31, 1861, three years First artillery, company H, private, discharged June 15, 1865, captured at Chancellorsville, and prisoner thirty days.

Norton, Charles R., age 19, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, private, served four months, mustered out September, 1864.

Pauley, Benjamin T., age 15, volunteer, December 5, 1862, three years, Sixty-third regiment, company D, private, discharged July 17, 1865.

Rodgers, Sanderson H., age 19, volunteer, August, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, discharged October 24, 1864, wounded at Chickamauga, and afterwards on detached duty in provost marshal's office.

Rodgers, Charles J., age 18, volunteer, February 14, 1865, one year, One Hundred and Eighty-sixth regiment, company I, private, died April 9, 1865, at Cleveland, Tennessee.

Rardin, Alonzo, age 27, volunteer, August 1, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, served two and one-fourth years, died November 25, 1863, killed in battle of Mission Ridge.

Rodgers, Edward P., age 16, volunteer, February 14, 1865, one year, One Hundred and Eighty-sixth regiment, company I, private, discharged on surgeon's certificate.

Reynolds, Emanuel, age 28, volunteer, February, 1864, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G, private, was discharged June 30, 1865.

Sayres, James M., age 24, volunteer, June, 1862, three months, Eighty-fifth regiment, company F, discharged by surgeon's certificate; reenlistment, volunteer, September 24, 1862, three years, Eighty-eighth regiment, company B, private, died August 5, 1865, of hemorrhage of lungs.

Sayres, Isaac T., age 20, volunteer, September 24, 1862, three years, Eighty-eighth regiment, company B, private, discharged October 26, 1863, by surgeon's certificate.

Sayres, William, age 24, volunteer, June, 1862, three months, Eighty-fifth regiment, teamster, reenlistment, volunteer, Eleventh Virginia regiment, company A, private, discharged July 3, 1865.

Sayres, Richard C., age 20, volunteer, June, 1862, three months, Eighty-fifth regiment, reenlistment, volunteer, September, 1863, Eleventh Virginia regiment, company A, private, mustered out in 1865.

Sayres, I. T., age 18, volunteer, September, 1863, three years, Eleventh Virginia regiment, company A, private.

Sayres, George, age 17, volunteer, September, 1863, three years, Eleventh Virginia regiment, company A, private, discharged July 24, 1865, wounded in front of Richmond.

Shaw, James, age 18, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company H, private, served four months, mustered out September, 1864.

Shipton, William, age 27, volunteer, August 9, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company F, private, served two and five-twelfths years, discharged March 31, 1865, from hospital, wounded in front of Atlanta.

Stanton, Smith, volunteer, 1864, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, mustered out July 20, 1865.

Tilton, Douglas, age 19, volunteer, August 1, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, served two months, died October 20, 1861, at Summerville, Virginia.

Todd, Alfred, age 54, volunteer, September 29, 1861, three years, Second Virginia cavalry, company B, private, served three years, mustered out November 29, 1864.

Todd, George (adopted), age 18, volunteer, November 8, 1861, three years, Second Virginia cavalry, company B, private, served three years and five months, mustered out June 30, 1865.

Wilson, Benjamin F., age 28, volunteer, August, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company F, private, mustered out June 10, 1865.

Wayson, Henry, Seventy-third regiment, company F, died.

Wayson, Alexander, Seventy-third regiment, company F.

RECAPITULATION.

|   |    |
|---|----|
| Huntington's battery.....   | 5  |
| Battery H, First Virginia light artillery.....  | 2  |
| Second Virginia cavalry.....  | 2  |
| One Hundred and Forty-eighth Ohio national guard.....   | 11 |
| Seventy-third Ohio.....   | 11 |
| Thirty-sixth Ohio.....  | 10 |
| Eighty-eighth Ohio.....   | 5  |
| Ninety-second Ohio.....   | 4  |
| Thirty-ninth Ohio.....  | 4  |
| Eleventh Virginia.....  | 4  |
| Eighty-fifth Ohio.....  | 3  |
| Seventy-seventh Ohio.....   | 3  |
| One Hundred and Eighty-sixth Ohio.....  | 2  |
| And one each in Thirty-second Ohio, Sixty-third Ohio, One Hundred and Seventy-fourth Ohio, One Hundred and Ninety-sixth Ohio, not designated one..... | 5  |
| Total number of soldiers.....   | 66 |
| Died.....   | 9  |

FAIRFIELD TOWNSHIP.

Addis, Benjamin F., aged 23, volunteer, October, 1861, for three years, Fifty-third regiment, company I, private, attained corporal, served three years, discharged November 1, 1864.

Addis, Thomas M., aged 24, volunteer, for three months, Eighteenth regiment, guard served three months, captured at Shiloh April 8, 1862, in prison for a year, on being released, sick and in hospital, reenlisted as a veteran, volunteer, 1861, for three years, Seventh regiment, company K, sergeant, served four years, discharged June 18, 1865, again captured at Mark's Mills, held for ten months, discharged for disability.

Barr, Elias, aged 44, volunteer, May, 1864, for one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, private, served one hundred days, discharged August, 1864.

Bracken, Reed P., aged 20, volunteer, August 12, 1862, for three years, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private, attained corporal, served three years, discharged June 20, 1865.

Blair Alexander, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F.

Bracken, Craig, volunteer, for three months, Eighty-seventh regiment, private, served three months, discharged, reenlisted, volunteer, January 7, 1864, First cavalry, company H, private, served one year and four months, died June 25, 1865, captured during first enlistment at Harper's Ferry, but parolled, died of consumption at Atlanta.

Bowman, Christian, aged 23, volunteer, 1861, Seventy-seventh regiment, company D, private, discharged September, 1862, wounded while sick and in hospital, discharged for disability.

Buck, J. A., Thirty-ninth regiment, company K.

Barnes, William, volunteer, 1861, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, discharged for disability.

Burritt, J. C., Eighteenth regiment, company C.

Campbell, Charles W., aged 19, volunteer, August 19, 1861, Seventy-seventh regiment, company D, private, served one year and three months, discharged November 12, 1862; discharged for disability.

Campbell, Thomas H., aged 22, volunteer, October 19, 1861, Seventy-seventh regiment, company D, private, attained corporal.

Callahan, George E., Ninety-second regiment, company G, died March 6, 1863, at Carthage, Tennessee.

Cary, Cornelius, aged 24, volunteer, October 17, 1861, three years, First artillery, company H, private, served three years, discharged 1864, as a veteran.

Cottle, Lewis, aged 28, volunteer, November, 1861, Seventy-seventh regiment, company D, private.

Cottle, Thornton F., aged 19, volunteer, November, 1861, Seventy-seventh regiment, company D, private, died April 6, 1862, killed at Shiloh.

Croy, Robert, aged 30, veteran, August 5, 1862, for three years, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private, served three years, mustered out June, 1865, took part in all the regiment actions.

Croy, Greer, aged 23, volunteer, October 12, 1861, for three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, attained color corporal, served three years and four months, discharged February, 1865, wounded first at Antietam, second at Chichamauga, third Cedar Creek, discharged as a disabled veteran.

Croy, Duncan, aged 16, volunteer, August 4, 1862, for three years, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private, served three years, mustered out June, 1865, sick during first year.

Croy, Calvin, aged 16, volunteer, May, 1864, for one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, private, served one hundred days, mustered out August, 1864, reenlistment, volunteer, February 17, 1865, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private, served four months, mustered out June, 1865.

Croy, William, age 26, volunteer, August 9, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private, served three years, mustered out 1865, detailed as wagonmaster for one year.

Croy, David, age 21, volunteer, August 6, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private, served three years, mustered out June 10, 1865.

Croy, Nathan, age 21, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company G, private, served one hundred days, mustered out August, 1864.

Dawson, William F, volunteer, One Hundred and First Pennsylvania infantry, first lieutenant, attained captain, discharged May 1, 1863, on account of disability.

Deweese, Caleb, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, attained corporal, served two years, killed at Gettysburgh.

Double, Edward, age 27, volunteer, August 12, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company G, private, attained orderly sergeant, served four years and seven months, discharged March 27, 1865, captured at Cumberland Gap but escaped.

Dunbar, David, age 27, volunteer, August 15, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private, served three years, discharged June 29, 1865, wounded at Chickamauga and transferred to veteran reserved corps.

Dunsmoore, Lucius J., age 18, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company D, private, served one hundred days, mustered out in September, 1864, died July 21, 1865, of injuries received at City Point.

Ellis, David F., age 22, October 14, 1862, three years, Sixty-third regiment, company G, private, served two years and two months, mustered out December 26, 1864.

Ellis, Lewis H., age 20, volunteer, May, 1862, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company D, private, served one hundred days, mustered out in September, 1864.

Faires, Cyreneus B., age 17, volunteer, September 5, 1861, three years, Second Virginia cavalry, company H, private, served one year and seven months, died in April, 1863, of typhoid fever.

Faires, Edward G., age 15, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company G, private, served one hundred days, mustered out in September, 1864.

Fitzgerald, Garret, age 33, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company B, private, served two years, discharged in 1863 on account of disability.

Goddard, Peter F., age 17, volunteer, October 9, 1861, Second regiment Virginia cavalry, company H, private, died October 1, 1862, died of typhoid fever.

Goddard, Harvey H., age 20, volunteer, August 6, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private, died March 6, 1863, in hospital.

Goddard, George R., age 17, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company G, private, mustered out September, 1864.

Gallagher, Patrick, Seventy-seventh regiment, company H.

Gallagher, James, age 15, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company D, private, reenlisted in 1863, Seventy-seventh regiment, company D, captured at Mark's Mills, in Tyler prison ten months.

Hart Lucien, age 20, volunteer, October 10, 1864, Ninth regiment cavalry, private, served nine months, mustered out July, 1865.

Hart, William R., age 22, volunteer, September 26, 1861, Seventieth regiment, company F, private, attained the rank of orderly sergeant.

Hart, Wilson S., age 20, volunteer, June, 1862, three months, Eighty-seventh regiment, company A, private, served three months, mustered out September, 1862, captured at Harper's Ferry and parolled.

Haynes, John T., age 26, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company D, corporal, served three months, mustered out September, 1864.

Haynes, Isaac P., age 24, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company D, private, served three months, mustered out September, 1864.

Hill Isaac, age 26, volunteer, 1861, First regiment artillery, company H, private, served four years, mustered out July 31, 1865, reenlisted as a veteran.

Hull Daniel, age 34, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company G, private, served one hundred days, died October 26, 1864, of measles.

Hull, Samuel, age 28, volunteer, August, 1862, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private, attained the rank of sergeant, died March 12, 1863, of measles at Nashville.

Hull, Reuben E., age 21, volunteer, October, 1861, three years, Second regiment Virginia cavalry, company H, private, attained the rank of first sergeant, served three years, mustered out October, 1864, reenlisted October, 1864, Second regiment Virginia cavalry, company H, first sergeant, mustered out February, 1865.

Hunter, Charles, age 21, volunteer, 1861, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, died May 19, 1865, of consumption.

Johnson, John D., Thirty-sixth regiment, company F.

Jones, William D., volunteer, January, 1864, three years, First regiment cavalry, company L, private.

Johnson, Zeno C., Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, died.

Kidwell, Alexander D., age 19, volunteer, December 31, 1861, Seventy-seventh regiment, company D, private.

Johnson, E. M., Seventy-seventh regiment, company D.

Lucas, Thomas, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, captain, mustered out 1864, discharged by surgeon's certificate.

Meek, William J., Ninety-second regiment, company G.

Marple, James W., age 21, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company D, private, served one hundred days, mustered out September, 1864.

Moore, George, aged 21, volunteer, February 15, 1864, Thirty-ninth regiment, company K, private, mustered out July 9, 1865.

Meer, Patrick C., volunteer, 1861, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, discharged, cause unknown.

Mocer, David, Thirteenth regiment, company H.

Miller, Elbridge, aged 19, volunteer, September 6, 1861, three years, Second Virginia cavalry, company F, private, served three years, mustered out November, 1864, captured at Somerville, West Virginia, May 12, 1863, in Libby prison eleven months, parolled and exchanged in 1864.

Morrow, William, Sixty-fifth regiment, company H.

Morrow, Andrew D., aged 24, volunteer, February 25, 1861, two years, Sixty-third regiment, company H, private, served two years, reenlisted, volunteered January 1, 1863, Sixty-third regiment, company H, saddler, served two years and six months, mustered out July, 1865.

M'Namery, William, aged 20, volunteer, February, 1864, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, mustered out May, 1865, wounded at Goldsborough, North Carolina.

Marple, Wesley, Sixty-third regiment, company G, private, died June 20, 1862, at Corinth, Mississippi, of typhoid fever.

Murphy, William, volunteer, 1861, Sixth Kentucky cavalry, private, died, 1863, shot through the head.

Nichol, Thomas, aged 22, volunteer, October, 1861, Seventy-seventh regiment, company D, private, attained rank of corporal, served on detached service, and reenlisted as a veteran.

O'Donnel, John, volunteer, November, 1861, three years, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, three years, mustered out 1864, wounded at second Bull Run fight, captured and parolled on the field.

Pennock, Jacob, aged 20, volunteer, March 9, 1865, One Hundred and Ninety-sixth regiment, company F, private, died April 27, 1865, of typhoid fever.

Reid, Hugh, aged 21, volunteer, December 31, 1861, two years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company D, private, served two years, captured at Mark's Mills, and imprisoned at Camp Ford, Texas, for ten months, reenlisted, volunteered, December 19, 1863, Seventy-seventh regiment, company D, private.

Sayler, Edward J., age 21, volunteer, August 1, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company K, private, served three years, reenlisted as a veteran, was wounded at Winchester, September, 1863.

Stephens, Thomas, age 16, volunteer, October 2, 1862, Ninth cavalry, company B, private.

Thompson, William, age 36, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company F, corporal, served one hundred days, mustered out in September, 1864.

Tait, Michael, age 46, volunteer, 1861, Seventy-third regiment, company F, private, died in 1863 in hospital.

Tait, Edward, age 14, volunteer, 1861, Seventy-third regiment company F, private.

Walker, James, age 44, volunteer, February, 1862, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company D, private, died April 21, 1862, in consequence of wound received at Shiloh.

Walborn, Elias, age 18, volunteer, February 17, 1864, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, served two months, mustered out April 27, 1865.

Wible, Levi, age 28, volunteer, October 26, 1861, Sixty-third regiment, company G, private, attained rank of sergeant; reenlisted as a veteran, severely wounded and captured at Atlanta, in prison at Andersonville eight months, parolled, and was on board the Sultana when she exploded on the Mississippi river, died.

Wible, Joseph, age 22, volunteer, August 28, 1861, two years, One Hundredth Pennsylvania infantry, company D, private, served two years, reenlisted, captured at James Island, South Carolina, June 3, 1862, in prison at Columbia four months and parolled, captured second time at Petersburg, March 25, 1865, in Libby prison five days and parolled, discharged with his company.

RECAPITULATION.

|  |    |
|--|----|
| Huntington battery.....  | 3  |
| Second Virginia cavalry.....   | 4  |
| First Ohio cavalry.....  | 2  |
| Ninth Ohio cavalry.....  | 2  |
| Sixth Kentucky cavalry.....  | 1  |
| Seventy-seventh Ohio.....  | 13 |
| One Hundred and Forty-eighth Ohio National guard.....  | 12 |
| Ninety-second Ohio.....  | 11 |
| Seventy-third Ohio.....  | 10 |
| Thirty-sixth Ohio.....   | 7  |
| Sixty-third Ohio.....  | 5  |
| Thirty-ninth Ohio.....   | 3  |
| Eighty-seventh Ohio (three months).....  | 2  |
| One each in Fifty-third Ohio, Eighteenth Ohio (three months), Eighteenth Ohio (three years), One Hundredth Pennsylvania, One Hundred and First Pennsylvania, Sixty-fifth Ohio, Seventieth Ohio, One Hundred and Ninety-sixth Ohio, in all..... | 8  |
| Total number of soldiers.....  | 78 |
| Died.....  | 16 |

FEARING TOWNSHIP.

Abbott, William James, age 21, volunteer, August 6, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company G, drummer, attained to the rank of principal musician, served two years and six months, honorably discharged, reenlistment, age 23, volunteer, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company G, quartermaster, attained rank of orderly, served one year and six months, mustered out.

Athey, Hezekiah, age 42, drafted, 1862, nine months, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B, private, served nine months, mustered out.

Athey, Charles Wesley, age 18, volunteer, October, 1861, three years.

Athey, James L., age 17, volunteer, February 26, 1863, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B, private.

Athey, John Wesley, age 17, volunteer, October 18, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B, private, reenlistment.

Bartmess, George J., volunteer, August 12, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company G, private, honorably discharged September 12, 1862, for disability.

Bartlett, Frederick, volunteer, August 19, 1862, three years, Seventh cavalry, company H.

Bell, John Thomas, age 18, volunteer, August 30, 1862, three years, Seventh cavalry, company H, private, served two years and ten months, mustered out June 29, 1865.

Brown, Leroy S., volunteer, August 3, 1862, three years, Seventh cavalry, company H, private, discharged from service on account of disability.

Boye, Charles, age 16, volunteer, 1861, three years, First Virginia light artillery, company C, private, mustered out July 1, 1865, reenlisted as a veteran.

Britton, Thomas, age 34, volunteer, August 12, 1862, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company D, private, served three years, mustered out July 9, 1865.

Brown, John Howell, volunteer, May 28, 1862, three months, Eighty-seventh regiment, company A, sergeant, one battle, served four months, mustered out October 1, 1862.

Brown, William, age 23, volunteer, September, 1861, three years, First cavalry, company L, private.

Brown, Daniel.

Brown, James Pedre, age 18, volunteer, May 28, 1862, three months, Eighty-seventh regiment, company A, private, one battle, served four months, mustered out September, 1862.

Carver, T. S., Second Virginia regiment, company H.

Carver, Sampson James, age 16, volunteer, First cavalry, company G. Chapman, Seldon, age 22, volunteer, 1863, three years, Second heavy artillery, company K, private, attained to rank of corporal.

Chapman, Levi O., volunteer, Seventh cavalry, company H.

Chapman, Hiram H., age 21, volunteer, August 13, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company H, private, served two years and ten months, mustered out June 10, 1865.

Doan, Richard, age 27, volunteer, July 25, 1863, three years, Second heavy artillery, company K, private, mustered out August 23, 1865.

Dowling, James R., age 25, volunteer, August 12, 1862, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company D, private, served three years, mustered out July 4, 1864, wounded at Chickamauga and transferred to veteran reserve corps.

Dowling, John W., age 24, volunteer, October, 1862, three years, Seventh cavalry, company H, private, served two years and nine months, mustered out June 29, 1865.

Dowling, Lewis W., age 21, volunteer, May 28, 1862, three months, Eighty-seventh regiment, company H, private, one battle, served four months, mustered out October 1, 1862.

Drum, Jacob, volunteer, August 3, 1862, three years, Sixty-third regiment, company C, private.

Flanders, John, age 24, drafted, 1862, nine months, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B, private, served ten months.

Flanders, Augustus, age 23, volunteer, September 3, 1862, three years, Seventh cavalry, company H, private, served three years.

Flanders, Henry, age 22, volunteer, August, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company I, private, served seven months, died March 17, 1862, at Summersville, Virginia, of typhus fever.

Flanders, Jasper C., age 21, substitute, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, private.

Flanders, Joseph, age 19, March 14, 1864, three years, Sixty-second regiment, company I, private, served one year and five months, mustered out August, 1865.

Flanders, Enos, age 23, substitute, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company A, private.

Guiteau, Benjamin Fulton, age 21, volunteer, 1861, three years, First cavalry, company L, private, killed January 2, 1863, at battle at Stone River.

Hall, James, age 20, volunteer, August 13, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company G, private, served three years, mustered out. Hallet, Charles, Second Huntington artillery, company K.

Henning, John Henry, age 29, volunteer, April 17, 1861, three months, Eighteenth regiment, company B, private served four months, mustered out August 28, 1861, reenlistment, age 29, volunteer, September, 1861, three years, First Virginia cavalry, company C, private, mustered out, veteran enlistment, age 31, volunteer, March 31, 1864, three years, First Virginia light artillery, company C, private.

Henning, Charles Henry, age 22, volunteer, April 17, 1861, three months, Eighteenth regiment, company B, private, served four months, mustered out August 28, 1861, reenlistment, age 22, volunteer, 1861, three years, First Virginia light artillery, company C, private, served two years, died October 31, 1863.

Hill, Ira, age 27, volunteer, September 2, 1862, three years, Seventh cavalry, company H, private, served three years, mustered out 1865.

Hill, Isaac, age 18, volunteer, August, 1862, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company I, private, served three years, mustered out July 3, 1865.

Himebaugh, John H., age 21, volunteer, February 1, 1864, three years, Seventh cavalry, company H, private, served one year and six months, mustered out June 29, 1865.

Hobby, William Alexander, age 32, volunteer, July 22, 1861, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company B, served three years, mustered out 1864, sick, and transferred to Fifteenth regiment, company D, Invalid corps.

Howland, Jesse, second heavy artillery, company K.

Horne, George Winfield, age 16, volunteer, August 1, 1863, three years, Second heavy artillery, company K, private, served two years, mustered out August 23, 1865.

Ifer, Jacob, First Virginia light artillery, company C.

Kaneff, George Washington, volunteer, August 27, 1862, three years, Seventh cavalry, company L, private, attained rank of sergeant, served three years, mustered out.

Kaneff, Charles Wesley, age 21, volunteer, February 3, 1864, three years, Seventh cavalry, company L, private.

Kidd, Nathaniel Evans, age 30, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company B, private.

Kidd, Jesse M., age 25, volunteer, September 8, 1862, three years, Seventh cavalry, company H, private.

Kidd, Joseph, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B.

Kimmick, George, age 17, volunteer, October 5, 1864, one year, Seventh Virginia regiment, company C, private, served nine months, mustered out June 26, 1865.

Kimmick, William, volunteer, December 12, 1863, Thirty-sixth regiment, company B.

Kimmick, William Henry, age 16, volunteer, December, 1863, one year, United States gunboat, cabin boy, attained rank of steward, mustered out.

Kurbs, Leonard.

Lane, Thomas, age 36, substitute, May 2, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company A, private, served five months, mustered out September 30, 1864.

Lankford, H. H., age 20, volunteer, August, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company G, private, attained rank of corporal, served three years, mustered out 1864, reenlistment, age 23, substitute, April 3, 1865, one year, Eighteenth regiment, company I.

McCall, James, age 35, volunteer, December 21, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company H, private, served one year, died January 1, 1862, at Alton, Illinois, of small pox.

Morris, Thomas, age 28, volunteer, September 8, 1862, three years, Seventh cavalry, company H, private, served seven months, honorably discharged April 3, 1863, pulmonary tuberculosis.

Newberg, William, age 17, volunteer, January 16, 1864, three years, First cavalry, company L, private.

Nicol, Robert Elder, age 35, substitute, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company B, private, mustered out September 14, 1864, died October 3, 1864.

Noe, Lewis, volunteer, July 14, 1862, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company G.

Page, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment.

Page, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment.

Palmer, Miles L., age 22, volunteer, August 29, 1862, three years, Seventh cavalry, company H, private.

Paff, Lewis, age 26, substitute, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company A, private.

Paff, Daniel, age 21, volunteer, July 22, 1861, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company B, private, served three years and one month, mustered out August, 1864.

Paff, Conrad, aged 18, volunteer, December 27, 1861, three years, First Virginia light artillery, company C, private, served two years and six months, honorably discharged 1864, veteran enlistment, age 20, volunteer, March 31, 1864, three years, First Virginia light artillery, company C, served one year and three months, mustered out June 28, 1865.

Prewett, Brazil, age 21, volunteer, Seventh cavalry, company L, private.

Price, John W., volunteer, 1861, three years, First cavalry, company L, private, reenlisted as a veteran.

Price, Logan, age 19, volunteer, September 1, 1861, three years, First Virginia light artillery, company A, private, served two years and six months, honorably discharged, veteran enlistment, age 21, volunteer, March 31, 1861, three years, First Virginia light artillery, company C, mustered out June 28, 1865.

Robinson, W. Lynch, volunteer, July, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company F, private, served three years, mustered out June 10, 1865.

Robinson, Joseph, age 48, volunteer, three years, Sixty-third regiment, company H, private, died July 20, 1863, at Covington, Kentucky, of chronic diarrhoea.

Robinson, Charles H., age 35, volunteer, August 9, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company F, private, served three years, mustered out June 10, 1865, last two years in invalid corps in Frederick City.

Rodgers, Mason C., volunteer, March 30, 1862, three years, First Virginia light artillery, company C, private, died March 17, 1863.

Rodgers, Frederick, volunteer, March 30, 1862, three years, First Virginia light artillery, company C, private, died December 24, 1862, mortally wounded at the battle of Cross Keys.

Schultze, Adam, age 21, volunteer, August 13, 1862, three years, Sixty-third regiment, company G, private, veteran reenlistment, age 22 volunteer, three years, Sixty-third regiment, company G.

Shelden, Charles, One Hundred and Sixteenth regiment, company G.

Seevers, Benjamin, volunteer, August 20, 1862, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company D, private.

Simmons, John, age 29, volunteer, one year, One Hundred and Seventy-ninth regiment, company F, private.

Sinclair, William, Thirty-ninth regiment, company B, private, died August 10, 1862, of fever, at Corinth, Mississippi.

Stanley, William, January 25, 1861, three years, Twelfth regiment, company D, private, served one year, honorably discharged December 25, 1862.

Stanley, W. T., volunteer, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company K, second lieutenant, attained rank of captain, honorably discharged November 25, 1864.

Stanley, George, volunteer, First Virginia light artillery, company C, private, attained rank of corporal, mustered out 1865.

Taylor, Reuben, age 17, volunteer, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B, private, died June, 25, 1864, in rebel prison at Tyler, Texas.

Theis, Jacob, age 20, October 13, 1864, one year, Seventy-eighth regiment, company D, private, served nine months, mustered out July 11, 1865.

Thornton, William, age 18, volunteer, August 12, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company G, private, attained rank of orderly, served two and one-half years, honorably discharged, veteran enlistment, age 20, volunteer, February 24, 1864, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company G, private, attained rank of orderly, served six months, mustered out July 27, 1865.

Troudner, George Adam, age 18, volunteer, March, 1862, three years, First Virginia light artillery, company C, private, served two years, honorably discharged, veteran enlistment, age 20, volunteer, October 31, 1864, three years, First Virginia light artillery, company C, private, mustered out June 28, 1865.

Tucker, John R., age 56, volunteer, April, 1861, three months, Nineteenth regiment, company G, private, served three months, mustered out August, 1861.

Tucker, Abner, age 22, volunteer, April 17, 1861, three months, Eighteenth regiment, company B, private, mustered out August 28, 1861, reenlisted, volunteer, Thirty-sixth regiment, private, reenlisted, volunteer, First light artillery, company C, private, reenlisted, age 26, volunteer, Eighteenth regiment, company C, private, honorably discharged.

Ward, Augustus, volunteer, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, drummer, served two and one-half years, reenlistment, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company A, lieutenant, attained rank of captain, served one and one-half years, mustered out July 9, 1865.

Ward, Everett R., age 18, volunteer, August 8, 1864, one year, First Virginia light artillery, company H, private, served ten months, honorably discharged May 24, 1865.

Warren, Robert L., volunteer, October, 1861, three years, First Virginia cavalry, company E, private, honorably discharged, reenlisted as a veteran.

Warren, Charles, Seventh Virginia regiment, company E.

Waxler, Archibald V., age 23, volunteer, August 19, 1862, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company G, private, attained rank of corporal, died November 18, 1864, killed.

West.

Whitney, Simon H., age 27, volunteer, October 5, 1862, three years, Seventh cavalry, company H, private, served seven months, died May, 1863, of typhoid fever.

Young, John R., age 23, volunteer, August 12, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company G, private, attained rank of corporal, served two years and six months, honorably discharged, veteran enlistment, age 25, volunteer, February 1, 1864, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company G, corporal, attained rank of sergeant, served one year and six months, mustered out July, 1865.

Young, Thomas Andrews, age 17, volunteer, March, 1865, one year, One Hundred and Eighty-ninth regiment, company H, private.

Young, Douglass H., age 22, volunteer, September, 1861, three years, First Virginia light artillery, company C, private, served one month, honorably discharged, second enlistment, age 23, volunteer, August 12, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company D, private, served three years, mustered out June 22, 1865.

Young, Lewis, volunteer, October 1, 1861, Fifty-eighth regiment, company K.

Zimmer, Lewis, age 20, volunteer, September 26, 1861, three years, Sixty-third regiment, company G, private, served one year, died October 3, 1862, shot in battle at Corinth.

RECAPITULATION.

|  |     |
|--|-----|
| Buell's Pierpont battery.....  | 12  |
| Battery K, Second heavy artillery.....   | 4   |
| Battery H, First Virginia light artillery.....   | 1   |
| Seventh Ohio cavalry.....  | 15  |
| First Ohio cavalry.....  | 6   |
| First Virginia cavalry.....  | 1   |
| Sixty-third Ohio.....  | 4   |
| Thirty-sixth Ohio.....   | 18  |
| Seventy-seventh Ohio.....  | 8   |
| One Hundred and Forty-eighth Ohio National Guard.....  | 8   |
| Three each in Thirty-ninth Ohio, Ninety-third Ohio, Eighty-Seventh Ohio (three months) Eighteenth (three months) in all....  | 12  |
| Seventh Virginia infantry.....   | 2   |
| Eighteenth Ohio (three years).....   | 2   |
| And one each in Second Virginia infantry, Sixty-second Ohio, Fifty-eighth Ohio, Twelfth Ohio, Nineteenth Ohio, Seventy-eighth Ohio, One Hundred and Sixteenth Ohio, One Hundred and Seventy-ninth Ohio, One Hundred and Eighty-ninth Ohio, and two not designated, in all..... | 11  |
| Total number soldiers.....   | 109 |
| Died.....  | 11  |

GRANDVIEW TOWNSHIP.

Adams, Thomas Dunn, age 23, volunteer, August, 1861, Seventh Virginia infantry, company C, private, served three years, mustered out in November, 1864.

Adams, William A. S., age 17, volunteer, September 12, 1864, one year, Sixth Virginia infantry, company C, private, served nine months, mustered out June 10, 1865.

Armstrong, Robert, One Hundred and Sixteenth regiment, company D, killed in service.

Austin, George Greenwood, age 21, volunteer, 1861, three years, Second Virginia cavalry, company C, bugler, veteran reenlistment, 1864, three years.

Arthur, William D., age 18, volunteer, October 5, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, served one year, honorably discharged October 12, 1862.

Arthur, J. Armstrong, age 16, volunteer, October 5, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private; veteran enlistment, February 1864, three years.

Aten, George, age 32, drafted, September 27, 1864, one year, Fifty-first regiment, company D, private, served nine months, mustered out June 20, 1865.

Ballentine, John, age 24, volunteer, November, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, served one year, honorably discharged.

Ballentine, Robert, age 16, volunteer, October 5, 1861, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, veteran enlistment, February, 1864, three years, private, attained the rank of corporal.

Ballentine, Hugh, age 14, volunteer, February, 1864, three years, Twenty-fifth regiment, company C, private.

Barber, J. Daubigne, age 24, volunteer, October 8, 1861, three years, Second Virginia cavalry, company C, first sergeant, attained rank of first lieutenant, served two years, killed in action near Winchester, July 27, 1864.

Barentz, Dwight, age 24, volunteer, January 25, 1865, one year, One Hundred and Eighty-fourth regiment, company A, private, served seven months, mustered out in September, 1865.

Barentz, Martin, age 18, volunteer, March, 1865, one year, One Hundred and Eighty-seventh regiment, company G, private.

Barnes, Vachel Hall, age 22, volunteer, August, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company H, corporal, died.

Barnes, Francis Adams, age 18, volunteer, September, 1861, three years, Second Virginia cavalry, company C, private, served one year, honorably discharged in 1862; second enlistment, age 20, volunteer, August, 1863, six months, Fourth Virginia cavalry, company G, first lieutenant; third enlistment, age 21, volunteer, September, 1864, one year, One Hundred and Eightieth regiment, company F, first lieutenant, served ten months, mustered out July, 1865.

Barnhart, Leonard, age 29, volunteer, October 5, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, served three and one-half years, mustered out in March, 1865.

Barnhart, William, age 22, volunteer, February, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private.

Barnhart, George M., age 39, volunteer, February 15, 1865, one year, One Hundred and Eighty-seventh regiment, company G, private.

Barnhart, Chester, age 33, volunteer, March 8, 1864, Seventh Virginia, private, killed June 3, 1864, in action at Cold Harbor, Virginia.

Barnhart, James William, volunteer, Seventh Virginia, killed.

Barrett, John C., age 18, volunteer, February 20, 1865, one year, One Hundred and Eighty-seventh regiment, company G, private.

Beaver, Perry, age 23, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, served three years, mustered out December 12, 1864.

Beaver, James age 19, volunteer, August, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, served seven months, died in May, 1862, at Covington, Kentucky.

Beaver, George W., age 31, drafted and volunteer, 1862, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private.

Beaver, Calvin, age 19, volunteer, November 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, served three years, mustered out December 12, 1864.

Beaver, Michael, age 23, volunteer, November, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, served two months, discharged.

Beegle, Daniel M., age 17, substitute and volunteer, 1862, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private.

Biddle, Perry, age 43, volunteer, December 16, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company I, private, served two years, died December 14, 1863.

Biddle, Loyd Adelbert, age 17, volunteer, October 22, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company I, private; veteran enlistment, February, 1864, company C.

Biddle, John Quincy, age 15, volunteer, October 22, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, served five months, honorably discharged March 15, 1862; reenlistment, age 18, volunteer, February, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private.

Bradfield, Charles, age 18, volunteer, February, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private.

Broadright, Henry, age 22, volunteer, October, 1861, three years, Second Virginia cavalry, company I, private, attained corporal, died.

Brooks, John, age 35, drafted, September 27, 1864, one year, Fifty-first regiment, company D, private, served nine months, mustered out June 20, 1865.

Bruce, Samuel, age 42, volunteer, August 6, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, served nine months, died April 23, 1862.

Burnet, John L. Jones, age 16, volunteer, May 18, 1863, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private.

Burris, Marion, age 23, volunteer, October 5, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, attained the rank of second lieutenant, resigned; reenlistment, age 27, substitute, February, 1865, one year, Twentieth regiment, company B, private.

Burris, William W., age 18, volunteer, December 12, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private; veteran enlistment, age 20, volunteer, February, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, attained the rank of first lieutenant.

Burris, John Martin, age 18, volunteer, February 8, 1864, three years, Sixty-second Pennsylvania regiment, company I, private, served seventeen months, mustered out July 3, 1865.

Burris, William, age 22, volunteer, 1861, three years, Second Virginia cavalry, company C, private, three years, mustered out in 1864.

Burris, Stimson, age 16, volunteer, February, 1865, one year, One Hundred and Eighty-Seventh regiment, company G, private.

Byers, Jacob, age 35, volunteer, August 15, 1862, three years, One Hundred and Sixteenth regiment, company E, private, served three years, mustered out June 14, 1865.

Callagan, John, age 47, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, killed January 8, 1862.

Calvert, Alexander, age 25, volunteer, August 29, 1862, three years, Fourteenth Virginia regiment, company E, corporal.

Calvert, Washington, age 25, volunteer, October 8, 1861, three years, Sixty-third regiment, company F, private, attained the rank of corporal, served ten months, honorably discharged August 23, 1862.

Calvert, Ezekiel, First artillery, company K.

Campbell, Joseph, age 23, volunteer, August 23, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, served nine months, honorably discharged May 26, 1862.

Cameron, John B., volunteer, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G.

Cameron, John R., Seventy-seventh regiment, company G.

Cameron, Andrew.

Carrol, George, age 38, volunteer, October 28, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, one year, died October 4, 1862.

Carrol, Thomas, Seventy-seventh regiment, company I.

Cline, Martin Van, age 34, volunteer, August 1, 1861, three years, Seventh Virginia regiment, company D, private, served one year, honorably discharged October 6, 1862, for disability.

Cline, Theodore, volunteer, One Hundred and Eighty-seventh regiment, company G.

Cluter, M. V., volunteer, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C.

Cooper, James, Ninety-second regiment, company H.

Cooper, John, volunteer, Ninety-second regiment, company H, private, killed in service.

Cooper, Robert, Sixty-third regiment, company F; reenlistment, volunteer, 1865, one year, One Hundred and Eighty-seventh regiment, company G, private.

Cunningham, William Henry, One Hundred and Eighty-seventh regiment, company G.

Cunningham, James, age 24, drafted, September 27, 1864, one year, Fifty-first regiment, companies I and D, private, served eight months, honorably discharged June 1, 1865.

Cunningham, Robert H., age 19, volunteer, February 14, 1865, one year, Fifty-first regiment, company G, private.

Custer, David, age 48, volunteer, January 5, 1862, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, served two years, honorably discharged February, 1864.

Dailey, Hamilton, age 18, volunteer, February 28, 1864, three years, Fifteenth regiment, company C, private.

Dailey, William, One Hundred and Twenty-fifth regiment, company H.

Davis, John, age 36, volunteer, August, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company H, private, served three years, mustered out June 10, 1865.

Davis, Peter, Second cavalry, company C, died.

Dayly, Wesley, age 18, volunteer, October 19, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, served five months, died March 30, 1862, at Paducah, Kentucky.

Dickey, Samuel M., age 41, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, honorably discharged, reenlistment, age 45, substitute, October, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, mustered out in 1865.

Dodds, Joseph, age 19, volunteer, September 13, 1861, three years, Second Virginia cavalry, company C, private, attained corporal, served two years and a half, reenlistment, volunteer, 1864, three years, Second Virginia cavalry, company C, corporal, served one year and four months, mustered out in 1865.

Dorff, Charles, age 17, volunteer, October 20, 1861, three years, Second Virginia cavalry, company C, private, reenlistment, age 19, volunteer, 1864, three years, Second Virginia cavalry, company C, private, mustered out in 1865.

Dorff, Reuben, age 16, volunteer, 1864, three years, Second Virginia cavalry, private, mustered out in 1865.

Dorff, William, age 18, volunteer, September, 1861, three years, First light artillery, company K, corporal, attained sergeant, reenlistment, age 21, volunteer, 1864, three years, First light artillery, company K, sergeant, mustered out in 1865.

Deegan, William C., age 20, volunteer, October, 1861, three years, Sixty-third regiment, company F, corporal, attained sergeant.

Dye, James, One Hundred and Ninety-fourth regiment, company I, private, died.

Eaton, William, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C.

Easthorn, James P., age 30, volunteer, September 12, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, reenlisted as a veteran, volunteer, February, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, attained corporal.

Easthorn, John J., aged 19, volunteer, May, 1861, three years, Twenty-fifth regiment, company B, private, served one year, died, mortally wounded at the battle of Cross Keys, Virginia.

Easton, Daniel, Twenty-fifth regiment.

Eddy, Going, age 40, volunteer, August 27, 1861, three years, Seventh Virginia infantry, company D, private, served ten months, honorable discharged in June, 1862.

Eddy, David, age 24, volunteer, October 18, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company I, private, reenlisted as a veteran, age 26, volunteer, February, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company I, private.

Eddy, Alpheus, age 18, volunteer, August, 1861, three years, First light artillery, company K, private, served two years and a half, enlisted as a veteran, age 20, volunteer, 1864, three years, First light artillery, company K, private, died in 1864.

Eddy, Going, Jr., age 17, volunteer, July 25, 1863, six months, Fourth Virginia cavalry, company G, private, served seven months, mustered out in March, 1864, reenlistment, age 18, volunteer, 1864, three years, First light artillery, company K, private, mustered out in 1865.

Eddy, William, age 15, volunteer, July, 1863, six months, Fourth Virginia cavalry, company G, private, served seven months, mustered out in 1864, reenlistment, age 16, volunteer, 1864, three years, First light artillery, company K, private, mustered out in 1865.

Edgill, John, age 15, volunteer, August, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, enlisted as a veteran, age 18, volunteer, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private.

Edmonds, Robert, age 19, volunteer, October 28, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, enlisted as a veteran, age 21, volunteer, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private.

Edmonds, William, aged 17, volunteer, July, 1861, three years, Fourth Virginia, company C, private, honorably discharged in March, 1865.

Edmonds, John, age 16, volunteer, February, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private.

Elrod, James, age 25, volunteer, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private.

Eoffle, Hiram, age 17, volunteer, June 4, 1861, three years, Fourth Virginia, company C, served two years, honorably discharged in September, 1863, enlisted as a veteran, age 20, volunteer, February, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private.

Eoffle, Sardine, age 17, volunteer, October 10, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, enlisted as a veteran, age 19, volunteer, February, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private.

Eoffle, Lander, age 19, volunteer, 1864, three years, One Hundred and Sixteenth regiment, company C, private, died in September, 1864, shot in hospital at Cumberland, Maryland.

Eoffle, Marion, volunteer, February 14, 1865, one year, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private.

Evans, John F., volunteer, Seventh Virginia, company C, Second lieutenant, attained first lieutenant, mustered out August 19, 1863, on account of wound received at Chancellorsville.

Ferguson, James S., volunteer, October 20, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, served six months, died April 20, 1862.

Ferguson, Thomas, age 32, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, died in 1862.

Ferguson, John, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private.

Filley, Buell, age 18, volunteer, September 3, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company D, private, served two and a half years, reenlisted as a veteran, February, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company D, private, served one year, died April 23, 1865, of diarrhoea, at Natchez, Mississippi.

Fisher, Henry, drafted, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B.

Forance, George, Seventeenth regiment, company B.

Frazier, George B., age 16, volunteer, August 1, 1861, three years, Seventh Virginia, company D, private, mustered out July 1, 1865.

Fouracre, Charles W., Fifteenth regiment, company D.

Frey, William Henry, age 22, volunteer, August, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company C, private, served three years, mustered out June 10, 1865.

Fry, William Everett, age 36, volunteer, August 13, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company H, private, served three years, mustered out June 10, 1865.

Gibson, Robert, age 25, volunteer, September 23, 1864, one year, One Hundred and Eightieth regiment, company F, private, mustered out June 10, 1865.

Gatten, Robert, Second Virginia cavalry, company A.

Gooseman, Israel, age 18, volunteer, October 10, 1861, three years, Second Virginia cavalry, company C, private, served three years, mustered out October 1, 1864, wounded in action near Raleigh.

Gray, Walter, age 19, volunteer, August, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company E, private, reenlisted as a veteran, 1864, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company E, private, mustered out July, 1865.

Gray, Philip, age 16, volunteer, February 25, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private.

Gray, William, age 15, volunteer, February 25, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, served three months, died June 6, 1864, at Little Rock, Arkansas.

Griggs, John C., age 15, volunteer, October 1, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company I, private, reenlisted as a veteran February, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company I, private.

Guirt, William, First light artillery, company K, private.

Gully, Cyrus, Ninth cavalry, company B.

Hackethorn, William, age 31, volunteer, September, 1861, three years, First light artillery, company K, private, served three years, mustered out, 1864.

Harvey, Lucien Levant, age 28, volunteer, December, 1861, three years, First light artillery, company H, private, served three years, mustered out, 1864.

Harvey, Franklin C., volunteer, 1863, six months, Fourth Virginia cavalry, company G, private, served seven months, mustered out March, 1864, reenlisted as a substitute in 1864, one year, Fifth regiment, company D, private, served nine months, mustered out June 22, 1865.

Harvey, Theodore I, age 17, volunteer, February, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private.

Hays, John, age 30, volunteer, August 25, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, attained the rank of corporal, served two and a half years, reenlisted as a veteran February, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, served one year and three months, honorably discharged June, 1865.

Heddlston, Finley, age 38, volunteer, March 23, 1864, three years, First light artillery, company K, private.

Hessam, Samuel T., substitute, September, 1864, one year, Fifth regiment, company D, private, served nine months.

Hill, Daniel, Seventy-eighth regiment, company G, died.

Hill, Porter, age 27, volunteer, August 1, 1861, three years, Seventh Virginia, company D, private, served three years, mustered out August 27, 1864.

Holland, Alexander, age 19, volunteer, May, 1861, three years, Twenty-fifth regiment, company C, private, served three years, mustered out, 1864, reenlisted March, 1865, one year, One Hundred and Ninety-fourth regiment, company C, attained the rank of captain.

Holland, William, age 18, volunteer, February 15, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private.

Holland, Harvey, age 16, volunteer, February 15, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private.

Hood, D., Fifty-first regiment, company D.

Howell, John H., age 19, volunteer, November 16, 1861, three years, Sixty-second regiment, company K, private, reenlisted as a veteran, 1864, three years, Sixty-second regiment, company K, private, attained the rank of corporal, honorably discharged September, 1865.

Howell, George, age 18, substitute, March, 1865, one year, Thirty-ninth regiment, company C, private, served four months, mustered out July, 1865.

Howell, James, drafted, discharged.

Howell, Andrew, First light artillery, company K.

Hines, John, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C.

Honnell, David, volunteer, Twenty-third regiment, company G.

Hines, John, jr., volunteer, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C.

Jarvis, John E., age 21, volunteer, 1863, three years, Fifty-ninth regiment, company A, private, killed.

Jarvis, Ashbury, age 19, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company I, served three years, mustered out in 1864.

Jewell, James, volunteer, February 24, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private.

Justice, John W., age 22, volunteer, January 18, 1864, First light artillery, company K, corporal, mustered out.

Jewell, Samuel, volunteer, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private.

Justice, Josiah, First light artillery, company K.

Johnson, James, age 35, volunteer, March 25, 1865, one year, One Hundred and Ninety-fourth regiment, company I, private, served three months, honorably discharged May, 1865.

Johnson, John D., Twenty-seventh regiment, company I.

Jones, Calvin D., age 20, volunteer, 1861, three years, First light artillery, company K, veteran reenlistment, age 22, volunteer, 1864, three years, First light artillery, company K, mustered out 1865.

Jones, Johiel, age 16, volunteer, December 25, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, served two years, veteran reenlistment, age 18, volunteer, February, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, served four months, shot himself, and died June 20, 1864.

Keigley, Jacob, age 22, volunteer, November 10, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, served one year, died December 14, 1862, at Alton, Illinois.

Kendle, Elias, Sixty-seventh regiment, company K, private.

Kette, Ferdinand, age 16, volunteer, 1863, six months, Fourth Virginia cavalry, company G, private, reenlistment, age 17, volunteer, March 1, 1865, one year, Nineteenth regiment, company I, corporal, served eight months, mustered out in 1865.

Kilmer, John, drafted September, 1864, one year, Thirty-second regiment, company C, private.

Kirkbride, Martin, age 18, volunteer, March 24, 1864, three years, First light artillery, company K, private, served sixteen months, mustered out July, 1865.

Knapp, Wilson L., age 30, drafted September 27, 1864, one year, Fifty-first regiment, company D, private, served nine months, mustered out June 20, 1865.

Landy, Alvy William, age 22, volunteer, July 22, 1861, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company B, private, served two years and six months, reenlistment, age 24, volunteer, January 1, 1864, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company B, private, served one year and five months, died June 17, 1865.

Larcombe, Charles, age 22, volunteer, November 8, 1861, three years, Second Virginia cavalry, company C, private, attained rank of quartermaster sergeant, served three years and seven months, mustered out July, 1865.

Ledger, Frederick, age 29, drafted 1864, one year, Thirty-second regiment, company C, mustered out 1865.

Ledger, Daniel, age 23, volunteer, September 4, 1861, three years, First light artillery, company K, corporal, served two years and six months, veteran enlistment, age 25, volunteer, 1864, three years, First light artillery, company K, corporal, attained rank of sergeant, served one year and six months, mustered out July 18, 1865.

Leonard, Albert W., age 19, volunteer, November 8, 1861, three years, Second Virginia cavalry, company C, private, served two months, killed at Jennie's Creek, Kentucky, January 7, 1862.

Linn, Hiram, age 22, volunteer, August, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company K, private.

Linn, William, age 20, volunteer, August, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company K, private, served one month, honorably discharged, second enlistment, volunteer, 1863, six months, Fourth Virginia cavalry, company G, teamster, served seven months, mustered out March, 1864.

Lipincott, Samuel, age 26, volunteer, August 27, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B, private, served two years and six months, veteran enlistment, volunteer, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B, private.

Lisk, James, age 22, volunteer, September 27, 1861, three years, First light artillery, company K, private, served five months, died of measles at Camp Dennison, March 4, 1862.

Lisk, Nicholas, age 18, volunteer, February, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, served one year and two months, honorably discharged June, 1865.

Little, Leander, age 18, volunteer, March 24, 1864, three years, First light artillery, company K, private, served one year and three months, mustered out July 18, 1865.

Little, Thomas, age 19, substitute, February 27, 1865, one year, Forty-third regiment, company H, private, served four months, honorably discharged July 14, 1865.

Little, John, volunteer, one year, One Hundred and Eighty-seventh regiment, company G, private, served one year, died in service.

Little, Daniel, age 17, volunteer, 1863, six months, Fourth Virginia cavalry, company G, private, served seven months.

Lowery, Daniel, age 22, volunteer, November 23, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, served four months, killed at Chattanooga, April 8, 1862.

Lowman, William Henry, age 18, volunteer, November 30, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, served five months, died May 1, 1862.

Lowther, William W., Twenty-fifth regiment, company C.

Marks, D. R., volunteer, January 1, 1862, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, served one year, honorably discharged January 16, 1863.

Marlow, Leonard A., age 22, volunteer, August, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, sergeant, attained rank of second lieutenant.

Masters, Thomas A., age 23, volunteer, April 29, 1861, three years, Twenty-fifth regiment, company B, private, served three years, mustered out July 20, 1864.

Mathers, Francis M., age 18, substitute, April, 1865, one year, Eighteenth regiment, company E, private, served six months, honorably discharged October 9, 1864.

Meeks, Gideon, age 24, volunteer, August, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company H, private, one year, died November, 1863. McBee, Jesse, age 21, volunteer, September 10, 1861, three years, First light artillery, company K, private, served three and a half years, mustered out January 16, 1865.

McCall, James, age 18, volunteer, October 18, 1861, three years, Sixty-second regiment, company K, private, reenlisted as a veteran, age 20, volunteer, 1864, three years, Sixty-second regiment, company K, private, attained rank of corporal.

McCall, Benjamin, age 16, volunteer, November 1, 1862, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private.

McCullough, John, age 19, volunteer, September, 1861, three years, First light artillery, company K, private, served two and a half years, reenlisted as a veteran, age 22, volunteer, 1864, three years, First light artillery, company K, corporal, served one and a half years, mustered out July 18, 1865.

McCullom, Isaac, age 18, volunteer, August 1, 1861, three years, Seventh Virginia, company D, private, mustered out July 1, 1865.

McCullom, John, Seventy-seventh regiment, company I.

McKnight, William Seman, age 32, drafted, September, 1864, one year, Seventy-first regiment, company I, private.

McMahan, William, volunteer, One Hundred and Sixteenth regiment, company D.

Miller, John, March 3, 1864, three years, Seventh Virginia, company D, honorably discharged for disability.

Miller, James, One Hundred and Eighty-seventh company G.

Miller, Frederick, age 27, drafted, October, 1864, one year, Thirty-second regiment, company C, private, served eleven months, mustered out August 27, 1865.

Minder, Jacob, age 16, volunteer, August 22, 1864, one year, One Hundred and Eighty-second regiment, company F, private, served eleven months, mustered out July 12, 1865.

Mitchell, Joseph M., age 20, volunteer, August, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, companies C and A, sergeant, attained rank of orderly sergeant, reenlisted as a veteran, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, orderly sergeant, attained rank of first lieutenant.

Mitchell, Israel, age 17, volunteer, February 20, 1865, one year, Eighteenth regiment, company F, private, served seven months, mustered out July 22, 1865.

Moore, John, age 33, volunteer, August, 1861, three years, Seventh Virginia, company D, private, served nine months, honorably discharged for disability May 6, 1862.

Moore, Shadrack, age 17, volunteer, February 24, 1862, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, served one and a half years, honorably discharged July 22, 1865, reenlisted, age 18, July 22, 1865, five years, First United States light artillery, company D, private.

Moore, William, age 27, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventh Virginia, company D, private, attained to rank of corporal, enlisted as a veteran 1864, three years, wounded at the battle of the Wilderness, July 1, 1865, mustered out.

Moore, Sheldon M., age 22, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventh Virginia, company D, private, one year, honorably discharged October, 1863.

Myers, William Larwell, age 19, volunteer, March 31, 1864, three years, Seventh Virginia, company D, private, attained rank of corporal, served one year and three months, mustered out July 1, 1865, enlisted as a veteran.

Myers, John, age 24, volunteer, October 20, 1861, three years, Second Virginia cavalry, company C, private, served two years, honorably discharged November 19, 1865, enlisted as a veteran November 20, 1863, three years, served one and a half years, mustered out June 30, 1865.

Myers, Henry, one year, Fifty-first regiment, company D, private.

McWilliams, Lewis H., age 20, volunteer, One Hundred and Eighty-fourth regiment, company C, private, died of fever at Columbus, Ohio, October 1, 1864.

Nenn, Jonas, age 44, volunteer, 1865, one year, One Hundred and Ninety-fourth regiment, company I, private, served seven months, mustered out October, 1865.

Nenn, George, age 17, volunteer, 1863, served six months, Fourth Virginia cavalry, company G, private, served seven months, mustered out March, 1864, reenlisted September, 1864, one year, Eighteenth regiment, company F, served nine months, mustered out July, 1865.

Nenn, John, age 16, substitute, 1865, one year, Twentieth regiment, company D, private, served three months, mustered out July 15, 1865.

Newman, Henry, age 17, volunteer, February 21, 1865, one year, One Hundred and Eighty-ninth regiment, company F, private, seven months, mustered out September 28, 1865.

Oliver, Hillery, age 33, volunteer, September 26, 1864, one year, One Hundred and Eighty-second regiment, company F, private, served nine months, mustered out July, 1865.

Oliver, John Weston, age 26, volunteer, February, 1865, one year, One Hundred and Eighty-seventh regiment, company G, private.

Parker, Isaac, age 39, volunteer, 1861, three years, First light artillery, company H, private, served three years, mustered out 1864.

Pan, James H., Thirty-sixth regiment, company G.

Petty, Daniel, Twenty-seventh regiment, company D.

Pitcher, William, volunteer, 1865, one year, One Hundred and Ninety-fourth regiment, company I.

Poole, James Jackson, age 27, volunteer, August, 1861, three years, Seventh Virginia, company D, private, served one year, killed at Antietam in 1862.

Poole, Charles, age 33, volunteer, March 3, 1865, one year, One Hundred and Ninety-fourth regiment, company I, private, three months, honorably discharged June, 1865.

Poole, Richard, age 36, volunteer, August 22, 1864, one year, Eighteenth regiment, company F, private, served eleven months, mustered out July 12, 1865.

Porter, Daniel, Eighteenth regiment, company B.

Potts, Richard, age 34, volunteer, October 18, 1861, three years, Sixty-second regiment, company K, private, served seven months, honorably discharged May 9, 1862.

Powell, George W., volunteer, Seventh Virginia, company D, private, attained rank of second lieutenant, mustered out July 1, 1865.

Racy, William, volunteer, Third Virginia cavalry, company C.

Ramsay, Joseph, Forty-fifth regiment, company C, died in prison.
 Riggs, Daniel B., age 18, volunteer, August 1, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company C, private, hung himself October 15, 1861.

Rienick, Gearhard C., age 33, volunteer, March 7, 1865, one year, Thirty-sixth regiment, company G, private, served five months, mustered out July 27, 1865.

Rindle, Charles, Sixty-first regiment, company C, private.

Ritter, Henry, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C.

Robinson, David, One Hundred and Eighty-seventh regiment, company G.

Sandford, John, age 40, volunteer, August 26, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, died.

Scott, Isaac, One Hundred and Eightieth regiment, company F.

Scott, John, age 16, volunteer, November, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, second enlistment, substitute, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company G, private, served four months, mustered out 1864, third enlistment, volunteer, October 1, 1864, one year, Fifteenth light artillery, private, served eight months, mustered out June 8, 1865.

Robinson, David, One Hundred and Eighty-seventh regiment, company G.

Sandford, Clark.

Springer, John, volunteer, 1861, three years, First regiment, company H, private, served eight months, honorably discharged.

Shaner, William, Twenty-fifth regiment, company B.

Springer, Henry J., age 21, volunteer, February, 1865, one year, One Hundred and Eighty-seventh regiment, company G, private.

Salisbury, Henry, Twenty-seventh regiment, company B.

Springer, George, age 19, volunteer, February, 1865, one year, One Hundred and Eighty-seventh regiment, company G, private, mustered out.

Sandford, Nathan, Twenty-fifth regiment, company K.

Springer, John, age 17, volunteer, March, 1865, one year, One Hundred and Ninety-fourth regiment, company I, private, mustered out.

Springer, Samuel, Seventy-seventh regiment, company I.

Stephens, Stacy H., age 22, volunteer, September, 1864, one year, One Hundred and Eightieth regiment, company F, private, served ten months, mustered out July 25, 1865.

Snodgrass, John S., Sixty-third regiment, company F.

Stephenson, Joseph, volunteer, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company H, captain.

Sandford, M., Twenty-fifth regiment, company K.

Stephenson, Joseph Albert, age 16, volunteer, September, 1864, one year, One Hundred and Eightieth regiment, company F, private, served ten months, mustered out July 25, 1865.

Shaner, Leander, Eighty-sixth regiment, company A.

Stewart, Hiram C., age 15, volunteer, August, 1861, three years, Seventh Virginia, company D, private, honorably discharged, veteran enlistment, age 17, volunteer, three years, Seventh Virginia, company D, private, died.

Still, Leonard, volunteer, September, 1864, one year, Seventh Virginia, company D, private, mustered out July 1, 1865.

Shaner, George L., One Hundred and Twenty-ninth regiment, company F.

Still, Thomas, age 18, volunteer, September, 1864, one year, Seventh Virginia, company D, private, served six months, died February 23, 1865.

Swatswood, Levi K., First light artillery.

Swatswood, William, Seventy-seventh regiment, company I.

Talbot, William Bruce, age 18, volunteer, April, 1861, three months, Eighteenth regiment, company E, private, served four months, mustered out August, 1861, second enlistment, age 18, volunteer, 1861, three years, Second Virginia cavalry, companies K and E, private, attained rank of sergeant, served two years, veteran enlistment, age 20, volunteer, 1863, three years, Second Virginia cavalry, company E, sergeant, served one year and six months, mustered out July 1, 1865.

Thorp, Isaiah, age 24, volunteer, August 20, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company H, private, served one year, killed at Chattanooga September 19, 1863.

Thorp, Isaac, age 23, volunteer, August 20, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, attained rank of corporal, veteran enlistment, age 20, volunteer, February, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private.

Thorp, William, age 19, volunteer, 1863, six months, Fourth Virginia cavalry, company G, private, served seven months, mustered out March 1864, reenlistment, age 20, volunteer, 1864, one year, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, died September 23, 1865, in prison, Brownsville, Texas.

Thorp, John Henry, age 16, volunteer, February, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private.

Thompson, Orvill, age 18, volunteer, November 8, 1861, three years, Second Virginia cavalry, company C, private, served two years, discharged November 25, 1863, for disability, died.

Thompson, James, age 42, volunteer, October, 1861, three years, Sixty-second regiment, company K, private, served seven months, honorably discharged, June 1862.

Thompson, Sampson, age 16, volunteer, October 18, 1861, three years, Sixty-second regiment, company K, private, served seven months, honorably discharged, June, 1862, reenlistment, age 17, volunteer, October 23, 1862, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private.

Thompson, William S., age 28, substitute and volunteer, 1862, three years, Ninth cavalry, company B, sergeant, honorably discharged, June 8, 1865.

Thompson, Edgar, age 26, volunteer, August 9, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company H, private, served four months, honorably discharged, December, 1862.

Thompson, Benjamin, Sixty-second regiment, company K.

Tice, John J., age 43, volunteer, October 27, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G, sergeant, veteran enlistment age 45, volunteer, February, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company E, teamster.

Tice, Harvey, age 15, volunteer, October 27, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G, private, veteran enlistment, age 17, volunteer, February, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company E, private.

Tice, Henry William, volunteer, Seventy-seventh regiment, company I, private.

Trimble, Francis, age 40, volunteer, October, 1861, three years, First light Artillery, company K, private, veteran enlistment, age 42, volunteer, February, 1864, three years, First light artillery, company K, private, died May 22, 1864.

Ulloni, Sylvanus, age 19, volunteer, May, 1861, three years, Twenty-fifth regiment, company B, private, veteran enlistment, age 21, volunteer, three years, Twenty-fifth regiment, company C, private, died.

Unger, Jonas, age 36, volunteer, September 27, 1864, one year, One Hundred and Eightieth regiment, company F, private, served ten months, mustered out July 25, 1865.

Vickers, Albert, age 19, volunteer, November 11, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private.

Waters, John, One Hundred and Sixteenth regiment, company A.

Watson, Jacob, Seventy-seventh regiment, company D.

Watson, William, age 32, volunteer, August 1, 1861, three years, Seventh Virginia regiment, company D, corporal, died April 1, 1862, at home.

Wells, Clinton, age 18, substitute, 1865, one year, Sixty-third regiment, private, served six weeks, mustered out May, 1865.

Williams, Lewis, One Hundred and Eightieth regiment, company F.

West, Michael, Eighteenth regiment, company F.

Williamson, Nelson, age 24, volunteer, November, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G, private, served five months, died March 20, 1862, at Pittsburgh Landing.

Willis, James, age 48, substitute, October 8, 1864, one year, Forty-third regiment, company D, private, served nine months, mustered out July 12, 1865.

Wilson, Andrew V., age 19, volunteer, August 29, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, attained rank of sergeant, served three years, mustered out 1864.

Wilson, John, age 21, volunteer, September, 1864, one year, One Hundred and Eightieth regiment, company F, private, honorably discharged 1865.

Winton, Clark, age 28, volunteer, September 7, 1861, three years, Second Virginia cavalry, company C, private, served three and one-fourth years, mustered out December 3, 1864, reenlistment, age 31, volunteer, March 1, 1865, one year, One Hundred and Ninety-fourth regiment, company I, sergeant, served eight months, mustered out October 28, 1865.

Woodburn, John Thomas, age 31, drafted, September, 1864, one year, Fifty-first regiment, company D, private, served eight months, mustered out June 10, 1865.

Wilson, James, volunteer, Thirty-third regiment, company D.

RECAPITULATION.

|  |     |
|--|-----|
| De Beck's battery.....   | 20  |
| Huntington's battery.....  | 3   |
| And one each in First Ohio light artillery, First United States light artillery.....   | 2   |
| Second Virginia cavalry.....   | 16  |
| Fourth Virginia cavalry.....   | 9   |
| Ninth Ohio cavalry.....  | 2   |
| And one each in Second Ohio cavalry, Third Virginia cavalry.....   | 2   |
| Seventy-seventh Ohio.....  | 85  |
| Seventh Virginia infantry.....   | 20  |
| Ninety-second Ohio.....  | 12  |
| One Hundred and Eightieth Ohio.....  | 11  |
| One Hundred and Ninety-fourth Ohio.....  | 8   |
| Fifty-first Ohio.....  | 8   |
| One Hundred and Eighty-seventh Ohio.....   | 14  |
| Eighteenth Ohio (three years).....   | 6   |
| Eighteenth Ohio (three months).....  | 1   |
| Twenty-fifth Ohio.....   | 10  |
| Sixty-second Ohio.....   | 6   |
| Sixty-third Ohio.....  | 5   |
| One Hundred and Sixteenth Ohio.....  | 5   |
| Thirty-sixth Ohio.....   | 4   |
| Fifteenth Ohio.....  | 3   |
| Twenty-seventh Ohio.....   | 3   |
| Thirty-second Ohio.....  | 3   |
| Thirty-ninth Ohio.....   | 2   |
| Twentieth Ohio.....  | 2   |
| Fourth Virginia infantry.....  | 2   |
| Fifth Ohio.....  | 2   |
| Forty-third Ohio.....  | 2   |
| And one each in Sixth Virginia infantry, Thirty-third Ohio, Nineteenth Ohio, Seventeenth Ohio, Twenty-third Ohio, Fourteenth Virginia, Forty-fifth Ohio, Fifty-ninth Ohio, Sixty-second Pennsylvania, Sixty-first Ohio, Sixty-seventh Ohio, Seventy-first Ohio, Seventy-eighth Ohio, Eighty-sixth Ohio, One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Ohio, One Hundred and Twenty-ninth Ohio, One Hundred and Forty-eighth Ohio National guards, One Hundred and Eighty-fourth Ohio, One Hundred and Eighty-ninth Ohio, not designated, 2; in all..... | 21  |
| Total number soldiers.....   | 272 |
| Died.....  | 45  |

INDEPENDENCE TOWNSHIP.

Baldwin, Perry, age 43, volunteer, October, 1861, three years, First regiment, company F, private.

Barr, Lewis, volunteer, 1862, three years, One Hundred and Sixteenth regiment, company F, private, served three years, mustered out June 14, 1865.

Blewer, James, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G.

Barnhart, James W., three years, Ninety-second regiment, company D.

Blewer, Hiram, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G.

Beabout, James, age 18, March 4, 1865, one year, Forty-third regiment, company G, private, served four months, mustered out July 13, 1865.

Boyle, Thomas M., Seventy-seventh regiment, company C.

Beaver, Francis M., age 21, volunteer, August 20, 1861, six months, Fourth Virginia cavalry, company G, private, mustered out.

Beaver, Abraham, age 17, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, second enlistment, age 21, drafted, March 23, 1865, one year, Thirty-ninth regiment, company C, private.

Beck, Preston, age 17, volunteer, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company F, private.

Bealour, James.

Beagal, Milton, age 22, volunteer, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private.

Begal, Jeremiah, age 18, volunteer, 1861, three years, First cavalry, company L, private, served three years, mustered out in 1864.

Belville, George, Fourteenth regiment, company F.

Bennett, Simeon, age 25, drafted, March 23, 1865, one year, Thirty-ninth regiment, company G, private, served three months, mustered out July, 1865.

Belville, James, Fifth regiment, company H.

Bowie, Eli, age 18, volunteer, February 27, 1864, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, served seventeen months, mustered out July, 1865.

Bowie, Harvey, age 18, volunteer, August, 1864, one year, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private.

Blower, D., Seventy-seventh regiment, company G.

Broom, James, age 37, volunteer, February, 1865, one year, One Hundred and Ninety-sixth regiment, company F, private.

Brown, George, age 40, drafted, March 23, 1865, one year, Sixty-third regiment, company I, private, served seven weeks, mustered out May 15, 1865.

Brown, James, One Hundred and Ninety-sixth regiment, company H, private.

Carson, James, age 27, volunteer, August, 1862, three years, One Hundred and Sixteenth regiment, company F, private, served two years, died October 28, 1864, in Andersonville prison.

Carson, Thomas, age 22, volunteer, October 28, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G, private, served one year, died October 4, 1862, of measles.

Carson, Andrew, age 20, volunteer, October 22, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G, private, served four months, died February 8, 1865, of measles at Camp Dennison.

Chapman, George, age 21, volunteer, July 22, 1861, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company B, private, served fourteen months, honorably discharged September 8, 1863, second enlistment, age 24, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company G, private, served four months, mustered out in 1864.

Chapman, Vivian, age 20, volunteer, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company F, private, served three years, mustered out June, 1865.

Chapman, James, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventy-fifth regiment, company B.

Chapman, William, age 36, volunteer, June 19, 1863, six months, One Hundred and Twenty-ninth regiment, company F, private, served nine months, mustered out March 5, 1864.

Chapman, John, Ninety-second regiment, company H.

Chapman, Joseph, age 38, volunteer, February, 1865, one year, One Hundred and Ninety-sixth regiment, company F, private, mustered out 1865.

Climan, John, age 17, substitute, March, 1865, one year, Sixty-third regiment, served seven weeks, mustered out May, 1865.

Cline, Jacob.

Cline, Isaiah, age 32, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, died September 15, 1862.

Cline, Joel, age 33, drafted, September, 1864, one year, Fifty-first regiment, company G, private, mustered out in 1865.

Cline, Marion, age 21, drafted, March, 1865, one year.

Cline, Luther, age 18, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G, private.

Cowen, Robert, age 46, drafted, September 26, 1864, one year, Forty-third regiment, company A, private, mustered out in 1865.

Davis, Bradford, age 17, volunteer, October 28, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, served fourteen months, December, 1862, veteran enlistment, age 20, volunteer, December 20, 1863, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, served one year and eight months, honorably discharged August 12, 1865.

David, James B., aged 40, drafted, September 28, 1864, one year, Fifty-first regiment, company G, private mustered out May 22, 1865.

Davis, Joel P., aged 20, volunteer, April 2, 1865, one year, One Hundred and Ninety-seventh regiment, company I, private, served four months, mustered out August, 1865.

Decker, Samuel.

Dilley, Jonathan, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company G, private, served three months, mustered out September, 1864.

Donley, Francis M., aged 18, volunteer, December, 1863, three years, Fifth cavalry, company K.

Eddy, Alfred, aged 36, drafted, March 23, 1865, one year, honorably discharged June 6, 1865.

Edwards, John, aged 19, volunteer, August 27, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, served one year, died September 28, 1864.

Edwards, Richard, aged 19, volunteer, 1863, six months, Fourth Virginia cavalry, company G, private, served eight months, mustered out 1864, reenlisted, age 20, volunteer, August 24, 1864, one year, One Hundred and Seventy-fifth regiment, company K, private, mustered out June 20, 1865.

Ellifritz, James P., aged 28, volunteer, August 8, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company F, private, served one year and four months, died November 25, 1863.

Ellifritz, George W., aged 21, volunteer, August 8, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company F, private, served three years, mustered out June 10, 1865.

Ellis, John J., Sixth regiment, company G, private.

Farnsworth, John C., aged 18, volunteer, July, 1861, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company B, private, served two years and six months, reenlisted as veteran, aged 20, volunteered three years, Thirty-ninth, company B, private, served one year and six months, mustered out July 9, 1865.

Farnsworth, Samuel S., aged 25, volunteer, September 19, 1864, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company C, private, honorably discharged.

Farnsworth, Henry, aged 23, volunteer, August, 1861, three years, First Virginia cavalry, company F, private, mustered out.

Farnsworth, Thomas D., aged 18, volunteer, August, 1861, three years, First Virginia cavalry, company F, private, reenlisted as veteran, aged 20, volunteer, 1864, three years, First Virginia cavalry, company F, private.

Farnsworth, Joseph, aged 34, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company G, private, served four months, mustered out September, 1864.

Fleming, Leander, aged 20, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company G, private, served four months, mustered out September, 1864.

Fryman, Alexander, aged 18, substitute, February 28, 1865, one year, Forty-third regiment, company G, private, served four and one half months, mustered out July 13, 1865.

Francis, B., Fourth Virginia cavalry, company G.

Goddard, Joseph, aged 19, volunteer, August, 1861, three years, Seventh Virginia cavalry, company B, private.

Gilbert, Isaac, Seventy-seventh regiment, company E.

Goodman, John Henry, aged 21, drafted, March 23, 1865, one year, Thirty-ninth regiment, company C, private, served three months, mustered out July 9, 1865.

Goodrich, John, aged 27, volunteer, 1861, three years, First light artillery, company K, private, mustered out 1865.

Gouer, John, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G.

Grandon, George W., aged 22, volunteer, March 7, 1865, one year, One Hundred and Ninety-sixth regiment, company F, private, served six months, mustered out September 11, 1865.

Green, Isaac N., Ninety-second regiment, company H.

Greenback, William, aged 27, drafted, September 27, 1864, one year, Fifty-first regiment, company D, private, served nine months, mustered out June 20, 1865.

Hanght, Bennett, aged 29, substitute, October, 1864, one year, Fifty-first regiment, company G, private, served nine months, mustered out June 20, 1865.

Haynes, Crawford, aged 16, volunteer, March, 1864, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, companies F and K, private.

Heinselm, Christian, aged 23, volunteer, October 23, 1861, three years, Seventy-fifth regiment, company B, private, attained corporal, served three years, mustered out December 22, 1864.

Heinselm, Martin, aged 21, volunteer, October 23, 1861, three years, Seventy-fifth regiment, company B, private, served three years, mustered out 1864.

Heinselm, Jacob, aged 23, drafted March 23, 1865, one year, Thirty-ninth regiment, company D, private, served three months, mustered out July, 1865.

Hicks, Ambrose.

Hicks, John, volunteer, 1861, three years, Second Virginia cavalry, company G, private, served seven months, honorably discharged, reenlistment, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company G, private, served four months, mustered out September, 1864, third enlistment, drafted, September, 1864, one year, Eighty-eighth regiment, company G, served six months, died April, 1865.

Hill, Thomas G., age 30, volunteer, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G, private, died April 8, 1862, killed at Pittsburgh Landing.

Hoffman, Conrad G., age 36, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company G, mustered out, September, 1864.

Homan, John L., Seventy-seventh regiment, company B.

Hornet, David.

Hutchinson, James, age 23, volunteer, July, 1861, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company B, private, served six months, died January 23, 1862.

Jobes, George, Ninety-second regiment, company F, died.

Jones, John R., age 23, volunteer, November 20, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G, private, served two years, 1863, veteran enlistment, age 25, volunteer, February, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G, private, attained rank of corporal.

Justice, Phineas J., age 36, volunteer, September 10, 1861, three years, First light artillery, company K, private, served three years, mustered out November 5, 1864.

Justice, John William, age 22, volunteer, November 15, 1861, three years, First light artillery, company K, private, veteran enlistment, age 24, volunteer, 1864, three years, First light artillery, company K, private, served three years and eight months, mustered out July 31, 1865.

Justice, Reuben J., age 20, volunteer, February, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private.

Kemp, Nathan, age 51, volunteer, October 23, 1861, three years, Seventy-fifth regiment, company B, private, served ten months, honorably discharged September 4, 1862.

Kemp, William J., age 17, volunteer, July 22, 1861, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company B, private, died July, 1862.

Kerns, Andrew J., age 33, volunteer, drafted, March 23, 1865, one year, Thirty-ninth regiment, company C.

Kidder, Rufus, age 29, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company G, private.

Kidder, Erastus, age 21, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company G, private, reenlistment, age 22, volunteer, February, 1865, one year, One Hundred and Ninety-fifth regiment, company I, private.

Kidder, Carolus, age 20, volunteer, February, 1865, one year, One Hundred and Ninety-fifth regiment, company I, private.

Kiggins, Joseph, age 18, October, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, reenlistment, age 20, volunteer, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C.

Kiggins, Samuel, age 17, volunteer, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private.

Kiggins, Elijah W., age 19, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company G, private, served four months, mustered out September, 1864, reenlistment, age 20, volunteer, March 9, 1865, one year, One Hundred and Ninety-sixth regiment, company F, private, served six months, mustered out September 11, 1865.

Landy, Calvin, age 19, substitute, March, 1865, one year, Eighteenth regiment, company E, private, served five months, died August 26, 1865.

Lee, Peter, age 20, volunteer, August 22, 1862, three years, One Hundred and Sixteenth regiment, company F, private, served three years, mustered out August 8, 1865.

Lee, William, age 33, drafted, March 23, 1865, one year, Thirty-ninth regiment, company C, private.

Lever, James, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G.

Luddington, Henry, age 40, drafted, September 27, 1864, one year, Fifty-first regiment, company G, private, served ten months, mustered out June 20, 1865.

Martin, John, age 19, Ninety-second regiment, company F, died April 15, 1863, of typhoid fever, in Tennessee.

McFarland, Amos M., age 30, drafted, September 27, 1864, one year, Fifty-first regiment, company G, private, served ten months, mustered out June 20, 1865.

McKean, Samuel, age 18, volunteer, March, 1865, one year, One Hundred and Ninety-fifth regiment, company K, private.

McFarland, William F., age 21, substitute, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Thirty-second regiment, company B, private, served three months, died August 17, 1864.

McFarland, Amos M., age 19, substitute, October, 1864, one year, Sixty-second regiment, company I, private, served seven months, died May 17, 1865.

Merical, John, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G.

Miles, William, age 41, volunteer, August 1, 1861, three years, Seventh Virginia, company D, private, served three years, mustered out August 27, 1864.

Mellen, Franklin S., Seventy-seventh regiment, company G.

Miller, John, age 25, drafted, March 23, 1865, one year.

Murphy, William, age 21, volunteer, September 3, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, private, served three years, mustered out 1864.

Moore, Grandville, age 18, volunteer, November, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G, private.

Noffsinger, Matthias, age 18, volunteer, November, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G, private, served five months, died April 8, 1862, killed.

Osten, James.

Parr, James, age 26, drafted, September 27, 1864, one year, Fifty-first regiment, company G, private, served ten months, mustered out June 20, 1865.

Powell, Reuben, volunteer, 1863, six months, Fourth Virginia cavalry, company G, private, served six months, mustered out with regiment.

Parr, Lorenzo D., age 19, volunteer, February, 1865, one year, Nineteenth regiment company I.

Powell, James, Fifty-third regiment, company B.

Patterson, Henry, age 51, volunteer, February, 1864, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company G, private, served ten months, discharged January 5, 1865.

Paynter, Daniel, aged 26, volunteer, October 28, 1861, three years, First Virginia regiment, company F, private, served three years, mustered out November 26, 1864.

Pickle, Matthias, One Hundred and Ninety-fifth regiment, company I.

Peterson, Thomas, age 35, volunteer, August 22, 1862, three years, One Hundred and Sixteenth regiment, company F, private, served three years, mustered out 1865.

Powell, Jesse, Thirty-sixth regiment, company K.

Pittman, Jacob, age 19, substitute, March 28, 1865, one year, Eighteenth regiment, company E, private, served four months, mustered out August 9, 1865.

Powell, George, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G.

Pool, Alexander, age 25, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventy-fifth regiment, company B, private, served two years, died November, 1863.

Rea, Thompson N., age 23, volunteer, August, 1863, six months, Fourth Virginia cavalry, company G, private, served five months, died January, 1864.

Rea, Samuel Kemper, age 20, volunteer, September, 1862, three years, Seventh cavalry, company H, private, served one year, died August, 1863.

Ray, John, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K.

Rea, James Richard, age 20, volunteer, August 11, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company F, corporal, served three years, mustered out June 10, 1865.

Rea, Philip Greene, age 18, volunteer, 1863, six months, Fourth Virginia cavalry, company G, private, mustered out, reenlistment, age 19, volunteer, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company G, private, mustered out.

Rea, William Henry, age 20, volunteer, 1863, six months, Fourth Virginia cavalry, company G, private, attained rank of quartermaster sergeant, mustered out, reenlistment, age 21, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company G, private, mustered out September 15, 1865.

Riggs, David, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company G, corporal, mustered out.

Riggs, Asbury, age 20, volunteer, August 20, 1863, six months, Fourth Virginia cavalry, company G, private, served seven months, mustered out March 8, 1864, reenlistment, age 21, volunteer, March 31, 1864, three years, First light artillery, company K, private, served one year and three months, mustered out July 19, 1865.

Roth, Nicholas, age 22, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G, private, died April, 1862, killed at Pittsburgh, Landing.

Roth, Jacob, age 18, volunteer, September 20, 1864, one year, Seventy-seventh regiment, company E, private, served ten months, mustered out July 31, 1865.

Scott, William, Seventy-seventh regiment, company K, private, died October 3, 1863, at Little Rock, Arkansas.

Sheppard, James, age 21, volunteer, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private, mustered out June, 1865, died.

Shockley, Squire, age 29, volunteer, December 10, 1861, three years, Seventy-fifth regiment, company B, private, served three months, died March 23, 1862.

Sipple, Daniel, age 21, volunteer, November, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G, private, served five months, died April 8, 1862.

Sipple, William, age 22, volunteer, February 14, 1865, one year,

One Hundred and Eighty-sixth regiment, company I, private, served seven months, mustered out September 25, 1865.

Skinner, James, age 19, volunteer, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G, private, died January 24, 1862, of measles, at Camp Dennison.

Skinner, George, age 25, drafted, March 23, 1865, one year, Thirty-ninth regiment, company G, private, served three months.

Stump, John, Seventh Virginia, company B, died.

Thomas, John L., age 22, volunteer, December, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company E, sergeant, served three years and three months, mustered out March, 1865.

Tice, Solomon, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G, private.

Tice, William P., age 21, volunteer, November, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G, private, served one year, died April 29, 1862, mortally wounded at Louisville.

Tice, Jacob, drafted, March 13, 1865, one year, Thirty-ninth regiment, company C, private.

Tice, William Harrison, drafted, September 27, 1864, one year, Twentieth regiment, company E, private, honorably discharged.

Tice, George W., age 38, drafted, March 25, 1865, one year, Thirty-ninth regiment, company C, private, served three months, mustered out July 9, 1865.

Tice, Lewis, age 33, drafted, September, 1864, one year, Twentieth regiment, company E, private, served eight months, mustered out May 30, 1865.

Tool, Alexander, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B, died.

Tice, Noah, age 17, volunteer, November 4, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G, private, honorably discharged in 1863, reenlisted September 17, 1864, one year, One Hundred and Eighty-second regiment, company C, private, served ten months, mustered out July 17, 1865.

Tice, Henry, age 14, volunteer, November, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G, private.

Todd, James, age 35, volunteer, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company G, private, died April 22, 1865, at Nashville, Tennessee.

Voshel, John, age 26, volunteer, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G, private, died November 5, 1863, at Alton, Illinois.

Ward, John, Ninety-second regiment, company F.

Ward, Jacob, age 18, volunteer, August, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company C, private, served nine months, died May 14, 1863.

Wells, Christopher, drafted, March 25, 1865, one year, Thirty-ninth regiment, company C, private, served three months, mustered out July 9, 1865.

Wells, Samuel, drafted, March, 1865, one year, Thirty-ninth regiment, company C, private, served three months, mustered out July 9, 1865.

Wells, Sheffield B., age 19, volunteer, July, 1861, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company B, private, served nine months, died in April, 1862.

Wells, Nelson F., age 17, volunteer, October 31, 1861, three years, Eighteenth Kentucky regiment, company F, private, served two years, veteran enlistment, age 19, volunteer, 1864, three years, Eighteenth Kentucky regiment, company F, private, served one and a half years, mustered out July 18, 1865.

Wells, Lewis Henry, age 16, volunteer, 1863, six months, One Hundred and Twenty-ninth regiment, company F, private, served seven months, mustered out in March, 1864, second enlistment, substitute, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company G, private, served four months, mustered out September, 1864, third enlistment, age 17, substitute, 1865, one year, Eighteenth regiment, company C, private.

Widger, Ananias, age 23, substitute, April, 1865, one year, Thirty-ninth regiment, company C, private, served three months.

Williams, John, age 19, August 29, 1863, three years, Fourth Virginia cavalry, company G, private, died.

Williamson, Stephen, Seventy-fifth regiment, company B.

Wilson, Richard, age 45, volunteer, 1862, three years, One Hundred and Sixteenth regiment, company F, private, served one year, honorably discharged.

Wiseman, Thomas, age 23, volunteer, October, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, corporal, attained the rank of sergeant, veteran enlistment, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company C, sergeant, attained rank of lieutenant.

Yonally, Jesse, age 40, drafted, September, 1864, one year, Fifty-first regiment, company G, private, served nine months, mustered out June, 1865.

Yonally, Asa, age 33, volunteer, February, 1865, one year, Thirty-sixth regiment, company C, private, served five months, mustered out July, 1865.

Yonally, Solomon, age 27, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G, private, served seven months, honorably discharged June, 1862.

RECAPITULATION.

|  |     |
|--|-----|
| DeBeck's battery.....  | 4   |
| Fourth Virginia cavalry.....   | 9   |
| First Virginia cavalry.....  | 2   |
| And one each in Second and Seventh Virginia cavalry, First, Fifth, and Seventh Ohio cavalry, in all.....   | 5   |
| Seventy-seventh Ohio.....  | 41  |
| Ninety-second Ohio.....  | 14  |
| Thirty-ninth Ohio.....   | 16  |
| Seventy-fifth Ohio.....  | 8   |
| Fifty-first Ohio.....  | 8   |
| Thirty-sixth Ohio.....   | 7   |
| One Hundred and Forty-eighth Ohio National guard.....  | 13  |
| One Hundred and Sixteenth Ohio.....  | 5   |
| One Hundred and Ninety-sixth Ohio.....   | 5   |
| One Hundred and Ninety-fifth Ohio.....   | 4   |
| Eighteenth Ohio (three years).....   | 3   |
| Seventh Virginia.....  | 2   |
| One Hundred and Twenty-ninth Ohio.....   | 2   |
| Forty-third Ohio.....  | 3   |
| Sixty-third Ohio.....  | 2   |
| Twentieth Ohio.....  | 2   |
| One each in the First, Fourteenth, Fifth, Sixth, Nineteenth, Fifty-third, Sixty-second, Eighty-eighth, One Hundred and Ninety-seventh, One Hundred and Seventy-fifth, One Hundred and Eighty-second, One Hundred and Eighty-sixth, One Hundred and Thirty-second, First Virginia, Eighteenth Kentucky, not designated 7, in all..... | 22  |
| Total number of soldiers.....  | 168 |
| Died.....  | 31  |

LAWRENCE TOWNSHIP.

Alexander, Samuel, age 38, volunteer, September 1, 1864, one year, One Hundred and Seventy-ninth regiment, company F, private, served ten months, mustered out June, 1865.

Alexander, A., age 28, volunteer, September 1, 1864, one year, One Hundred and Seventy-ninth regiment, company F, private, served ten months, mustered out June, 1865.

Atkinson, James, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F.

Atkinson, William Templeton, age 22, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company G, private, died July 23, 1864.

Atkinson, Charles, age 20, volunteer, August 23, 1864, one year, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, served eleven months, mustered out July, 1865.

Atkinson, George Templeton, age 18, volunteer, February 23, 1864, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, served one year and six months, mustered out July, 1865.

Bartmess, Washington, age 25, volunteer, 1862, three years, One Hundred and Sixteenth regiment, company F, private.

Bartmess, Jacob S., age 21, volunteer, March 28, 1863, three years, Thirty-eighth regiment, company D, private, served two years and three months, mustered out July, 1865.

Bartmess, Samuel, age 20, volunteer, October 16, 1863, six months, Fourth regiment Virginia cavalry, company M, private, served six months, mustered out with regiment.

Bender, Frederick, age 36, drafted, March 23, 1865, one year, Eighteenth regiment, company F, private.

Baumes, Jacob, Seventy-seventh regiment, died.

Bony, Simon, age 36, drafted, September 27, 1864, one year, Sixty-sixth regiment, company B, private, served two months and two weeks, died December 14, 1864, at Nashville, Tennessee, of consumption.

Boswell, James R., age 29, volunteer, August 8, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company F, private, served one year, honorably discharged August 23, 1863, reenlisted, age 32, drafted, September 28, 1864, one year, Sixty-sixth regiment, company E, private, served eight months, mustered out June 2, 1865.

Bowie, James R., Seventy-seventh regiment, company D, died at Alton, Illinois.

Boye, Eli, Thirty-sixth regiment, company G.

Britton, Luther Dale, age 33, drafted, September 28, 1864, one year, Seventy-first regiment, company F, private, served five months, died February, 1865, at Louisville, of smallpox.

Britton, William Henry, age 19, volunteer, August 30, 1863, six months, Fourth regiment Virginia cavalry, company G, private, mustered out, reenlisted, age 20, volunteer, August 12, 1864, one year, One Hundred and Seventy-fifth regiment, company K, private, served ten months, mustered out June 27, 1865.

Brooks, David, age 23, volunteer, March 21, 1864, three years, First regiment light artillery, company K, private, served one year and three months, mustered out July, 1865.

Bull, Reason H., age 36, volunteer, August, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company F, sergeant, attained rank of second lieutenant, served two years and ten months, mustered out 1865.

Bull, William R., Ninety-second regiment, company F.

Calvert, Alfred, age 47, substitute, September, 1864, one year, Seventy-first regiment, company C, private.

Cantwell, Joseph M., age 25, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company D, private, died July, 1862.

Carpenter, Samuel, age 40, volunteer, December, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company H, private, served five months, died May 19, 1862.

Carpenter, Alexander, age 25, volunteer, December, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company D, private, served two years, honorably discharged February, 1864, reenlisted as a veteran, age 27, volunteer, February, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company D, private.

Casady, Amzi, age 21, volunteer, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company F, private, served three months, died of smallpox January 23, 1865.

Clasey, Wine Rood, age 42, drafted, March 23, 1865, one year, Thirty-ninth regiment, company B, private, mustered out July 27, 1865.

Cline Peter, age 23, volunteer, 1861, three years, First regiment cavalry, company D, private.

Covey, Morgan, One Hundred and Seventy-fifth regiment, died May 22, 1865, at Columbia, Tennessee.

Cline John, drafted, September, 1864, one year, Fifty-fifth regiment, company D, private, mustered out.

Cameron, Andrew, volunteer, 1864, one year, One Hundred and Seventy-fifth regiment, company K, private, served one year, mustered out with regiment.

Close, Daniel, August 14, 1862, three years, First regiment Virginia light artillery, company A, private.

Clute, John, Thirty-sixth regiment, company E.

Cockings, James, age 26, drafted, March, 1865, one year, Thirty-ninth regiment, company B, private, served three months, mustered out July 9, 1865.

Conner John, Eighteenth regiment, company C.

Covey, Marion, Ninety-second regiment, company F.

Covey, William Mason, age 18, volunteer, February 29, 1864, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, companies F and K, private, served seventeen months, mustered out July, 1865.

Cunningham Wilson, age 34, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company H, private, honorably discharged May, 1862.

Callahan, Oliver, volunteer, 1864, one year, One Hundred and Seventy-fifth regiment, company K, private, served one year, mustered out with regiment.

Cuthbert, Ralph, volunteer, August 9, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company F, private, served two years and six months, mustered out June 6, 1865.

Cuthbert, Ralph W., age 18, volunteer, September, 1863, six months, Fourth Virginia cavalry, company G, private, served eight months, mustered out May, 1864, reenlistment, age 19, volunteer, August 6, 1864, one year, One Hundred and Seventy-fifth regiment, company K, private, attained rank of corporal, served nine months, died May 11, 1865, effects of exposure at the battle of Nashville.

Cuthbert, Ralph D., age 25, volunteer, September, 1863, six months, Fourth Virginia cavalry, company G, private, served eight months, mustered out May, 1864.

Dye, Morgan, Ninety-second regiment, company F.

Davis, Frank, age 29, Ninety-second regiment, company H, died May, 1864, at Atlanta, Georgia, gun-shot.

Dye, Amos, Seventy-seventh regiment, company H.

Dickes Charles, age 34, drafted, September 28, 1864, one year, Thirty-third regiment, company I, private, served nine months, mustered out July 5, 1865.

Dye, John Ely, Ninety-second regiment, company F.

Draher, John, age 23, drafted, March 23, 1865, one year, Thirty-ninth regiment, company B, private.

Dye, Daniel W., volunteer, September, 1861, three years, First cavalry, company L, corporal, attained rank of first lieutenant, served four years, mustered out September 28, 1865.

Draper, Adam, age 16, substitute, 1862, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B, private.

Dye, Ross N., First cavalry, company H.

Dunlap, William, age 20, volunteer, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company F, private, died in March, 1864, at Nashville, Tennessee.

Drew, Jesse P., Thirty-sixth regiment, company H.

Dye, Thomas, First cavalry, company L.

Dye, Minor M., volunteer, 1864, one year, One Hundred and Seventy-fifth regiment, company K, corporal, served one year, mustered out with regiment.

Dye, S. P., Ninety-second regiment, company F.

Dye, Dudley, Seventy-seventh regiment, company H.

Davis, Isaiah, volunteer, 1863, six months, Fourth Virginia cavalry, company G, private, served six months, mustered out with regiment.

Early, William, age 24, substitute, 1862, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G, private, died 1863, Alton, Illinois, of lung fever.

Early, James, volunteer, 1862, three years, One Hundred and Sixteenth regiment, company F, private.

Early, Thomas, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventy-Seventh regiment, company D, private, reenlistment, volunteer, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company D, private.

Early, George Washington, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G, private, veteran enlistment, volunteer, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G, private.

Early, John Morris, volunteer, 1861, three years Seventy-seventh regiment, company G, private, veteran enlistment, volunteer, 1864, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company G, private.

Early, John Alexander, drafted, March 23, 1865, one year, Thirty-ninth regiment, private, served five months, mustered out August 26, 1865.

Early, William Thomas, drafted, March 23, 1865, one year, Thirty-ninth regiment, company G, private, served three and one-half months, mustered out July 18, 1865.

Efaw, Lugenius, volunteer, August 17, 1862, three years, One Hundred and Sixteenth regiment, company F, private.

Eifler, Charles.

Eifler, Jacob.

Evilsiser, Samuel Hunt, age 29, volunteer, August 5, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company F, private, served three years, mustered out June 10, 1865.

Evilsiser, Jonathan, age 20, volunteer, July, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company F, private, died September, 1863, mortally wounded at Chickamauga.

Evilsiser, Josiah, age 19, volunteer, February, 1864, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company K, private, served one and one-half years, mustered out July, 1865.

Foster, George, Thirty-sixth regiment, company G.

Forest, Andrew, age 20, volunteer, July 31, 1861, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company B, private, served three years, mustered out 1864.

Foster, John, Thirty-sixth regiment.

Foster, Archibald, age 28, volunteer, September, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company G, private, served three months, died December 25, 1861, of typhoid fever, at Summersville.

Foster, James, age 26, volunteer, February, 1864, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company G, private, served one year, honorably discharged 1865.

Foster, Josephus, age 22, volunteer, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company G, private.

Foster, Albert, age 20, volunteer, 1861, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company G, private, served three years, mustered out 1864.

Frazer, Adam, Seventy-seventh regiment, company B.

Gilsher, Jacob, age 20, volunteer, 1861, three years, Thirty-ninth regiment, company B, private, veteran enlistment.

Gist, William, age 45, volunteer, September 5, 1864, one year, One Hundred and Seventy-ninth regiment, company F, private.

Gitchell, John Wesley, age 27, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company G, corporal, attained rank of sergeant, reenlistment, age 28, drafted, March, 1865, one year, Sixty-third regiment, private.

Gitchell, Joseph Harmen, age 21, volunteer, May, 1864, one hundred days, One Hundred and Forty-eighth regiment, company G, private.

Greathouse, McDonald, age 23, drafted, March, 1865, one year, Thirty-ninth regiment, company G, private, served three and a half months, mustered out July 18, 1865.

Greathouse, Peter, age 26, volunteer, August 6, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company F, private, served one and two-thirds years, honorably discharged in 1864.

Green, Isaac Newton, age 24, volunteer, August 12, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company H, private, served two and ten-twelfths years, mustered out June, 1865.

Groves, James, volunteer, 1864, one year, One Hundred and Seventy-fifth regiment, company K, private, attained the rank of corporal, served one year, mustered out with regiment.

Guist, James, age 19, volunteer, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company F, private, died May 10, 1864, of typhoid fever, at Carthage, Tennessee.

Guyton, Jacob, age 32, drafted September 28, 1864, one year, Twenty-third regiment, company A, private, honorably discharged May 8, 1865.

Harris, Isaac, age 19, Ninety-second regiment, company F, died at Camden, Tennessee.

Harris, William, age 20, volunteer, 1863, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company F, private, served five months, died March 31, 1864.

Harshy, William Wesley, age 26, volunteer, August, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company F, private, served two years and six months, mustered out June 10, 1865.

Haight, Levi, age 37, volunteer, 1861, three years, Seventy-seventh regiment, company F, private.

Haight, Joshua, age 19, volunteer, August 24, 1864, one year, Thirty-sixth regiment, company F, private, served ten months, mustered out June 27, 1865.

Henning, William, aged 33, volunteer, August 7, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company F, private, served two and ten-twelfths years, mustered out June 10, 1865.

Hill, McIntosh, volunteer, August 12, 1862, three years, Thirty-sixth regiment, company I, private.

Hoff, Washington George, age 31, volunteer, August 4, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company F, private, served ten months, died June 12, 1865, of chronic diarrhoea.

Hoff, Kingsbury, age 24, volunteer, August 8, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company F, private, served two and ten-twelfths years, mustered out June, 1865.

Hoff, Ford Plum, age 16, volunteer, October 3, 1864, one year, First Virginia cavalry, company L, private, served eight months, honorably discharged June, 1865.

Immel, George, age 18, volunteer, August 11, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company F, private, served two and ten-twelfths years, mustered out June 10, 1865.

Jameson, James, age 23, volunteer, August 11, 1862, three years, Ninety-second regiment, company F, private, served two and ten-twelfths years, mustered out June 10, 1865.

John, Anthony, Seventy-Seventh regiment, company D, died.

